

2006

Haywire

Utah State University Press

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.usu.edu/swenson_awards

 Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Utah State University Press, "Haywire" (2006). Swenson Poetry Award Winners. Book 8. http://digitalcommons.usu.edu/swenson_awards/8

This Book is brought to you for free and open access by the USU Press at DigitalCommons@USU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Swenson Poetry Award Winners by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@USU. For more information, please contact becky.thoms@usu.edu.

May Swenson
POETRY AWARD SERIES

Haywire

poems by George Bilgere

foreword by Edward Field

HAYWIRE

May Swenson
Poetry Award Series

HAYWIRE

poems by

George Bilgere

UTAH STATE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Logan, Utah

Utah State University Press
Logan, UT 84322-7800

Copyright 2006 George Bilgere
All rights reserved

Cover art by David Wilder Cover design by Barbara Yale-Read Manufactured in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Bilgere, George, 1951-Haywire : poems / by George Bilgere.
p. cm. -- (May Swenson Poetry Award series)

ISBN-13: 978-0-87421-646-2 (cloth : alk. paper)

ISBN-10: 0-87421-646-X (cloth : alk. paper)

ISBN-13: 978-0-87421-647-9 (pbk. : alk. paper)

ISBN-10: 0-87421-647-8 (pbk. : alk. paper) ISBN 0-87421-541-2 (e-book)

I. Title. II. Series.
PS3552.I425H39 2006
811'.54--dc22

2006012212

For Jodie

CONTENTS

Acknowledgments ix

Foreword by Edward Field xi

Aria 5

Birds 6

This Summer 7

The Bear 8

The Surgeon General 10

That's a Take 11

Simile Practice 12

Once Again I Fail to Read an Important Novel 13

Happy Hour 14

The Mastodon at the Carnegie Natural History Museum 15

Janitorial 16

Say My Name 17

Petroglyphs 19

Tosca 21

Vikings 25

Miss December 26

Blood-Soaked Bear Turd 27

Retards 28

Good Humor 30

Haywire 31

Casablanca 32

Norelco 34

What Would Jesus Do? 35

Unwise Purchases 36

View of the City of Delft 38

Anniversary 40

The Table 41

Chinese 43

She's Good 47

Waiting 49

Museum Piece 51

Olympics 52

Dark Side of the Moon 53

Going to Bed 54

Citizen Kane 55

Global Warming 56

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

My thanks to the journals in which the poems below appeared or are forthcoming:

Chattahoochee Review: Aria, Retards

Comstock Review: View of the City of Delft

Denver Quarterly: Haywire

Fulcrum: Closing Time (reprinted here as Happy Hour), Museum Piece, Simile Practice

The Georgia Review: That's a Take

The Iowa Review: Good Humor

The Journal: She's Good

Meridian: Casablanca

The Mid-America Poetry Review: Once Again I Fail to Read an Important Novel, Tosca

Missouri Review: Waiting

Poetry: Janitorial, The Surgeon General

Rattle: Unwise Purchases

River Styx: Miss December

Tar River Poetry: Citizen Kane, Norelco, The Table

FOREWORD

I understood the danger of judging this competition right away—I'd be looking for poetry I myself would like to have written. And for the political subject matter that obsesses me in this age of ruthless empire building. No such luck in the manuscripts submitted to me. Not one real rant against the forces attacking our democracy, from the inside or the outside. No book of poems from the Iraqi front—that would certainly have been a strong contender.

So I tried to imagine what May Swenson, the namesake of this book award, would have chosen. She was always one of my guides, with her instinct for the precise words for what she was talking about, and best of all an accurate account of events and experience, full of sly imagery that slipped in and out of the closet. From her I learned that poetry is the saying of it. No room for any dogma there, political or religious. She pulls me back into the realm of Poetry, even if we're now in a post-Eliot, post-Marianne Moore, even post-Ginsberg and post-Ashbery age, where anything smacking of High Art is out the window.

One thing I knew from the beginning—I wasn't interested in what I call the torturers of the language, who write without any relation to what and how we really speak, who think that it's poetry because it's unusual. Poetry for me is not inventing fancy ways of saying things, unless it's playful. It's what it says as much as how—the trick is to find the exact words. And nature description, no matter how clever—landscapes without humans front and center in them—has never interested me. Harder to pass over were the poets whose poetry was part of their struggle for sanity, or poets climbing out of some abyss of failed relationships, or poets who submitted the selected poems of a lifetime, a lifetime dedicated to the Sacred Art. I could see that winning would have meant so much to them. And yet, and yet. . . . And here I must lament the lack of humor in the pile of submissions. Bawdiness would have been very welcome in the litany of sorrows. What dismayed me the most about the entrants, though, is how the world of the poetry workshop, with its fear of emotion masked under the prohibition against something called sentimentality, hovered like a fog.

I knew nothing about the author of Haywire when I finally picked up the manuscript—the submissions were anonymous—but even though some of the others were just as proficient, I felt comfortable with this one, even ready to argue with the author, for the poetry raised issues for me. I could tell the poet was a guy. (Actually, for May's sake, I would like to have awarded the prize to a woman poet, and I feel slightly guilty for not doing so. But just as guilty for not giving it to a fellow gay poet.) Not openly political, this poet—you knew from his very first lines—didn't fall for anything phony, the hypocritical discourse the media swamp us with, and his own language is irresistibly no-bullshit, down to earth, even sassy. He's unpretentious, speaks as openly from his feelings as guys in this culture can, and has opera in his life—I dig that, with its sexy overtones. In fact, many of the poems are like operatic arias, bel canto style, with its seemingly easy, soaring melodies. And there is plenty going on in this book. Here, I felt, was an irresistible, not-so-easy, engaging humanness, whereas the brilliant technicians—and there were a number of those in the pile—left me cold. This one is simply a damn good poet. So good, that when I found out who he was, and that he'd already gotten several major awards, one chosen by Poet Laureate Billy Collins, I was dismayed that I hadn't been the one to discover him!

I was even more impressed when I read the title poem "Haywire." It speaks of the staggering changes one lifetime has gone through, relegating the old loon—I identified there!—if not to the tower, then into a back bedroom, a burden, irrelevant. I am still stuck in a time when the youth would be marching not dusty country roads but the streets of towns and cities against the Vietnam war—though, sadly, until there's a draft, that's unlikely to happen again. With the changes that have confronted me in my life, from the Great Depression and bombing the Nazis in WWII, to the persecution of dissent (even original thought) in the Cold War, to the immensities of gay liberation, the electronic revolution and the frightening attacks on our secular traditions today, it's taken all my energy and resourcefulness not to be relegated to the back room myself! It takes fancy footwork indeed, and at my great age I'm not up to jitterbugging anymore. (Or what's the dance step you guys are doing now?)

While so many poets are torturing the language, accepting the role assigned to poetry as an academic discipline, or even a monastic one, George Bilgere sticks to a poetry of inclusion. Which means that if almost anyone would read his poetry, it seems to say, they'd understand it; it's about them too, even if, as another colloquial poet, Gerald Locklin, says with a tolerant shrug, "the people I write for don't read poetry." So Bilgere is not alone in this, and I mention Locklin purposely as an outstanding figure among a lot of southern California poets, who like many poets around the country (in a world which proclaims the subject of poetry is language) are also insisting on a poetry that uses language that's almost unobtrusive in order to focus on what it's saying. And speaks to someone, is not a solipsistic exercise. It's satisfying that Billy Collins, one of the leading poets of this subtly subversive "school," if one can call it that, was chosen Poet Laureate.

I don't sense any false notes in this book. It is very hard to sound natural like this when the weight of the poetic tradition is in your head, hard not to imitate but to discover what is natural for your own time and place. The poems give a sense of the genuine, of the authentic, not because of the simple language, which is after all the language of the feelings, but because it is grounded in real life. I should stress that if Bilgere is not an overtly political poet, his poem where Christ sits in the electric chair instead of being nailed to the cross, is one of the best poems I've seen against the death penalty. This is a great achievement in a world where we are drenched daily in false simplicities presented as patriotism, from the president on down. Poets have long fled banality, and every poet is faced with the challenge of finding a language to speak his or her own truth. So the most obvious solution, as proposed by Modern Poetry, has been to invent a new language, as many poets have done brilliantly, with elaborations of syntax, innovative word juxtapositions, rich sound. That is a noble endeavor, even if it's not the language very many people understand. But this poet does something harder. He reclaims the language as it is spoken. This is American speech transmuted into poetry. And the struggle to do this must be repeated in every generation, to recapture poetry from the forces that want to neuter it.

While I, who can claim to be one of the inspirations for this kind of poetry, go abroad frequently and find great nourishment in foreign cultures and languages, especially when America is launching its imperial mission with optional foreign wars, Bilgere turns his back on that and affirms an almost stay-at-home sensibility. He's been there, he seems to say, and knows the score. If I'm proudly cosmopolitan, his is the true American spirit—not flag waving, but skeptical. Coming from one of the ethnic, industrial cities, there's a gritty element in his work. He recalls all the sorrows of a life—the drunken father, the parents' divorce, his mother's death, his unremitting horniness, his own divorce—nothing special, just what we all have to deal with one way or another. And yet he ends on an almost contented note. Haywire is remarkable for being an essentially happy book, though with an ironic eye cast on such happiness while, as he knows, children are starving. And when he arrives at this, we don't say he's avoiding anything, we're glad for him.

Why am I so comfortable with this poet, especially since I keep wanting to argue for more political activism in the poetry? That's just it: I'd be able to argue with him, disagree and still feel we were friends. And I can grant that he may be more centered than I am in this country's spirit. His charm wins me over, and okay, those starving children will be there too, but I'll sit on a bar stool with him anytime.

Edward Field

HAYWIRE

We would give anything for what we have.

—Tony Hoagland

“Give me my leg,” she said.

—Flannery O’Connor

I

ARIA

Jussi Bjoerling, that soaring tenor, Was pulled down from the air.
My father pulled off to the shoulder And closed his eyes. Nessun Dorma, It might have been, or Cielo e Mar.

Hotter than Hades in the car But I knew enough by then To shut up. Even my sisters For once stopped their idiot fidgeting.
Somewhere that summer, Bjoerling Was dying of booze.
My father had lost a lung. No more Singing forever.

Through the bridal veil Of a cigarette, my mother Stared hard down the highway, Waiting for it to be over.

BIRDS

You keep reading about them Vanishing. Or not vanishing, Exactly, but finding themselves unwelcome.

This morning, for instance, I stood at the window with my coffee, Staring across the fields at the new development, And suddenly heard their silence From where the trees used to be.
The ruined choirs.

Not one black quarter note On the drooping measures of the wires.

It was the sound of the new order, half Breeze in the power lines, Half ruckus of the highway, that garbage Disposal of our hunger.

And then,
To make matters worse, a dead bird Was waiting for me on the sidewalk As I walked to the CVS
For some more Theraflu.

It always amazes me, the way Birds seem to have practiced for this All their lives. Eyes pursed in concentration.
Body cupped in a prayer of wings.

The tiny grip of their claws On death's invisible branch.

THIS SUMMER

The big-dick rides have taken over the Coke-soaked acres of Great America.

Now your death-defying, one-hour wait is for Big Dude, or the Tower of Power, or even the Magnum XL 2000.

Gone
are the hokey thrills of yesteryear,

The furtive, darkly vaginal ones, like the Haunted House,

which was really

the Tunnel of Love, which was actually

the Haunted House.

They were too slow.
They took forever.

THE BEAR

The first thing I saw when I came to visit my friend in the hospice at the edge of town was an old woman holding a bear.

She was in a wheelchair on the lawn, staring out at the lake.

A heavy-set young Candy Striper was trying to administer some meds but the woman was nursing her bear and she wasn't about to stop.

That's how life is.
You enter into it from the darkness of your mother's womb and someone hands you a bear.

You hold on for dear life through nightmares and a handful of peaceful years.

Then comes a long period of cars and houses, gardening in the back yard of that nice bungalow in Des Moines you and Jim lived in after he got transferred, sex passing over you like a fever, gin and bridge on the porch in the summer evenings, a war, and suddenly someone you barely remember giving birth to one winter in Chicago, when all the pipes burst, or was it St. Louis, is driving you here on a spring afternoon, the birds singing, everybody apologizing, finally leaving you in a wheelchair out on the lawn, with nothing to do all day but love your little brown bear, who waited all this time for you to come home.

THE SURGEON GENERAL

The year he came out with his warning, like Luther nailing up his theses, my mother was frying us some salmon cakes for dinner, or maybe a little Spam, trying to stretch that dollar with hominy like white teeth from a can.

Divorce felt like another country.
Suddenly Cassius Clay knocked out Sonny Liston on our kitchen floor.
My sisters struggled with a Barbie.
Through trees in the back yard Vietnam moved like bad weather.

In the bathroom a wrinkled girl with a staple in her navel presided over my pale, original boners. 1964.

Somewhere back in St. Louis lay my pale, original father.
Let the niggers kill each other, said my mother unto the frying pan, lighting up yet another of the million Parliaments it took to kill her.

THAT'S A TAKE

She's just finished mourning for us all the fact that spring is here above the buzz and clatter of this crowded café where I have stopped reading the paper because it's impolite to do anything while Ella Fitzgerald is singing.

And in the pause that follows, I imagine her turning away from the bright, entranced face of the microphone, kidding with the sound technicians while putting on her hat and a pale green sweater before she steps out of the studio and into a spring day as it played out in 1951, the year I was born, stopping on the way home at a little deli to pick up something for supper, turning words like macaroni and potato salad into tiny American songs for the pimply kid behind the counter who thinks nothing of it, who has his own problems, who bears his own secret beauty through the world.

SIMILE PRACTICE

When I taught English as a Second Language the whole class sat down every night in the Adult Education Classroom and talked about the strange creature, the big, unruly language I offered them.

English sound like plastic click together! said the Vietnamese girl in a voice like bits of breaking plastic.

Like lot of cricket everywhere, said the weird kid from Korea, permanently wired to his Walkman.

Sound like hit a dog with wood stick, suggested the businessman from Oman, who resembled a penguin in the three-piece suit he wore even in the St. Louis summer.

Yuriko, who just wanted to please, said, I'm enjoy English, singing like nightingale, while our ill-tempered Italian, Mauricio, said simply, Sound like shit.

And so it went, that wild animal looming around them, clicking like plastic, howling like a dog, singing like nightingale, sounding like shit, until one day it lifted its heavy, hairy bulk and shuffled out of the classroom, leaving the door wide open. And there, on the varied and ample plain, stood America, with its malls and soaring cities, its blue jeans and fast cars full of French fries and breast implants.

And all my students were gone, for the strange beast they'd studied for so long had eaten them, each and every one.

ONCE AGAIN I FAIL TO READ AN IMPORTANT NOVEL

Instead, we sit together beside the fountain, the important novel and I.

We are having coffee together in that quiet first hour of the morning, respecting each other's silences in the shadow of an important old building in this small but significant European city.

All the characters can relax.
I'm giving them the day off.
For once they can forget about their problems—desire, betrayal, the fatal denouement—and just sit peacefully beside me.

In the afternoon, at lunch near the cathedral, and in the evening, after my lonely, historical walk along the promenade, the men and women, the children and even the dogs in the important, complicated novel have nothing to fear from me.

We will sit quietly at the table with a glass of cool red wine and listen to the pigeons questioning each other in the ancient corridors.

HAPPY HOUR

God created the world and then vanished into heaven, Slamming the door behind him.

My father created the world, then went downtown to the old Coronado Hotel with a bottle of Jim Beam.

God still gets angry from time to time, shaking things up, knocking things down, drowning and burning anyone who gets in his way.
Then he'll just disappear for a month or two.

My father would show up in the middle of the night, smash everything in the kitchen, curse creation, then head out on a three-day bender.

Drop by any church nowadays and there's not a trace of God inside.
Just an old man looking haunted.

That's how St. Louis feels when I go back to visit.
Big empty streets Daddy used to drive.
The cauldron of our old house, a new family bubbling up inside.

I can see my father and God in the now defunct Tack Room at the Chase.
God hated my father. My father hated God.

Shit-faced, they sit there smiling at each other. Running a tab.

THE MASTODON AT THE CARNEGIE NATURAL HISTORY MUSEUM

You ate lots of vegetation. You were very large.
I love to think of you making love, perhaps because I'm drawn to big women.

I imagine the dark planets of your eyeballs rolling in ecstasy above the Monongehela as a cock thick as my thigh delivered the news.

Carnegie himself brought you here a hundred years ago.
He loved doing things like that: I'm rich, I've brought you a mastodon!

You'd see some major changes if you ever made it out of here.

A black kid in a Steelers jersey clicks his camera-phone at you and speaks to the cusp of glowing plastic: Mastodon.

Mass. Toe. Don.

JANITORIAL

All morning he drifts the spacious lawns like a gleaner, picking up this and that, the summer clouds immense and building toward the afternoon, when the heat drives him under the shade of the oak trees in the quad and then along cool corridors inside to pull down last term's flyers for the chamber recital, the poetry reading, the lecture on the ethics of cloning,

the dinner with some ambassador, the debate between Kant and Heidegger, the frat party, the sorority party, the kegger, the weekend Bergman festival, the Wednesday screening of Dumb and Dumber. He says hello to fine young ladies, and tries not to dwell on their halter tops, their tanned thighs, shorts up to here.

At five he climbs into an old, dumpster-colored Olds, lights up and heads home across the barge-ridden river in its servitude to East St. Louis, where you know this poem—glib, well-meaning, trivial—grows tongue-tied, and cannot follow.

SAY MY NAME

Beyonce's singing, and what's strange about that is, first of all, I somehow know who Beyonce is, and second, the voice I'm hearing is coming from the earbuds of an iPod plugged into a kid sitting about thirty feet from me on the fourth floor of the library on a humid summer night, the buzz of cicadas outside sounding weirdly like the buzz coming from his head—and third, I know exactly what he's reading, because I assigned it to him. It's the immortal Paradise Lost, by John Milton, and it's very long and very hard and it's a terrible thing to be reading late in the summer, time running short, life running out, the moon throbbing just above the trees and somewhere out there a woman is leaning against the fender of a car, waiting for you to shift her transmission into submission, and God knows I don't blame this kid for blowing out his ears at an early age, as Adam and Eve stand there stunned in the garden, stupidly covering their crotches, as if that would do any good, as if it would stop Beyonce, dark serpent, from reminding this nice Catholic boy in his brand new

Tommy Hilfiger muscle shirt, with his fresh, 'round-the-biceps badass barbed wire tattoo, that in this fallen world he's never, never, evah gonna get his smooth white hands on what they burn for.

PETROGLYPHS

Somehow it pleases me to observe, in the perfect silence of the desert sunset, that he wasn't very good.
There's really no sense of perspective, and the men and the deer he carved on this chunk of sandstone look pretty much as I would have drawn them back in third grade.

I suspect that as he labored here at his stone canvas long ago he felt the same disappointment I used to experience as I sat facing the blank paper with my new set of watercolors, so bright and optimistic in their box.

Everything seemed possible, every doorway to the future was wide open, until I made that first botched attempt, that first failed stroke.

He probably went back to his little stone encampment and did something paleolithic like repairing a spearpoint, or helping his wife make dinner.

He told her about his day, standing there in the hot sun with his sharp stone, trying to make an image of last summer's deer hunt.

How the creatures looked ridiculous with their antlers like turkey wings, and the brave hunters with their spears ended up looking more like groundhogs beating the air with twigs.

And that got the kids giggling, and pretty soon even his wife found herself unable to be angry with him for not bringing anything home to eat.
Telling stories was something he'd always been good at.
and that night as they lay together before the invention of the roof, and still a little bit before the invention of art, he told her about the deer and the bison, and the great starry hunter wheeling namelessly overhead.
Then she rolled over and showed him a thing or two.

TOSCA

My sister held on to our old turntable and all the old records we listened to through the long Italian opera of our childhood. So tonight we sit in the living room with some wine and Puccini, as the needle scratches the black door of the past, the air comes to life with that lovely, cornball melodrama, and our father is sitting in his chair, ice cubes clinking in his scotch, and our mother is in the kitchen trying to be quiet, trying not to disturb Maria Callas as she explains to Tito Gobbi that she has lived for art and she has lived for love, but it's hard to fry pork chops and dice an onion without making a certain amount of noise, and pretty soon my father is shouting at her, he's trying to listen to the goddamn music for Christ's sake, could she for once show some goddamn respect, and our mother says nothing, it's just the same old argument between ghosts, after all—the music won't let them sleep—although it has my sister in tears and even Tosca has begun to weep.

II

VIKINGS

There are always Vikings out there, a longboat on the scary edge of nowhere.

Always
a space capsule in the dark, Scott and Byrd in their frozen tents, Hilary with his Sherpa, cold men taking measurements.

All of them heroic and very lonesome. All of them far from home.

Because
it's here.

Where the rest of us are making iced tea.
Watching The Jeffersons before fixing the screen door.

Now and then one of us refuses to read the newest Harry Potter or stand all night in line for Star Wars.

Or wear even one of this summer's disease-of-the-month rubberbands, quietly choosing our own road less traveled, our own tent on the tundra.
Expecting no praise for this.
Receiving none.

MISS DECEMBER

I come upon her in an old box in the garage where she's waited all these years, still lying on her bearskin rug in front of the cheery fireplace, still wearing nothing but her Santa hat and a friendly smile.

She must be in her sixties now, somebody's grandmother.
She wears sneakers and a warm-up suit to the grocery store.
Her knees are giving her trouble.
Nobody bothers to airbrush her nipples anymore.

But I remember the times we had back then when we were young and crazy, locked in the bathroom for hours while my sister pounded on the door.

What the hell, I think, and take her inside.
One more time, for auld lang syne.

BLOOD-SOAKED BEAR TURD

. . . that sticky infusion, that rank flavor of blood, that poetry by which I lived . . .

Close up, the cicada dying on the lawn was indescribably weird—a gargoyle fallen from the choir of summer—but at last I could put a face to the name he'd been singing all season long.

Like that time in a crowded elevator at some long-forgotten MLA when my eyes fell on a name tag reading Galway Kinnell, then rose slowly to a face terribly altered from the young, dark-haired dreamer's in my ancient college anthology of American poetry, but indisputably belonging to the author of The Bear, with its line about the hunter eating the wounded polar bear's blood-soaked turd

just to keep himself alive long enough to eat the bear, a poem about paying the price for doing what you're born to do, singing your one poem all summer, burning your own body to make a song of fire.

I smiled at him. He smiled back.
Then the doors opened, and Galway Kinnell walked down the cold December sidewalk like anyone else.

RETARDS

Down the street from my sister's house where I am staying for the summer of my divorce, is a school for what we used to call the mentally retarded.

I sit in the house, trying to work, listening to their strange cries from the playground, their wild articulations.

A little girl is trying to call a boy: Keith, I guess his name is, though it sounds like Death, or like nothing at all, just a crazy wound on the surface of the normal, a foghorn meaning something's wrong out there.

And I think of the look on the faces of the mothers of retarded kids, that same tired look of mandatory sainthood my wife was just learning to master, and finally, to drown them out, I put on Brahms, a jittery violin blending with the cries of the broken children.

Years ago when I lived in Denver with a woman who defined one green season in my life, our neighbors down the street were a retarded couple.
Their yard was perfect, a putting green of ceramic rabbits and chipmunks where plaster figures of Snow White and the Seven Dwarves smiled at the street.

The man and his wife did not work.
In the evening they walked around the block, hand in hand, smiling but never speaking, and at twilight we could see them through the open front door, sitting before the tv like the rest of us, as if to say, See? What you folks do is not so hard, and soon we all began to feel anxious when we'd mow the lawn or water the petunias, the retarded couple mirroring our every move with a smile, looking past us through their thick glasses, going in when we went in to watch the retarded news, and when the woman and I broke up, when everything fell apart and I loaded up my truck and drove off into the broken world, they smiled and waved from their porch, where they sat every afternoon on the glider, smiling and waving.

And now Brahms is growing more anxious and the little girl is calling insanely in the distance to the retarded little boy who cannot answer, and this, I recall, is the duet my wife and I screamed at each other through that long final act, and I know that forevermore all beautiful songs to me will have their counterpoint of insanity, that reminder that the world out there is damaged beyond recovery.
So for God's sake close the windows. Shut the door.
Turn up the music.

GOOD HUMOR

You don't often hear them anymore but now and then a survivor of The Great Ice Cream Truck Purges at the end of the last century approaches with its sad little tune from a far street, on the last page of the Book of Summer, and even now this urge arises, this panic to run inside the house that is still there to find the mother who is still sitting at her Singer sewing machine making a cotton shift for my sister who is still in second grade, and ask her, beg her, for the nickel that will still buy the popsicle, or drumstick, or orange fifty-fifty bar from the foggy cave of the truck whose music may be drawing closer now, or moving farther away; at this distance it's hard to say.

HAYWIRE

When I was a kid, there was always someone old living with my friends, a small, gray person from another century who stayed in a back room with a Bible and a bed with silver rails.

They were from a time before the time the world just plain went haywire, and even though nothing made sense to them anymore, they'd gotten used to it, and walked around smiling vaguely at the aliens ruining the galaxy on the color console television, or the British invasion growing from the sides of our heads in little transistorized boxes.

In the front room, by the light of tv, we were just starting to get stoned, and the girls were helping us help them out of their jeans, while in the back room someone very tired closed her eyes and watched a wheat field where a boy whose name she can't remember is walking down a dusty road.

No sound but the sound of crickets.
No satellites, or even headlights in the distance yet.

CASABLANCA

Last night I saw Casablanca again, following it like an old song as it touched on all the familiar notes of passion, betrayal, and death, sweeping me along as helplessly and willingly as it did the first time.

Once more I lamented the lovers' lost idyll in Paris, once more I sweated out with them the approaching thunder of the Occupation, and once more I felt the sweet relief as the Nazis arrived at the airport a split-second too late to stop Bergman and Bogart from climbing aboard the shining airplane and rising toward freedom in a driving rain.

It's the same feeling I have every time I come to the end of Othello, when the Moor listens to Iago's outrageous insinuations in utter disbelief before having him whipped and imprisoned for life, and then embarking with Desdemona on a honeymoon cruise through the Aegean.

Or when, in the final, grainy frames, the handsome young President in the open car kisses Jackie with unabashed vigor, and all the spectators on the grassy knoll put down their cameras for a moment and burst into spontaneous applause as the limo returns triumphantly to the airport.

It's like that giddy feeling I had, that sense of having stepped from a cave into a bright meadow full of flowers, when the doctors announced that the looming gray mass on my mother's spine had turned out to be nothing more than a harmless flyspeck on the negative, a feeling of pure, high-octane joy of the sort I haven't experienced since the day my wife came back to me in tears, begging me to forgive her for even considering the possibility of leaving me. And of course I forgave her, and held her for a long time before taking her out to Mario's, where we like to go on Friday night, and the waiter brought us to our usual table and the evening ended as evenings do when there's been a little too much wine, and the woman is very beautiful and a sudden rain makes everything shine.

NORELCO

Adam had his father's face.
Telemachus had his father's bow.
And the sons of lost soldiers have a German pistol or a Japanese sword, the sterner stuff
the old man was made of.

But all I have from the last days of my dad is his electric shaver, egg-sleek, heavy as a grenade, with a thick black cord and a gold Norelco fading and nearly gone.

Sometimes I plug it in, click the heavy switch to On.

As a younger man he loved to watch me watch him in the mirror: straight razor,
brush and lather, the four-foot leather strop.

But near the end, the DT's made the lean blade dangerous.
I press the shaver to my cheek and feel its cold mouth tremble like his goodnight kiss.

WHAT WOULD JESUS DO?

—for dubya

Had Christ died, through sheer Roman ingenuity, in the electric chair,

His hair would have lifted in a spiky halo, each filament pointing toward a sin.

His eyes would have widened like the craziest prophet's, blazing with the knowledge of a man or god who has looked at lightning from the inside out.

From His mouth he would have spoken smoke, and His tongue would have wagged and stammered on the blue vowel of a blowtorch, of Hell's pilot light, while His fingernails curled and blackened like leaves, His sacred testicles fulminated, and from every orifice rained the holy water of the Son of God.

Thenceforth, penitents in all the churches would shuffle forth every Sunday to touch the True Electric Chair, and weep over the Lord's Electrodes, the heavy duty circuitry that blew Him from the world, while from silver necklaces He would hang suspended in his Chair, enthroned between the breasts of pretty girls in shopping malls and movie theaters, dying for us all and forever as He did that day the voltage flowed and the lights in the whole village dimmed, then came back on, brighter than ever.

UNWISE PURCHASES

They sit around the house not doing much of anything: the boxed set of the complete works of Verdi, unopened.
The complete Proust, unread:

The French-cut silk shirts which hang like expensive ghosts in the closet and make me look exactly like the kind of middle-aged man who would wear a French-cut silk shirt:

The reflector telescope I thought would unlock the mysteries of the heavens but which I only used once or twice to try to find something heavenly in the windows of the high-rise down the road, and which now stares disconsolately at the ceiling when it could be examining the Crab Nebula:

The 30-day course in Spanish whose text I never opened, whose dozen cassette tapes remain unplayed, save for Tape One, where I never learned whether the suave American conversing with a sultry-sounding desk clerk at a Madrid hotel about the possibility of obtaining a room, actually managed to check in.

I like to think that one thing led to another between them and that by Tape Six or so they're happily married and raising a bilingual child in Seville or Terra Haute.
But I'll never know.

Suddenly I realize I have constructed the perfect home for a sexy, Spanish-speaking astronomer who reads Proust while listening to Italian arias, and I wonder if somewhere in this teeming city there lives a woman with, say, a fencing foil gathering dust in the corner near her unused easel, a rainbow of oil paints drying in their tubes on the table where the violin she bought on a whim lies entombed in the permanent darkness of its locked case next to the abandoned chess set, a woman who has always dreamed of becoming the kind of woman the man I've always dreamed of becoming has always dreamed of meeting.
And while the two of them discuss star clusters and Cézanne, while they fence delicately in Castilian Spanish to the strains of Rigoletto, she and I will stand in the steamy kitchen, fixing up a little risotto, enjoying a modest cabernet, while talking over a day so ordinary as to seem miraculous.

VIEW OF THE CITY OF DELFT

In Vermeer's View of the City of Delft the city beckons from a dreamy void—but wait! Hold on a minute.

Poems about paintings, poems you know were written during some kind of travel grant by a Guggenheim Fellow crazed with loneliness, remind me of that moment on a first date when you realize it's not going anywhere, that the slim, delicious thoughts you'd noticed slipping around the corners of the workdays all week, like sylphs idling in the palace chambers, weren't looking at you after all.

They were waiting for someone you'll never be, so you might as well go back to the unspectacular weather of the town you live in, plain and steady as an old table, where no fair creature of an hour, smelling of musk and honeysuckle, will draw you deliriously down to the dark thunderhead of a nipple.

No. You two will be friends, and that's nothing to sneeze at, friendship being precious and rare.

Count yourself lucky that things between you will remain as they are, safely in their frame, like Vermeer's masterpiece, in which the streets and buildings, in all their stolid respectability, are suspended forever between an unattainable heaven and the silent river, wherein the city dreams, and darkens, and drowns.

ANNIVERSARY

I would like to keep lying here, looking through the airy head of the elm tree, where clouds go drifting through the blue gaps, like the great white fish of summer, swimming slowly through the ocean of my day. Of my life.

And it would be nice to keep watching the tiny speck of that high-circling, big-winged hawk floating as easily in the sky as I float on the summer grass.

But someone sitting on a bench across the park is wearing a particular perfume, and the breeze carries just a hint of it, a couple of thousand molecules—so now the simple act of breathing reminds me of the way she used to touch her breasts very lightly with that little glass wand before our dinner parties, and so for no reason anyone watching me could guess,

I gather my books and newspaper, stand up and stroll away, as if I had some better place to be.

THE TABLE

I'm helping my brother-in-law knock apart an old table by the tool shed, a table they've loaded with planting pots and fertilizer bags for years, until a decade outside in wind and rain has done it in.

And suddenly, as in a myth or fairytale when the son recognizes his lost father under the rags of an old beggar, I realize it's the kitchen table of our childhood, where my mother and my two sisters and I regathered and regrouped inside a new house in a new state after the divorce, the dinner-time table where we talked about our day, practicing our first fictions over pork chops and mashed potatoes when Mom had a job, or fish sticks or fried Spam, or chicken pot pies when she didn't.

Where we dyed our Easter eggs, and played through rainy days of Scrabble.
Where I sweated over algebra and the infernal verbs of the Germans, and our mother would finish a bottle of wine and lay her head down and weep over everything, terrifying us into fits of good behavior, of cleaning and vacuuming, until she snapped out of it, as if nothing had happened and made it up to us by doing something crazy like making pancakes for supper.

The table where my uncle got me drunk for the first time and where I sat down to dinner for the last time with my grandmother.

The table where my sister announced she was pregnant, where I said that, on the whole, Canada had a lot more to offer than Vietnam.
Where the four of us warmed ourselves at the fire of family talk.

Plain brown table of ten thousand meals.

I'm starting to sweat now, the hammer overmatched by iron-grained walnut bolted at the joists. It takes a wrench and a crowbar to finally break it down to a splintered skeleton, to the wreckage of an old table, built when things were meant to last, like a hardcover book, or a cathedral, or a family. We stack up what's left for firewood, and call it a day.

CHINESE

All the girls this summer are Chinese, so sexy in their iPods, their Goon Squad t-shirts, God, they drive me crazy!

They've got that look, that sleepy, ancient, fog-shrouded hotness, but they don't give a shit about the Tang Dynasty or Zen, No lacquered bowls for them.
Just turn up the Wu Tang and make the Starbuck's sizzle.

Let the Chinese girls play with their starry hair spun of black holes and antimatter, let them close the temples of their eyes and dream of silken algorithms, let the dumb kids in the back of the class look up in wonder at their smooth-assed porcelain IQs, while the dazed boys graze in the pastures of their beauty, and the poor American chicklets stand around, stunned and deposed, saying like, like, like—

Like you can do anything about it.
It's over, get used to it, you're toast, you blond retard, the Chinese are multiplying like bees in the honeycombs of their cities, their breasts are full of physics, their eyes are dark with quarks, their nipples are destroying our libraries!

III

SHE'S GOOD

Right down to the very end, DiMaggio insisted that whenever the horse-toothed, doddering old ghost the years had somehow made of him was trundled out for yet another banquet or home opener or old geezerfest, they introduce him as the world's greatest living ballplayer—and the old geezers would clap and get all misty-eyed and the young women in little dresses who knew him only as a line in some old song or as that coffee guy, just smiled and thought, as usual, about their own beauty.

He was a fool, of course, to hang around so long.
Marilyn could have told him that the young favorites of the gods are doomed, or should be, etc.

Despite this,
when Agassi misses the crosscourt backhand because he was a step slow getting there, I actually find myself saying to the young woman whose hand rests in mine like a tourist visiting the ruins of the Coliseum, I would have had that—and she because she is the reason for all crosscourt passes, all hat tricks and home runs, does not laugh, or even smile indulgently, but draws a little closer and says, Easily.

Touchdown.

Knockout.

Oh yeah.

Nothin' but net.

WAITING

When the guy in the hairpiece and the cheap suit asks me if I want to see my mother as she lies in a back room, waiting,

I remember her, for some reason, in a white swimsuit, on a yellow towel on the sand at Crystal Lake, pregnant with my sister, waiting for me to finish examining the sleek fuselage of a minnow, the first dead thing I had ever seen, before we went back to the cottage for lunch.

I remember her waiting up for my father to come home from God knows where in a Yellow Cab at 2 AM, and waiting for me in the school parking lot in our rusted blue station wagon when whatever it was I was practicing for ran late.

I remember her, shoulders thrown back, waiting in the unemployment line, waiting for me to call, waiting for the sweet release in the second glass of wine after a long day working at the convalescent hospital where everyone was waiting to die.

And I remember her waiting for me at the airport when I got back from Japan, waiting for everything to be all right, waiting for her biopsy results.

Waiting.

But when the guy in his ridiculous hairpiece asks me if I'd like to go back there and be with her in that room where she lies waiting to be cremated, I say No thank you, and turn and walk out onto the sunny street to join the crowd hustling down the sidewalk, and I look up at the beautiful white clouds suspended above the city, leaving her to wait in that room alone, for which I will not be forgiven.

MUSEUM PIECE

—for Carmi

Standing in front of this pint-sized fighter in his greaves and chain mail, his jacket of chased steel,

I think of my six-foot uncle in the bomber he wore like a suit of armor.

He wore his B-52 like a second skin.
Like he wore his white Cadillac and ten-gallon Stetson, his wife and his Texas spread.
Like he wore the war.

Mythic quester, little knight, your lance is much too small.
You'd never see him coming.

My uncle was a twinkle of light in his Stratofortress and his enemies turned to dust.

And though he ended Vietnam with a Colt Python in his paneled den, for me he never came down.

In the shadow of his flight over the boiling land there's nothing to destroy.

What's left for me but to build the small museum of this poem for him?

OLYMPICS

One of the pixies on the U.S. team, a little starveling kept from food and boys and pretty much everything in order to spend her teens fending off puberty from the cloister of a balance beam, gives a tiny wobble when she touches down after agitating the air above the mat spectacularly—

So tiny, in fact, that only the Russian judge with the horse trader's eye can even see it. But just like that she's lost a thousandth of a point, the gold, the silver, even the bronze.

And she stands there sobbing in the arms of her coach, an actual woman with a monthly period and the luxury of breasts, who looks at her little failure with an expression I remember on the face of my ex-wife when I wobbled on the balance beam of our marriage, missed the vault into bed, came home late from the uneven bars.

DARK SIDE OF THE MOON

I walk down to the bay, an after-dinner stroll in the darkness. and there, on the invisible horizon, is the red, lacquered bowl of the quarter moon, just beginning to sink into the Pacific, not far from where I watched the sun go down only a few hours earlier.

So in one day I've seen the sun set and the moon set.
And though nothing is more predictable than when and where the sun will vanish, I couldn't tell you anything about the habits of the moon.

Some nights you see it up there—a ball or a bowl or a thin white smile—and some nights you don't.

It's a mystery
I want to talk to you about after I walk back home and climb into bed, where I know you will be deep in a novel as usual, one side of your face lit by the yellow reading lamp, one side in shadow.

GOING TO BED

I check the locks on the front door and the side door, make sure the windows are closed and the heat dialed down.
I switch off the computer, turn off the living room lights.

I let in the cats.

 Reverently, I unplug the Christmas tree, leaving Christ and the little animals in the dark.

The last thing I do is step out to the back yard for a quick look at the Milky Way.

 The stars are halogen-blue.
The constellations, whose names I have long since forgotten, look down anonymously, and the whole galaxy is cartwheeling in silence through the night.

 Everything seems to be ok.

CITIZEN KANE

All summer and fall my Flexible Flyer clung like a moth to the basement wall.

Then would come that morning when white was the only color, when the school bus couldn't come, and my father took it down.

He waxed the red runners and we went outside together.
The world was ours to explore.

When I die, I can't imagine the last thing I'll remember, the last words I will say.

But I want death to be like my father in his big boots and heavy sweater, lifting down my sled for winter, taking me with him into the day.

GLOBAL WARMING

A bunch of kids, flies in their eyes, are starving on the new flat-screen as we sit in the bar, far from Africa.
There's a number you can call, but no one writes it down.

One hundred degrees today. A record.
The beer is very cold.
And that's the current situation in Cleveland.

Except there's another problem with the space shuttle, some more of that foam has banged into the heat tiles Which no one, absolutely no one, can figure out how to glue on so they'll stay.

It's starting to look like we'll never make it off this planet, all because of some lousy glue.

But nonetheless, the astronauts are smiling, cheerful and upside down, although the token Asian guy looks a little worried, a bit apprehensive about reentry.

Even Tokyo in the summer—trains packed with sweaty salarymen, earthquakes every five minutes—has to be looking pretty good right now.

But I, for one, am safe. Safe and well-informed. Magma cooled. Velociraptors turned to gasoline.
Life became a magazine.

All of which occurred just to bring me here to this stool. This apogee.

I have stood on the shoulders of giants.

I am where the astronauts and the starving kids would like to be,

 cool and a little buzzed, full of common sense.

Faithfully serving my role as audience.

 I could sit here forever...

But tonight Jodie's making gazpacho, and she has a heavy hand with the cilantro.

And Gary is bringing the chardonnay he got this summer in Napa, and Roger has fresh blueberries for dessert.

So now I must pop the heavy hatchway leading from my pressurized capsule into a heat that is breaking records in a dying city at the end of the world where, despite everything, we're all reasonably happy.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

George Bilgere is the author of three previous collections of poetry, The Going (University of Missouri Press), Big Bang (Copper Beech), and The Good Kiss (University of Akron Press). His poems have appeared in such periodicals and anthologies as Poetry, The Sewanee Review, Ploughshares, The Southern Review, and Best American Poetry. A recipient of grants from the National Endowment for the Arts, The Fulbright Commission, the Witter Bynner Foundation, and the Ohio Arts Council, he is a professor of English at John Carroll University.

Bilgere received the 2006 Ohioana Poetry Award, a prize given yearly to an Ohio poet for a body of published work that has made, and continues to make, a significant contribution to poetry, and through whose work as a writer, teacher, administrator, or in community service, interest in poetry has been developed.

THE MAY SWENSON
POETRY AWARD

This annual competition, named for May Swenson, honors her as one of America's most provocative and vital poets. In the words of John Hollander, she was "one of our few unquestionably major poets." During her long career, May was loved and praised by writers from virtually every major school of poetry. She left a legacy of nearly fifty years of writing when she died in 1989.

May Swenson lived most of her adult life in New York City, the center of American poetry writing and publishing in her day. But she is buried in Logan, Utah, her birthplace and hometown.