

Utah State University

DigitalCommons@USU

Swenson Poetry Award Winners

USU Press

2007

Neck of the World

Daniel F. Rzicznek

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.usu.edu/swenson_awards

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Recommended Citation

Rzicznek, Daniel F., "Neck of the World" (2007). Swenson Poetry Award Winners. 5.

https://digitalcommons.usu.edu/swenson_awards/5

This Book is brought to you for free and open access by the USU Press at DigitalCommons@USU. It has been accepted for inclusion in Swenson Poetry Award Winners by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@USU. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@usu.edu.

May Swenson
POETRY AWARD SERIES

Neck
of the World

F. Daniel Rscisnek

foreword by Alice Quinn

NECK OF THE WORLD

May Swenson
Poetry Award Series

NECK OF THE WORLD

poems by

F. Daniel Rzicznek

UTAH STATE UNIVERSITY PRESS
Logan, Utah 84322-7800

Utah State University Press
Logan, Utah 84322-7800

© 2007 F. Daniel Rzicznek
All rights reserved

978-0-87421-668-4 (cloth) 978-0-87421-669-1 (e-book) 978-0-87421-670-7 (paper)

Manufactured in the United States of America Cover design by Barbara Yale-Read

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Rzicznek, F. Daniel (Frank Daniel), 1979-

Neck of the world : poems / by F. Daniel Rzicznek.

p. cm. -- (May Swenson poetry award series)

ISBN 978-0-87421-668-4 (cloth : alk. paper) -- ISBN 978-0-87421-670-7 (pbk. : alk. paper) -- ISBN 978-0-87421-669-1 (e-book)

I. Title.

PS3618.Z53N43 2007

811'.6--dc22

2007022448 for Amanda, always

CONTENTS

Acknowledgments	ix
Foreword by Alice Quinn	xi

ONE

Speakmaple	5
A Mouthful of Crickets	6
A Bear in His Madness	7
Happy	8
Within Within	9
Winnowing	10
Neck of the Woods	11
Dreamer in Winter	12
Donnybrook	13
Vows of Babel	14
Stormdweller	15
Toyhouse	16
Grackles	17
Silence Journal	18
During Fever	19
Blood Realm	20

TWO

Genius of Frogs	23
Hibernacula	24
Outside the Horse	25
Prayer for Fall	26
Thieves	27
Dust Merchant	28
Raker	29
Sycamore	30
Rainlegs	31
Book of Letters Reversed	32
Ten Cents Worth of Fog	33
North of North	34
Fishkill	35
Primer	36
Radio	37

THREE

Helmet in the Glade	41
Foglifter	42
Where Your Victory	43
Nightyard	44
First Lady	45
Cathode	46
Host	47
Neck of the World	48
Hooded Merganser	49
Bait	50
Tickets for a Fire	51
Returning the Ghost	52
Crested Daughter	53
Decomp	54
Mane and Claw	55
Human	56
Astral	57
Notes	58

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Hearty thanks to the editors of the following publications in which some of these poems first appeared, sometimes in slightly different versions:

Backwards City Review: “Bait”

Blackbird: “During Fever,” “Outside the Horse”

Boston Review: “Speakmaple,” “Toyhouse,” “Genius of Frogs,” “Raker”

The Carolina Quarterly: “Stormdweller”

Elixir: “Returning the Ghost”

Fugue: “Primer”

New Hampshire Review: “Nightyard”

North American Review: “Neck of the Woods”

Notre Dame Review: “Grackles”

Paper Street: “First Lady”

Pebble Lake Review: “Crested Daughter”

Phoebe: “Tickets for a Fire”

Red Mountain Review: “North of North”

Rhino: “Mane and Claw”

Salamander: “A Mouthful of Crickets”

Sou’wester: “Blood Realm”

Texas Poetry Journal: “Happy.”

Both “Returning the Ghost” and “Grackles” also appeared on the Verse Daily website.

Thank you to the many family members and friends who have enriched my life and provided me with the space to write, to the astute teachers and readers who helped to sharpen my vision of this manuscript: Larissa Szporluk, Amy Newman, Lawrence Coates, and Karen Craigo, as well as the following teachers, magicians, and cohorts: Mike Czyzniejewski, Bryan Gattozzi, Mark Jenkins, Wendell Mayo, Matt McBride, Gary McDowell, Sharona Muir, and Christof Scheele. Thanks also to my peers in the Bowling Green State University MFA program who gave of their time and hearts while reading many of these poems.

Warm thanks to Sydney Lea for his generous encouragement and good will. Thanks to Jane Mead and Alike Barnstone, who may not remember, but were there. Thanks to Michael Spooner and Utah State University Press, and much thanks to Alice Quinn, for choosing my work. Special thanks to John Freeman, for reading, questioning, and believing. Canine thanks to Sam, who's waiting somewhere.

Above all others, thanks to Amanda McGuire, without whom . . .

FOREWORD

Reading and rereading the poems in Neck of The World prompted me to return to and dwell upon the aphorisms grouped under the heading “Adagia” in Wallace Stevens’s Opus Posthumous. A few of the “Adagia” are as gnomic and unforgettable as the poems in this debut collection:

One reads poetry with one’s nerves.
We have to step boldly into man’s interior world or not at all.
A poem need not have a meaning, and, like most things in nature, often does not have.
Poetry is a pheasant disappearing in the brush.

Poetry, Stevens noted elsewhere, “makes itself manifest in a kind of speech that comes from secrecy.” Daniel Rzicznek’s poems cast their spell, it seems to me, because they invite us (like his white crane in the pond in the poem, “Primer”) “to the bottom’s murk/ silent as snow-melt . . .”, to the seedbed of their own making.

“The first successful poems of young poets,” Auden said, are “made up of magical lyrical phrases which seem to rise involuntarily to the consciousness.” There are countless examples of such mesmerizing phrases here. Daniel Rzicznek writes of the “threadbare light binding the valley” in “A Mouthful of Crickets.” And in the same poem,

The dream of the cave is a means,
a must, a smell crawling solid
through the foglike arms of trees.

“Prayer for Fall” evokes “damp swamp light,/ springheeled by the burnt gusts/ of foliage.” In “Host,” “Winter hangs/ glinting on its hook of light.” And from “Hibernacula,” “Into the woods the bear becomes/ darkness hedged by darkness.” Throughout, the language pulsates, always vigorous, by turns knotty and crystalline. In “Donnybrook,” he describes the arrival of a storm in winter,

The opal everywhere eyes
of a lightning-spoiled virgin, branches dangling icy triggers,
the world’s envelope open:
extremities numb, a long
and erasing bellow, the onrush,

the tentacles of snow.

Listen: we live each for the other.

“Newness (not novelty) may be the highest value in poetry,” Stevens wrote. In Neck of the World, we have a poet with a striking new vision--challenging, rewarding, and bold.

Alice Quinn

NECK OF THE WORLD

Sometimes you look for the world, and it's there.

—Tom Andrews

I am whatever beast inhabits me.

—Charles Simic

ONE

SPEAKMAPLE

When there was town here I sprouted. As the humans bound a baby, dropped it to the freezing river, I knew only that the child levitated, lucent in some quick vein of the air's dark sugar.
Now pheasants stitch the edge of terrain, the pagan wheat cast beneath itself by sky.
My leaves pause around me, brittle boats unanchored to the seething winds.
Loose stretches of cloud ripple like banners of a bloodrich city overhead. I place my mark on the screech owl, the vole, every heart under my motion, though the river rules this place—bones nestled in the alleys of its trout-flashed bottom—and I touch the names of arrows all through this one-eyed sleep.

A MOUTHFUL OF CRICKETS

How do you expect to die with a song like that, with a riot of black fiddles among your teeth?

To sleep, to brag of eating them conjures legs, populations, dusk, threadbare light binding the valley.

The dream of the cave is a means,
a must, a smell crawling solid
through the foglike arms of trees.

The cavern purges its hollow ice, a quivering tonsil. Sickles of tar scan every river of the lips and it's this thousandth elsewhere, these well-to-do's, dear. Close up.

Something gleams when you speak.

A BEAR IN HIS MADNESS

There's a burnished violence ignorant in the leaves, gilded to the hillside where I sit.
The land has begun holding me trial for the murder of a sapling tall as my smallest finger, its leaves two spots of fire beneath my boot.
The air whirs a mouth foreign like the speech of far-off bells in the dark borough of my ear.

There, the lines of brick-lined streets become sharp and on a hill beyond the chimneys (their smoke a thought like this) he idles, black fur a mass of gloss, licking himself. Wait.
The land is proclaiming him king. He rises, bristles.
Treefuls of giant minuscule crows shake through my eyes like sun.

HAPPY

to coax the shining hair of dusk down like a rope, to map a new route from the wintered forest to the stadium of rubble, to fill a stone cup with the dust that once was a gladiator's knuckle, to harbor certainties about the fish of candlelight stewing on the ceiling, to know the inner mouth as sleek with star noise among craters and plaque, to trace the dead man's handwriting that lopes with a river's reason, to witness the river climbing muddy in its banks, to know both as breathing.

WITHIN WITHIN

The bear pauses long enough to shine a dense industry of triangular teeth.

With each narrowing move my bones evaporate slightly, the world slipping into youth, salmon defleshed into roe, trees pulling leaves straight from soil back through the grey armor of bark, the smokestacks tearing themselves apart like heartbeats.

See: he staggers underneath, fattened hind legs upright as a wiry moth alights, touching off a depth charge in his skull—some smoke, tugging waves.
I refuse to exist.

WINNOWER

Between alike fingertips a match springs its will into contour and relief: whatnots of hill and sage, the desert night sliding coolly into the noisy shades of an open coat sleeve—the languorous coming-to of rust and starlight on emotionless train cars tugging green and again green names into darkness.

Still, into the low carved system of systems the world dissolves—minerals scraping skin and leaf till ghosts of every bone tilt in some remote heaven.

Still, ordinary sands shift under wind, thunder rustles its latent wraiths, the sky a zero shrinking in.

NECK OF THE WOODS

Hanging the scorched calves in this plague year, remember how once we were led here by our selves, how glow worms nested in the toughwood, the knock of death coming down, every so often, along the fence, a weathervane muscling east. Remember the pines and the blood in the pines and the dangle and clack of hooves in the pines and the blood, and all of this like green in the bonfire, the good fire. And remember: everything acknowledges only the hanging, the year, and the glint of earring through branches where we had marked them, pneumatic with candor as they were in the herd's hot center.
How we relish this hanging, this old way: the hats and chains, mud dead on the axe's blade, dolorous winds, and how what befell them rises heavily up and what had drowsed in us stretches, shudders, sets out.

DREAMER IN WINTER

The river ice is hard enough to splinter bone: the night sky pinned to the inside of his skull.
Each try at a dive takes longer. Soon the music quits him, winds away through the snowbound tips of grass to the mouth of the road that spat him up onto the day's tongue.
With caves of wind around his ears and eyes, those tools of his escaping, a fox that had whimpered beneath an icicled hill waiting to join him, finds his brain rotten as a berry, teeth a fence of bruises, and the sun breaking on frost: another restless idea finished, impossibly happy without him.

DONNYBROOK

A gash of winter road, blood lacing over frost, over a bevy of stuck limbs.
When the storm came (spiked clubs, ax-handled wind) the wayfarers panicked in deep puzzles of muscle strained across fishtailings.
The opal everywhere eyes
of a lightning-spoiled virgin,
branches dangling icy triggers,
the world's envelope open:
extremities numb, a long
and erasing bellow, the onrush,
the tentacles of snow.
Listen: we live each for the other.

VOWS OF BABEL

When my kneecaps leap with a lion's startle, will you quell them, soothe them down like the dead?
And when I have spires rising from my eyes, will you turn them inward?
And the sky, when it
folds the diagram of light, the single, failing number, will you charter riddles in four directions? And when I hear musicians below, and you, you hear the love-groans of vermin, will you seal my jambs with golden wax? And when the god comes careening in, howling for sacrificial meat, will you have me wrapped tight in a cloth he does not know? Oh, will you have tucked me away, like a stone?

STORMDWELLER

It starts with the call of a lamp to a book across the room and the call of the book to a crippled spider overhead, the spider not calling at all anymore, the mute lines of inquiry growing in half-circles toward the call of huge winds wanting to lift the third story out over the bare mountains, twist it there like a cloud, the third story itself calling to the anonymous thunder and spinning still inside, the call of the chair to the haunch, and the call of haunch to a wren sunk dead in the rooftop snow, and the calling of the weathervane to the kitchen spoons, the calls of thumbnail to the hammer and the endless calling of the face to the skull, the skull calling and calling, calling unanswered.

TOYHOUSE

A freckled pair of newts lay dead as trespassers in the circular kitchen—ochre fronds open, gills to a heavens of balsa.

A fly gleams once,
metal green in the attic with clear stomach hooks, a tube for glands
and an eye each for us

leveled at our lives, wooden as we are and as empty. If only a little lawn, we think, and soil hungry under floor—that we could drop downward through the rift to the places longed for:

surgery of slow dirt,
the hues marigolds shed candled in the earth, this faith in black thumbs of lava heaving matter into pigeons of smoke, webbed bodies sighted

as pulsing points of coal, tailbones set like rubies in dust's sane display.

The core, its nearness—the killing heat cures us.

GRACKLES

The day is fastened around the bronze irises of the grackles as they flash en masse through the yard.

An airplane's dumb echo passes over, buzz seeping through clouds. A small toy in my gut is coming apart, the grass pounding fresh spikes at the sky. One grackle in the colony loosens a heavy worm from the earth leaving a dark inlet in its place. So these are the shy, unlit mines of the body's abiding.

SILENCE JOURNAL

An egg explodes underwater and you are above water.
Along the map a tiny breeze hurries.

As Abraham began to lose his memory . . .

The snaking of a moa's neck, somewhere behind this. Deeper inside the breath-snap of a needle.
Water way up in the atmosphere hasn't felt land in centuries.

I: the baby seal; disabled, returned ashore by the orcas.
There is again this longing to be the animal of the wind.
Buddha with apples raised above his head: victorious.

A painting about foxes and grapes (a long painting, perhaps). Some buildings collapse in flame as two heifers graze in a meadow.

Mangos are floating in the waves.

Juries of quail wait for an answer, watch your search.

DURING FEVER

Caustic wisp of malaria like woodsmoke near the nose, tumult of decisive blood en route from twinkling docks, a pressing of your figure like a handle into the earth.

Landscape remains portable, the hills rise into your temples.

Leafy coils roll south under black vaults of storm soaking your rage, fading your lids a gradual suede.

The trees jitter above you:
 pin oak, pine, litany of maples.

Roaring sun, imploding roar:
 death like death only.

BLOOD REALM

The tall rushes wait to be parted and then conceal, when into the black, muscular length of marsh the walking becomes splashing, a tiding that carries the steely odor of death into the air.
This morning, as we drove,
the first thing our eyes met was the headless flowering of a fat deer left in a ditch, until this final, inked out landscape where our tiredness is a sound—a heavy steam escaping the throat on an east-west road our walking grinds gently before dawn.

When digested, the land loses its birdcalls and dens of mud, turns to a low-pitch rumble:

a water-logged revolving of trees and necks—the middle of the mind gone under to a fast and constant silence. We turn our numbness to the wind, which is the sound of a hand in the dark pulling dark brains from between antlers, out of the skull, and the eye that sees them shine, shines.

TWO

GENIUS OF FROGS

In the room drawn from rain I've tied maps to the ceiling to track the flecks of winter in each summer's sprung instant, and the notched, pump-handle tail of the dusk-scented phoebe perched on a gutter the wind pulls atom by atom apart each night.
Steel tufts of cumulus sweep over my charge and yellows of automobile headlamps snake through mountainways beneath.
I mold a calendar from earth, arranging the air's lean mouth between the sharp flashing of cars, the phoebe's broken path of eggs, and a slew of dewy eyes tug away from one another into the prethought of legs: the coming-to, the disappearance at water's door.

HIBERNACULA

A scrap of river glints its one long diamond of sleep and the bear turns outward, believing the water full of mirrors.
Buoyant as stars, his paws search the slip and heft of rock and my hands stroll the bed like minstrels, kneeling now and then to clench the sheets.
The house-scent carries over the hills, downstream the moon burns its coral stuffing in the river glass.
Into the woods the bear becomes darkness hedged by darkness, an undoing of pines into their own dominion. Awake, my hands rear up, cut and bruised on slate, skittish as a team of horses catching the scent of an animal that approaches, searching out a lair.

OUTSIDE THE HORSE

In saying tomato field one inherits a green ironwork of stems, shifting splotches of sun where light bounds from skin—with skylight, a cloud slides back above the landscape—far removed from saying, say, landmine: crescent steel, a bed of red, spent leaves, feather-width pin upright as a statue—saying statue one troubles over a park, pin: medal, but saying horse a meadow comes forth, bees quickening and the thought of nostrils oscillating eager circles, hooves still among leaf-spines—saying horse again, one intuits a rider, architect of motion, saying motion the brain is seen, pulsing along its limits.

PRAYER FOR FALL

Thousands of miles north, let caribou stir on an open hill.

With five swans lifting over squat pines, let mute sun shape the grasses grown coarse as questions in tundra heat.

Let roads crack through lunar regions of the down country: hairs clutching in shower basins.

Let for now a hound to track his tail into prairies, borders, and damp swamp light, springheeled by the burnt gusts of foliage. The hydrangea, gut blue beneath my bed's window, casts petals like bits of map shredded in the dryer. Let it barter local roots for what passes as a life, a name crumbling free of darkness.

And of course me too. Take me in.

THIEVES

The brain has a drawer named home: the trees shine, appetite and wonder mingle.
A soldier sits carving an auk from elephant ivory.

His lips purse downward in pursuit of the knife's fitness: the certain peel each slice rings out toward the handprint smear on the window, its oil blooming on the wind. One door has been nailed shut.

The hand is off somewhere, adrift from the gripstone of the heart.
A cabinet and dresser moan in a back room, rocking the light bulbs into streaks.
The wind dips low in searching.

The soldier knows wealth lies three corridors behind the brow, dying slowly as a steer.
The strangers step one after one to the gates of childhood—cells shrink back at their touch.

DUST MERCHANT

With each hammering gust of snow, the scales and thimbles shrink, and the hanging foot long folds of my skin shudder like robes. I may appear to have wings. I may look directly past you, remembering a sheer thigh of mountain I climbed, in search of an atom passed through a fish to a man to a fish—all within a speck of sand, and that's but one;
the jars here stretch for acres, the innumerable grains of matter congregated in shelves, in rows.
This house decides its own name.
I may appear to wear glasses of steam. I may appear smaller than before, this weather arriving on time, my tomb torn open like the flesh of an orange.

RAKER

The motorcycle meditates in the neighbor's drive—silver beyond the silver of fishes—handles rising sexed and armlike. I prowls my yard, flannel replicating in miniature the dimensions I tend and fence.
In fresh mulch, near the fort of my shoe, ants weave late circles. This morning the glacier fluttered its tongues again and I foresaw my children bronzed in frostworn hollows, my wife shining at the top, arms silver and crossed, centering her innards on herself.
But work stretches ahead of me:
many trees here stand dead, the shrubs need to be pampered, or showered in chemical spit.
Every fungal face will atrophy into black suds and uselessness.
There has been a lurching under the tarp of my skin and though the glacier has ceased its mutterings for now, it has slid toward this country half of a half of a hair. I cannot conquer this thankfulness.

SYCAMORE

Old child who drooled beneath,
slept in shavings
of twilight, sank with a dark gun the circles of bats in a money-pile
the nowhere cows of morning lull around. A wake:
windmill glimmer:
closer, now father,
a northern train
yowling outbound.

RAINLEGS

The horses all morning have been moving and moving.
When I bend across this fence, the grass and my pores making friends, the fields stretch their flowered hides.

A guide begins its sprout in the garden mud: numbers and photographs maturing under the soft, green shield.
The horses. I consider this kindred house an orchard and my shoulder is the rock all fathers have carried a stinging piece of inside themselves: over water, and dirt, into the ancient, lonely clouds. A house has come nearer. When I listen, dew buzzes in her skin. How to stand in this world, or even a world resembling this?
The winds go and go and go.

BOOK OF LETTERS REVERSED

In those pages there's full darkness and in those long fields, rowing backwards through the earth, badgers.
And over the movements of plants about to grow their yearly auras, a borrowed moon has kept ahead of a woman and man as they walk, the man thinking the stars must be knots of thread, the woman: black sand behind the stars, black as the back of his mouth. Floating glovelike in the moonlight three geese sharpen their bodies along fake terraces of wind.
“Lusting for lust,” the man says,
“the birds foglike, disappearing.”
The woman kneels to a path trampled with broken stalks, bloodied fur. As if in a drafty, well-lit room, the stars bristle and the badgers freeze.
Some of the darkness begins to laugh.

TEN CENTS WORTH OF FOG

Over the facelessness of windshields and shuttered windows the thick air twists in with all the folly of a shark and the only thing awake in the newly clouded neighborhood is the bright branch of my spine.
I am not able to say what the long ghostly houses want with this opening and opening: my breath—but daylight stirs around the trunks of my smallest hairs and these lungs flail apart like twin piles of leaves burning.
The streets remain vague, unmendable as the fogs settle in, gritty as homesteaders, questioning the good of any map until the churning, brittle erasure of each garage, every numbered door.

NORTH OF NORTH

Let me attempt to describe: dusk air follows the scaremonger's flock of rumors, his blind horse and black carriage rattling in the scrambled light across the only bridge out of town.

Or the morning air: voluptuous gallons of it between each tanager perched among frozen fingers of trees—ruby feathers quietly burning, the preening of those stuffy coats.

The river changes direction and the townspeople paint their blue doors bluer. They junk the lacelike white of patio furniture, loose their mastiffs to hunt the potbellied bearcat to her den near the territory's edge where there is a chance to mask the self from all but its mask.
Still, the town floats lost like a hat in the wilderness that carries it.

We'll need to go before the beginning:
combing the bogs for an oath, the destruction of the last red sports car, the scaremonger's clamor, the barely breathing tanagers.

FISHKILL

The river is a bed of gruel beneath the leaf-green bellies turning in mist.

The banks record
shadow and wave, the noise of light between ear and frost.

The river is the ear of a fly.
The trees remain blind.
The river passes by a window of a house in a country where there is no river.

This waiting for you
has been a stretch of bark and year, stem and yellowed bone.

This waiting for you
has been the fireflies' slow curtain of sparks, the force with which the bellies are turned silver, the eyes stopped.

PRIMER

The white crane hooks backward through town to a pond reddish with soot, wraps broad wings around its pumping body, eases to the bottom's murk silent as snowmelt. Bells of ancient air collect in the ears of the man thought long dead who emerges now from his ramshackle house, who steps lightly through the rusted gate to which feathers have been stapled as a warning.

RADIO

The hum attracts, and just beyond my ribcage, some old hags try cooing, flattening their voices sheer as metal, chanting the word magnify once, then twice, and on and on. Then it's baby they sing like this, again, again and again, hoping that it, above all others, will gain entry—the ribs, as they imagine them, unlocking, my body
in a landslide backwards and the secret dens laid bare as late autumn—but the chest holds. The hags change the word to shit, a syllable chugging slowly off.
The women become static.
The women become flies.
I breach lightly in my sleep.
This lake shines, is bottomless.

THREE

HELMET IN THE GLADE

I looked beneath:
grass kept the head's impression.
The water I stooped to was once muscle, organ, and the body gone missing watched everywhere: mistook for shackles and coal the feral brood of roaches bursting from the thicket I pushed blindly through.
My foot gave a knock on that armor meant for rough while the alder bed I left jumped behind me in the wind.
Slow miles of chase and hunger in the wooded heaven and I'll never know who turned the other sick.

FOGLIFTER

We the apple refuse the night, its muddied trucks,
the world outside the orchard.
We're done with hands, their shadows heavy across us. The rain is what summons. Bullets drill coves into the air, their creativity missing us completely.
Somewhere, you are through with us as well, through with knives drifting our oceanous bodies and our hard children scuttling like beetles down the drain.
The rain. A posture among us: two flags droop as the soil below gapes, the midnight crew burying horses again.
Had we but skeletons for what once were our wings before they curled tight to the stem, we could levitate until sunrise.
Look at us.
When we fall it is straight and down, the earth swelling a little to reap our gravity.

WHERE YOUR VICTORY

Figure falling up
in a skyward flail, the wind turns stone for hours around you—head never finding news of itself, arms
drawing down into legs, chalk-soft teeth clacking on air, hair a subtle tangle of gases dissipating into anvils and altars of cloud until, like the blue undersong of a magnet, you wake to a room in which flowers are dying.

NIGHTYARD

The darkened schoolhouse has given me this thing to say:
the dry lips of a man part as a candle is lowered through a glowing block of fat.
 In the top there is a hole for air to feed in, whipping the light. This is the system.
I can feel the cold panting inside my navy sleeves.
Outside the butcher's, a mutt pisses, the steam ascending like a ghost after its name has been mentioned. But what is it asking me to tell?
 Our leaders stride sienna halls, their lilac-scented hands flexing. In the grass, a tiny chant musters itself: I know you. I know you. This is how the first, classical speeches begin. Then the fat shifts, sings.

FIRST LADY

Whole, the land soaks pressure like a bandage, the slow break of time

across the nightstand clock, the sleet in chains
past the window's swart lid, pearl wind rotting the yule: (underwear, cars, underwear.)

Your gown is priceless.

Stung like a rabbit, you dream your feet stepping to a country-sized landmine until in a loose flash the face-shaped leaves and high tidal trees release

floating boxes of the dead, a bastard's returning theme:
text, ghost text.

CATHODE

What passes for throughness, for shining invisible or shy steam parting from a wound is now within,
a flick on the bridge
of the tongue, cavernous scripting
of inner-lung into a clean remove unrecognized:
a word for a word of no significance.

HOST

Winter hangs glinting on its hook of light and the bear, bloated, curls deep in the leafless brush as the fat, bluebellied snakes of the sky unfurl like snakes of fat bluebellied sky unfurling. Where wild hairs have kept him like a crib he whimpers
into sleek shoulders of earth.
Pain has him cornered these nights, slow force (chirp of metal on bone) writing his innards away: silencing snow the body against the body of the real against the real against the snow
its nature of lilt and blame...
Clawing aside the brittle nest, the sky flowering tongues, he turns on himself like a man.

NECK OF THE WORLD

The dim aubades of pears release, echo around the tree.
While eating, thoughts motion out ahead in the day's reserve:

the animal must be carried forth, lured with feathers, blue song and gun-shine.
For eons we string animals up (humans, too) and for years they die speechlessly down upon us. Someone told me flesh makes a bed in quiet, expansive soil, in cascades of sweat, even some drunkard's vision of the self as dove.

No one tells me if the dove can swim, or will be eaten—eventually. These rank pears.
A watery daughter I hadn't dared imagine pleads goodbye.

HOODED MERGANSER

Little sail-head, little black wingfish crowing storm,

I've peeled livery bargains
from your bones,

worn the shawl used to imitate
the world.

Ah, fuck and damn me. Sawbill hunter for fingerlings,

lake delver
of rainy saints, rot surrounds

the gold drain of your eye.

In the harbor

known for waste and unbeing, hook your claw-

footed winches,
pull the waters
up into hell.

BAIT

My final mouth lives to eat.

The garden lay ashed, as in rags, as in crabshell: armor and claws eightly in unknowable directions.
Each worldly spine lay fitted with blood.

The vitals ache of sun,
two filthy rocks pressured together.
Light folds, passing for marrow; something cloven, even common clutching at the downward road as night passages out the island, salmon king high in his teeth—this lord, he will surface as gold.

Where reefs parent a colony of bombs, the stench of collars even here; decay ground into seabottom.

The gills lift and rush at the hook, the crown bones creep nearer,
a shawl spurts up as naiads, home a wire drenched in skin.

TICKETS FOR A FIRE

He leaves the speckled horse by the river. Sounds of town fade like tin as the horse and he start in opposite directions. You are the brow of wind awake in fervor, in jungle, in egg. He stops, casts a fly to the current. Steelhead, their berry gills spreading, waver in the slimed grass.
The sun stays on his hands and burns. Selling tickets for what sermons deem a name you have defiled, you who scrawl a map. And hoofing slowly, in the way a horse will, away from the bank toward a cluster of young birches, the horse recognizes the sweep his tail interrupts the flies with, the rhythm of withers, the grains in the meadow.

Snow graduates in skeins drawn across a land hidden within the hidden craw, snow now blurring in the chest around a foursome of stones not carved from your parent but the air's blue gristle.

The meathouse's turning under your decades, a clutch of great auks rising black as captains through the ice.

RETURNING THE GHOST

After the glass of crashing I bleed into the fields:
water chewing at itself under icy lids, houses gathering their cloudy bulks, shouts of dogs falling over the ridge with sudden weight, night turning like a spear in its own pulsing gut and the sound that waited:
swish and rasp of ducks in the bent corn behind me, flapping themselves red, nudging down into my lungs, the air folding us shut like a blade.

CRESTED DAUGHTER

The daughter of a father who was the son of a father whose great, great grandmother was a blue jay scraping along a rusty girder not far from where this page's mother tree was drawn and laid like a ship toward the end of daylight—storm of boot heels, the bleating of saws, and all through the earth the genus slandered the flat homily of bodies—their one wish:
to abandon the shape,
the formlessness of a shape, which is why the earth can be concerned only with this last blue jay, her harsh squawk, her color—white under throat, sky back, the bird gun-sized, firing cries above the fires, tucking her feet under, in.

DECOMP

When the gutters fill, you ask where the rain lives and are redirected to the worms who notify the willow-roots of your inquiry, and I can tell we're about to get a series of questions long enough to knot softly into a noose.
She stole the farmer's only horse and rode bareback through the pear orchard; something about love or a lover, an interrogation of her body, how it governs each sense.
It was, at its end, a short, sad story too immense to enact here, but details do remain: she wore ballerina shoes and the boards creaked like leather beneath her, and then, staining the gallows a spot at a time, the rain through which she is still falling, a floor of clouds amassed around the crags of her feet.

MANE AND CLAW

My dear sisters: how the scent of half-life spins continual from our voices like talk, and the body carnival dumbs down to calcite: reflective segments of hair and nail in us. When the sink drains the first of me to hear it is my stomach—the rust flying through me like sparrows, weird marrow nearly dead, the goat-mask of factory work.

What is stolen from one is stolen still from another. What lows in the murk wants, wild and staring, to pull us enjoyably down.

The fact of night is such:
it breaks. The fact of women and men is this: the struggle out.
And the struggle out: it breaks.

HUMAN

She limps down the mountain:
pair of hole-ridden feet clapping leathered mouths on rock.
A button of green wrestles among exploding coal mounds and shrivels. She stares at stones as they flock into liquid, surveys her isle of blisters and congregating gas clouds.
The last bird she saw (a blue jay, a blue jay!) attacked her.
Four thousand years south where the mudslides of Peru once hardened over jungle expanse, the green sleeve, the green ladle, the green wound, the green teeth are dusking in the metal dirt while her lungs like pears rot inward.
Some light lies deviled beneath.
Some worlds won't arc again.

ASTRAL

Between silence and wooden clap of door, there exist various routes: you drive off toward sleep and Orion hesitates past my roof—its drip a speech, and speech the train two blocks east, shriller than before: a newborn arrow of air that billows, increases to familial, moans calm into fields as space around the town lifts like a monk ever at dying.

This whole living we've been within the arms and legs. The level, fixed light of our pores whitens, shifts under. The body: the outside minting allergies—the inner snowing, and so old.

NOTES

“Outside the Horse” takes its title from a phrase in the last few lines of James Wright’s poem “A Dream of Burial” from The Branch Will Not Break.

“Dust Merchant” owes a debt to Yusef Komunyakaa’s character the Thorn Merchant from various poems in his book I Apologize for the Eyes in My Head.

“Ten Cents Worth of Fog” takes its title from a line by Issa, as translated by Robert Hass in The Essential Haiku.

“Where Your Victory” takes its title from a phrase found in the hymn “Christ the Lord is Risen Today.”

“A Mouthful of Crickets,” “Neck of the Woods,” and “Host” are hereby dedicated to Larissa Szporluk, who literally compelled me to write them.

“Helmet in the Glade” and “Neck of the World” are dedicated to Amy Newman, whose questions helped them breathe.

The epigraphs are from Charles Simic’s “Sleep” in Dismantling the Silence, and from Tom Andrews’s “When Comfort Arrives” from Random Symmetries: The Collected Poems of Tom Andrews.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

F. Daniel Rzicznek was born in Indiana and grew up in northeastern Ohio. He received his BA from Kent State University and earned an MFA in creative writing from Bowling Green State University. His chapbook of prose poems, Cloud Tablets, part of the Wick Poetry Chapbook Series, appeared from Kent State University Press in 2006. His poems have appeared in The New Republic, Boston Review, AGNI, The Iowa Review, Mississippi Review, and numerous other literary journals. Currently, he teaches English composition at Bowling Green State University and lives with his wife in Bowling Green, Ohio. Neck of the World is his first book-length collection of poems.

THE MAY SWENSON
POETRY AWARD

This annual competition, named for May Swenson, honors her as one of America's most provocative and vital poets. In the words of John Hollander, she was "one of our few unquestionably major poets." During her long career, May was loved and praised by writers from virtually every major school of poetry. She left a legacy of nearly fifty years of writing when she died in 1989.

May Swenson lived most of her adult life in New York City, the center of American poetry writing and publishing in her day. But she is buried in Logan, Utah, her birthplace and hometown.