Bahuchara Mata

Kunal Kanodia

Columbia University

Recommended Citation
KUNAL KANODIA is in his last year at Columbia University where he is pursuing a major in Human Rights with a concentration in Middle Eastern, South Asian and African Studies. His research interests lie in the intersectionality of identities of marginalized and subaltern communities in different social contexts. His interests include contemporary Hindi poetry, skydiving, cooking, Spanish literature and human rights advocacy. Kunal aspires to become a human rights lawyer someday.
Kunal Kanodia

BAUCHARAJA MATA: LIBERATOR, PROTECTOR AND MOTHER OF HIJRAS IN GUJARAT

INTRODUCTION

The most prominent of myths surrounding the Hindu goddess Bahuchara Mata is that she belonged to the Charan caste, members of the Brahman class in Gujarat associated with divinity. As the narrative proceeds, one day Bahuchara Mata and her sisters were travelling when a looter named Bapiya attacked their caravan. This was considered a heinous sin. Bahuchara Mata cursed Bapiya with impotency and according to legend, self-immolated and cut off her own breasts. She vowed that the only way for the curse to be lifted was if Bapiya “worshiped Bahuchara Mata by dressing and acting like a woman.” There are distinct implications of this myth for how the image of the Goddess is constructed. The aspect of caste is particularly significant. The Charans—to which Bahuchara Mata belongs—are esteemed within the caste hierarchy. Charan women are often thought of as “divine” goddesses; apart from Bahuchara Mata, a range of other localized Charan Mother Goddess figures exist including Hinglaj Mata, Aavad Mata and Karni Mata.

1 For a detailed discussion on the Charans, please refer to:

The hijras, on the other hand, are a marginalized social group within the Gujarati context. In fact, their position within the caste hierarchy itself is not clear. They have even been termed as a psuedo-caste. In India, hijras comprise what is legally recognized as the “third gender” and specifically refer to male-to-female transgender persons who identify as female, trans female, gender non-conforming, or simply, the third sex (i.e. neither male nor female). This subaltern community has chosen a distinctively

---

3 Ibid.
5 For a detailed discussion on the place of Hijras in the caste system, please refer to: Belkin, Erica. “Creating Groups outside the caste system: the Devadasis and Hijras of India”, p. 70-71.
Brahmanical Goddess as their patron. It is interesting to note that many hijras do not find this to be problematic. In this essay, I argue that the worship of an upper caste, Brahmanical Goddess helps to include hijras within the larger Hindu social context from which they are already largely excluded. This means that the image of Bahuchara Mata is both conceived and represented differently between the hijra community and the Brahmanical context.

ICONOGRAPHY OF THE GODDESS

As a Sanskritic Goddess\(^7\) who is revered by a group on the fringes of society, it comes as no surprise that there are competing depictions of Bahuchara Mata. While there is a consistent depiction of Bahuchara holding a trishul (or trident) while seated on a rooster, this is where the similarities in her iconography end. In this section, I will explore the differences in these representations, and their implications for the hijras. Figures 1 and 2 represent two distinct versions of Bahuchara iconography, which is not surprising given their distinctive sources.

\(^7\) In this context, “Sanskritic Goddess” means a Hindu Goddess who is worshipped in Sanskritic hymns, and whose worship is often under the care of Brahman priests.
The first image is the type of iconography of Hindu deity found in calendar art that is commonplace throughout India. It was produced by ArcheStudio, which is an architecture and design studio. ArcheStudio is designing a Bahuchara Mata temple for a Hijra Utthan Kendra that would cater to the needs of the hijra experience. This ArcheStudio image depicts Bahuchara Mata as a distinctively feminine deity who carries a sword in her upper right hand, a book of scripture on the upper left, an open palm in the form of the abhay hasta mudra in her lower right, and a trishul in her lower left.

---

There is a balance in this iconography between the violent (the sword), the trinities of creation, which depict preservation and destruction (the trishul), learning and knowledge (the Shri scripture), and blessing (the abhay hasta mudra). This representation has deep roots in her mythology. The sword, for instance, is the weapon used by Mata Bahuchara to excise her own breasts. Again, the trishul represents the balance between the principles of creation, preservation and destruction. When Bahuchara was attacked, the divine principle of balance was violated. The violation of the balance of the trinities was one of the impetuses for her seemingly brash reaction to Bapiya. This imagery, however, neglects the issue of gender and the transition to transgenderism, which each experienced — Bahuchara who literally and metaphorically excised her femininity and for Bapiya who was forced to take on the identity of a woman as an act of worship. This depiction of gender does not reflect who Bahuchara Mata is to the hijra community or how she is distinctly associated with their experience as conforming to neither male nor female stereotypes. The scripture in her hand reinforces Bahuchara’s legitimacy as belonging to the Charan caste, and places her strictly within the Brahmanical framework. This portrayal of her might seem to be an attempt to Sanskritize¹⁰ this Goddess, but we should not presume that the hijras would reject this attempt. It is important to recognize that the pseudo-divine status of the Charan community meant that Bahuchara’s curse was legitimized by virtue of her being a Charan and not, in fact, because she was a Goddess.

While Sanskritization might mean an erasure to Bahuchara Mata’s mythological identity, there is the distinct possibility that it may provide legitimacy for the hijra community as well. A parallel can be seen here in the incorporation of Kali into the mainstream, which occurs through the lens of Sanskritization as a gradual progression from “the peripheries of settled culture, where she was probably a tribal deity who answered pragmatic concerns, to the center of a popular urban and rural cult, where her priests are Brahman and her sphere of operation transcendental.”¹¹ While the origins of Bahuchara Mata remain unclear, an argument could certainly be made that the Sanskritization of Bahuchara mirrors the process that Kali went through. As a mainstream Gujarati Goddess whose priests are Brahmin at the popular temples, she continues to answer the “pragmatic concerns” of the hijras. This was directly addressed in email correspondence with Maneka Chaturthi, a member of the hijra community who has been a devotee of Bahuchara since her initiation at the age of seventeen. As Chaturthi explained,

---

¹⁰ In this context, attempts to Sanskritize the Goddess follow the definition introduced by M.N. Srinivas. The transformation of Bahuchara Mata from a hijra Goddess into a mainstream deity follows how a “low or middle Hindu caste, or tribal or other group, changes its customs, ritual ideology, and way of life in the direction of a high and frequently twice-born caste”. For more details, please refer to: Srinivas, M. N. "A Note on Sanskritization and Westernization." The Far Eastern Quarterly 15, no. 4 (1956): 481. doi:10.2307/2941919.

Any attempts to incorporate Bahuchara Mata into the larger Hindu framework are to be celebrated. I underwent castration believing in the religious imperative that it had for me, and for my position as a hijra. People say hijras are so irritating, they beg, they don’t work. They don’t sympathize with us. If they see Bahuchara Mata as a hijra Goddess who is also a Hindu Goddess to be revered, they will sympathize with us more.12

Just like the incorporation of Kali into the Sanskritic tradition resulted in greater acceptance for overtly violent aspects of the tradition, Chaturthi hopes that the incorporation of Bahuchara Mata into mainstream discourse will result in greater acceptance for her as well. But does Sanskritization create a more balanced image of the Goddess—one that incorporates both its origins and the Brahmanical tradition—or does it create two separate images of the Goddess, in which one is clearly more accepted than the other?

12 See Appendix II for the Hindi transcription of the interview.

In order to answer this question, it is important to consider hijra representations of Bahuchara Mata. The fact that these representations are not as readily accessible as calendar art or photographs of temple idols speaks volumes about the probable outcome of Sanskritization. The more “sanitized” version of Bahuchara Mata surfaces in a simple Google Image search for instance, rather than the earthier image in Figure 2.

Figure 2 Bahuchara Mata, a version of the Mother Goddess, is the special object of devotion for the hijras (Photograph by Serena Nanda). Gender Diversity, cross-cultural variations, 32.

Serena Nanda’s photograph of a hijra Bahuchara Mata is a major departure from the representation by ArcheStudio. One of the most striking features is the fact that the rooster is much bigger than the Goddess herself.
Rarely are vahanas depicted as larger than the Hindu deity (with the notable exception of Vishnu’s vahana Garuda). This serves to accentuate the serene innocence that the rooster espouses, versus the more violent sword and trishul imagery that is prominent in the first figure. It may be that the first image was an attempt by the artist to place Bahuchara within the framework of Maha Shakti, as we would see in a representation of Durga or Kali (refer to appendix I for an image of Durga). The hijra depiction, on the other hand, is not as much concerned with placing her within the Shakta narrative, as it is with claiming legitimacy for its own gender positioning. British colonial accounts claimed that the hijras also worship Bahuchara Mata with a yoni instead of a rooster as her vehicle. According to a late nineteenth century British colonial account by F.A.H. Elliot, this use of a conventional symbol for the vagina points to a desire among hijras to reclaim their femininity.

\[13\] I disagree with this idea that the hijras would like to reclaim a distinctively feminine position (since that would threaten their own inherent identity as non-binary), although the use of the vagina as a symbol could be interpreted as a desire to claim a sort of “monopoly”, as it were, over... fertility. This being said, there are no other accounts that I am aware of that depict the hijras as worshipping Bahuchara Mata with a yoni as her vehicle. However, whether this is a result of Sanskritization of the Goddess’s vahana into a more “acceptable” animal, or a colonial orientalist imagery that may have misrepresented the vehicle remains unclear.

While Bahuchara Mata holds the sword, trishul and scripture as in the first figure, in this image she is depicted as holding a five-edged leaf of the mango tree in place of the abhay hasta mudra. The mango leaf is often used with vermillion in the sindoor ceremony during marriages.\textsuperscript{14} Incidentally, one of the major social functions of the hijras is to dance during and after Hindu marriage ceremonies. Because they are themselves excluded from marriage themselves, hijras are believed to have the power to bless newly married couples with a happy and fertile married life.\textsuperscript{15} While the abhay hasta mudra of Figure 1 is often seen in depictions of Hindu deities (see Figure 4 in the appendix, which is a representation of Durga), the depiction of a societal role as with the hijra Bahuchara Mata is not as common. Perhaps this is because the hijra depiction is aimed at

\textsuperscript{14} Chatterjee, Gautum. \textit{Sacred Hindu Symbols} 1996, p. 106
\textsuperscript{15} Moorat Aka Eunuch’s Wedding, IMDb, August 2004, retrieved June 2015.
emphasizing the “hijra-ness” of Bahuchara Mata, while the Sanskrit depiction is focused on locating her within the larger Shakta framework.

Makhana Chootto, an uncastrated hijra who lives within the temple complex of the Sri Bahucharji Temple in Rajkot, Rajasthan echoes this sentiment.

When I was in the [hijra] village on the outskirts of the district, I never saw Bahuchara Mata as Durga or Kali. I saw her as my own goddess, a hijra goddess. Even though she looks like Durga here, she is still the same Bahuchara—we hijras already have her blessings so we do not need the abhay hasta mudra that you people require.16

Chootto makes the claim that the Brahmanical representation of Bahuchara is necessary for “you people,” (or the lay person who is not a hijra) because they have not been accorded the blessings of the Devi that the hijras already received. It is for this reason that the Sanskrit representation comprises a more general abhay hasta mudra that would be applicable to all worshippers, while the hijra representation comprises a socially specific, ritualistically important mango leaf that carries particular significance for the hijras. Hijras play an important social role in commemorating marriages, even though they are themselves impotent and by definition lie outside of that domestic sphere. Why is it that a social 16 See appendix II for transcription of the full interview in Hindi.

group that intrinsically does not participate in the very same social institution it blesses, has the ability to be an important aspect of it? I would argue that it has to do with Bahuchara Mata’s unique positioning as a Goddess who achieved deification through self-sacrifice.

MYTHS AND INTERVENTIONS IN THE LIVES OF HIJRAS

The worship of Bahuchara Mata plays an important role in the initiation, sustenance and even the livelihood of the hijras. There is a clear link between Bahuchara deification through self-sacrifice and the devotion of the hijras who self-castrate. After all, the transition from one gendered state to another in each respective case is significant. In Bahuchara Mata’s case, she sacrifices her femininity (her breasts) while in the hijras’ case there is a transition from the male to the third sex (which sometimes involves physical castration of male genitalia). The mirroring of the lives of Bahuchara and those of the hijras is key to understanding the active role that Bahuchara plays in the lives of her devotees. For instance, hijras believe that they were ordained to worship Bahuchara Mata in changing

---

17 This is a peculiar positioning for a Hindu Goddess since Bahuchara Mata was not a Goddess until she had undergone the transformation of cutting of her breasts by sacrificing herself.
their sex or else face the consequence of impotency in their next seven lives.\textsuperscript{18}

What does it mean for \textit{hijras} to worship a Goddess whose power to bless is simultaneously celebrated with her curse? This paradox is based on the myth of Prince Jetho who was impotent. In this narrative, Bahuchara singles out Prince Jetho and commands him to worship her through taking upon himself the identity of a woman by way of castration. There are two major implications of this myth for the relationship that \textit{hijras} share with Bahuchara Mata. First, the origin of the devotion was not out of the voluntary \textit{shraddha} or faith, but because obedience resulted in seven lifetime times of potency. Secondly, Bahuchara’s insistence that Jetho chop off his own genitals and dress as a woman is her way of rescuing him from the restrictive masculinity rooted in his impotency. This transition to the male is inherently violent—including, of course, the physical act of castration itself.

It is also important to note that fear was a major motivation for Jetho to chop off his genitals. After all, if he refused, he would be cursed to live as an impotent for seven lifetimes. How does this fear translate into the lives of the \textit{hijra}? Bahuchara offers them complete protection in exchange for submission, but does so by capitalizing on their fear. Interestingly, it is in the contrasting relationship that the hijras share with Bahuchara Mata that they gain legitimacy in social functions (which will be explored shortly). As Serena Nanda holds, “this dual nature of the goddess provides the powerful symbolic and psychological context in which the hijras become culturally meaningful as an alternative sex/gender.”19 This peculiar relationship—where Bahuchara’s protection is contingent on devotion—creates different modalities of worship, particularly as it relates to castration. One of the interviewees mentioned earlier, Maneka Chaturthi, believes that castration is important not only for recognition as a hijra, but also for a constant reminder of the special protection that Bahuchara Mata accords to her as a member of the hijra community. She explained,

I underwent castration not so that they would recognize me as a woman, or even so that they would think of me as a hijra. After all, there are many uncastrated hijras. I was castrated to remind myself of Mata’s desire to be worshipped. If she could chop off her own breasts, she can give me the strength to live my life.20

For Chaturthi, the act of castration itself is critical in remembering the myth that surrounds Prince Jetho. It is therefore more of a spiritual, rather than a social choice that is made by hijras. Interestingly, a similar

---

19 Nanda, Serena. Gender Diversity: Crosscultural Variations. 1999, p. 32
20 See appendix II for transcription of the full interview in Hindi.
opinion is voiced by those hijras that chose to not undergo castration.

Vaishali Raode, a Pune-based Marathi writer who is also a hijra, writes, “Though the world believes that a castrated hijra alone is a real hijra, we do not endorse this. I am not castrated. I did not opt for it and my guru did not pressure me into it. Most of my chelas[^21] are also uncastrated like me”[^22]

Again, while this underscores the spiritual importance of castration within the cult of the Goddess, it does not seem to be necessary for someone to undergo it in order to be considered a hijra by society. It is, in fact, to remind them of the story of Bahuchara Mata that hijras like Chaturthi choose castration, while those like Raode believe that castration has nothing to do with being a “real hijra.” Both narratives, although divergent, maintain a strong belief in Bahuchara Mata’s story.^[23]

As Lawrence Cohen notes, “being a hijra seems rooted both in this narrative of having always been hijra and in a continual reenactment of the [^21]: One of the most important hijra social institutions is the guru-chela relationship. The chela’s role is that of an obedient student. Roade is a guru, and has many chela hijras under her care. For more details, please refer to: Mines, Diane P., and Sarah Lamb. Everyday Life in South Asia. Bloomington: Indiana UP, 2002. Print, p. 124

[^23]: I had emailed Vaishali Raode, and got a response in which she categorically stated that “I do believe that Bahuchara Mata is our special goddess. She does not call for castration, but asks for hijras to dress up and worship her as women. She does not care about your genitalia, but about your shraddha.”
moment of becoming—the gesture of castration.”

What are the implications of emasculation, which results in gender ambiguity? The answer to this lies in the ritualistic blessings that Bahuchara Mata places on hijras during and after castration. It is not surprising therefore that Bahuchara’s blessings are imperative for the ceremony to take place—after all, “[the hijras’] impotence, emasculation, and commitment to sexual abstinence combine to create a vehicle for Bahuchara Mata’s powers, an anomaly whereby she and her sexually mutilated acolytes confer fertility and other blessings on mortal humans.”

The fact that hijra castration is carried out in the name of the Goddess means that the ritual unites the hijra with the Goddess, transforming her into a bhagat (a devotee) in a process called nirvana. Being a bhagat means that hijras can now claim potency through the Goddess. In this vein, it is important to remember that hijras are thought of as being capable of blessing or cursing—a core aspect of Bahuchara mythology, she curses Bapiya, but blesses Jetho. Bahuchara provides the hijras with the medium through which they can earn their livelihood—the ability of the hijras to bless weddings, births and other occasions of festivity, and the threat of their possible curses ensures their participation in such occasions.

---

The core of hijra identity is not merely located in the act of Bahuchara’s transformation, although it is certainly an important aspect. For instance, hijra also claim power “through Shiva’s ritual sacrifice of the phallus.” The physical sacrifice of male genitalia during the process of castration mirrors the castration of the Hindu god Shiva (seeing that Shiva had been denied his role in creating the world). This has a major implication for the symbolism associated with the phallus itself—it being a symbol of universal fertility. It is fitting, perhaps, that the hijras would identify with a symbol of fertility, as they no longer physically embody the symbol itself. Drawing on the narrative of Bahuchara Mata enables the hijras to bless and curse. In this way, they take part in ceremonies associated with fertility—

---

28 Nanda, Serena. Gender Diversity: Crosscultural Variations. 1999, p. 31
weddings and birth—while never receiving the personal blessing of fertility themselves.

In conclusion, the manner in which hijras interact with their Goddess in personal, social and ritualistic spaces means that it is not just a lack of masculinity that shape their identity. The particular “operation [of castration and/or biological sex transformation] is explicitly identified with the hijras’ devotion to Bahuchara Mata, who is particularly associated with male transvestism and transgenderism.” These interactions with Bahuchara that exist on a spiritual and personal level for the hijras (while providing legitimacy to their social context), also mean a distinct form of worship of the Goddess.

BECHARAJI, THE TEMPLE TOWN OF BAHUCHARA MATA

Bahuchara Mata is an important Goddess in the Gujarat region in general and has numerous temples dedicated to her worship across the state. In this section, I will explore the manner in which Bahuchara Mata is worshipped as a version of the “Indian Mother Goddess”\textsuperscript{31} in temple rituals, while retaining many of her unique hijra associations. One of the most important temples dedicated to Bahuchara Mata is located in the temple town of Becharaji. Becharaji is also associated with many myths of Bahuchara Mata, including that of a lake where one dip can transform a person’s gender. Prerna Laxmi Chaudhary, a hijra devotee who has lived near the temple grounds for around two decades, shared his thoughts about the legend of the lake:

---

Of course, not everyone who bashes in the lake becomes a hijra. You become a hijra when you have true faith in serving Bahuchara Mata. Most of the devotees here are infertile women or men who want to have children. They are not mediums of the Goddess like we are. When a hijra bashes in the lake, she has already been castrated, or become a bhagat through true devotion. The temple is important for us, but more important is the appropriate worship of the Goddess herself through devotion.\textsuperscript{32}

Chaudhary insists that being a hijra provides a special connection with Bahuchara Mata that other devotees cannot hope to achieve. There are two annual fairs at the temple where over 100,000 hijras gather. They also have separate guesthouses near the temple. There seems to be ambivalence among the general public as to the relationship that the hijras share with Bahuchara Mata. In a video interview with locals, one man explained that one of the reasons why boys’ hair is shaved off at the age of five is so that the Goddess “does not ask for the penis.” In this same video, we find the transformation of hijras apparent. Given the difficult social, economic and even legal hurdles that hijras might deal with, it is not surprising that it is undesirable to become one. However, it is because of these hurdles that they have come to privilege a special relationship with Bahuchara Mata.

\textsuperscript{32} See appendix II for interview

While the locals might not wish to become hijras themselves, they have come to admire the unique position that the hijras occupy at Becharaji. What does this emphasis on the power of hijras to bless (or conversely, to curse) mean for their social status in Becharaji, even as a marginalized social group? According to a local quoted by Hans Plomb, “the hijras are the richest people around here. They own huge properties

34 “Blessed by A Eunuch in Bahucharaji Temple, Gujarat”, see 2:45
https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ME9KzuI1KrY 35 Ibid, see 1:16
and nobody dares refuse them anything because it is known that a hijra can bless or curse.”\textsuperscript{36} This particular account might be a little exaggerated, given that all five hijras who I interviewed did not own any property of their own, but instead lived in guesthouses near the temple. That being said, this account does underscore the importance that the hijras are given at Becharaji by the local populace.

It is interesting to note that while hijras are heavily involved in the intricacies of the public worship of Bahuchara Mata at Becharaji, the priests within the temples are all upper caste Brahmin men. A cursory glance at the website of the main Becharaji temple\textsuperscript{37} reveals the dominance of Brahmins in worshipping Bahuchara Mata. In a phone conversation with Parvathi Tripathi, a hijra who has been living in the temple complex for the better part of a decade, it became clear that she recognizes the worship of Bahuchara Mata by Brahmin priests as advantageous to the hijras’ community.\textsuperscript{38} She explained, “This is good for us. Why not? Now everyone knows Bahuchara Mata as the transgender goddess of Gujarat. They still come to Becharaji for our blessings as well.” It seems that worship of Bahuchara Mata by Brahmin

\textsuperscript{36} Plomb, Hans. \textit{Tantric Picnic: Tales of India}, 2008 p. 63
\textsuperscript{38} See Appendix II for interview.
priests provides legitimacy to hijras that they both recognize and appreciate. According to Lalitha Kumari, another member of the community who is Tripathi’s chela, this legitimacy is not just social or religious, but also legal.\(^39\)

BAHUCHARA MATA AND LEGAL RIGHTS OF THE HIJARA COMMUNITY

On April 15, 2014, the Supreme Court of India officially recognized the hijras as a legal third gender. The Court quoted a variety of sources in its reasoning, including Hindu, Jain, and Muslim traditions, and foreign verdicts on transgender rights. Bahuchara Mata’s absence was conspicuous in the verdict; however, there were multiple references to well known male deities such as Ram and Aravan.\(^40\) Ram and Aravan retain their cisgender identities as heterosexual men who are supported by the hijras as it relates to their respective mythologies. On the other hand, Bahuchara Mata is a deity who undergoes a transformation that mirrors that of the hijras. Does this subtle difference exhibit a bias in understanding the experience of the hijra community by blatantly

---

\(^39\) Ibid

\(^40\) Judgment of the National Legal Services Authority vs. Union of India in the Supreme Court of India. April 15, 2014 http://supremecourtofindia.nic.in/outtoday/wc40012.pdf ignoring their primary goddess (who is also a mainstream Gujarati goddess)? After all, even Prime Minister Narendra Modi has been documented doing aarti at the Becharaji Temple.\(^{41}\) I suspect that the reason for this omission may be the specific Gujarati context of the goddess, rather than her close association with the hijra experience. It was surprising to me that many of the members of the community that I interviewed did not find the omission of Bahuchara Mata problematic at all. Shalini Singh, another chela of Tripathi, explained this to me:

> The Supreme Court judgment opened up a new door for us. Of course, there is much to be done still. But today, I can go and ask for an identification card, a ration card. I can sit for examinations, become a doctor or engineer. I am legally allowed to do so. If they had acknowledged Bahuchara Mata, it would have been good. But I am happy with my legal rights, and I do not care otherwise.
Bahuchara Mata would be happy for us, she would not care either.\(^{42}\)

Many of the hijras I spoke to echoed Singh’s sentiments. While the worship of Bahuchara Mata is important for their social and religious context, it is ironic that the hijras’ relationship with deities like Ram and Aravan were taken to legitimize their legal rights.

CONCLUSION

\(^{41}\) “Shree Karni Mata – Deshnok”, 2009 https://deviputra.wordpress.com/2009/03/24/bahuchara-mata/\(^{42}\) See appendix II for interview
The role that Bahuchara Mata plays in the life of the hijra is manifold. She is their source of initiation into being a hijra and sustains their lifestyle while continuing to live as one. While her worship at Becharaji takes place in what could be described as Brahmanization, the hijras themselves do not seem to mind this. In this paper, I found the lack of research on Bahuchara Mata to be challenging, fascinating and troubling at the same time. I found many of my assumptions about Sanskritization, marginalization and the hijra experience itself being challenged through the course of this research. What does it mean to be a transgender devotee of a Goddess who is worshipped in the mainstream Gujarati context? Who decides who the “real” Bahuchara is? These questions are especially relevant in the current debate surrounding LGBTQ rights in India. There is a desire to find indigenous stories, myths and legends that can validate LGBTQ experiences in non-Western terms. Bahuchara Mata’s stories, and the importance given to hijras in her worship in Becharaji could be important references in the fight for equal rights.
APENDIX I (IMAGES)

Figure 3 A picture of the murti of Bahuchara Mata at Shree Bahucharji Temple in Rajkot
http://bahucharajitemple.org

Figure 4 A typical calendar at representation of Durga
http://adishakti.org/meeting_his_messengers/shri_durga.htm Interview with Maneka Chaturthi

प्रश्न: ब्राह्मणों द्वारा बहुचरा माता के पूजन के बारे में आपका क्या ख्याल है?

उत्तर: मेरे हिसाब से बड़े हिंदू ढांचे में बहुचरा माता को शामिल करना एक बहुत खुशी की बात है। जब मैंने बिधया कराया, मुझे मालूम था की वो धार्मिक क रूप से अलविद्यू था, और साथ ही साथ, मेरे एक विज्ञान होने के नाटे भी। लोग कहते हैं कि विज्ञान उनके इतने परेशान कर रहे हैं, वे भीख मांगते हैं, वे काम नहीं करते। आम आदमी हमारे साथ सहानुभूति नहीं निभाता है। अगर लोग बहुचरा माता जैसी विज्ञान देवी को एक अलग विज्ञान देवी मानें, तो वे हमें बेहतर समझेंगे।

प्रश्न: विधया को लेकर आपका क्या ख्याल है? बहुचरा माता आपकी विधया चाहती हैं?

उत्तर: मैंने विधया इस लिये नहीं कराई की आदमी मुझे एक औरत के रूप में पहचानने या यह की वो मुझे एक विज्ञान के रूप में देखा। आलोचनात्मक, बहुत सारे विज्ञान ने विधया नहीं कराई है। मैं विधया इस लिये कराई ताकि मैं अपने आप को माता की इच्छा के बारे में याद दिलाती रह सकूं। यदि वह अपने खुद के स्तन काट सकती हैं, तो वह जीवन जीने के लिए शिक्त भी दे सकती हैं।

Interview with Makhana Chootto

प्रश्न: विज्ञान और ब्राह्मण बहुचरा माता को अलग-अलग रूपों में बांधकथा रते हैं?

उत्तर: जब मैं इतिहास के बाहरी इतिहास के गांव में थी, मैंने कभी भी दुगार या काली माता के रूप में बहुचरा माता देखा। मैंने उनके अपने आप की देवी, एक विज्ञान देवी के रूप में देखा। हालांकि वह दुगार की तरह यहाँ लग रही है, वह अभी भी एक ही बहुचरा हीं है - हम विज्ञान पर उनका आशीर्वाद पहले से ही है तो
आप लोगों की तरह हमें अभय हस्त मुद्रा की आवश्यकता नहीं है।

Interview with Prema Laxmi Chaudhary प्रश्न: झील का क्या महत्व है?

उत्तर: बेशक, हर कोई जो झील में नहाता हिजरा नहीं हो जाता है। जब आप एक हिजरा हो तुम बहुचरा माता की सेवा में सच्चा विश्वास किया है। श्रदाधार यहां के अधिकांश बांज मिहलाओं या पुरुषों के लिए जो बच्चे हैं करना चाहते हैं। उन्होंने देवी के माध्यमों की तरह हम कर रहे हैं नहीं कर रहे हैं। एक हिजरा झील में नहाता है, वह पहले से ही विधाया कर दिया गया है, या सच्ची बिकृत के माध्यम से एक भगत हो जाते हैं। मंदिर हमारे लिए महत्वपूर्ण है, लेकिन अधिक महत्वपूर्ण बिकृत के माध्यम से देवी खुद की उंचत पूजा है।

Interview with Parvathi Tripathi

प्रश्न: क्या ब्राह्मणों द्वारा माँ का पूजन गलत है?

उत्तर: यह हमारे लिये अच्छा है। क्यों? सबको बहुचरा माता एक हिजरा देवी के नाम से पता है। सब हमारे आशीर्वाद के लिये भी आते हैं।

Interview with Shalini Singh

प्रश्न: सुपरीम कोटर के फैसले में बहुचरा माता का कोई बिज्ञकर नहीं था। इस पर आप की क्या राय है?

उत्तर: सुपरीम कोटर के फैसले ने हमारे लिए एक नया द्वारा खोल दिया। बेशक, वहाँ अभी भी किया जा करने के लिए काफी है। लेकिन आज, मैं जाने के लिए और एक पहचान कार्य, राशन कार्य के लिए पूर्ण सकते हैं। मैं परिसंचारों के लिए बैठता हूँ, एक डॉक्टर या इंजीनियर बन सकता है। मैं कानूनी तौर पर हमें ऐसा करने की अनुमति दी है। अगर वे बहुचरा माता को स्वीकार किया तो, यह अच्छा हो गया होता। लेकिन मैं अपने कानूनी अधिकारों के साथ खुश हूँ और मैं नहीं तो कोई
परवाह नहीं है। बहुचर माता हमारे लिए खुशी होगी, वह या तो परवाह नहीं होती।
BIBLIOGRAPHY

Judgment of the National Legal Sevices Authory vs. Union of India in the Supreme Court of India. April 15, 2014 http://supremecourtofindia.nic.in/outtoday/wc40012.pdf

“Lakshmi’s Story” World Without Borders

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ME9KzuJlKrY

Yagnik, Bharat. “Driving through the queer legends of Bahucharaji”. November 05, 2011.