

2019

Online Decreta Regni Mediaevalis Hungariae. The Laws of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary

János M. Bak
Central European University, Budapest, BAKJM@CEU.HU

Follow this and additional works at: https://digitalcommons.usu.edu/lib_mono

Part of the Medieval Studies Commons

Recommended Citation

Bak, János M., "Online Decreta Regni Mediaevalis Hungariae. The Laws of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary" (2019). All Complete Monographs. 4.
https://digitalcommons.usu.edu/lib_mono/4

This Book is brought to you for free and open access by DigitalCommons@USU. It has been accepted for inclusion in All Complete Monographs by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@USU. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@usu.edu.

The Laws of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary *Decreta regni mediaevalis Hungariae
Online edition

The present edition is a revised, up-dated, and re-worked version of the five printed volumes of the The Laws of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary. Decreta regni mediaevalis Hungariae, [DRMH] published between 1989 and 2012. The initiator of that project was Charles Schalcks, Jr., Publisher, a tireless servant of Slavic and East European studies, single-handed editor and publisher of several books and many seminal periodicals. On the counsel of Peter Hidas from Montréal, who was to be General Editor of all the laws of Hungary, he had approached Prof. György Bónis (1914–1985) to prepare a bi-lingual edition of the medieval laws of Hungary that was to be part of a major editorial plan of publishing all the laws of Central and Eastern Europe with English translations.¹ Bónis, in turn, invited James Ross Sweeney (1940–2011) of Penn State University, who then asked the assistance of the present editor, at that time at the University of British Columbia, who finally remained with the project to its very end. The first volume (1000–1300) appeared in 1989 (with a second, revised ed. in 1998); the second (1301–1458), co-edited with the leading Hungarian medievalist of the time, Pál Engel (1938–2001) and the Roman legal scholar Paul B. Harvey Jr. (1945–2014) of Penn State, came out in 1992. The volume of the laws of King Matthias I Corvinus (1458–90) was edited with the cooperation of Paul Harvey and Leslie S. Domonkos, then at Youngstown State University, and published in 1996. For the legislation of the Jagiellonian age, including the great collection of customary law, the Tripartitum, the editor was joined by Martyn Rady of UCL SEES, Peter Banyó of CEU Budapest, and Zsolt Hunyadi from Szeged University (and profited from the counsel of András Kubinyi, 1929–2007), so that the project could be completed by 2012. In the course of these decades a great number of colleagues, faculty and students alike, from the editors' own universities and elsewhere assisted the editors; financial aid from their home universities and several foundations was helpful in preparing the printed volumes. Thanks are due to all of these persons and institutions, duly listed in the prefaces to the printed volumes of DRMH 1–5.

1 Selection of texts

In principle, this edition intends to present all surviving texts of legal force for the entire kingdom of Hungary in their time (“statutory law” and the major source of customary law) from its foundation in 1000 AD to its end at the battle of Mohács, 1526 (or the fall of Buda to the Ottomans in 1541). No such collection exists, and, considering the rather chequered history of these text, cannot be easily constructed. Besides, the exact definition of “law” (decreta) is open for discussion.² The editors have, therefore, made reasonable selections for every period, based on the available resources; they are confident that this edition represents the essentially complete corpus of what were legally binding rules in the kingdom across these five centuries as far as they survived in a more or less authentic form. Their point of departure was the collection of the hand- or typewritten transcripts of Ferenc Döry (1875–1960), who spent decades planning to edit a complete critical collection of medieval laws, but did not live to see it published. His work was acquired by György Bónis, who shared it with the editors of DRMH, then it went into the possession of Géza Érszegi, and is now deposited in the Hungarian National Archives.

1.1 The laws from 1000 to 1301

There is no generally accepted canon for the texts of Árpáadian legislation. Neither the choice of legislative documents nor their authentic texts have yet been established through a critical edition. In the absence of a consensus, legal scholars have been free to shape the contents of printed collections in accordance with different principles. In the Hungarian tradition, the *Codex Juris Hungarici (CJH)*³ represents a minimalist principle, for it contains only the “books” of Stephen, Ladislas, and Coloman, and the Golden Bull of Andrew II of 1222. The manuscript collections used by the first editors of the CJH did not contain later ones.⁴ At the other extreme, Stephen Endlicher included more than eighty pieces in his collection of “laws,” augmenting—theoretically speaking, not without reason—the “law books” with a number of charters of privileges for towns, territories, and other communities.⁵ The present edition represents a compromise between these two, combining legal tradition and modern view of legal history. Almost all of

¹ Of this ambitious project, only the five volumes of DRMH and the edition of a few early Russian laws materialize.

² See: György Bónis, “Begriff, Wirkung und gesellschaftliche Rolle des Dekrets,” in DRH 1301, pp. 15—31 and Susanna Teke, “Begriff des Dekrets und seine gesellschaftliche Rolle zur Zeit von König Matthias,” in: DRH Matth. pp. 11—4

³ The most frequently used, so-called “Millennial,” edition is Magyar Törvénytár: Codex Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., Budapest: Franklin, 1896 ff.

⁴ See Andor Csizmadia, “Previous Editions of the Laws of Hungary,” in DRMH 21, pp. xvii—xxxiii. Now also below under Studies to medieval Hungarian law.

⁵ Stefan Ladislaus, Endlicher, Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana. Sankt Gallen: Scheitlin, 1849.

what had been part of the CJH for centuries has been included, but now augmented by additional texts. In contrast to the CJH, we have dropped the Institutio Morum “of St. Stephen” (called there the first book of his laws). As early as the eighteenth century, Adam Kollar demonstrated that this speculum principum does not belong into a book of laws.⁶ On the other hand, certain texts of historical significance, not strictly laws or decreta but rather important privileges, discovered only in the eighteenth century, are included here: besides the Golden Bull of 1222, also its 1231 renewal and a later, shorter version of 1267 for a wider circle of freemen. The coronation decree of Andrew III and the parliamentary decretum of 1298 can be regarded as the earliest true pieces of legislation and although missing from the CJH, they are included here. In the printed version, certain texts issued in what was called “synods” had been relegated into an Appendix. That we have revised for the present edition: the statutes of the “Synod of Szabolcs (1092)—also styled “Book I of King Ladislas’ Laws”—and the “Synod of Esztergom” as well as the undated canons of other early twelfth-century synods belong to this group. Together with the statute of Coloman concerning the Jews—as part of this rare group of early “laws”—have been included. However, the so-called “Second Cuman Law” dated to 1279, has been now convincingly argued to be a modern forgery, based partially on an authentic royal charter of that year.⁷ While in the printed version the editors’ doubts about its authenticity were already noted, we have now left it out altogether. Finally, an undated collection of legal norms, formerly believed to have originated in the last years of the thirteenth century, was also included in the Appendix as “Complatio c. 1300.” Containing significant legal measures (although irregular in form), it was seen as the last piece of legislation extant from the Árpadian age. It has now been demonstrated that it originates most likely from a century or so later.⁸ Its date cannot be ascertained, the only firm ante quem is the year 1440, when it was presented to King Wladislas I, copied into a booklet; we call it therefore “Compilatio ante 1440”. Privileges and decrees are referred to throughout by the date of their issue.

⁶ A. Kollar, De originibus et usu perpetuo potestatis legislationis circa sacra apostolica regum Hungariae libellus singularis. Vienna: Trattner, 1764. The “Admonitions” were most recently edited by László Havas, Sancti Stephani primi regis Hungariae libellus de institutione morum: sive admonitio spiritualis, Debrecen: Debreceni Tudományegyetem 2004; better than Josephus. Balogh, in: Emericus Szentpéteri, ed, Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum tempore ducum regumque stirpis Arpadiane gestarum, vol. 2., (Budapest: Academia Litt., 1938; repr. Budapest: Nap, 2001) pp. 611–28. On this “mirror of princes,” see Jenő Szűcs “The Admonitions of St. Stephen and his state,” New Hungarian Quarterly 29. 112 (1988): 89–97, with English translation of the text, by James Ross. Sweeney and János M. Bak, ibid., 98–105.

⁷ See Nora Berend, “Forging the Cuman Law, forging an identity,” in: Manufacturing a Past for the Present: Forgery and Authenticity in Medievalist Texts and Objects in Nineteenth-Century Europe, János M. Bak, Patrick Geary, Gábor Klaniczay, eds. (Leiden: Brill, 2014), pp. 109–28.

1.2 The laws between 1301 and 1490

The decreta of the Angevin, Luxembourg and Corvinian age have been critically edited—based on Döry’s manuscripts—in two volumes: György Bónis and Vera Bácskai Decreta regni Hungariae. Gesetze and Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457 (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1976), in the series Publicationes Archivi Nationalis Hungariae II, Fontes vol. 11 [DRH]; and György Bónis with Géza Érszegi and Zsuzsanna Teke, Decreta regni Hungariae. Gesetze and Verordnungen Ungarns 1458–1490 (ibid., 1989), same series, vol. 19 [DRH Matth]. The editors of DRMH essentially followed their choices, but did not include the fragmentary texts and those that are known only by reference (deperdita); they can be consulted in the two volumes mentioned above. An exception is the decree of 1411, for which a text, not utilized in previous editions, was recently discovered. Thanks to the collegial advice of Dr. Iván Borsa of the Hungarian National Archives, the editors were able to include the reading of this version, as it seems to contain the oldest text. As mentioned above, the “Compilatio ante 1440” is now placed in its chronological context here. The editors yielded to tradition and included one of the royal charters on a cameral contract from 1342, while omitting the others printed in DRH. Three other texts, not decreta proper, but relevant for legal development have also been retained: the royal propositions of 1415/7 and of 1432/3, and a Register from 1467. Recent research proved that the so-called Palatinal Articles, believed to have been issued in 1458, are of much later date.⁹ They have, therefore, been dropped.

1.3 The laws and dietal decisions between 1490 and 1526

The decreta of these decades were never edited in any critical version. For this period, the editors were forced to give up the principle of translating and printing the entire corpus of statutory law. The bulk of legal documents emanating from the period between 1490 and 1526 proved to be too large to handle successfully. As far as we know, during these decades more than forty diets were held, and even though the decisions of many are lost, under King Wladislas II seven (or six) decreta were issued amounting altogether to some four hundred articles (paragraphs); from the ten years of King Louis II's reign, more than three hundred articles have survived. Besides, many of the texts repeat more or less verbatim provisions of earlier decreta and often contain matters that were merely ephemeral administrative issues. One may even question whether all the decisions of diets—some not approved by the king, others not accepted by the estates—deserve at all the name of “legislation” in the sense that they contain legal norms binding for all subjects of the kingdom. This is especially true for the articles issued at the “tumultuous diets” of the last decade of the medieval kingdom under Louis II. These texts are less legal monuments than political programs, designed for the moment and as part of the propaganda war waged between the different factions. We identify them rather as dietal decisions. Lacking up-to-date, document based studies for the period, the context and background of the texts can be indicated only in general outlines. These will have to be augmented by new research, but at least the surviving texts are worth to be made accessible.

⁸ Pál Engel, “Az ‘1300 körüli’ tanácsi határozat keletkezéséhez” [On the origin of the decision in council of ‘c. 1300’], in I, Honor, vár, ispánság., ed. Enikő Csukovics (Budapest: Osiris, 2003) pp. 638-48.

⁹ Norbert C. Tóth, “A nádori cikkelyek keletkezése,” [Origin of the Palatinal Articles] in: Rendiség és parlamentarizmus Magyarországon a kezdetektől 1918-ig. Dobszay Tamás et al. eds., (Budapest: Oszággyűlés – Argumentum, 2014) pp. 36-45.

The editors, therefore, made a few compromises for the texts of the Jagiellonian Age. Almost all original surviving Latin texts—based on Döry's transcription, hitherto unpublished—are included in the edition, but not all are translated and annotated. Actually, the CJH Millennial edition also abbreviated these texts or set them in small type. The selection was guided by the question whether the text contains any new legal (including procedural) measure, or whether it is politically important (e.g. reflecting stages in the tug-of-war between different noble and aristocratic factions, or the gradual restriction of the liberty of peasants, and so on). According to these criteria:

- (1) some decreta are altogether given only in Latin;
- (2) the rest of the decreta is presented in the usual bi-lingual form but those paragraphs that repeat earlier laws were left out, and marked not only—as in previous volumes—when they are verbatim identical to earlier articles by the = sign, but, this time, also when they are essentially the same as texts already edited elsewhere, containing only stylistic changes; these are marked by the ≈ sign indicating “similar to”; o
- (3) even in the translated texts, several overly verbose articles were dropped and instead something of a regest is offered, summarizing their content in a sentence in English and printing their tituli (even though these were mostly added by later editors) in Latin.

2 The Latin text

This edition presents, as mentioned above, a hitherto partly unpublished vulgate redaction of the Latin text of the laws, based largely on the transcriptions made by Ferenc Döry. Döry followed, as a rule, the best and oldest available manuscripts: for St. Stephen, the twelfth-century Codex Admont; for Ladislas and Coloman, mainly the Codex Thuróczi; and for the decreta from the thirteenth century onward either the rare originals or the best available medieval transcripts. It is, of course, not certain that there are not more copies in provincial or private archives. For the Golden Bull of 1222 and the decretum of 1514, however, newly established texts have been adduced, prepared by Géza Érszegi, who collated all available copies. As mentioned above, the law of 1411 is also in a new redaction.

At some points, where Döry's reading does not agree with those of the older editions, the disagreement has been noted. In some instances all surviving texts are so corrupt or incomplete that, in order to render some sense, reconstructions proposed by other historians have been consulted. Manuscript variants are included only in the texts from the Jagellonian age (1490–1526). For the preceding centuries the DRH edition of Bónis et al. can be consulted.

The Tripartium (DRMH 5) follows the first printed edition of 1517 (Vienna: Singrenius) tacitly correcting obvious misprints.

The presentation of the texts conforms to the prevailing norms of modern scholarship. Rubrics inserted by early modern editors have been dropped, with the exception of chapter headings in some of the law books of Stephen and Ladislas and in a few later decreta, which may be original. (Exceptions made for the Jagiellonian age are discussed above.) The subdivision of laws into articles is an old CJH tradition and rests implicitly on medieval bases, even though the numbering is modern. The traditional numbering of either the CJH or the first editors has been, as a rule, followed to facilitate scholarly consultation. Differences between this edition and previous ones, if significant, are listed in the concordances following the respective texts. The orthography has been normalized to the usage of u and v, i, and j; e caudata (which prevails for æ) is given as e.

3. The English translation.

This posed more problems than translations usually do. Every translation implies interpretation and thus a certain amount of change and distortion. The editors had to face at least two additional problems. First, the Latin text was in many cases clearly faulty or garbled and had never been properly amended. During the past five hundred years learned editors of the CJH put their hands to the text and did their best to make sense of it. They did so, however, in the light of a living Hungarian legal tradition, that is, of the customary law of the noble natio Hungarica of much later centuries. We attempt to bring the texts as we have it, even if they do not correspond with the expectations of lawyers and legal historians of a later age, or contained contradictions and obscurities. The editors have noted their doubts and problems, as well as earlier scholarly comments in the notes, but have attempted to render the text of the ancient originals as faithfully as possible.

This brought them to the second major quandary. It is obvious that medieval institutional and legal terms in the English language originated in the historical realities of the British Isles. Here, however, concepts that grew out of an entirely different historical experience had to be rendered in English words. Many of our learned colleagues in such cases decide to retain the “original” Latin—which may be precise, but awkward. One still might ask, however, how “original” these Latin terms were. Surely medieval Hungarians named offices and institutions in the vernacular and these terms were translated into Latin by the learned clerks who composed the written record—therefore, only their Magyar version, if known, would be truly original. But deploying a large number of Latin or Hungarian technical terms on each page of English text would not have helped the non-specialist reader. Therefore, the editors attempted in almost all cases to coin a term that appears to be a reasonable English equivalent of the Latin of the laws (and, as far as one can presume, of the vernacular original). Finally, only the translation of the word comes remained “unsolved”: since it does not imply noble title (there was, with some exceptions, no titled nobility in medieval Hungary) nor the kind of royal officer of Carolingian-type “count,” the editors decided to give the Hungarian version, ispán, that seems to have designated first the great men of the realm, later royal officers heading the counties.¹⁰ The difficulties with another enigmatic term, regnicola (verbatim: inhabitant of the realm), that seems to have meant landowning freemen, later noblemen, led to an awkward but perhaps reasonable formulation: they are referred to (in the earlier Middle Ages) as “man/men of the realm,” and later as “gentleman/en of the realm.” Other technical terms are explained in the notes and in the Glossary.

All in all, the translation aims at the maximum feasible authenticity, bearing in mind that not all readers will wish to enter into the intricacies of local development. The task was to prepare a readable and informative text, not necessarily elegant, but faithful, and by adding notes and glosses, to enable the reader to derive more precise understanding.

4 The apparatus criticus

As can be expected in a project that was accomplished across several decades with a number of collaborators, the annotations and prefaces to the texts are slightly diverse in every section, even if a certain uniformity was attempted. Every law opens with a preface on its background and textual problems, then lists the manuscripts (used by Döry and usually re-checked by the editors) as MSS, the previous editions (EDD) and a selected list of relevant scholarly literature (LIT).

Annotations on historical matters, technical terms, and personal data as well as cross-references to earlier or later legislation are added only to the English translation.

The annotations are composed so that every law can be read in itself, thus repetitions are frequent.

5 Glossary and Gazetteer

Even though technical terms are usually explained in the notes, it seemed useful to summarize them in a Glossary and partial subject index. Such a helpful addition was prepared by Zsolt Hunyadi from Szeged University and I am most grateful to him to

¹⁰

That the word was seen as specific for this Hungarian officer is suggested by the fact that in German it was translated not as Graf but as Gespan. Pipo Scolari, ispán of several counties in Hungary, was called in Florence Pipo Spano.

have prepared and now updated it. Considering the many changes of place names and the peculiarities of the medieval use of them, we also added a Gazetteer of such place names that have significantly diverse forms, historical or otherwise. That table does not claim completeness, but may be helpful in identifying locations.

Overall,, no systematic attempt was made during the preparation of the present edition fully to update the literature in the prefaces and the notes from the printed DRMH, but some recent titles have been added.

Many thanks are due to USU Digital Commons for publishing this version.

Budapest, August 2019.

János M. Bak, ed.-in-chief

(Having been alerted to some mistakes, a revised version was prepared and the Glossary and Gazetteer added half a year after the first publication. Thanks to attentive readers for their comments!)

TABLE OF CONTENTS

THE HOUSE OF ÁRPÁD (1000-1301)

THE LAWS OF KING ST. STEPHEN I OF HUNGARY (1000–1038)

BOOK I...St 1..... 18

BOOK II...St 2..... 41.

THE LAWS OF KING ST LADISLAS I OF HUNGARY (1077–1095)

CANONS OF THE SYNOD OF SZABOLCS 20 MAY, 1092

= [“BOOK I”] Syn. Sz.....51

[BOOK II] ...Lad 2.....71

[BOOK III] ...Lad 3..... 84

THE LAW OF KING COLOMAN OF HUNGARY (1095–1116)...Colo.....105

STATUTES OF KING COLOMAN FOR THE JEWS ...Colo. Iud.....131

CONSTITUTIONS OF SYNODS HELD UNDER KING

COLOMAN Syn. Str.....135

THE LAWS OF KING ANDREW II OF HUNGARY (1205–35)

THE GOLDEN BULL OF 1222..... 156

RENEWAL OF THE GOLDEN BULL 1231..... 172

PRIVILEGE FOR THE LESSER NOBLES 1267..... 183

THE LAWS OF KING ANDREW III OF HUNGARY (1290-1301)

CORONATION DECRETUM OF 1 SEPTEMBER,1290.....190

LAW OF 5 AUGUST, 1298.....206

DIVERSE DYNASTIES (1301-1490)

ANJOU

THE LAWS OF KING CHARLES I OF HUNGARY (1301-42)

LAW OF CA. 1320	222
MANDATE OF 10 AUGUST, 1324	229
PRIVILEGE OF 31 OCTOBER, 1328	235
CHARTER ON CAMERAL CONTRACTS, 1342	243

DECRETUM UNICUM OF KING LOUIS I OF HUNGARY (1342-82)

11 DECEMBER, 1351	268
--------------------------------	-----

LAWS OF QUEEN MARY OF HUNGARY (1382–7)

OF 22 JUNE, 1384	289
OF 14 NOVEMBER, 1385	298
DECRETUM OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY IN 1386 (AFTER 27 AUGUST).....	302

LUXEMBURG

LAWS OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY (1387-1437)

LAW OF (October 1397).....	310
LAW OF 6 APRIL, 1404 (Placetum regium).	333
LAW OF 21 DECEMBER, 1404	340.
LAW OF 15 APRIL, 1405	350
LAW OF 31 AUGUST, 1405	375
LAW OF 1411 (BEFORE 18 MARCH).....	389
PROPOSITION TO THE ROYAL COUNCIL 1415	395
LAW OF 23 JULY 1421	407
ORDINANCE OF 17 Marc, 1427 A	411
LAW OF 17 March, 1427 B	420

PROPOSITIONS ON DEFENSE OF c. 1432/1433	426
LAW OF 8 MARCH, 1435 (Decretum maius).....	456
EDICT OF 12 MARCH, 1435	487
HABSBURG
LAW OF KING ALBERT (1437-39) OF HUNGARY OF 29 MAY, 1439	497
JAGIELLO
COMPILATION OF LAWS IN HUNGARY (BEFORE 1440)... Comp. ante 1440 ...	518
LAWS OF KING WLADISLAS I (1440-44) OF HUNGARY
CORONATION PATENT OF 20 JULY, 1440	532
LAW OF 1443 (MARCH OR APRIL).....	542
LAW OF 18 APRIL, 1444	553
LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF 7 MAY, 1445	574
LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF 13 JUNE, 1446	595
LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF 25 MARCH, 1447	598
HABSBURG
LAWS OF KING LADISLAS V OF HUNGARY (1440-57)
LAW OF 29 JANUARY, 1453	614
LAW OF 25 JANUARY, 1454	620
HUNYADI
LAW OF REGENT MICHAEL SZILÁGYI OF HUNGARY, 1458 Sz).....	631
LAWS OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)
LAW OF 1458 [JUNE 8].....	643
LAW OF 5 JANUARY 1459	661
LAW OF 28 MAY 1462	678
CORONATION DECREE OF 6 APRIL, 1464	687
REGISTER OF 1467 [BEFORE 1 APRIL]... Reg.1467	703

LAW OF 18 SEPTEMBER, 1471	711
LAW OF 2 OCTOBER, 1474	727
LAW OF 29 MARCH, 1478	736
LAW OF 15 JULY, 1481	748
LAW OF 25 JANUARY, 1486 (Decretum maius).....	760

JAGIELLONIAN HUNGARY (1490–1526)

LAWS OF KING WLADISLAS II OF HUNGARY (1490-1516)

LAW OF OF 1492 (2 FEBRUARY?).....	835
LAW OF 1495	889
LAW OF 1498 (2 JUNE).....	919
LAW OF MAY 8, 1500	974
LAW OF MAY 8, 1504	998
DIETAL DECISION OF 1507	1017
LAW OF 1514	1026

LAWS AND DIETAL DECISIONS UNDER KING LOUIS II OF HUNGARY (1516-26)

DIETAL DECISION 1518	1063
DECISION OF THE DIET IN 1518 at TOLNA	1069
DIETAL DECISION 1518 at BÁCS	1080
DIETAL DECISION OF 1521	1103
DIETAL DECISION OF 1523	1127
DECISIONS OF THE DIET, 1525 (in HATVAN).....	1139
LAW OF 1526	1158

STEPHEN WERBŐCZY'S TRIPARTITUM (1517)	1174
---	------

Abbreviations.....	1175
--------------------	------

Martyn Rady, Stephen Werbőczy and the Tripartitum	1176
---	------

TRIPARTITUM OPUS IURIS CONSUEUDINARII INCLYTI REGNI HUNGARIÆ PER MAGISTRUM STEPHANUM DE WERBEWCZ PERSONALIS PRÆSENTIE REGIÆ
MAIESTATIS LOCUM TENENTEM ACCURATISSIME EDITUM

LECTORI SALUTEM.....	1194
WLADLADISLAUS &C REX.....	1196
SERENISSIMO PRINCIPI ET DOMONI &C.....	1198
PROLOGUS.....	1201
PARS I.....	1210
PARS II.....	1274
PARS III.....	1329
CONCLUSIO.....	1347
APPENDIX.....	1350

THE CUSTOMARY LAWS OF THE RENOWNED KINGDOM OF HUNGARY: A WORK IN THREE PARTS RENDERED MOST ACCURATELY BY MASTER STEPHEN WERBŐCZY
LOCUMTENENS OF THE PERSONAL PRESENCE OF THE ROYAL MAJESTY

GREETING TO THE READER.....	1352
WLADISLAS KING &C.....	1354
TO THE MOST SERENE PRINCE AND LORD &C.....	1357
PROLOGUE.....	1363
PART I.....	1378
PART II.....	1473
PART III.....	1553

CONCLUSION.....	1578
APPENDIX.....	1584
GLOSSARY.....	1587
GAZETTEER OF PLACE NAMES	1628

King St. Stephen from the Illuminated Chronicle (ca. 1386)

The Golden Bull of Andrew II (1222)

THE HOUSE OF ÁRPÁD (1000–1301)

THE LAWS OF KING ST. STEPHEN I OF HUNGARY (1000–1038)

Book I

(St 1)

The two books of ascribed to King St. Stephen laws mark the legislative foundation of the kingdom of Hungary. They were intended to enforce the teachings and protect the institutions of Christianity introduced into the country under the king's father, Prince Géza (c. 972–997) and forcefully expanded by Stephen. The king legislated both for the newly created government of royal counties and for the dioceses in the ecclesiastical sphere. Although the laws are formulated as issued on royal authority, there are also references to the council (senatus) as legislator. No information is available on the composition of this body. The exact date of the codification cannot be established but historians assume that the first book of the second book is now dated to the last decade of his reign, c. 1030–1038. The text has numerous verbal, stylistic, and conceptual similarities with papal and Frankish royal-imperial canons and capitularies (Závodszky, pp. 13– 56). Canonical and Carolingian models may have reached Hungary through the Western (Bavarian, Italian, Lotharingian) missionaries who, together with Western knights, were called in by the king. The author of the laws must have been one of them, perhaps a monk, but his person cannot be identified with any certainty.

The textual transmission of the laws was studied most carefully by Mónika Jánosi (1945–95). She proposed that a mid-eleventh century text found its way to the monastery of Admont (version A), but remained unknown in Hungary until the nineteenth century. A second version, a few chapters longer (B 1) was compiled around 1100, perhaps for King Coloman (1095–1116), who referred to it in his law (see Colo Preamble.). It survived in four later codices, the earliest of which may have been written in 1406, but known only from a copy of two hundred years later. Some time before the sixteenth century, a third version (B 2) was compiled, not significantly different from B 1 save some word and chapter sequence. Both B versions were known to the first editors of the Corpus Juris Hungarici, John Zsámbuki (Sambucus) and Bishop Zakariás Mosóczy (on this, see Andor Csizmadia, "Previous editions of the laws of Hungary, in: Decreta Regni Mediaevalis Hungariae 1000–1526: Laws of the Medieval Kingdom o Hungary vol. 1 1000–1301, János M. Bak, György Bónis, James R. Sweeney, ed. 2 (Idyllwild, CA: Charles Schlacks, 1999) xvii—xxxiii, here xxii–xxv.

Our edition follows the transcription of Ferenc Döry (1875–1960) based on the best codices.

MSS: “Codex Admont”, late twelfth century, ff. 119–126 of Codex 712, Monastery of Admont, Austria; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 433.

“Codex Thuróoczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 79v–85r.

Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 9r–17r.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungaricia, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1,20-43; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman], (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904) pp. 141-52; Szent István törvényeinek XII. századi kézírata. Az Admonti Kodex [A Twelfth-Century Manuscript of the Laws of St. Stephen: The Admont Codex], Emma Bartoniek, ed. Budapest: Lantos, 1935.

LIT: F. Schiller, “Das erste ungarische Gesetzbuch und das deutsche Recht,” Festschrift Heinrich Brunner (Weimar: Böhlau Nachf., 1910) pp. 379–404; J. von Sawicki, “Zur Textkritik und Entstehungsgeschichte der Gesetze König Stefans des Heiligen”, Ungarische Jahrbücher, 9 (1929), 395–425; György Bónis, “Szent István törvényeinek önállósága” [The Autonomous Character of the Laws of St. Stephen], Századok 82 (1938), 433–487; Jenő Szűcs, “König Stefan in der Sicht der modernen ungarischen Geschichtsforschung”, Südost-Forschungen, 31 (1972), 17–40; György Györffy, “Dem Gedächtnis Stephans, des ersten Königs von Ungarn,” Acta Historica Acad. Sc. Hung., 17 (1971), 1–11; Idem, István király és műve [King Stephen and His Work] (Bp.: Gondolat, 1977), espec. pp. 265–275; briefly also in Idem, King Stephen of Hungary, trans. by Peter Doherty, (Boulder, CO: Social Science Monographs &c. 1994) pp. 132-9; Lajos Csóka, “Az első magyar törvénykönyv keletkezése” [Origins of the First Hungarian Book of Laws], Jogtörténeti tanulmányok, 3, (1974), 153–176; Mónika Jánosi, Törvényalkotás Magyarországon a korai Árpád-korban [Making of Law in the Early Árpadian Age] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 1996). Gábor Mikó “Szent István törvényei és a pseudo-izidori hamisítványok” [The laws of St. Stephen and the Pseudo-Isidorian forgeries] Magyar könyv- szemle 123. (2007) 153-68 (<http://epa.oszk.hu/00000/00021/00369/153.htm>; vidimus 1.3.2018)

DECRETA S. STEPHANI REGIS

(1000–38) [LIBER PRIMUS]

Prefatio regalis decreti

Regnante divina clementia opus regalis dignitatis alimonia katholice fidei effectum amplius ac solidius alterius dignitatis operibus solet esse. Et quoniam unaqueque gens propriis utitur legibus, idcirco nos quoque dei nutu nostram gubernantes monarchiam, antiquos ac modernos imitantes augustos, decretali meditatione nostre statuimus genti, quemadmodum honestam et inoffensam ducerent vitam, ut sicut divinis legibus sunt ditati, similiter etiam secularibus addicti, ut quantum boni in his divinis ampliantur, tantum rei in istis multentur. Que autem decrevimus, in sequentibus subnotavimus lineis.

Capitula huius libri:

- I. De statu rerum ecclesiasticarum.
- II. De potestate episcoporum super res ecclesiasticas eorumque conveniencia cum laicis.
- III. Quales esse debeant testes et accusatores clericorum.
- IV. Item de eodem.
- V. De labore sacerdotum.
- VI. De concessione regali propriarum rerum.
- VII. De retentu regalium rerum.
- VIII. De observatione dominici diei.
- IX. Item aliud.
- X. De observatione quatuor temporum.
- XI. De observatione sexte ferie.
- XII. De his, qui sine confessione moriuntur.
- XIII. De observanda christianitate.
- XIV. De homicidiis.
- XV. De his, qui suas uxores occidunt.
- XVI. De evagatione gladii.
- XVII. De periuris.
- XVIII. De libertis.
- XIX. De conventu ad ecclesiam et de his qui murmurant, vel locuntur in ecclesia hora misse.
- XX. De non recipiendis servis vel ancillis in accusatione et testimonio super dominos suos vel dominas.

- XXI. De his, qui alienis servis libertatem acquirunt.
- XXII. De his, qui liberos in servitutem redigunt.
- XXIII. De his, qui alterius milites sibi tollunt.
- XXIV. De his, qui hospites alterius sibi tollunt.
- XXV. De his, qui flagellantur sua querentes.
- XXVI. De viduis et orphanis.
- XXVII. De raptu puellarum.
- XXVIII. De fornicationibus cum ancillis alterius.
- XXIX. De his, qui petunt sibi ancillas alienas in uxores.
- XXX. De his, qui extra regnum suas fugiunt uxores.
- XXXI. De furto mulierum.
- XXXII. De incendiis mansionum.
- XXXIII. De strigis.
- XXXIV. De malefecis.
- XXXV. De invasione domorum.

I. De statu rerum ecclesiasticarum.

Quisquis fastu superbie elatus domum dei ducit contemptibilem et possessiones deo consecratas atque ad honorem dei sub regia immunitatis defensione constitutas inhoneste tractaverit, vel infringere presumpserit, quasi invasor et violator domus dei excommunicetur. Decet enim et, ut indignationem ipsius domini regis sentiat, cuius benivolentie contemptor et constitutionis prevaricator extitit. Nichilominus tamen rex sue concessionis immunitatem ab omnibus ditionis sue illesam conservari pricipiat. Assensum vero non prebeat improvide affirmatibus non debere esse res dominicas, id est domino dominantium traditas. Ita sunt sub defensione regis, sicuti proprie sue hereditatis. Magisque advertat, quia quanto deus excellentior est homine, tanto prestantior est divina cause mortalium possessione. Quocirca decipitur, quisquis plus in propriis quam in dominicis rebus gloriatur. Quarum divinarum rerum defensor et custos divinitate statutus diligenti cura non solum eas servare, sed etiam multiplicare debet, magisque illa, que diximus prestantiora, quam sua defendere oportet et augmentare. Si quis igitur insanus inopportunitate improbitatis sue regem a recto proposito pervertere temptaverit, nullisque remediis mitigari posse visus fuerit, obsequiis aliquibus transitoriis sit necessarius, abscidendus ab eo prociendusque est iuxta illud evangelicum: Si pes, manus vel oculus tuus scandalizat te, amputa vel erue eum et proice abs te.

II. De potestate episcoporum super res ecclesiasticas eorumque convenientia cum laicis.

Volumus, ut episcopi habeant potestatem res ecclesiasticas providere, regere et gubernare atque dispensare secundum canonicam auctoritatem. Volumus, ut et laici in eorum ministerio obediant episcopis ad regendas ecclesias, viduas et orphanos defensandos et ut obedientes sint ad eorum christianitatem servandam. Consentientesque sint comites et iudices presulibus suis ad iustitias faciendas iuxta precepta legis divine. Et nullatenus per aliquorum mendacium vel falsum testimonium neque periurium vel premium lex iusta in aliquo depravetur.

III. Quales debeant esse testes et accusatores clericorum.

Testes autem et accusatores clericorum sine aliqua sint infamia, uxores et filios habentes et omnino Christum predicantes.

IV. Item de eodem.

Testimonium laici adversus clericum nemo recipiat. Nemo enim clericum in publico examinare presumat, nisi in ecclesia.

V. De labore sacerdotum.

Scitote fratres cuncti, quod supra omnes vos laborat sacerdos. Unusquisque enim vestrum suum fert laborem proprium, ille vero et suum et singulorum. Et ideo sicut ille pro omnibus vobis, ita et vos omnes pro eo summo opere laborare debetis in tantum, ut si neccessitas fuerit, animas vestras pro eo ponatis.

VI. De concessione regali propriarum rerum.

Decrevimus nostra regali potentia, ut unusquisque habeat facultatem sua dividendi, tribuendi uxori, filiis, filiabus atque parentibus sive ecclesie, nec post eius obitum quis hoc destruere audeat.

VII. De retentu regalium rerum.

Volumus quidem, ut sicuti ceteris facultatem dedimus dominandi suorum rerum, ita etiam res, milites, servos et quicquid ad nostram regalem dignitatem pertinet, permanere immobile et a nemine quid inde rapiatur, aut subtrahatur, nec quisquem in his predictis sibi favorem acquirere audeat.

VIII. De observatione dominici diei.

Si quis igitur presbiter vel comes sive aliqua alia persona fidelis die dominica invenerit quemlibet laborantem, sive cum bubus, tollatur sibi bos, et civibus ad manducandum detur. Si autem cum equis, tollatur equus, quem dominus bove redimat, si velit, et idem bos manducetur, ut dictum est. Si quis aliis instrumentis, tollantur instrumenta et vestimenta, que si velit, cum cute redimat.

IX. Item aliud.

A sacerdotibus vero et comitibus commendetur omnibus villicis, ita ut illorum iussu omnes concurrant die dominica ad ecclesiam, maiores ac minores, viri ac mulieres, exceptis, qui ignes custodiunt. Si quis vero non observationis causa remanebit per illorum negligentiam, vapulent ac depilentur.

X. De observatione quatuor temporum.

Si quis quatuor temporum ieiunia cunctis cognita carnem manducans violaverit, per spatium unius ebdomade inclusus ieiunet.

XI. De observatione sexte ferie.

Si quis in sexta feria ab omni christianitate observata carnem manducaverit, per unam ebdomadam luce inclusus ieiunet.

XII. De his, qui sine confessione moriuntur.

Si quis tam perdurato corde est, quod absit ab omni christiano, ut nolit confiteri sua facinora secundum suasum presbiteri, hic sine omni divino officio et elemosinis iaceat, quemadmodum infidelis. Si autem parentes et proximi neglexerint vocare presbiteros et ita subiacet absque confessione morti, ditetur orationibus ac consoletur elemosinis, sed parentes lavent negligentiam ieiuniis, secundum arbitrium presbiterorum. Qui vero subitanea periclitantur morte, cum omni ecclesiastico sepeliantur honore, nam divina iudicia occulta nobis sunt et incognita.

XIII. De observanda christianitate.

Si quis observatione christianitatis neglecta et negligentie stoliditate elatus, quod in eam commiserit, iuxta qualitatem offensionis ab episcopo per disciplinas canonum iudicetur.¹⁹ Si vero rebellitate instructus rennueritsibi impositum eque sufferre, iterum eodem iudicio restringatur et etiam usque septies. Tandem super omnia si resistens et abnuens invenitur, regali iudicio, scilicet defensori christianitatis, tradatur.

XIV. De homicidiis.

Si quis ira accensus aut superbia elatus spontaneum commiserit homicidium, sciat se secundum nostri senatus decretum centum et X daturum pensas auri. Ex quibus quinquaginta ad fiscum regis deferantur, alie vero L parentibus dentur, X autem arbitris et mediatoribus condonentur, ipse quidem homicida secundum institutionem canonum ieiunet.

Item aliud.

Si quis autem casu occiderit quemlibet, XII auri pensas persolvat et sicut canones mandant, ieiunet.

Item de homicidiis servorum.

Si alicuius servus servum alterius occiderit, reddatur servus pro servo, aut redimatur et penitentiam, quod dictum est, agat.

Item aliud.

Si vero liber alicuius occiderit servum, reddat alium servum vel pretium componat et secundum canones ieiunet.

XV. De his, qui suas uxores occidunt.

Si quis comitum obduratus corde neglectusque anima, quod procul sit a cordibus fidelitatem observantium, uxoris homicidio polluetur, secundum decretum regalis senatus cum quinquaginta iuvcis parentibus mulieris concilietur et ieiunet secundum mandata canonum. Si autem miles vel alicuius vir ubertatis eandem culpam inciderit, iuxta eundem senatum solvat parentibus X iuencos ieiunetque, ut dictum est. Si vero vulgaris in eodem crimine invenietur, cum quinque iuencis cogitas reconcilietur et subdatur predictis ieiuniis.

XVI. De evagatione gladii.

Ut pax firma et incontaminata per omnia maneat, tam inter maiores natu quam inter minores, cuiuscunque conditionis sint, interdiximus omnino, ut nullus ad ledendum aliquem evaginet gladium. Quod si quis posthac stimulis sue audacie tactus temptaverit, eodem iuguletur gladio.

XVII. De periuris.

Si quis valentium fide commaculatus, corde pollutus iuramento confracto periurio addictus invenietur, perditus manu periurium luat, aut cum quinquaginta iuencis manum redimat. Si vero vulgaris periurius exteterit, manu amputata punietur aut XII iuencis redimetur et ieiunet, ut canones mandant.

XVIII. De libertis.

Si quis misericordia ductus proprios servos et ancillas libertate feriaverit cum testimonio, decrevimus, ut post obitum eius nemo invidia tactus in servitutem eos audeat reducere. Si autem libertatem promiserit et morte impediens non testificatus fuerit, habeat mulier illius vidua et filii potestatem hanc eandem libertatem testificari et agapen facere pro redemptione anime sui mariti qualitercunque velit.

XIX. De conventu ad ecclesiam et de his, qui murmurant vel locuntur in ecclesia hora misse.

Si qui ad ecclesiam venientes ad audiendum officium et ibidem hora sollempnitatis missarum inter se murmurant et ceteros inquietant exponentes fabulas otiosas et non intendentes divinas lectiones cum ecclesiastico nutrimento, si maiores sunt, increpati cum dedecore expellantur de ecclesia, si vero minores et vulgares, in atrio ecclesie pro tanta temeritate coram omnibus ligentur et corripiantur flagellis et cesura capillorum.

XX. De non recipiendis servis vel ancillis in accusationem vel testimonium super dominos vel dominas.

Ut gens huius monarchie ab omni incursu et accusatione servorum et ancillarum remota et quieta maneat, secundum decretum regalis concilii penitus interdictum est, ut nullius causa culpe aliqua servilis persona contra dominos vel dominas in accusationem vel in testimonium recipiatur.

XXI. De his, qui alienis servis libertatem acquirunt.

Si quis improvidus alienum servum sine conscientia sui senioris ante regem vel maiores natu et dignitate duxerit, ut soluto servitutis iugo levitam libertatis sibi acquirat, sciat se, si dives est, quinquaginta iuencos redditurum, ex quibus quadraginta debentur regi, X vero seniori servi, si vero pauper et tenuis, XII iuencos, ex quibus X regi, duo seniori servi.

XXII. De his, qui liberos in servitutem redigunt.

Quoniam igitur dignum deo est et hominibus optimum, unumquemque sue industria libertatis vite cursum ducere, secundum regale decretum statutum est, ut nemo comitum vel militum posthac liberam personam servituti subdere audeat. Quod si elationis audacie sue stimulatus presumpserit, sciat se totidem ex proprio compositurum, que vero compositio inter regem et comites dividatur, ut cetera.

Item de eodem.

Sed si quis actenus in servitute retentus pro libertate sui tuenda iudicium legale faciens securus extiterit, tantummodo libertate fruatur et ille, a quo in servitute tenebatur, nichil reddat.

XXIII. De his, qui alterius milites sibi tollunt.

Volumus, ut unusquisque senior suum habeat militem, nec aliquis alter illum suadeat antiquum deserere seniore et ad se venire, inde enim litigium habet initium.

XXIV. De his, qui hospites alterius sibi tollunt.

Si quis hospitem cum benivolentia accipit et nutrimentum sibi honeste inpendit, quamdiu secundum propositum nutritur, non deserat suum nutritorem, nec ad aliquem alium suam deferat hospitalitatem.

XXV. De his, qui flagellantur sua querentes.

Si cuius miles aut servus ad alium fugerit, et his cuius miles vel servus fuga lapsus est suum miserit legatum ad reducendos eos et is legatus ibidem a quoquam percussus et flagellatus extiterit, decernimus nostrorum primatum conventu, ut ille percussor X solvat iuencos.

XXVI. De viduis et orphanis.

Volumus quidem, ut et vidue et orphani sint nostre legis participes tali tenore, ut si qua vidua cum filiis filiabusque remanserit atque nutrire eos et manere cum illis, quamdiu vixerit, promiserit, habeat postestatem a nobis sibi concessam hoc faciendi et a nemine iterum cogatur in coniugium. Si vero mutato voto iterato nubere voluerit et orphanos deserere, de rebus orphanorum nichil omnino sibi vendicet, nisi tantum sibi congrua vestimenta.

Item de viduis.

Si autem vidua sine prole remanserit et se innuptam in sua viduitate permanere promiserit, volumus, ut potestatem habeat omnium bonorum suorum et quidquid velit inde facere, faciat. Post obitum autem eius eadem bona ad suos redeant parentis mariti, si parentes habet, sin autem, rex sit heres.

XXVII. De raptu puellarum.

Si quis militum inpudicia fedatus, puellam aliquam sine concessione parentum sibi in uxorem rapuerit, decrevimus puellam reddi, etiamsi ab illo aliqua vis sibi illata sit, et raptor X solvat iuencos pro raptu, licet postea reconcilietur parentibus puelle. Si vero pauper quis hoc vulgaris agere agreditur, componat raptum V iuencis.

XXVIII. De fornicatoribus cum ancillis alterius.

Ut liberi suam custodiant libertatem incontaminatam, volumus, illis ponere cautionem. Quisquis transgrediens fornicatur cum ancilla alterius, sciat se reum criminis et pro eodem crimine inprimis decoriari. Si vero secundo cum eadem fornicatus fuerit, iterum decorietur ac depiletur. Si autem tertio, sit servus pariter cum ancilla, aut redimet se. Si autem ancilla conceperit de eo, et perare non potuerit, sed in partu moritur, componat eandem cum altera ancilla.

De servorum fornicatione.

Servus quoque alterius, si cum ancilla alterius fornicatur, coretur ac depiletur. Et si ancilla de eo conceperit et in partu moritur, servus venundetur ac dimidia pars pretii senior ancille detur, altera pars vero seniori servi remaneat.

XXIX. De his, qui petunt sibi ancillas alienas in uxores.

Ut nemo eorum, qui libero censentur nomine, cuiquam quid iniurie facere audeat, terrorem et cautionem inposuimus, quia in hoc regali concilio decretum est, ut si quis liber connubium ancille alterius sciente domina ancille elegerit, perdita libertatis sue industria, perpetuus efficiatur servus.

XXX. De his, qui extra regnum suas fugiunt uxores.

Ut gens utriusque sexus certa lege et absque iniuriis maneat et vigeat, in hoc regale decretum statutum est, ut si quis protervitate peditus propter abominationem uxoris patriam effugerit, uxor cuncta, que in potestate mariti habebantur, possideat, dum velit expectare virum, et nemo in aliud coniugium cogere presumat. Et si sponte nubere velit, liceat sumptis congruis sibi vestimentis et dimissis ceteris bonis ad connubium ire. Et si vir hoc audito redierit, ne liceat sibi aliam ducere preter suam, nisi cum licentia episcopi.

XXXI. De furto mulierum.

Cum igitur cunctis horrendum et omnibus abominabile sit virilem sexum repertum furtum fecisse, et magis magisque sexum femineum, secundum regalem senatum decretum est, ut si aliqua mulier maritata furtum commiserit, a marito redimetur, et si secundo eandem culpam inciderit, similiter redimetur, si vero tertio, venundetur.

XXXII. De incendiis mansionum.

Si quis per inimicitias alterius edificia igne cremaverit, decrevimus ut et edificia restituat, et quidquid suppellectilis arsum fuerit, et insuper XVI iuencos, qui valent XL solidos.

XXXIII. De strigis.

Si qua striga inventa fuerit, secundum iudicalem legem ducatur ad ecclesiam et commendetur sacerdoti ad ieiunandum fidemque docendam. Post ieiunium vero domum redeat. Si secundo in eodem crimine invenietur, simili ieiunio subiciatur, post ieiunium vero in modum crucis in pectore et in fronte atque inter scapulas incensa clave ecclesiastica domum redeat. Si vero tertio, iudicibus tradatur.

XXXIV. De maleficis.

Ut creatura dei ab omni lesione malignorum remota et a nullo detrimentum sui passura maneat, nisi a deo, a quo et augmentatur, secundum decretum senatus statuimus magni cautionem terroris veneficis ac maleficis, ut nulla persona maleficio aut veneficio quemquam hominem subvertere a statu mentis aut interficere audeat. Ast si quis vel que posthac hoc presumpserit, tradatur in manus maleficio lesi, aut in manus parentum eius secundum velle eorum diiudicandum. Si vero sortilegio utentes invenientur, ut faciunt in cinere, aut his similibus, ab episcopis flagellis emendentur.

XXXV. De invasione domorum.

Volumus, ut firma pax et unanimitas sit inter maiores et minores secundum apostolum: omnes unanimes estote et cetera, nec aliquis alium invadere audeat. Nam si quis comitum post diffinitionem huius communis concilii tam contumax extiterit, ut alium domi querat ad perdendum eum atque sua dissipare, si dominus domi est et secum pugnaverit vel interfecerit, luat secundum legem de evagatione gladii confectam. Si autem comes ibidem occubuerit, sine compositone iaceat. Si vero ille non supervenerit, sed suos milites miserit, centum iuvcis componat invasionem. Si vero miles quis curtim vel domum alterius militis invaserit, X iuvcis componat invasionem. Si vulgaris quidem alterius sui similis mansiunculas invaserit, V iuvcis solvat incursionem.

Explicit liber primus.

THE LAWS OF KING STEPHEN I (1000–1038)

[BOOK ONE]

Preface to the royal law

The work of the royal office, subject to the rule of divine mercy, is by custom greater and more complete when nourished in the Catholic faith than any other office. Since every people use their own law, we, governing our monarchy by the will of God and emulating both ancient and modern caesars, and after reflecting upon the law, decree for our people too the way they should lead an upright and blameless life. Just as they are enriched by divine laws, so may they similarly be strengthened by secular ones, in order that as the good shall be made many by these divine laws so shall the criminals incur punishment. Thus we set out below in the following sentences what we have decreed.

Here are the chapters of this book.

1. The state of ecclesiastical things.
2. The powers of the bishops over church goods and their accord with laymen.
3. What sort of person may be a witness and accuser of clerks.
4. Similarly on the same.
5. The work of priests.
6. Royal concession for the free disposition of goods.
7. The preservation of royal goods.
8. The observance of the Lord's day.
9. More on the same.
10. The observance of Ember days.
11. The observance of Friday.
12. Those who die without confession.
13. The observance of Christianity.
14. On homicide.
15. Those who kill their wives.
16. Drawing the sword.
17. On perjury.
18. On manumission.
19. Gathering at church and those who mutter and chatter in church during mass.
20. Inadmissability of accusations and testimony of servi or ancillae against their masters or mistresses.
21. Those who procure liberty for ancillae of others.
22. Those who enslave freemen.
23. Those who take the warriors of another for themselves.

24. Those who take guests of another for themselves.
25. Those who are beaten while looking for their own.
26. Widows and orphans.
27. The abduction of girls.
28. Those who fornicate with ancillae of another.
29. Those who desire ancillae of others as wives.
30. Those who flee their wives by leaving the country.
31. Theft committed by women.
32. Arson of houses.
33. On witches.
34. On sorcerers.
35. The invasion of houses.

1 The state of ecclesiastical things.¹

Should anyone, swollen with haughty pride, hold the house of God in contempt, or mistreat the possessions consecrated to God and placed for His service under protective royal immunity, or presume to injure them, let him be excommunicated as an invader and desecrator of the house of God. It is fitting that he should also feel the indignation of his lord, the king, whose good will be disparaged and whose good order subverted. Therefore the king commands that the immunity which he has granted be preserved unimpaired by everyone subject to him. He gives no assent nor should assent be given to foolish assertions that possessions ought not to be given to the church, that is, to the Lord of Lords. Rather they receive the protection of the king in the same way as his own inheritance. He gives even more attention to them, for, just as God is greater than man, the affairs of God take precedence over the possessions of mortals. Thus the man who glories more in his own than in the things of the Lord is badly deceived. The divinely ordained defender and keeper of the things of God ought not only to preserve them with diligent care, but also increase them, and those things which we have called the more important should be defended and increased even more than his own things. If anyone, therefore, should be so foolhardy as to try through the devices of his own wickedness to turn the king away from right purpose, and it should appear that no remedies can be effectively applied, even though he may be temporarily necessary, he should be cut off by the king and cast away just as according to the Gospel: *If your foot, or your hand, or your eye offend you, cut it off, or pluck it out, and cast it from you.*²

¹ The first five chapters and at least parts of the preface are believed to have been inserted in the laws after St. Stephen's death, sometime in the eleventh century (Schiller, pp. 389–391; Sawicki, p. 407f.). This chapter follows verbatim canon 6 of the Synod of Mainz (Con. Magunt. I. a. 847; see Mansi, XIV: 905; also MGH Cap., II: 177).

² Mt 18: 8; Mk 9: 42, 44, 46.

2 The powers of the bishops over church goods and their accord with laymen.³

It is our will that bishops have the power to oversee, rule, govern, and dispose of church goods according to the authority of the canons. It is our will that laymen should be obedient in their service to the bishops ruling the churches and defending widows and orphans, even as they be obedient in holding to their Christianity. The ispáns and judges⁴ should mete out justice according to the precepts of divine law in concert with the prelates. Just law should in no way be perverted by lies or false witness, by perjury or bribes.

3 What sort of person may be a witness and accuser of clerks.⁵

The witnesses and accusers of clerks should be without infamy,⁶ having wives and sons, and in all ways professing Christ.

4 Similarly on the same.

No one should accept the testimony of a layman against a clerk. No one should presume to try a clerk in public, unless in church.⁷

5 The work of priests.

Be it known to you, brethren, that the priest works more than any one of you. Each of you bears his own burden, but he bears his own and the burden of all others. Therefore, as he labors for you, ³ This chapter follows verbatim canon 7 of the same Synod of Mainz of A.D. 847 (Mansi, XIV: 905; MGH Cap., II: 179).

⁴ The comes and judex in this chapter may in fact refer to two officials of the Carolingian Empire, as the text is a word-for-word borrowing from a ninth-century law. Nevertheless, we have rendered the designation of this royal officer as ispán, the name used for administrators and commanders of counties in Hungary. (That comes may have had a wider meaning, referring to an elite, is possible.) The actual existence of regular courts of ispáns and judges in St. Stephen's times cannot be proven from this borrowed text.

⁵ The author—or his immediate model, probably a compilation of canons—here confused a passage in the “Capitula Papae Hadriani I” of A.D. 785 (Mansi, II: 914) which prescribes the qualities necessary in secular witnesses. The accusation of clerks belongs to the next chapter and is explicitly prohibited to secular persons.

⁶ Infamia (“infamy”) is to be understood as a legal punishment depriving the culprit of his civil or ecclesiastical rights for such offenses as bigamy, perjury, or heresy; cf. Dictionnaire de droit canonique, R. Naz, ed. (Paris: Letouzey & Ané, 1953), XV, 1358f. The “false capitularies” known as the collection of Benedict the Deacon (PL 97: 698–911) discusses infamy extensively (cf. G. May, “Die Infamie bei Benedikt Levita”, Österreichischen Archiv für Kirchenrecht, 11 [1960], 16–36), and it is likely that his interpretation reached Hungary through an unidentified canonical collection.

⁷ This chapter, in essence the confirmation of the privilegium fori of the clergy, follows verbatim the chapters of Pope Hadrian, referred to above. In fact, as Sawicki (p. 410f.) pointed out, the clergy's immunity from secular justice did not become generally accepted practice at least until the end of the eleventh century; cf. Coloman 5 and 65.

so you should work for him with all your strength, even, if necessary, laying down your lives for him.⁸

6 Royal concessions of free disposition of goods.

We, by our royal authority have decreed that anyone shall be free to divide his property, to assign it to his wife, his sons and daughters, his relatives, or to the church;⁹ and no one should dare to change this after his death.

7 The preservation of royal goods.

It is our will that just as we have given others the opportunity to master their own possessions, so equally the goods, warriors,¹⁰ servi, and whatever else belongs to our royal dignity should remain permanent, and no one should plunder or remove them, nor should anyone dare to obtain any advantage from them.

8 The observance of the Lord's day.

If a priest or ispán, or any faithful person finds anyone working on Sunday with oxen, the ox shall be confiscated and given to the men of the castle¹¹ to be eaten; if a horse is used, however, it shall be confiscated, but the owner, if he wishes, may redeem it with an ox which should be eaten as has been said. If anyone uses other equipment, this tool and his clothing shall be taken, and he may redeem them, if he wishes, with a flogging.¹²

⁸This article—as some other passages as well— is strongly indebted to the Pseudo-Isidorian false decretals, specifically to the Collectio Danieliana; see Mikó, “Szent István törvényei.”

⁹The king seems to have wanted to transform the undivided property of clans into the personal property of freemen and nobles. This was hardly successful as inheritance of “allodial” property remained restricted to the clans. Even though the thirteenth-century privileges (see 1222: 4; 1231: 11; 1290: 19) repeated the clause of free disposition, with the enactment of the aviticitas in 1351, the inalienation of noble property became the law in force until the nineteenth century

¹⁰*Miles*, meaning “warrior”, seems to have been an armed servant of the king and magnates. On the social categories of the ages in general, see László Solymosi, “Gesellschaftsstruktur zur Zeit des Königs Istvan der Heiligen” in Gizella és kora. Felolvasóülések az Árpád-korból, I [Queen Gizella and her Age. Colloquia on the Arpadian age], Zs. V. Fodor, ed. (Veszprém: Laczkó Dezső Múzeum, 1993) pp. 59–69.

¹¹*Cives* in St. Stephen's time were dependent men attached to the castles of the royal ispáns for their defense and maintenance; their exact social status has been a matter of long debate—just as that of the servile population in general. (In particular between K. Tagányi and L. Erdélyi in Történelmi Szemle, 3–4 (1914– 1916); on these historians, see F. Rottler, “Beiträge zur Kritik der Historiographie des frühen Mittelalters: Über die Geschichtsanschauung László Erdélyis”, Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica., 3 (1961), 121–152; and S. B. Vardy, “The Hungarian Economic History School” Journal for European Economic History, 4 (1975), 121–136.

¹²Lit.: “by his skin,” translators suggest flogging, which is supported by the wording of a decree of King Childebert of A.D. 596 with a similar injunction, where the redemption is de dorsum (his back). See Závodszy, p. 22.

9 More on the same.

Priests and ispáns shall enjoin village reeves¹³ to command everyone both great and small,¹⁴ men and women, with the exception of those who guard the fire, to gather on Sundays in the church. If someone remains at home through their negligence let them be beaten and shorn.

10 The observance of Ember days.¹⁵

If someone breaks the fast known to all on Ember days, he shall fast in prison for a week.

11 The observance of Friday.

If someone eats meat on Friday, a day observed by all Christianity,¹⁶ he shall fast incarcerated during the day for a week.¹⁷

12 Those who die without confession.

If someone has such a hardened heart – God forbid it to any Christian – that he does not want to confess his faults according to the counsel of a priest, he shall lie without any divine service and alms like an infidel. If his relatives and neighbors fail to summon the priest, and therefore he should die unconfessed, prayers and alms should be offered, but his relatives shall wash away their negligence by fasting in accordance with the judgment of the priests. Those who die a sudden death shall be buried with all ecclesiastical honor, for divine judgment is hidden from us and unknown.

13 The observances of Christianity.

¹³ Although villici are known to have existed in the Carolingian realm, the models for this chapter (e.g., Charlemagne's capitulary of A.D. 789, c. 25, MGH Cap., I: 64 or Capit. de part Saxon, c. 18, ibid., p. 69) do not mention them as being in charge of supervising Sunday church attendance. About villici in Hungary we know from later times that they were frequently elected by the villagers but also represented the lord of the land.

¹⁴ The translation can also be read: "old and young" (cf. Sawicki, p. 410f.).

¹⁵ The observance of three days' fast during the weeks following Ash Wednesday, Pentecost, the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, and St. Lucia was prescribed for the Latin church only under Pope Gregory VII, but it was widespread in the Carolingian realm and its successor states; see also Coloman 71 and Syn. Szab. 25.

¹⁶ This decree prescribed what had been general practice in most of Europe, although, according to Závodszy (p. 25), only c. 11 of the council of Coyanza in A.D. 1050 (Mansi XIX: 790) made it generally mandatory for laymen. Comparing it with a tenth-century Bavarian law (Lex Baiuvariorum, Additamenta: Acta synodi Ratisbon., MGH LL, III: 456), he regards this chapter as a proof of South German influence on the legislation

¹⁷ Some Hungarian translations render the passage "fast for a week in the dark", but neither the Latin text, nor logic (in comparison with ch. 10) justifies this

If someone neglects a Christian observance and takes pleasure in the stupidity of his negligence, he shall be judged by the bishops according to the nature of the offense and the discipline of the canons.¹⁸ If he rebelliously objects to suffer the punishment with equanimity, he shall be subject to the same judgment seven times over. If, after all this, he continues to resist and remains obdurate, he shall be handed over for royal judgment, namely to the defender of Christianity.¹⁹

14 On homicide.

If someone driven by anger and arrogance willfully commits a homicide, he should know that according to the decrees of our council²⁰ he is obliged to pay one hundred ten gold pensae,²¹ from which fifty will go to the royal treasury, another fifty will be given to relatives, and ten will be paid to arbiters and mediators.²² The killer himself shall fast according to the rules of the canons.²³

More on the same.

If someone kills a person by chance, he shall pay twelve pensae and fast as the canons command.

The killing of slaves.

If someone's slave kills another's slave, the payment shall be a slave for a slave, or he may be redeemed and do penance as has been said.

More on the same.

¹⁸ This chapter in fact authorizes the introduction of canon law into Hungary (cf. also ch. 14 below); on this and its later development, see Gy. Bónis, "Entwicklung der geistlichen Gerichtsbarkeit in Ungarn vor 1526", Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, 80, Kan. Abt. 49 (1963), 174–235

¹⁹ The king as defensor christianitatis, in this case as the judge of the incorrigible backsliding neophyte, was, of course, central to the idea of Christian kingship which Stephen wished to establish by his coronation with papal-imperial approval; cf. the Preface and ch. 1 above; in general, see P. Váczy, Die erste Epoche des ungarischen Königtums (Pécs: Danubia, 1935).

²⁰ This collection uses the words senatus, consilium regalis or consilium commune for the royal council; that—at any rate in later centuries—consisted of the great men (barons) and prelates in an informal way, actually of those, who happened to be in the king's entourage.

²¹ The pensa auri was equivalent to the contemporary Byzantine gold solidus; see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1916., repr. 199)), pp. 158–168)

²² Note the role of the arbitrators and the claim of the king to parts of the composition. Fifty pensae was the composition (wergeld) of a free person in St. Stephen's Hungary; fifty pensae was the royal fine and ten the "cost" of the proceedings. The figures of fifty or hundred and ten pensae occur quite frequently as the highest sums to be paid as composition or fine; see, e.g., Stephen: II: 4; Ladislas II: 6.

²³ Penances for different types of homicide were prescribed in every penitential, ranging from seven to ten years of fasting; cf., e.g., Poenitentiale Pseudo-Romanum c. 1 § 1 (N. Wasserschleben, Die Bußordnungen der abendländischen Kirche [Halle: Graeger, 1851], p. 364) or Poenitentiale Hubertense, c. 1 (ibid., p. 377).

If a freeman kills the slave of another, he shall replace him with another slave or pay his price, and fast according to the canons.

15 Those who kill their wives.

If an ispán with a hardened heart and a disregard for his soul – may such remain far from the hearts of the faithful – defiles himself by killing his wife, he shall make his peace with fifty steers²⁴ to the kindred of the woman, according to the decree of the royal council, and fast according to the commands of the canons. And if a warrior or a man of wealth commits the same crime he shall pay according to that same council ten steers and fast, as has been said. And if a commoner²⁵ has committed the same crime, he shall make his peace with five steers to the kindred and fast.²⁶

16 Drawing the sword.

In order that peace should remain firm and unsullied among the greater and the lesser of whatever station, we forbid anyone to draw the sword with the aim of injury. If anyone in his audacity should put this prohibition to the test, let him be killed by the same sword.

17 On perjury.

If a powerful man of stained faith and defiled heart be found guilty of breaking his oath by perjury, he shall atone for the perjury with the loss of his hand; or he may redeem it with fifty steers. If a commoner commits perjury, he shall be punished with the loss of his hand or may redeem it by twelve steers and fast, as the canons command.²⁷

18 On manumission.

²⁴ Iuenci, meaning “steers” or “young oxen”, served apparently as the “general equivalent” in eleventh-century Hungary, a society extensively engaged in animal husbandry. See A. Kralovánszky, “A tinópénz kérdéséhez I. István korában” [On the Question of Steer-Money in the Age of Stephen I], Alba Regia, 14 (1975), 283–286. They were valued at one gold pensa each (see Ladislav III: 29), hence fifty oxen, that is, fifty pensae, reflect here a free woman’s composition (cf. ch. 14 above).

²⁵ Vulgaris, meaning “commoner”, a rather general category (see below) is rarely used after 1050.

²⁶ The three main strata of society under St. Stephen suggested by this chapter, i.e., comes (ispán) or maior (magnate), miles (warrior) or liber (freeman), and the different servile elements (servus, pauper, vulgaris), are succinctly discussed by György Györffy, “Ungarn von 895 bis 1400,” in Europäische Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte im Mittelalter, ed. J. A. van Houtte, Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1980. [Handbuch der europäischen Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte, ed. H. Kellenbenz, II], 625–55, here p. 632ff. See also n. 10, above.

²⁷ The same punishment was prescribed, inter alia, in the Capitulary of Herstal A.D. 779 (MGH Cap., I: 49, c. 10). This severe punishment had the effect of depriving the perjurer of any future capacity to swear an oath in his own defense or in that of another; cf. J. Goebel, Felony and Misdemeanor (Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1937), pp. 79–80. The canonical punishment for perjury was a seven-year penance, including four years of fasting; cf. Poenitentiale Merseburgense c. 5 (Wasserschleben, Bußordnungen, p. 392).

If anyone, prompted by mercy, should set his male and female slaves free in front of witnesses, we decree that no one out of ill will shall reduce them to servitude after his death. If, however, he promised them freedom but died intestate, his widow and sons shall have the power to bear witness to this same manumission and to render *agape*²⁸ for the redemption of the husband's soul, if they wish.

19 Gathering at church and those who mutter or chatter in church during mass.

If some persons, upon coming to hear the divine service, mutter among themselves and disturb others by relating idle tales during the celebration of mass and by being inattentive to Holy Scripture with its ecclesiastical nourishment, they shall be expelled from the church in disgrace if they are older, and if they are younger²⁹ and common folk they shall be bound in the narthex of the church in view of everyone and punished by whipping and by the shearing off of their hair.

20 Inadmissibility of accusations and testimony of servi or ancillae against their masters or mistresses.

In order that the people of this kingdom may be far removed and remain free from the affronts and accusations of servi and ancillae, it is wholly forbidden by decree of the royal council that any servile person be accepted in accusation or testimony against their masters or mistresses in any criminal case.

21 Those who procure liberty for servi of others.³⁰

If anyone thoughtlessly brings the servus of another, without the knowledge of his master, before the king or before persons of higher birth and dignity in order to procure for him the benefits of liberty after he has been released from the yoke of servitude, he should know that if he is rich, he shall pay fifty steers of which forty are owed to the king and ten to the master of the servus but if he is poor and of low rank, he shall pay twelve steers of which ten are due to the king and two to the master of the servus.

²⁸ The reference here is not to the early Christian agape, but rather to a memorial meal shared by the manumitted or an offering made in the memory of the dead

²⁹ "Older" or "younger" seems to be appropriate here, although the Latin may also mean persons of socially "higher" or "lower" standing

³⁰ The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). In the printed version of DRMH, the editors decided to avoid coming down on either side and translated servus and ancilla &c. as "bondman" or "bondwoman" intending to escape the decision, but that was awkward. Now see: László Solymosi, "Liberty and Servitude in the Age of Saint Stephen," in: Attila Zsoldos, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country: A Newborn Kingdom in Central Europe: Hungary (Budapest: Lucidus, 2001), pp. 69-80. Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued— with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the "easy way out" by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader.

22 Those who enslave freemen.

Because it is worthy of God and best for men that everyone should conduct his life in the vigor of liberty, it is established by royal decree that henceforth no ispán or warrior should dare to reduce a freeman to servitude. If however, compelled by his own rashness he should presume to do this, he should know that he shall pay from his own possessions the same composition, which shall be properly divided between the king and the ispáns, as in the other decree above.

Similarly on the same.

But if someone who was once held in servitude lives freely after having submitted to a judicial procedure³¹ held to consider his liberty, he shall be content with enjoying his freedom, and the man who held him in servitude shall pay nothing.

23 Those who take the warriors of another for themselves.

We wish that each lord have his own warriors and no one shall try to persuade a warrior to leave his long-time lord and come to him, since this is the origin of quarrels.

24 Those who take guests³² of another for themselves.

If someone receives a guest with benevolence and decently provides him with support, the guest shall not leave his protector as long as he receives support according to their agreement, nor should he transfer his service³³ to any other.

25 Those who are beaten while looking for their own.

³¹ This technical term meant in fact an ordeal; there are many examples of trials by ordeal regarding the assertion of liberty to be found in the records of ordeals by hot iron at Várad (Nagyvárad/Oradea). See: Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, J. Karácsonyi, S. Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903); cf. I. Zajtay, "Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle", Revue d'histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562 and M. Lupesco Makó, "Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the 'Regestrum Varadiense'" Mediævalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. For the European-wide practice of recourse to the "judgment of God", see R. C. van Caenegem, "La preuve dans le droit du moyen âge", Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l'histoire comparative des institutions, 17 (1965), 691–753, trans. J. R. Sweeney and D. A. Flanary as "Methods of Proof in Western Medieval Law", Academiae Analecta, Academie voor Wetensch., Lett. en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. d. Lett., 45, No. 3 (1983), 85–127.

³² In St. Stephen's time the foreigners who came to Hungary were mostly Western clerks and knights; see Erik Fügedi, "Das mittelalterliche Königreich Ungarn als Gastland", in Walter Schlesinger, ed., Die deutsche Ostsiedlung des Mittelalters als Problem der Europäischen Geschichte (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1975), pp. 471–508. See now also Erik Fügedi and János M. Bak, "Foreign Knights and Clerks in Early Medieval Hungary," in Nora Berend, ed. Expansion of Central Europe in the Middle Ages pp. 319–32. (Farnham: Ashgate Variorum) [The Expansion of the Latin Europe, 1000 – 1500, vol. 5]

³³ Hospitalitas, a technical term of early medieval Barbarian-Roman arrangements, may also mean the transfer of the host's protection to another guest.

If a warrior or a servus flees to another and he whose warrior or man has run away sends his agent to bring him back, and that agent is beaten and whipped by anyone, we decree in agreement with our magnates that he who gave the beating shall pay ten steers.

26 Widows and orphans.

We also wish widows and orphans to be partakers of our law in the sense that if a widow, left with her sons and daughters, promises to support them and to remain with them as long as she lives, she shall have the right from us to do so, and no one should force her to marry. If she has a change of heart and wants to marry and leave the orphans, she shall have nothing from the goods of the orphans except her own clothing.³⁴

More about widows.

If a widow without a child promises to remain unmarried in her widowhood, she shall have the right to all her goods and may do with them what she wishes. But after her death her goods shall go to the kin of her husband, if he has any, and if not, the king is the heir.

27 The abduction of girls.

If any warrior debased by lewdness abducts a girl to be his wife without the consent of her parents, we decree that the girl should be returned to her parents, even if he did anything by force to her, and the abductor shall pay ten steers for the abduction, although he may afterwards have made peace with the girl's parents. If a poor man who is a commoner should attempt this, he shall compensate for the abduction with five steers.³⁵

28 Those who fornicate with ancillae of another.³⁶

In order that freemen preserve their liberty undefiled, we wish to warn them. Any transgressor who fornicates with an ancilla of another, should know that he has committed a crime, and he is to be whipped for the first offense. If he fornicates with her a second time, he should be whipped and shorn; but if he does it a third time, he shall become a slave together with the woman, or he may redeem himself. If, however, the ancilla should conceive by him and not be able to bear but dies in childbirth, he shall make compensation for her with another ancilla.

The fornication of servi.

³⁴ In contrast to later laws (e.g., Ladislas III: 6), married women apparently did not yet have a right to their dos or dower after the death of their husbands; see also below, ch. 30

³⁵ Violent abduction of girls, a widespread custom in archaic societies, was repeatedly prohibited in “barbarian laws” and medieval synodal statutes. Nevertheless, it survived in many countries in one form or another; ritual remnants of this could be found in Hungarian folk custom until quite recently; cf. E. Tárkány Szücs, Magyar jogi népszokások [Hungarian Legal Folk Customs] (Budapest: Gondolat, 1981), pp. 255–256.

³⁶ On ancilla, see n. 30, above.

If a servus of one master fornicates with the ancilla of another, he should be whipped and shorn, and if the woman should conceive by him and dies in childbirth, the man shall be sold and half of his price shall be given to the master of the ancilla, the other half shall be kept by the master of the servus.

29 Those who desire ancillae of others as wives.

In order that no one who is recognized to be a freeman should dare commit this offense, we set forth what has been decreed in this royal council as a source of terror and caution so that if any freeman should choose to marry a ancilla of another with her master's consent, he shall lose the enjoyment of his liberty and become a slave forever.

30 Those who flee their wives by leaving the country.

In order that people of both sexes may remain and flourish under fixed law and free from injury, we establish in this royal decree that if anyone in his impudence should flee the country out of loathing for his wife, she shall possess everything which was her husband's, and no one shall force her into another marriage. If she voluntarily wishes to marry, she may take her own clothing leaving behind other goods, and marry again. If her husband, hearing this, should return, he is not allowed to replace her with anyone else, except with the permission of the bishop.

31 Theft committed by women.

Because it is terrible and loathsome to all to find men committing theft, and even more so for women, it is ordained by the royal council, that if a married woman commits theft, she shall be redeemed by her husband, and if she commits the same offense a second time, she shall be redeemed again; but if she does it a third time, she shall be sold.

32 Arson of houses.

If anyone sets a building belonging to another on fire out of enmity, we order that he replace the building and whatever household furnishing were destroyed by the fire, and also pay sixteen steers which are worth forty solidi.³⁷

33 On witches.

If a witch is found, she shall be led, in accordance with the law of judgment into the church and handed over to the priest for fasting and instruction in the faith. After the fast she may return home. If she is discovered in the same crime a second time, she shall fast and after the fast she shall be branded with the keys of the church in the form of a cross on her bosom, forehead, and between the shoulders.³⁸ If she is discovered on a third occasion, she shall be handed over to the judge.³⁹

³⁷ In this exceptional case, Bavarian silver solidi are meant, of which 2.5 were equal to a Byzantine gold solidus (the frequently cited pensa auri of this collection). Thus the exchange of sixteen steers, worth the same number of gold pieces, is consistent, only the author of the laws did not change the monetary equivalent from the probable model of this chapter, the Lex Baiuvariorum (MGH LL, III: 306, X. 1); see Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325, pp. 165–67

34 On sorcerers.

So that the creatures of God may remain far from all injury caused by evil ones and may not be exposed to any harm from them – unless it be by the will of God who may even increase it – we establish by decree of the council a most terrible warning to magicians and sorcerers that no person should dare to subvert the mind of any man or to kill him by means of sorcery and magic. Yet in the future if a man or a woman dare to do this he or she shall be handed over to the person hurt by sorcery or to his kindred, to be judged according to their will. If, however, they are found practicing divination as they do in ashes or similar things, they shall be corrected with whips by the bishop.

35 The invasion of houses.

We wish that peace and unanimity prevail between great and small⁴⁰ according to the Apostle: *Be ye all of one accord*⁴¹, etc., and let no one dare attack another. For if there be any ispán so contumacious that after the decree of this common council he should seek out another at home in order to destroy him and his goods, and if the lord of the house is there and fights with him and is killed, the ispán shall be punished according to the law about drawing the sword.⁴² If, however, the ispán shall fall, he shall lie without compensation. If he did not go in person but sent his warriors, he shall pay compensation for the invasion with one hundred steers. If, moreover, a warrior invades the courtyard and house of another warrior, he shall pay compensation for the invasion with ten steers. If a commoner invades the huts of those of similar station, he shall pay for the invasion with five steers.

End of the first book.

³⁸ No parallel is known to this kind of branding, although wearing “the cross of infamy” on the clothes of those convicted of heresy may have been a later, less brutal form of the same punishment.

³⁹ Secular court is meant here.

⁴⁰ Or: “young and old.”

⁴¹ Cf. Phil 2: 2–4.

⁴² See above, ch. 16.

CONCORDANCE

dDRMH (Same as Závodszy)	Magyar Törvénytár/Corpus Iuris Hungarici 1896 (same as MPL 151: 1245–54)	Codex Admont , ed. E. Bartoniek
Stephen I	Stephen II	Stephen I
1–3	1–3	1–3
4	3 § 1–2	4
5–13	4–12	5–13
14	16, 13	14
15	14	15
16		16
17	15	17
18–20	17–19	18–20
21		21
22–35	20–33	22–35

THE LAWS OF KING STEPHEN I OF HUNGARY

(1000–1038)

Book II (St 2)

The second book of laws belongs also to the legislative foundation of the Kingdom of Hungary.. The king legislated both for the newly created government of royal counties and for the dioceses in the ecclesiastical sphere. The exact date of the codification cannot be established , but the second book is now dated to the last decade of his reign, c. 1030–1038 or, perhaps (according to Jánosi), later, compiled under Andrew I (1046--60), but reflecting decisions of the founding monarch. The text has numerous verbal, stylistic, and conceptual similarities with papal and Frankish royal- imperial canons and capitularies (Závodszky, pp. 13–56). Canonical and Carolingian models may have reached Hungary through the Western (Bavarian, Italian, Lotharingian) missionaries who, together with Western knights, were called in by the king. The author of the laws must have been one of them, perhaps a monk, but his person cannot be identified with any certainty.

The textual transmission of the laws was studied most carefully by Mónika Jánosi (1945-95). She proposed that a mid-eleventh century text found its way to the monastery of Admont (version A), but remained unknown in Hungary until the nineteenth century. A second version, a few chapters longer (B 1) was compiled around 1100, perhaps for King Coloman (1095-1116), who referred to it in his law (see Colo Preamble.). It survived in four later codices, the earliest of which may have been written in 1406, but known only from a copy of two hundred years later. Some time before the sixteenth century, a third version (B 2) was compiled, not significantly different from B 1 save some word and chapter sequence. Both B versions were known to the first editors of the Corpus Juris Hungarici, John Zsámbuki (Sambucus) and Bishop Zakariás Mosóczy (on this, see Andor Csizmadia, "Previous editions of the laws of Hungary, in: Decreta Regni Mediaevalis Hungariae 1000–1526: Laws of the Medieval Kingdom o Hungary vol. 1 1000–1301, János M.. Bak, György Bónis, James R. Sweeney, ed. 2 (Idyllwild, CA: Charles Schlacks, 1999) xvii—xxxiii, here xxii-xxv. Our edition follows the transcription of Ferenc Döry (1875-1960) based on the best codices.

Best MSS:

“Codex Admont”, late twelfth century, ff. 119–126 of Codex 712, Monastery of Admont, Austria; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 433.

Codex Thuroczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 79v–85r.

Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 12r–17r.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1, 20-43[=MTvT/CJH]; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman], pp. 153-6 (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904; Szent István törvényeinek XII. századi kézírata. Az Admonti Kodex [A Twelfth-Century Manuscript of the Laws of St. Stephen: The Admont Codex], Emma Bartoniek, ed. Budapest: Lantos, 1935.

LIT: F. Schiller, “Das erste ungarische Gesetzbuch und das deutsche Recht,” Festschrift Heinrich Brunner (Weimar: Böhlau Nachf., 1910) pp. 379–404; J. von Sawicki, “Zur Textkritik und Entstehungsgeschichte der Gesetze König Stefans des Heiligen,” Ungarische Jahrbücher, 9 (1929), 395–425; György Bónis, “Szent István törvényeinek önállósága” [The Autonomous Character of the Laws of St. Stephen], Századok 82 (1938), 433–487; Jenő Szűcs, “König Stefan in der Sicht der modernen ungarischen Geschichtsforschung,” Südost-Forschungen, 31 (1972), 17–40; György Györffy, “Dem Gedächtnis Stephans, des ersten Königs von Ungarn,” Acta Historica Acad. Sc. Hung., 17 (1971), 1–11; Idem, István király és műve [King Stephen and His Work] (Bp.: Gondolat, 1977), espec. pp. 269–275; briefly also in Idem, King Stephen of Hungary, trans. by Peter Doherty, (Boulder, CO: Social Science Monographs &c. 1994) pp. 132-9; Lajos Csóka, “Az első magyar törvénykönyv keletkezése” [Origins of the First Hungarian Book of Laws], Jogtörténeti tanulmányok, 3, (1974), 153–176; Mónika Jánosi, Törvényalkotás Magyarországon a korai Árpád-korban [Making of Law in the Early Árpadian Age] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 1996).

DECRETA S. STEPHANI REGIS (1000–1038)

[LIBER SECUNDUS]

I. De regali dote ad ecclesiam.

Decem ville ecclesiam edificent, quam duobus mansis totidemque mancipiis dotent, equo et iumento, sex bubus et duabus vaccis, XXX minutis bestiis. Vestimenta vero et cooperatoria rex prevideat, presbiterum et libros episcopi.

II. De successoribus regalium beneficiorum.

Consensimus igitur petitioni totius senatus, ut unusquisque propriorum simul et donorum regis dominetur, dum vivit, excepto, quod ad episcopatum pertinet et comitatum, ac post eius vitam filii simili dominio succedant. Nec pro ullius causa reatus detrimentum bonorum suorum patiatur quis, nisi consiliatus mortem regis aut traditionem regni fuerit, vel in aliam fugerit provinciam. Tunc vero bona illius in regiam veniant potestatem. Ast si quis in consilio regie mortis aut traditionis regni legaliter inventus fuerit, ipse vero capitali subiaceat sententie, bona vero illius filiis innocentibus inremota sint remanentibus salvis.

III. De servis et servorum occisoribus.

Si alicuius servus servum alterius occiderit, senior homicide medietatem servi componat seniori interfecti, si potest, sin autem peracta una quadragesima venundetur servus et pretium dividatur.

IV. De liberatione eiusdem.

Servum liberari homicidam, si seniori placuerit, cum centum et X iuvencis aut redimat, aut tradat.

V. De libertate servorum.

Si quis alienis servis libertatem acquirere nititur, quot servi erint, totidem mancipia solvat, ex quibus due partes regi, tertia seniori servorum. Rex autem ex sua parte tertiam tribuat comiti.

VI. De furto servorum.

Si quis servorum semel furtum commiserit, reddat furtum, et componat nasum V iuvencis, si potest, sin autem abscidatur. Si absciso naso iterum commiserit furtum, componat aures V iuvencis, si potest, sin autem abscindantur. Si idem tertio furtum commiserit, careat vita.

VII. De furto liberorum.

Si quis liberorum furtum commiserit, hac lege componere decrevimus. Si semel, redimat se, si potest, sin autem venundetur. Si autem idem venundatus furtum commiserit, legibus servorum subiaceat.

Item de eodem.

Si secundo, simili legi subiaceat, si vero tertio, dispendio vite diiudicetur.

VIII. De compositione regis.

Si quis comitum partem regis defraudaverit, reddat fraudem et duplo componat.

IX. De iniusta appellatione.

Si quis militum iudicium a suo comite recte iudicatum spemans, regem appellaverit, cupiens comitem suum reddere iniustum, sit debitor decem pensarum auri suo comiti.

X. De violentia comitis.

Si quis comitum inventa aliqua occasione quid iniuste militi abstulerit, reddat, et insuper ex proprio tantum.

XI. De solutione mendacii.

Si quis autem militum, suum spontaneum donum dicens sibi vi ablatum, mendax extiterit, ex hoc careat et insuper tantumdem solvat.

XII. De iudicio gladii.

Si quis gladio hominem occiderit, eadem gladio iuguletur.

XIII. De debilitatione membrorum.

Si quis autem gladio evaginato alium quemlibet debilitaverit, vel in oculo, vel in pede, vel in manu, consimile dampnum sui corporis patiatur.

XIV. De adulatoribus.

Si quis falsum testimonium vel adulationis sermonem contra aliquos protulerit, tacereque eos deprecatus fuerit, ut astutia diaboli ad invicem eos separet, solvat duas compositiones fallacis lingue pro reatu mendacii. Si uni soli adulatus fuerit, privetur lingua.

XV. Ne furis testimonium recipiatur.

Si quis illorum, qui vulgo udivornich vocantur, furtum commiserit, lege liberorum diiudicetur, testimonium autem eorum inter liberos non recipiatur.

[XVI.] De gladii vulnere.

Si quis vero gladio vulneraverit aliquem et vulneratus de eodem vulnere sanus et incolumis evaserit, homicidii compositionem vulneris illator componat.

[XVII.] De gladii evaginatione sine vulnere.

Si quis furore repletus evaginaverit gladium et tamen non leserit, pro sola evaginatione mediam homicidii compositionem absolvat.

[XVIII.] De testimonio servorum regali curie vel civitati prepositorum. Si quis servorum curie regali aut civitati preficitur, testimonium eius inter comites recipiatur. Item si servus seniore, si miles suum comitem interfecerit.

[XIX.] De conspiratione regis et regni.

Si quis in regem aut in regnum conspiraverit, refugium nullum habeat ad ecclesiam. Et si quis contra regis salutem aut dignitatem quolibet modo aliquid conspiraverit aut conspirare aliquid temptaverit, seu temptanti sciens consenserit, anathematizetur et omnium fidelium communione privetur. Et si quis huiusmodi aliquem noverit et probare valens non edicaverit, predictae subiaceat dampnationi.

[XX.] De decimatione.

Si cui deus decem dederit in anno, decimam deo det. Et si quis decimam suam abscondit, novem solvat. Et si quis decimationem episcopo separatam furatus fuerit, diiudicetur ut fur ac huiusmodi compositio tota pertineat ad episcopum.

[XXI.] De versutia comitum.

Si quis versutiis alicui comitum vel alteri persone fideli dixerit: audivi regem ad perditionem tui loqui et hic inventus fuerit, pereat.

The Laws of King St. Stephen I

Book II

1 The royal contribution to a church.

Ten villages¹ shall build a church and endow it with two manses and the same number of mancipii,² a horse and mare, six oxen, two cows, and thirty small animals. The king shall provide vestments and altar cloths, and the bishop the priests and books.

2 Successors to royal grants.

We have agreed to the petition of the whole council that everyone during his lifetime shall have mastery over his own property³ and over grants of the king, except for that which belongs to a bishopric or a county,⁴ and upon his death his sons shall succeed to a similar mastery. Nor should an accused suffer damage to his goods for any reason, unless he plotted the king's death or the betrayal of the kingdom, or fled to a foreign land. In this case his goods devolve to the king. Yet if anyone should be found guilty according to law of plotting the king's death or the betrayal of the kingdom, he shall be subjected to capital punishment but his goods shall remain secure and his innocent sons undisturbed.

3 Servi and the killers of servi.

If someone's servus kills another's servus, the master of the killer shall compensate the master of the victim with the price of the servus, if he can, but if not, the slave shall be sold after forty days and his price divided.⁵

¹ Villa, means "village", "village community."

² Mansus means a servile peasant tenement. The laborers (probably whole families) belonging to it are referred to as mancipia. The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). In the printed version of DRMH, the editors decided to avoid coming down on either side and translated mancipium, servus and ancilla &c. as "bondman" or "bondwoman" intending to escape the decision, but that was awkward. Now see: László Solymosi, "Liberty and Servitude in the Age of Saint Stephen," in: Attila Zsoldos, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country: A Newborn Kingdom in Central Europe: Hungary (Budapest: Lucidus, 2001), pp. 69-80. Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the "easy way out" by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader. -- The endowment of a parish church follows essentially Carolingian patterns, as codified, e.g., in the Capit, de partibus Saxoniae c. 15, MGH Cap., I, 69.

³ I.e., something like allodial lands

⁴ The existence of land given as an allotment to the office of a bishop or and ispán has often been overlooked. This type of "temporary donation", not dissimilar to Western benefices, has not been studied in detail.

⁵ Cf. Stephen I: 14.

4 The liberation of the same [servi].⁶

If the master wants, he may either free the servus who killed a freeman by paying one hundred ten steers, or he may hand him over.

5 The freedom of servi.

If someone wants to procure the freedom of servi of other masters, he may pay for as many servi as there are, from which two parts go to the king, the third to the master of the men. The king shall give a third of his part to the ispán.

6 Theft by servi ⁷

If a servus commits a theft once, he shall make restitution and pay compensation for his nose with five steers, if he can, otherwise it shall be cut off. If having lost his nose he steals again, he shall pay composition for his ears with five steers, if he can, otherwise they shall be cut off. But if he steals a third time, he shall lose his life.

7 Theft by freemen.

If a freeman commits a theft, we decree that he make composition by this law: if he does it once, he shall redeem himself, if he can, otherwise he shall be sold; if after having been sold he commits a theft, he shall be subject to the law of slaves.⁸

On the same.

If he⁹ commits a second offense, he shall be subject to the same law; if a third time, he shall be sentenced to death.

8 The king's composition.

If an ispán cheats the king of his portion, he shall make restitution and pay double as compensation.

9 Unjust appeal.

If a warrior, scorning the just judgment of his ispán appeals to the king, seeking to prove the injustice of the ispán, he will owe ten pensae of gold to the ispán.¹⁰

⁶ The title refers to "the same" topic as in ch. 3, but the text treats a different crime.

⁷ In this case a person who could, in certain circumstances, render a fine of five steers was hardly a domestic slave, but rather a servile tenant (serf), even though referred to in the same way (servus) as those mentioned in the preceding chapters who clearly are more precisely "slaves."

⁸ I.e. ch. 6, above

⁹ Translators and commentators see this passage as referring to free men.

¹⁰ The translator of MTvT/CJH, I (39, n. 11) suggests that the punishment may not have been a mere ten pensae fine, but rather a kind of debt bondage with such an amount due at regular intervals to the ispán. He cites in support a will of 1157 which mentions a debitor sex pensarum -- see Gusztáv Wenzel, ed., Árpádkori új okmánytár. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus, (Budapest: MTA, 1860–78) [Monumenta Hungariae historica, Diplomataria, VI ff.] I: 64.

10 Violence by an ispán.

If on any pretext an ispán takes something unjustly from a warrior he shall make restitution and also pay the same amount out of his own resources.

11 Payment for a lie.

If a warrior says that his freely given gift was taken from him by force, and in so doing tells a lie, he shall be deprived of it and, in addition, pay the same amount.

12 Judgment of the sword.

If anyone kills a man by a sword, he shall be put to death by the same sword.¹¹

13 The maiming of parts of the body.

If anyone maims another in any way with a drawn sword, either in the eye, or on the foot, or on the hand, he shall suffer the same injury to his own body.

14 On flatterers.

If someone spreads false testimony or connivingly intrigues against others and asks them to remain silent about it so the cunning of the devil may cause divisions among them, he shall pay double composition of a lying tongue for the crime of lying. If he has connivingly intrigued with only one person, he shall be deprived of his tongue.¹²

15 The testimony of a thief shall not be accepted.

If any of those people who are popularly called *udvarnok*¹³ commits a theft, he shall be judged according to the law of freemen,¹⁴ but his testimony shall not be accepted among freemen.¹⁵

[16.] Wounds inflicted by the sword.

If anyone wounds another with a sword and the victim emerges from this wounding safe and sound, the wounder shall pay the composition for homicide.

[17.] Drawing of the sword without wounding.

If anyone filled with rage draws a sword but does no injury, he shall pay one half the composition for homicide for the drawing alone.

¹¹ See Stephen I: 14; less harsh punishment was included in the law of Ladislas II: 8.

¹² The apparent imbalance of punishment may be explained if we assume, as was often the case, that the offender judged to be deprived of his tongue could pay composition for it.

¹³ Agricultural servile personnel on royal estates; see György Györffy, "Zur Frage der Herkunft der ungarländischen Dienstleute," Studia Slavica Acad. Sc. Hung., 22 (1976), 318.

¹⁴ Both codices of the vulgate tradition (Cod. Ilosvay, Cod. Thuroczi) add liberorum, which makes better sense.

¹⁵ The text from the Codex Admont ends here. The following chapters are traditionally numbered 14–19, and inserted before ch. 14 above. On this textual problem, see now Jánosi, Törvényalkotás, pp. 81–9.

[18.] The testimony of *servi*¹⁶ put in charge of a royal residence or castle.¹⁷

If a servus is appointed to administer a royal residence or castle, his testimony shall be accepted among the ispáns. Similarly, if a servus kills his master, or a warrior his ispán.¹⁸

[19.] Conspiracy against the king and the kingdom.

If anyone has conspired against the king or the kingdom, he shall have no refuge in the church.¹⁹ And if anyone conspired in any way against the king's person or dignity, or attempts to conspire, or knowingly sympathizes with those attempting to conspire, he shall be anathematized and cut off from association with the faithful. And if someone knew anyone of this sort and can prove it but does not speak out, he shall be subject to the same judgment.

[20.] On tithes.²⁰

If in a year God has given ten parts to anyone, he shall give one-tenth to God. If anyone evaded rendering his tithe, he shall pay nine.²¹ And if anyone shall have stolen the tithe reserved for the bishop, he shall be judged as a thief, and the entire composition shall belong to the bishop.

[21.] The intrigues of the ispáns.

If anyone deceitfully says to any ispán or other loyal persons, "I heard the king speak of your ruin," and he is found out, he shall be put to death.

CONCORDANCE

¹⁶ Henrik Marczali (A magyar történet kútjöinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum Budapest.: Athenaeum, 1901 p. 79) followed by Závodszky, amended the text to read senior instead of servus, finding the commission of such duties to unfree men inconceivable, but senior (magnate) makes nonsense of the text. – Actually, this chapter was one of the main reasons for the editors not wanting the call servi &c. slaves, believing that they would not be assigned a castle. This issue is still problematic, but it is true that ancient slaves were often given quite significant military or civil administrative posts.

¹⁷ Curia or curtis was the center of royal estates; civitas, however, is the usual name for a county (see Glossary); see Gy. Györffy, "Civitas, castrum, castellum", Acta Antiqua Acad. Sc. Hung., 23 (1975), 331–334; and idem, "Die Entstehung der ungarischen Burgorganisation", Acta Archaeologica Acad. Sc. Hung., 28 (1976), 323–358. In this case it is more likely that royal servants were in charge of minor residences, castles, and perhaps smaller district attached to them.

¹⁸ This sentence is misplaced here; most editors have suggested that it belongs to [16.] above or [18.] below.

¹⁹ This is the first reference to ecclesiastical asylum in the laws; see György Bónis, "Első törvényeink sorsa és az egyházi menedékjog" [The Fate of Our First Laws and Ecclesiastical Asylum], Regnum, 3 (1938–39), 75–97.

²⁰ This chapter confirms the establishment of the ecclesiastical dues which were to remain in force for many centuries to come; see Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn", Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan Abt. 61 (1975), 228–257. For more elaborate assessment of the tithe, see, e.g., Syn. Szab. 40 and Coloman 25.

²¹ The meaning of this clause is unclear. May mean a ninth, that it a second tithe.

dDRMH (Same as Závodszyk,)	Magyar Törvénytár/Corpus Iuris Hungarici 1896 (same as MPL 151: 1245–54)	Codex Admont , ed. E. Bartoniek
Stephen II (St2)	Stephen II	Stephen II
1–5	34–38	1–5
6	39–40	6
7–13	41–47	7–13
14	54	14
15	55	15
16	48
17–20	50–53

CANONS OF THE SYNOD OF SZABOLCS 20 MAY 1092

[Laws of King St Ladislas I (1077-95) “Book I”]

(Syn. Szab.)

St. Ladislas I was the second king of Hungary to leave a collection of statutes to posterity. During the four decades preceding his reign, the social and ecclesiastical order established by St. Stephen suffered much in the course of foreign intervention, civil war, and pagan uprisings. The new laws introduced harsh measures for the restoration of property and public order.

The canons of this synod, the only legislation precisely dated in the reign of King Ladislas, have come down to us as “Book I” of that king’s laws. The text makes clear that the holy synod (sancta synodus) was primarily a gathering of bishops and abbots at which the king presided and to which the secular magnates were invited. The synodal decreta deal with ecclesiastical matters or procedures in church law in forty of the forty-two canons, and are described as having been canonically (canonice) established. Traditionally three “books” of laws have been ascribed to King Ladislas, and all earlier editions and commentaries cite this legislation in tripartite form (see MTvT/CJH, 1). We call Book I Synod of Szabolcs (Syn. Szab.) and but keep the name of Books II and III in order to facilitate references to the older editions.

Since these laws have survived only in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century transcriptions rather than in medieval manuscripts, there is considerable controversy about their dating. Mónika Jánosi (1945-95) suggested that one should speak about the redaction rather than the dating of these legislative documents, as the latter cannot be ascertained. The Synod of Szabolcs may contain all ecclesiastical (and some secular) legislation passed on several occasions during Ladislas’s time. Books II and III have to be judged similarly as collections of decrees of different times. A final redaction of all these texts may have taken place as late as King Béla III’s reign in the late thirteenth century.

MSS: Codex Thuroczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. f. 85r–88v.

Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 17r–20v.

EDD: I. Batthyány, Leges ecclesiastici regni Hungariae... (Alba-Carolina: Typis episcopalibus, 1785), I, 433–41; Mansi, Concilia XX: 758–83; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1, 50–65 [=MTvT/CJH]; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislas, and Coloman], pp. 157–65. (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904.

LIT: I. Batthyány, “Dissertatio de synodis...”; in Idem, Leges, I, 30–54; G. Adriányi, “Die ungarischen Synoden”, Annuario historiae conciliorum, 8 (1976), 541–575 (espec. 542f.) M.

Büdinger, Ein Buch ungarischer Geschichte 1058–1100 86–8 (Leipzig: Teubner, 1866); Henrik Marczali, Magyarország története az Árpádok korában 1038–1301 [History of Hungary in the Age of the Arpads 1038–1301] (Bp.: Athenaeum, 1896=A magyar nemzet története [History of the Hungarian Nation], ed. S. Szilágyi, II); Gy. Györffy, “Szent László”, in László király emlékezete [Memory of King Ladislas] (Bp.: Magyar Helikon, 1977), pp. 13–15; Mónika Jánosi, Törvényalkotás Magyarországon a korai Árpád-korban [Making of law in Hungary in the early Árpadian age] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 1996). pp. 104–28, esp. 124 ff.; Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006).

CONSTITUTIONES SYNODI IN CIVITATE ZABOLCH

20 Maii 1092

[LADISLAI REGIS DECRETORUM LIBER PRIMUS]

Incipit decretum sancti regis Ladislai.

Regnante creatore et salvatore domino nostro Jesu Christo anno incarnationis eius millesimo XCII^o XIII. kalendas Junii in civitate Zabolch sancta synodus habita est, presidente christianissimo Hungarorum rege Ladislao cum universis regni sui pontificibus et abbatibus, necnon cunctis optimatibus, cum testimonio totius cleri et populi. In qua sancta synodo canonice et laudabiliter decreta hec inventa sunt.

Recapitulationes:

- I. De bigamis presbiteris et diaconis.
- II. De his, qui ancillam in locum surrogaverint uxoris.
- III. De indulgentia presbiterorum.
- IV. De consensu episcoporum nolentibus separari ab illicito coniugio.
- V. De dote ecclesiarum non expleta.
- VI. De perditione rerum ecclesiarum ob sacerdotis incuriam.
- VII. De restauratione desolatarum ecclesiarum propter seditionem.
- VIII. De desolatione propter vetustatem.
- IX. De negotiatoribus quos ysmaelitas appellant.
- X. De coniugio iudeorum et christianorum mulierum.
- XI. De negligentia ecclesiarum in dominicis et festivis diebus.
- XII. De veneratione supradictorum dierum.
- XIII. De interfectione adultere.
- XIV. De subtractione kalendarum absque licentia.
- XV. De negligentia festivitatum ob negotium.
- XVI. De negligentia dominice diei.
- XVII. De hospitibus advenientibus clericis.
- XVIII. De coherentia clericorum.
- XIX. De desertione propriarum ecclesiarum.
- XX. De muliere in adulterio deprehensa.
- XXI. De procuratione abbatum erga proprios episcopos.
- XXII. De ritu gentilium.
- XXIII. De datione propriarum rerum alicui ecclesie.
- XXIV. De inventione rerum ecclesiarum.
- XXV. De negligentia fidelium cadaverum.
- XXVI. De laboribus iudeorum in festivitibus.

XXVII. De decimatione liberorum abbatum.
 XXVIII. De testibus iudicii ferri vel aque.
 XXIX. De celebratione misse extra ecclesiam.
 XXX. De decimatione liberorum.
 XXXI. De carnis dimissione.
 XXXII. De illata violentia virginis vel mulieris.
 XXXIII. De decimatione pecorum in alio episcopatu nascentium.
 XXXIV. De satisfactione meretricum vel strigarum.
 XXXV. De osculo abbatis vel monachi erga regem vel episcopum.
 XXXVI. De salutatione abbatis vel monachi euntis ad regem.
 XXXVII. De observatione vigiliarum sanctorum.
 XXXVIII. De sanctorum veneratione festivitatum.
 XXXIX. De abbatibus vel monachis in kalendis sedentibus.
 XL. XL. De decimationem negantibus.
 XLI. De litigatoribus venientibus ad regale palatium.
 XLII. De spretu sigilli regis vel iudicis.

I. De bigamis presbiteris et dyaconis.

Bigamos presbiteros et dyaconos, et viduarum vel repudiatarum maritos iubemus separari, et peracta penitentia ad ordinem suum reverti. Et qui noluerint illicita coniugia dimittere, secundum instituta canonum debent degradari. Separatas autem feminas parentibus suis iubemus reddi et quia non erant legitime, si voluerint, liceat eis maritari.

II. De his, qui ancillam in locum surrogaverint uxoris.

Si quis autem presbiter ancillam suam uxoris in locum sibi associaverit, vendat; et si noluerit, venundetur tamen, et pretium eius ad episcopum transferatur.

III. De indulgentia presbiterorum.

Presbiteris autem, qui prima et legitima duxere coniugia, indulgentia ad tempus datur propter vinculum pacis et unitatem sancti spiritus, quousque nobis in hoc domini apostolici paternitas consiliatur.

IV. De consensu episcoporum nolentibus separari ab illicito coniugio.

Si quis autem episcopus aut archiepiscopus ab illicitis coniugiis separari nolentibus, spreto sinodali decreto aut consensum prebuerit, aut ecclesiam dederit, aut aliquid, quod ad ordinem pertinet, agere permiserit, a rege et coepiscopis suis secundum, quod rationabile videtur eis, diiudicetur. Si vero archipresbiter causa ignorantie episcopo consenserit aut presbiter per consensum illius in tali vitio permanserit, iudicio episcopi voluntario subiaceat.

V. De dote ecclesiarum non expleta.

Quicumque ecclesiam deo edificaverit, et dotem nominaverit, nominatam vero non dederit, ad illud explendum transmissio nuntio prevaleat episcopale iudicium; cui si quis contradixerit, et contradicendo verberaverit, ipse regali iudicio subiaceat.

VI. De perditione rerum ecclesiarum ob sacerdotis incuriam.

Si quis presbiterorum res ecclesie ad propria loca duxerit et ibi vendiderit, vel per incuriam suam perdiderit, tripliciter ecclesie restituat.

VII. De restauratione desolatarum ecclesiarum propter seditionem.

Ecclesias propter seditionem desolatas aut combustas, iussu regis parochiani restituant. Calices et vestimenta ex sumptu regis dentur, libros episcopus provideat.

VIII. De desolatione propter vetustatem.

Ecclesias ex vetustate desolatas episcopus reedificet.

IX. De negotiatoribus, quos ysmahelitas appellant.

De negotiatoribus, quos ysmahelitas appellant, si post baptismum ad legem suam antiquam per circumcisionem rediisse inventi fuerint, a sedibus suis separati ad alias villas removeantur. Illi vero, qui inculpabiles per iudicium apparuerint, in propriis sedibus remaneant.

X. De coniugio iudeorum et christianorum mulierum.

Si iudei uxores christianas sibi associaverint, aut aliquam personam christianam in servitio apud se detinuerint, ablata ab eis libertati reddantur, venditoribus earum pretium tollatur et in sumptum episcoporum veniat.

XI. De negligentia ecclesiarum in dominicis et festivis diebus.

Si quis in dominicis diebus aut in maioribus festivitibus ad ecclesiam non venerit parochianam, verberibus corripiatur. Si vero ville remote fuerint et ad ecclesiam suam parochianam villani venire non potuerint, unus tamen ex eis in vice omnium cum baculo ad ecclesiam veniat, et tres panes et candelam ad altare offerat.

XII. De veneratione supradictorum dierum.

Si quis in his diebus venatus fuerit, canibus et equo careat, sed equum bove redimat. Si vero presbiter vel clericus venatus fuerit, ab ordine descendat usque ad satisfactionem.

XIII. De interfectione adultere.

Si quis uxorem cum altero viro adulterantem necaverit, deo rationem reddat, et si voluerit, aliam ducat. Si vero ex propinquis aliquis femine in eum insurrexerit, quod interfecisset iniuste, iudicio discutiatur, et illud a vicinis eorum omnimodis investigetur, si in despectione et contemptu apud virum suum prius esset, aut aliqua suspicio fornicationis de illa prius orta fuisset, et hoc, secundum quod rationabile videtur, diiudicetur.

XIV. De subtractione kalendarum absque licentia.

Si quis de kalendis sine presbiteri sui et fratrum licentia subtraxerit, manum eam, cum qua fraternitatem promisit, decem pensis redimat.

XV. De negligentia festivitatum ob negotium

Si quis in dominicis diebus vel in maioribus festivitibus ecclesiam negligens mercatum frequentaverit, equo careat.

XVI. De negligentia dominice diei.

Si quis die dominica mercatum constituerit, precipit sancta synodus, ut sicut construxit, ita destruat. Si autem quis rennuit, quinquaginta quinque pensas solvat.

XVII. De hospitibus advenientibus clericis.

Si quis hospes clericus in hanc patriam sine commendatitiis litteris episcopi sui venerit, ne forte monachus aut homicida fuerit vel alicuius ordinis se confessus fuerit, iudicio vel testimonio discutiatur.

XVIII. De coherentia clericorum.

Si quis hospes clericus in patriam istam veniens, alicui episcoporum vel comitum adhererit, et eum dominus suus bene habuerit, et secundum quod cum eo convenit, tractaverit, si discedere ab illo voluerit, nequaquam discedat, donec prius de iniustitia sibi illata in audientia regis declamaverit.

XIX. De desertione propriarum ecclesiarum.

Si derelicta ecclesia villani alias transierint, pontificali iure et regali mandato, unde transierunt, ibi redire cogantur.

XX. De muliere in adulterio deprehensa.

Si quis uxorem suam in adulterio deprehenderit et in iudicium statuerit, secundum statuta canonum penitentia imponatur et peracta penitentia, si maritus voluerit, iterum recipiat, sin autem, quamdiu ambo vixerint, innupti permaneant.

XXI. De procuracione abbatum erga proprios episcopos.

Abbates secundum decreta patrum in procuracione episcoporum suorum, in quorum territorio sunt, humiliter permaneant. Et non semel in anno, sed sepe monasteria eorum episcopi visitent et regulariter vitam et conversationem fratrum discutiant. Conversi monachi, cui monasterio monachorum voluerint, se cum rebus suis commendent; similiter et monache in monasterio monachorum. Deinceps autem aliquis episcopus aut abbas sine titulo certi loci monachum aut monacham non audeat ordinare.

XXII. De ritu gentilium.

Quicumque ritu gentilium iuxta puteos sacrificaverint, vel ad arbores et fontes et lapides oblationes obtulerint, reatum suum bove luant.

XXIII. De datione propriarum rerum alicui ecclesie.

Si quis res suas aut predia uni dederit ecclesie, nulla interveniente causa subtrahere audeat et dare alie.

XXIV. De satisfactione meretricum vel strigarum.

Meretrices et strige, secundum quod episcopo iuste visum fuerit, ita diiudicentur.

XXV. De osculo abbatis vel monachi erga regem vel episcopum.

Si contigerit regi aut episcopo ad quamlibet abbatiam venire, abbas vel monachi ad regis vel episcopi osculum in ecclesia non accedant, sed egressi in claustrum, ordinatim stantes, regis vel episcopi osculum prestolentur. Regem autem et episcopum, cum quot et qualibus sibi placuerit, abbas claustrum intrare permittat.

XXVI. De salutione abbatis vel monachi euntis ad regem.

Si autem contigerit, abbatem vel monachum ad curiam regis venire, in ecclesia dei ad salutandum regem non eat, sed postquam exierit de ecclesia, in domo vel tentorio salutet eum.

XXVII. De observatione vigiliarum sanctorum.

In hac vero sancta synodo a venerabili rege Ladislao statutum est, ab universis collaudatum et canonizatum, ut vigilie celebrentur beati Stephani regis et Gerardi martiris, quo die passus est,³⁶ et tres dies ad festivitatem sancti Martini. Et quod patruus suus Andreas rex cum omnibus, qui tunc erant, episcopis, vovit et statuit, iste rex christianissimus destruere noluit, sed firmius roboravit, scilicet dierum trium vigiliam ad festivitatem sancti Petri.

XXVIII. De sanctorum veneratione festivitatum.

Iste vero festivitates feriande sunt per annum: Nativitas domini, sancti Stephani prothomartiris, sancti Johannis ewangeliste, sanctorum Innocentum, Circumcisio domini, Epiphania cum vigilia, Purificatio sancte Marie, in Pascha quatuor dies, sancti Georgii martiris, Philippi et Jacobi cum vigilia, Inventio sancte crucis, Ascensio domini, in Pentheskosten IIII dies, sancti Johannis Baptiste, Petri et Pauli una die, sancti Jacobi apostoli, sancti Laurentii martiris, Assumptio sancte Marie, sancti Stephani regis, Bartholomei apostoli, Nativitas sancte Marie, Exaltatio sancte crucis, sancti Mathei apostoli, sancti Gerardi episcopi, sancti Michaelis archangeli, Symonis et Jude apostolorum, Omnium Sanctorum, sancti Henrici ducis, sancti Martini eipscopi, sancti Andree apostoli, sancti Nicolai episcopi, sancti Thome apostoli et unaqueque parochia suum patronum et dedicationem ecclesie celebret.

XXIX. De abbatibus vel monachis in kalendis sedentibus.

Abbates et monachi inter fratres kalendarum non sedeant, sed abbas oblationes fratrum in claustrum recipiat et secundum regulam fratribus administret.

XL. De decimationem negantibus.

Episcopus accipiat decimationem in omnibus, sed eo tenore: pristaldus episcopi interroget possessorem annonarum seu bestiarum, quantum habeat? Si vero crediderit verbis illius, accipiat secundum hoc, quod dixit; si vero non crediderit, faciat illum iurare et accipiat. In annona vero commixtum ne accipiat, sed separatim. Si vero post iuramentum dominum annone quis alienus perurum dixerit, preter pristaldum episcopi ante pristaldum regis et comitis numeretur annona. Si culpabilis inventus fuerit dominus annone, ei decima pars detur et novem partes dentur episcopo; si autem qui insurrexerit, ipse mendax extiterit, eodem iudicio persolvat culpam. Si non habuerit, unde se redimat, solus vendatur exceptis liberis. Decimatio autem tota colligatur usque ad Nativitatem domini. Filius, qui in domo patris est, seu filius, seu servus, non separentur, sed simul dent decimationem cum patre; a filiis vero aut servis, qui per se habent domos suas, accipiant decimam de omnibus, que habent. Si autem aliquis contumax fuerit, interrogatus decimam noluerit iudicare pristaldo episcopi, tunc pristaldus coram idoneis testibus designet, quantum sibi videtur esse iustum. Linum vel canopum, quantum potest pugillus pressis digitis ad terram premere, accipiat. Si trituratam annonam invenerit, si decem ydrie fuerint, nichil accipiat, si viginti vel plus, accipiat decimam partem.

XLI. De litigatoribus venientibus ad regale palatium.

Si quis vero nobilium vel comitum in curiam causa litium veniens ad regale palatium cum suo litigatore non steterit et regio nuntio vocatus sine regis licentia domum perrexerit, rationem perdat et insuper, si quid ab eo abstulerit, duppliciter reddat.

XLII. De spretu sigilli regis vel iudicis.

Si quis autem regis sigillum super aliquem proiciens et ipse in curiam venire neglexerit, rationem perdat et quinque pensas persolvat et quocienscumque renovaverit, totiens quinque pensas solvat. Si vero iudicis sigillum proiciens non venerit, centum nummos solvat.

CANONS OF THE SYNOD OF SZABOLCS
20 MAY 1092
[BOOK ONE OF THE LAWS OF KING LADISLAS]

Here begin the statutes of the holy King Ladislas:

In the reign of the Creator and Savior, Jesus Christ, in the year of His incarnation 1092, on the twentieth day of May a holy synod was held in the castle of Szabolcs,¹ presided over by the most Christian king, Ladislas, with all the bishops and abbots of his realm, as well as all the magnates, the entire clergy, and people as witnesses thereof. The following was canonically and commendably established in this holy synod

Summary:

1. Bigamous priests and deacons.
2. Those who keep *ancillae*² in place of wives.
3. An indulgence to priests.
4. Episcopal consent to those not wanting to separate from an illegal marriage.
5. Unfulfilled pledges to churches.
6. The loss of church property on account of the negligence of the clergy.
7. Restoration of churches ruined as a result of sedition.
8. Ruin as a result of age.
9. The merchants called Ishmaelites.
10. The marriage of Jews and Christian women.

¹ Szabolcs Castle, center of the county of same name, was founded by St. Stephen; the earthworks have survived into modern times and were archeologically explored in the late nineteenth century. On recent diggings, see P. Németh, “Előzetes jelentés a szabolcsi Árpádkori megyeszékhely kutatásának első három esztendejéről [Preliminary report on the first three years’ exploration of the Szabolcs county seat of the Árpadian age], Archaeologiai Értesítő, 100 (1973), 167–178; cf. also Fügedi, Castle and Society in Medieval Hungary, ch 1.

² The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century. In the printed version of DRMH, the editors decided to avoid coming down on either side and translated servus and ancilla &c. as “bondman” or “bondwoman” intending to escape the decision, but that was awkward. Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the “easy way out” by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader.

11. Neglecting church on Sundays and feast days.
12. The observance of the aforesaid days.
13. Killing an adulteress.
14. Absence from a confraternity without permission.
15. Neglecting feasts as a result of business.
16. Neglecting Sundays.
17. The arrival of alien clerks.
18. The dependence of clerks.
19. Desertion of a church.
20. A woman caught in adultery.
21. The procuration of abbots to their own bishops.
22. Heathen rites.
23. The gift of personal property to a church.
24. Finding church goods.
25. Neglecting the corpses of the faithful.
26. The working of Jews on feast days.
27. The tithe of the abbot's freemen.
28. Witnesses at ordeals of hot iron and water.
29. The celebration of mass outside the church.
30. Tithes from freemen.
31. Renunciation of meat.
32. The rape of virgins and married women.
33. The tithe on cattle born in another diocese.
34. The atonement of whores and witches.
35. The kiss of an abbot or a monk given to the king or a bishop.
36. The greeting of the abbot going to the king.
37. The observance of the vigils of the saints.
38. Veneration of the feasts of the saints.
39. The abbots or monks sitting among the confraternity.
40. Those who refuse the tithe.

41. Litigants coming to the royal palace.
42. Contempt for the king's or the judge's seal.

1 Bigamous³ priests and deacons.

We command that priests and deacons who are bigamous or husbands of widows or of repudiated women be separated from their wives, and, having done penance, shall return to their order. Those who do not wish to abandon illegal marriages shall be degraded in accordance with canonical statutes. We command that the separated women, however, be returned to their kindred, and, because they were not married legally, it is permissible for them to marry if they wish.⁴

2 Those who keep bondwomen in place of wives.

If any priest lives together with a bondwoman in place of a wife, he shall sell her; and if he does not want to, she shall be sold nevertheless, and her price shall be given to the bishop.

An indulgence to priests.

3 To priests, who married once and legally, we give temporary indulgence because of the bond of unity and peace of the Holy Spirit for as long as the lord pope shall advise us on this.⁵

4 Episcopal consent to those not wanting to separate from an illegal marriage.

³ The concept of bigami mentioned here is derived ultimately from 1 Tim 3: 2 and 12. It passed from early church practice into Byzantine canon law, and thence into this decretum (cf. also Colo. 67). It is an explicit prohibition of all second marriages to those in both major and minor orders. In Byzantine history this canonical prohibition was a significant issue in both the Moechian and Tetragamist controversies. The inclusion of this measure, therefore, serves to document Byzantine influence in the Hungarian church; see Anton Szentirmai, "Der Einfluß des byzantinischen Kirchenrechts auf die Gesetzgebung Ungarns im XI–XII. Jahrhundert." Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinistischen Gesellschaft, 10 (1961), 76–79; and in general, Gyula Moravcsik, Byzantium and the Magyars, (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1970) pp. 102–118 with literature.

⁴ The text of this article and the following two have been compared critically by Závodszy (pp. 58–61) to canons 3 and 13 of the Quinisextum or Council in Trullo (A.D. 691–692); Mansi XI: 942f., 947.

⁵ Although in general these synodal decrees show scarcely any familiarity with the program advanced by the "Gregorian" Reformers since the mid-eleventh century, this canon by implication recognizes the total prohibition of clerical marriage. It also points to a measure of royal-papal cooperation in the gradual implementation of the reform program in Hungary. For the reform, with occasional references to Hungary, see H. Jedin and J. P. Dolan, Handbook of Church History (New York: Herder, 1969), III, 351–403. See also E. Pásztor, "Sulla origini della vita comune del clero in Ungheria," in La vita comune del clero nei secoli XI–XII: Atti de settimana di studio, Mendola 1959 (Milano: Vita e Pensiero, 1962), 2: 71–8; Josef Deér, "Die Ansprüche der Herrscher des 12. Jahrhunderts auf die apostolische Legation," Archivum historiae pontificiae, 2 (1964): 153–76

If, however, any bishop or archbishop should either give his consent, or grant a church, or permit any other function which pertains to orders to a person who in contempt of this synodal decree does not wish to separate from an illegal marriage, he shall be judged by the king and his episcopal brethren in whatever manner seems reasonable to them. And if an archpriest⁶ agrees with his bishop out of ignorance or if a priest persists in this corruption with his consent, he shall be subject to the discretionary judgment of the bishop.⁷

5 Unfulfilled pledges to churches.

Whoever builds a church to God and announces his donation, but in fact does not give what he said, the bishop shall have the right to claim it after having sent a messenger. Should anyone speak against the messenger, and in the altercation beats him, he shall be subject to royal judgment.

6 The loss of church property on account of the negligence of the clergy. If any priest takes the goods of the church to his own place and sells them, or if he loses them through negligence, he shall make triple restitution to the church.⁸

7 Restoration of churches ruined as a result of sedition.

By the king's command, the people of the parish shall restore the churches ruined or burnt through sedition.⁹ The chalices and vestments shall be given at the expense of the king,¹⁰ the bishop shall provide the books.

8 Ruin as a result of age.

⁶ Archpriests as distinguished from parish pastors are referred to here for the first time in Hungarian sources; Antal Szentirmai, "Die Anfänge des Rechts der Pfarrei in Ungarn." Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht, 10 (1959), 30–35, here p. 30. They seem to have been the parish priests of the most important church of a smaller district within the diocese comparable to the later plebani and perhaps with similar rights and duties as a rural dean in England or the pievano in Italy; cf. R. Brentano, Two Churches: England and Italy in the Thirteenth Century (Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1968), p. 68

⁷ Závodszy (p. 61f.) points to parallels in Canon 12 of the Council of Melfi (A. D. 1090); Mansi XX: 724

⁸ This measure is closely related to Canon 8 of the 847 Council of Mainz (Mansi XIV: 906) and Canon 6 of the 888 Council of Mainz (ibid., XVIII: 66); Závodszy, p. 62f

⁹ Two major "pagan" uprisings occurred in the decades preceding King Ladislas' reign: one in 1046 under the leadership of Vata, probably consisting of former tribal leaders and freemen, and one in 1060 under János, son of Vata, possibly supported by déclassé freemen rebelling against the new ecclesiastical and social order. In the former, Bishop (St.) Gerald., among others, was killed by the rebels, and in both many churches were burned down. The first rebellion was put down swiftly by King Andrew I, the second by Béla I; see Gy. Kristó. "Megjegyzések az ún. 'pogánylázadások' kora történetéhez" [Comments on the history of the age of the so-called pagan uprisings], Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila József nominatae, Acta Historica, 18 (1965), 1–57. See also: Christian Lübke, "Das 'junge Europa' in der Krise: Gentilreligiöse Herausforderungen um 1000, Zeitschrift für Ostmitteleuropa-Forschung 50 (2001), 475–95

4

¹⁰ Cf. Stephen II: 1

The bishops shall rebuild churches ruined by age.

The merchants called Ishmaelites.¹¹

9 The merchants, called Ishmaelites, who after having been baptized return to their old religion through circumcision, shall be removed from their dwelling to different villages. But those, who have proved themselves innocent by ordeal, shall remain in their own dwellings.

The marriage of Jews and Christian women.

10 If Jews live together with Christian wives, or keep any Christian person in servitude in their home, these shall be taken away and restored to liberty; those who sold them shall lose the price that will go to the bishop.¹²

11 Neglecting church on Sundays and feast days.

If someone does not come to the parish church on Sundays or the greater feasts, he shall be punished by beating.¹³ If, however, the villages are far apart and the people of the parish are unable to come to church, one among them on behalf of all shall, nevertheless, come to the church with a staff and shall offer at the altar three loaves of bread and a candle.¹⁴

12 The observance of the aforesaid days.

If someone hunts on these days, he shall lose his dogs and horse, but he may redeem the horse with an ox. But if a priest or a clerk hunts, he shall be deposed from his order until he makes ¹¹ The presence of a Muslim or “Ishmaelite” community in Hungary is well documented for the entire Árpád period. Muslim merchants generally were active throughout Eastern Europe in the tenth and eleventh centuries. The wide distribution in the tenth century of silver dirhems, the observations of contemporary Arab geographers, and the evidence for trade in Hungarian horses, slaves, and worked silver suggest prolonged and wide-ranging economic contacts with Eastern, particularly Muslim, traders, some of whom, apparently, were settled in Hungary; cf. A. Bartha, Hungarian Society in the Ninth and Tenth Centuries (Bp.: Akadémiai, 1975), pp. 115–117; see also Coloman 46 with n. 42 See S. Balič, “Der Islam im mittelalterlichen Ungarn.” Südost-Forschungen, 23 (1964), 19–35 and now: Nora Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and ‘Pagans’ in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000-c.1300, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

¹² This prohibition was widespread in Christian Europe and repeated regularly; cf., e.g., Can. 72 of the Synod of Meaux (Conc. Meldense) in 845 (Mansi XIV: 836ff.), where a number of earlier canons are also repeated

¹³ Cf. Stephen I: 9.

¹⁴ Decrees on similar offerings are to be found, e.g., in Canon 12 of the V. Synod of Rome (A.D. 1078); Mansi XX: 510; See: Závodszy, p. 66.

satisfaction.¹⁵

13 Killing an adulteress.

If someone kills a wife committing adultery with another man, he shall render account to God, and, if he wishes, may marry another¹⁶. But if any relatives of the woman charge that he has killed her unjustly, he shall be put to the ordeal, and their neighbors thoroughly questioned whether the wife was formerly despised and scorned by her husband, or if there previously had been any suspicion of her fornication, and this shall be decided according to what seems reasonable.

14 Absence from a confraternity¹⁷ without permission.

If anyone is absent from a confraternity without the permission of his priest and brethren, he shall redeem that hand with which he promised brotherhood with ten pensae.

15 Neglecting feasts as a result of business.

If someone neglects the church by visiting the markets on Sundays or major feasts, he shall lose his horse.

16 Neglecting Sundays.

If someone sets up a market on Sundays,¹⁸ the holy synod rules that what he has put up, he shall take down. If, however, anyone should refuse, he shall pay fifty-five pensae.

¹⁵ As early as the reign of Charlemagne the hunt on Sunday had been prohibited: see c. 1 of the Admon. gen. of A.D. 789 (MGH Cap., I: 61); the clergy's hunting was proscribed in c. 19 of the Capit. gen. de missis, A.D. 802 (ibid., p. 95)

¹⁶ As in other European countries, adultery was perceived as a crime committed by a woman against her husband, and, if she were revealed, she was at his mercy. The killing of an adulteress was, therefore, an act of private legal retribution and not murder; see, e.g., Edictum Rothari, cap. 212, , Leges Langobardorum MGH LL 4, p. 51; cf. The Lombard Laws, trans. Katherine Fischer Drew (Philadelphia: Penn. U. Press, 1973) p. 93

¹⁷ These confraternities—called calenda or kalenda, because they met on the first day of every month—were sodalities or religious associations organized to promote pious works. Similar associations existed in many countries of Europe; Bishop Atto of Vercelli in his Capitulary (Cap. 29, Mansi XIX: 250) refers to kalends that consisted only of clergy. In Hungary laymen were also included (cf. B. Majláth, “A ‘kalandos’ társulatok” [The ‘calends’ associations], Századok 19 [1885], 563–78); they survived into our own times as burial associations in some rural communities; see Ernő Tárkány Szücs, Magyar jogi népszokások, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1981, repr. 2003) pp. 189–190. See also below, canon 39.

¹⁸ According to tradition (Chronica de gestis Hungarorum &c. János M. Bak, László Veszprémy, eds. Budapest: CEU Press, 2018, p. 183), King Béla I moved the day of fairs from Sunday to Saturday (the Hungarian word for Sunday, vasárnap, from vásár= fair, nap = day) retains the memory of the older custom

17 The arrival of foreign clerks.¹⁹

If any foreign clerk comes into this country without a commendatory letter from his bishop, he shall be put to the ordeal or compurgation in order to disclose whether or not he was a monk, a murderer, or a member of some order.

18 The dependence of clerks.

If a clerk arrives in this country and adheres to a bishop or ispán, and his lord keeps him well, treating him in the manner to which he had agreed, then he may not leave his lord even if he should wish to leave, unless he shall first have denounced him in the king's court for an injustice done to him.

19 Desertion of a church.

If villagers abandon their own church and wander away, they shall be compelled by episcopal law and royal mandate to return whence they came.²⁰

20 A woman caught in adultery.

If someone catches his wife in adultery and this is affirmed in court, penance shall be imposed according to canon law, and then the husband shall receive her again after she has performed penance, if he wants to; otherwise they shall remain unmarried for as long as they both shall live.²¹

21 The procuration of abbots to their own bishops.

Abbots shall humbly remain subject to the procuration of their own bishops in whose territory they are, in accordance with the decrees of the Fathers.²² Bishops shall visit their monasteries not just once a year, but often, and they shall examine regularly the life and habits of the brothers. Lay brothers shall commend themselves together with their goods to the monastery which they choose and the same shall be done by nuns in female convents. Henceforth, however, no bishop ¹⁹ On "guest" clergy, see Stephen I: 24.

²⁰ The interpretation of this decree is very controversial; it was for a long time seen as proof of nomadic habits of the Hungarians well into the late eleventh century (seemingly supported by the remarks of Otto of Freising about their living in "tents"; Gesta Friderici I. xxxii, MGH SSrG [46], 50 (=C. C. Mierow, trans., The Deeds of Frederick Barbarossa [New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1935], p. 66). More recent studies tend to consider it as an indication of either semi-nomadic transhumance from winter dwellings to summer pasture, or rather of agricultural villages "moving" when their cultivated fields were exhausted. Cf. Gy. Györffy, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft der Ungarn um die Jahrtausendwende, (Wien-Köln-Graz: Böhlau, 1983), pp. 24-31

²¹ Závodszy (p. 70) points to a similar decree of the Synod of Ingelheim (A.D. 948), cap. X (MGH Const., I: 15). This canon appears to reflect a different spirit than can. 13 above, where the killing of the adulterous wife is apparently tolerated as "justifiable homicide," for which no secular punishment is imposed on the husband

²² Canon 4 of the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 455) charged bishops with the responsibility for founding communities of monks and entrusted the task of supervising them specifically to bishops. Gratian later incorporated this canon into his Decretum (C. 16, q. 1, c. 12 and C. 18, q. 2, c. 10)

or abbot shall dare institute a monk or a nun without a title to a specific place.²³

22 Heathen rites.

Anyone making a sacrifice next to wells or giving offerings to trees, fountains, and stones according to heathen rites shall atone for their offense with an ox.²⁴

23 The gift of personal property to a church.

If someone gives his land or goods to one particular church, he shall not for any reason withdraw them and give them to another.

24 Finding church goods.

Church goods, wherever they may be found, whether in other churches or with lay patrons,²⁵ shall return to the original church.

25 Neglecting the corpses of the faithful.

If someone does not observe Sunday and does not keep feasts, or does not fast on Ember Days and vigils, or does not bury his dead near the church,²⁶ he shall fast on bread and water for twelve days in the pillory. If a lord does not take to the church the body of his servi,²⁷ or a village reeve²⁸ that of a poor alien or a villager, he shall fast for the same length of time.

26 The working of Jews on feast days.

If a Jew is found at work on Sundays or the major feasts, he shall lose the tools with which he

²³ The title (titulus) binding an individual monk or nun to a specific community has the effect of guaranteeing them a living. In the Rule of St. Benedict (cap. 1) the gyrovagi who wandered from one monastery to another “ever roaming and never stable” were roundly condemned; see also Roul Naz, ed. Dictionnaire de droit canonique, 7 vols. (Paris: Letouzey & Ane, 1990) VI, 1278–1288, espec. 1288

²⁴ The need for passing a canon against persistent, though perhaps not organized, heathen practices nearly a century after the mass conversion of the Hungarians should be noted; similar prohibitions can be found in Charlemagne’s Capit. de part. Saxon., c. 21 (MGH Cap., I, 69)

²⁵ Dominus can be translated here as lay patron, thus indicating the existence of proprietary churches in Hungary to which the donations mentioned above in cap. 5 and 23 may also refer; see Elemér Mályusz, “Die Eigenkirche in Ungarn,” Studien zur Geschichte Osteuropas: (Festschrift für H. F. Schmidt) 3 (1966) 76–95.

²⁶ Burying the dead in the churchyard was an important symbolic act for the Christianization of the populace and also for encouraging the settled way of life (see n. 20, above) as the living tended to stay near to their dead; see e.g. Philippe Aries, The Hour of Our Death, trans. H. Weaver (New York: Knopf, 1981) pp. 40–2, 50–6, and 62–71.

²⁷ Servus can mean here slave, servant, and serf alike.

²⁸ Although villici are known to have existed in the Carolingian realm, the models for this chapter (e.g., Charlemagne’s capitulary of A.D. 789, c. 25, MGH Cap., I: 64 or Capit. de part Saxon, c. 18, ibid., p. 69) do not mention them as being in charge of supervising Sunday church attendance. About villici in Hungary we know from later times that they were frequently elected by the villagers but also represented the lord of the land. See also Stephen I: 9.

worked in order not to bring scandal to Christians.²⁹

27 The tithe of the abbot's freemen.

Abbots shall give the tithe of their freemen³⁰ to the bishops.

28 Witnesses at ordeals of hot iron and water.

Whenever an ordeal by water or hot iron is held, three suitable and duly sworn witnesses shall be there to testify to the innocence of the innocent, or on the contrary to the guilt of the guilty. The priest shall receive two pensae for ordeals by hot iron and one for that by water.³¹

29 The celebration of mass outside the church.

No priest shall dare to celebrate mass outside the church, unless he is compelled by the necessity of a journey. If he should be compelled by his ispán, he shall be suspended from his order, and he who forced him shall pay fifty-five pensae. On a journey of several days the divine office may be celebrated in a tent.³²

30 Tithes from freemen.

Bishops shall receive the tithes of freemen. But freemen shall be held by whichever bishop or count to whom they had at their pleasure adhered without, however, losing their freedom. Those persons, moreover, who were given freedom to serve the church for the salvation of the soul, shall ²⁹ The practice of confiscating the tools of anyone, Christian or not, who worked on Sundays dates from the time of St. Stephen; see Stephen I: 8.

³⁰ The exact social status of these "freemen", who dependent on an abbot (or bishop, or ispán; see below, c. 30), is a debated issue. György Györffy (Studia Historica Acad. Sc. Hung 186, pp. 104–116) regards the "freemen", some of whom may have been attached to lords, as a significant social stratum, adding up to something like a fifth of the population in the early Árpadian period. On the question of "freedom", see also I. Bolla and P. Horváth, "La rôle de la liberté hongroise médiévale," Acta Univ.Sc. Budapestiensi, Sect. iurid., 23 (1981), 9–25

³¹ Records of ordeals by hot iron at Várad (Nagyvárad/Oradea) are known. See:; Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, J. Karácsonyi, S. Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903); cf. I. Zajtay, "Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle", Revue d'histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562 and M. Lupesco Makó, "Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the 'Regestrum Varadiense'" Mediævalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. For the European-wide practice of recourse to the "judgment of God", see R. C. van Caenegem, "La preuve dans le droit du moyen âge", Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l'histoire comparative des institutions, 17 (1965), 691–753, trans. J. R. Sweeney and D. A. Flanary as "Methods of Proof in Western Medieval Law", Academiae Analecta, Academie voor Wetensch., Lett. en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. d. Lett., 45, No. 3 (1983), 85–127. This is, however, the first mention of ordeal by water, to which few medieval references are known in Hungary. This canon seems to imply that the ordeal was administered widely by any priest whatsoever; but only a short time later King Coloman restricted the ordeal to specific locations; see Colo. 22.

³² Several Carolingian capitularies (e.g., c. 14 of A.D. 769, MGH Cap., I: 46), and synodal decrees (e.g., Council of Mainz, A.D. 888, Mansi XXVIII: 67) contain similar injunctions. Great lords and rulers received special privileges to have services held by their chaplains outside a church, but this does not yet seem to have been the practice in eleventh-century Hungary; see, however, Syn. Strig. 33.

work for the priest alone.

31 Refraining from meat.

The Latins,³³ who do not wish to agree to the lawful Hungarian custom³⁴ – that is, those who continue to eat meat on Monday and Tuesday, after the Hungarians have renounced it – shall leave for wherever they like if they will not adopt our better custom. But they shall leave behind them the money they acquired here, unless they come to their senses and abstain from meat with us.

32 The rape of virgins or married women.

Anyone who rapes a virgin or a married woman going from village to village shall be punished as for homicide.

33 The tithe on cattle born in another diocese.

Bishops who receive tithes on cattle born in another diocese shall give a fourth part to the priests living in their own bishopric.

34 The atonement of whores and witches.

Whores and witches shall be judged according to what seems just to the bishop.

35 The kiss of an abbot or a monk given to the king or a bishop.

If the king or a bishop happens to come to an abbey, the abbot and the monks shall not come to kiss the king or the bishop in church, but they, standing in order, shall await for the kiss of the king or the bishop in the cloister. The abbot shall allow the king or the bishop to enter the cloister with as many people of whatever rank he may wish.

36 The greeting of the abbot or monk going to the king.

If it happens that an abbot or monk arrives at the king's court, he shall not greet the king in the church of God, but after leaving the church shall salute him in his residence or tent.

37 The observance of the vigils of the saints.

In this holy synod it was established by the venerable King Ladislav and approved and ordained

³³ Latini were French, Italian, and Walloon urban settlers, mainly craftsmen and traders, whose presence in early Hungarian cities, such as Székesfehérvár and Esztergom, is documented since the early eleventh century; see H. Ammann, "Die französische Südostwanderung im Rahmen der mittelalterlichen französischen Wanderungen," Südost-Forschungen, 14 (1955), 406–428; and György Székely, "Wallons et Italiens en Europe centrale aux XI^e–XVI^e siècles", AUSBp Sect. hist., 6 (1964), 3–71.

³⁴ According to Moravcsik (Byzantium and the Magyars, p. 117), the practice of an extended Lent "preserved an archaic Byzantine custom which the Magyars may have got to know before their final settlement." In Latin Christendom the beginning of Lent was changed to Shrove Tuesday in the sixth or seventh century; see Karl Holl, "Die Entstehung der vier Fastenzeiten in der Griechischen Kirche", in Gesammelte Abhandlungen zur Kirchengeschichte (Tübingen: Mohr, 1928; rept. Darmstadt: Wiss, Buchges., 1964), II, 155–203

by all, that the vigils of the holy King Stephen³⁵ and of Gerard the Martyr, which is fixed on the day of his agony,³⁶ shall be observed, together with three days at the feast of St. Martin.³⁷ This most Christian king does not wish to destroy but rather more strongly to confirm what his uncle, King Andrew together with all the bishops then extant swore and instituted,³⁸ namely that a three-day vigil be held at the feast of St. Peter.³⁹

38 Veneration of the feasts of the saints.

The following feasts shall be celebrated during the year:⁴⁰ Christmas, St. Stephen the Protomartyr, St. John the Evangelist, Holy Innocents, the Circumcision of the Lord, Epiphany with its eve, the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, four days at Easter, St. George the Martyr, SS. Philip and James with the eve, the Invention of the Holy Cross, the Ascension of the Lord, four days at Pentecost, St. John the Baptist, one day for SS. Peter and Paul, St. James the Apostle, St. Lawrence the Martyr, the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Stephen the king, St. Bartholomew the Apostle, the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Exaltation of the Holy Cross, St. Matthew the Apostle, St. Gerard the Bishop, St. Michael the Archangel, the Apostles Simon and Jude, All Saints, St. Emeric the duke,⁴¹ St. Martin the Bishop, St. Andrew the Apostle,

³⁵ King Stephen I was canonized in 1083; his feast is celebrated in Hungary on 20 August. His Lives are edited by E. Bartoniek, in Emericus [Imre] Szentpétery, Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum tempore ducum regumque stirpis Arpadianae gestarum, (Budapest: MTA, 1937–38, repr. Ibid.: Nap, 2001) II, 363–400; German translation with notes in T. von Bogyay, G. Silagi, J. Bak, Die heiligen Könige (Graz: Styria, 1976), pp. 25–72; New ed. with English translation is to be published in Gábor Klaniczay (ed.), Sanctitas Principum: Sancti Reges, Duces, Episcopi et Abbates Europae Centralis (Saec. XI–XIII) – The Sanctity of the Leaders: Holy Kings, Princes, Bishops, and Abbots from Central Europe (Eleventh to Thirteenth Centuries). Central European Medieval Texts 7 (Budapest: CEU Press, forthc.)

³⁶ Bishop Gellért/Gerard of Csanád was killed during the pagan uprising on 23 September 1046 and canonized in 1083; see his Vita, edited by E. Madzsar, in Szentpétery, Scriptores II, 461–505, German translation in Bogyay et al., Die heiligen Könige, pp. 73–120; with English translation in Klaniczay, Sanctitas, as above.

³⁷ 11 November

³⁸ This reference to a synod during the reign of King Andrew I (1046–1060) is the only authentic information about that meeting and its decrees. The text of a Decretum Andreae Regis I, published in the CJH (down to the CJH/MTvT) was compiled by Z. Mossóczy from Antonio Bonfini's Rerum Hungaricarum decades (1494). The first editors noted this fact but later editions dropped the note. The constitutiones of Andrew I published in the Patrologia Latina, 151: 1257–1258 follow the old CJH and are, therefore, similarly apocryphal

³⁹ 29 June (SS. Peter and Paul) is meant; Nándor Knauz, Kortan [Chronology] (Bp.: MTA, 1876), p. 237

⁴⁰ On the ecclesiastical calendar used in the Hungarian church, see Polikárp Radó, Libri liturgicimanuscripti bibliothecarum Hungariae (Budapest: Musaeum Nationalis Hungariae, 1947), I, 37–39, where the oldest surviving calendar from the Codex Pray (comp. c. 1192–1195) is reproduced

⁴¹ Duke Emeric (Imre), son of St. Stephen, died in 1031, and seems to have been venerated as a “virgin” by the late eleventh century. He was canonized together with his father and Bishop Gerard, in 1083; his feast was 5 November. His Vita, edited by Emma Bartoniek, is in Szentpétery, Scriptores II, 440–460. New ed. with English translation in Klaniczay, Sanctitas, as above n. 35.

St. Nicholas the Bishop, St. Thomas the Apostle, and each parish shall celebrate its own patron saint and the dedication of the church.

39 The abbots or monks sitting among the confraternity.⁴²

Abbots and monks shall not sit among the brethren of a confraternity, but the abbot shall receive the offerings of the brethren⁴³ in the cloister and minister to the brethren according to the rule.

40 Those who refuse the tithe.

The bishop shall receive the tithe in all things, but in this way: the bailiff of the bishop shall question the owner of the grain or beast about how much he has. And if he believes his response, he shall receive the amount which he has said; if he does not believe it, he shall make him swear and then receive it. He shall not accept the grain mixed, but separated. If after the oath an outsider says the owner of the grain committed perjury, the grain shall be counted before the bailiff of the bishop in company with the bailiff of the king and of the ispán. If the owner of the grain is found guilty, nine parts shall go to the bishop and the tenth part to him. If, however, the accuser is found to have lied, he shall pay for his mischief in the same way. If he has nothing with which to redeem himself, he alone shall be sold, not his children. The entire tithe shall be collected before Christmas. A son who lives in his father's house shall not pay separately, but whether son or bondman they both shall give the tithe together with the father. From sons or bondmen who have independent houses, the tithe is due from all they have. But if anyone is refractory, and having been questioned does not want the tithe to be judged by the bailiff of the bishop, then the bailiff shall say in front of suitable witnesses how much seems just to him. He shall receive as much flax and hemp as a fist can press to the ground with compressed fingers. If he should find ten buckets of threshed corn, he shall receive nothing; if twenty or more, he shall take the tenth part.

41 Litigants coming to the royal palace.

If someone, either a nobleman or an ispán, comes to the court at the royal palace on account of a lawsuit, and does not stand his ground with his adversary but despite having been called by the king's messenger, returns home without royal permission, he shall lose his suit, and if he took anything from his adversary he shall pay double.

42 Contempt for the king's or the judge's seal. If someone sends the king's seal to another⁴⁴ and fails to appear in court, he shall lose his suit and pay five pensae, and each time he repeats it he shall ⁴² On confraternities, see above, can. 14.

⁴³ Hincmar of Rheims (Capitula ad presbyteros parochiae suae, c. 15, Mansi XV:478) counselled his priests to stay with the confratres for only three glasses of wine, and then retire to their dwellings. Of course, for regular clergy the ruling was to be stricter pay five pensae again. If someone sends the seal of the judge and does not appear, he shall pay one hundred pence.⁴⁵

⁴⁴ In the early Middle Ages summons to court was given by sending the judge's seal to the accused. One such bull (billog) has actually survived; see Emil Jakubovich, "I. Endre törvénybeidéző ércbilloga" [The metal summoning bull of Andrew I], Turul, 47 (1933), 68–78. On the possible Slavic models for this procedure, see Milán Sufflay, "Az idéző pecsét a szláv források világánál" [The summoning seal in the light of Slavic sources], Száz., 40 (1906), 293–312. See also W. Ewald, Siegelkunde, 2nd ed. (München: Oldenbourg, 1972), pp. 29–30. See also Ladislav III: 3, 25–26.

⁴⁵ Nummus in late antiquity meant a lesser bronze coin, but here is used as a synonym for penny (denarius). In the probable model for this canon (Lex Alemannorum Karolina, c. 28; cf. Závodszky, p. 81), the ratio of the two fines is 2:1; hence we may assume that 5 pensae were also the double of 100 nummi. This would suggest a 40 nummi = 1 pensa = 40 denari equation, see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325], (Budapest: MTA, 1916. [repr. 1991]), p. 224, n. 1.

THE LAWS OF KING LADISLAS I OF HUNGARY (1077– 1095)
[BOOK TWO]
(Lad 2)

St. Ladislas I (1077–1095) was the second king of Hungary to leave a collection of statutes to posterity. During the four decades preceding his reign, the social and ecclesiastical order established by St. Stephen suffered much in the course of foreign intervention, civil war, and pagan uprisings. The new laws introduced harsh measures for the restoration of property and public order. Traditionally three “books” of laws have been ascribed to King Ladislas, and all earlier editions and commentaries cite this legislation in tripartite form (see MTvT/CJH, 1–cf. Concordance below). “Book I” of the old collections, however, is in fact mainly ecclesiastical legislation consisting of the canons of the Synod of Szabolcs of 1092. As only “Book II” and “Book III” are entitled to be regarded as royal decreta, “Book I” is now published as “Synod of Szabolcs”[Syn. Szab.] . The traditional designation and sequence of the secular laws of King Ladislas (Books II and III) has been retained to facilitate access to older editions and references.

Since these laws have survived only in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century transcriptions rather than in medieval manuscripts, there is considerable controversy about their dating. Mónika Jánosi (1945-95) suggested that one should speak about the redaction rather than the dating of these legislative documents, as the latter cannot be ascertained. The Synod of Szabolcs may contain all ecclesiastical (and some secular) legislation passed on several occasions during Ladislas’s time. Books II and III have to be judged similarly as collections of decrees of different times. Jánosi accepted Büdiner’s suggestion (even if that was challenged by Györffy, p. 13) for dating Book III to the reign of Géza I (1074-77)—in part perhaps to Salomon’s (1073-74)—and explained the ascription of all these laws to Ladislas because of the saintly king’s high reputation. A final redaction of all these texts may have taken place as late as King Béla III’s reign (1173-96).

The opening sentences of both collections state that they were decrees of a group, probably of the king and his council, but in the formulation of subsequent articles abrupt grammatical changes in the subject pronouns from singular to plural, and from first person to third, also suggest that these texts originated at different occasions and were compiled into one body only later, when their origin and the different bodies that had passed the laws were no longer known.

MSS: Codex Thuróoczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 88v–94r.

Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 20v--26r.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest:

Franklin, 1896) 1, 66-89 [=MTvT/CJH]; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman], pp.166-71 (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904.

LIT: M. Büdinger, Ein Buch ungarischer Geschichte 1058–1100 (Leipzig: Teubner, 1866); Henrik Marczali, Magyarország története az Árpádok korában 1038–1301 [History of Hungary in the Age of the Árpáds 1038–1301] (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1896=A magyar nemzet története [History of the Hungarian Nation], ed. Sándor Szilágyi, II); Pál. Angyal, “I. Endre és Szt. László büntetőtörvénykönyve” [The Criminal Laws of Andrew I and St. Ladislav], Magyar Jogászegyleti Értekezések (1941), pp. 71–85; György Györffy, “Szent László”, in László király emlékezete [Memory of King Ladislav] (Budapest: Magyar Helikon, 1977), pp. 13–15; Mónika Jánosi, Törvényalkotás Magyarországon a korai Árpád-korban [Making of Law in the Early Árpadian Age] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 1996). pp. 104-28; Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006).

LIBER SECUNDUS

Sequitur recapitulatio secundi libri:

- I. De furto proximi quorumlibet principum.
- II. De furto servi.
- III. De ligatione furis.
- IV. De purgatione furti, si quem furem tota villa proclamaverit.
- V. De inquisitione furtive rei.
- VI. De iudicis iudicio erga servum vel liberum.
- VII. De negotiatoribus sive mercatoribus.
- VIII.
- IX. De quolibet eiusdem prosapie faciente furtum.
- X. De cuiusvis servo in furto deprehenso.
- XI. De nobile vel milite invadente alterius domum.
- XII. De libero vel servo in furto capto.
- XIII. De furto clericorum.
- XIV. De libero in furto reperto.
- XV. Ut nulli negotiatori liceat emere vel vendere equos aut boves, nisi quantum ei necesse fuerit.
- XVI. De venditione equorum vel bovum sine licentia regis.
- XVII. De privatione honoris comitum, si permittunt emere vel vendere.
- XVIII. De negotiatione cuiusvis hospitis.

Temporibus piissimi regis Ladislai omnes nos regni Pannonico optimates in Monte Sancto conventum fecimus et quesivimus, qualiter malorum hominum impedirentur studia et gentis nostre expedirentur negotia.

- I. De furto proximi quorumlibet principum.

Primo omnium iureiurando constituimus, ut qualiscumque proximus principum reperiretur in furti culpa ultra pretium gallinarum, nullatenus possit abscondi vel defendi a quolibet eorum. Placuit quoque ut ipse fur, nisi ceciderit in ecclesiam, suspendatur et omnis facultas eius depereat. Et si [per] imprudentia[m] eius, qui ceperat eum, evaserit in ecclesiam, vel in curiam regis, vel ad pedes episcoporum, careat, qui non cavit, vendicatione furti. Si autem de manu fideiussoris evaserit, de patibulo quidem liberetur, verumtamen cum eodem fideiussore in aliam regionem venundetur et bona ipsius regali fisco vindicentur.

- II. De furto servi.

Si servus fur inventus fuerit, non possit pretio commutari nasus eius, nisi ceciderit in ecclesiam vel in curiam regis vel ad pedes episcopi; et si ceciderit, careat custos eius vindicatione furti. Si vero secundo captus fuerit, suspendatur.

‘

III. De ligatione furis.

Si quis autem furem ligaverit, habeat potestatem ligandi eum et ducendi ad iudicem, sive iuste, sive iniuste ligaverit. Si autem eum ligare quis prohibuerit, persolvat L quinque pensas et eandem moxam reddat in ligamine.

IV. De purgatione furti, si quem furem tota villa proclamaverit.

Si quem deinceps tota villa furem esse proclamaverit, probetur iudicio. Unde si mundus apparuerit, villa persolvat solummodo unam pensam presbitero. Si autem reus iudicetur, omnis substantia eius vendicatur regi, unde detur IIII pars villanis. Si vero aliquem personaliter furem esse proclamaverit, accipiant unam pensam. Si autem una pars accusaverit furem, alia vero defenderit, non recipiatur eorum defensio, et probato fure iudicio, si culpabilis inventus fuerit, non habeant partem in quarta vendicationis.

V. De inquisitione furtive rei.

Si quis vestigia sequitur furtive rei, nuntium premittat in villam, in quam dirigantur vestigia, ne excutiendo bestias suas perturbent villam sequenda vestigia. Quod si contumaciter fecerint, perditas res persolvant. Si autem, priusquam nuntius venerit, villani excusserint bestias suas, tunc investigatores perscrutentur singulas domos, ut ipsis placuerit. Si cui perierit res, eat cum testibus ydoneis investigare rem, ubi putaverit esse, et si prohibitus fuerit, prohibitores probentur iudicio et si culpabiles effecti fuerint, pereant ut fures; si vero mundati, propter prohibitionem LV pensas solvant. Si instinctu comitis sin militis investigatorem impederint, pro ipsis LV pensas comes persolvat et post hec probetur iudicio.

VI. De iudicis iudicio erga servum vel liberum.

Si iudex nasum servi non inciderit vel liberum non suspenderit, pereant omnia sua preter filios filiasve et ipse iudex venundetur. Si vero suspenderit iustum, centum X pensas et omnia bona sua suspenso restituat. Et si se duobus ydoneis liberaverit, ab eo, qui duxerat cum in concilium, tollat LV pensas. Et si advenerit iudicium et iustus iudex apparuerit, introductor eadem pena pereat, qua iudex periturus erat. Et si maioris facultatis fuerit, quam iudex, amittat etiam libertatem.

VII. De negotiatoribus sive mercatoribus.

Nemo emat vel vendat preter mercatum; si qui vero contra hoc emerint de furtiva re, pereant omnes, et emptor et venditor et testes. Si vero propriam rem contraxerint, perdant rem et pretium et testes tantundem. Si vero in mercato tractus sit, contractus fiat coram iudice et theloneario et testibus, et si res empta esse furtiva apparuerit, emptor quidem testimonio iudicis et thelonearii evadat, testes autem reddant venditorem.

VIII. De iugulato homine.

Si quis extracto gladio iugulaverit hominem, regali iudicio tradatur in carcerem, et omnia sua dividantur in tria, scilicet vinee, terre, lixe, servi, unde due partes dentur cognatis iugulati, tertia vero filiis et uxori iugulatoris. Si vero minoris facultatis sit, quam centum X pensarum, amittat etiam libertatem.

IX. De quolibet eiusdem prosapie faciente furtum.

Si quis eodem decreto et divina propitiante gratia prolem vel cognatum sive quemlibet propinquum in furti conditione preoccupaverit, suspensionem vel carnis perditionem non subeat, sed ut exul venundetur, si vulgaris fuit. Si vero nobilis eadem culpa captus a parentibus fuerit, non venundetur, sed ergastuli custodie commendetur.

X. De cuiusvis servo in furto deprehenso.

Si quis ergo servum suum vel in propriorum sive aliorum in furto culpabilem invenerit, prefato testante eloquio, iudicibus ne parcat ad incidendum largiri nasum.

XI. De nobile vel milite invadente alterius domum.

Si quis nobilium vel militum alterius nobilis domum invaserit et ibi pugnam fecerit, et uxorem illius flagellaverit, si tantam substantiam habuerit, due partes eiusdem substantie pro reatu commissio dentur, tertia vero uxori filiisque suis remaneat. Si autem substantia defuerit, raso capite ligatus et flagellatus circa forum ducatur, et sic vendatur; alii vero, qui cum illo erant, liberi reatum suum LV bizanciis redimant, servi vero eadem pena dampnentur, ut dominus eorum. Servi vero alieni, qui ad hanc pugnam insciis dominis convenerint, venundentur et dimidium pretium pro reatu detur, dimidium vero ad dominos illorum redeat.

XII. De libero vel servo in furto capto.

Si quis liber vel servus in furto captus fuerit, suspendatur. Si vero pro evadendo patibulo ad ecclesiam confugerit, eductus ab ecclesia obcecetur. Servus in furto captus, si ad ecclesiam non fugerit, sicut liber suspendatur. Domino servi illius detrimentum sit in servo suspenso, domino vero rerum perditarum detrimentum sit in rebus perditis. Liber in furto captus, si ad ecclesiam confugerit, et inde eductus obcecatus fuerit, filii sui et filie sue, si X annorum aut minoris etatis fuerint, in libertate permaneant, si vero maioris etatis quam decem annorum fuerint, in servitum redigantur et omnis substantia eorum auferatur. Servus autem vel liber, si anserem aut gallinam furatus fuerit, monocus efficiatur, et quod furatus est, reddat.

XIII. De furto clericorum.

Ordo clericalis, si anserem vel gallinam, poma vel his similia furatus fuerit, scopis tantum a magistro corrigatur, sed quod furatus est, restituat; maius his si furatus fuerit, ab episcopo suo degradetur et iudicio vulgari dampnetur.

XIV. De libero in furto reperto.

Si quis liber decem denariorum pretium furatus fuerit, suspendatur; minus decem denariis si furatus fuerit, furtum duodecies reddat et bovem unum persolvat. Servus autem tale furtum si fecerit, reddat duplum et nasum amittat. Servus profugus si alicubi in furto deprehensus fuerit, obcecetur. Et ideo ne suspendatur, nec lingua abscindatur, decrevimus, et si postea dominus suus eum invenerit, requirat per eum si aliquid perdidit.

XV. Ut nulli negotiatori liceat emere vel vendere equos aut boves, nisi quantum ei necesse fuerit.

Nullus mercator in aliquo huius terre confinio equum aut bovem vendere vel emere presumat, sed equum solummodo sibimet ad expeditionem necessarium, aut boves ad arandum aptos, si voluerit, emat.

XVI. De venditione equorum vel bovum sine licentia regis.

Si quis equum ad vendendum sine licentia regis in confinium duxerit, equus per comitem confinii ab eisdem auferatur, vel equi dominus in carcerem mittatur, donec testimonio comitis sui comprobetur; et si reus extiterit, sicut fur pereat, sin autem liber et hospes, evadat et equum quem adduxit amittat.

XVII. De privatione honoris comitum, si permittunt emere vel vendere.

Comites confinium, si equos vel boves ultra fines huius patrie sine licentia regis vendi permiserint, comitatus honore priventur. Custodes vero confinium, qui vulgo ewrii vocantur, si absque scientia comitum tale quid commiserint, libertatem amittant, si pauperes fuerint. Illis vero custodibus, qui presunt, in culpa eadem rei inventi fuerint, cum omnibus que habuerint pereant, soli filii et filie in libertate permaneant.

XVIII. De negotiatione cuiusvis hospitis.

Hospites ex aliis regionibus in confinium pro equo emendo vel aliis rebus negotiandis si venerint, cum nuntio eiusdem confinii comitis ad regem eat, et per licentiam regis quicquid et quantum ei concessum fuerit, coram pristaldo regis emat.

Explicit liber secundus.

THE LAWS OF ST. LADISLAS (107-95)

BOOK II

The chapters of the second book follow:

- 1 Theft by anyone related to a nobleman.
 - 2 Theft by a servus.
 - 3 Tying up a thief.
 - 4 Purgation of theft when someone is accused of being a thief by a whole village.
 - 5 The search for stolen property.
 - 6 The judgment of a judge against a servus or a freeman. 7
- Traders or merchants.
- 8 On the killer.
 - 9 Anyone committing theft within his own kindred.
 - 10 Anyone's bondman caught in theft.
 - 11 The invasion by a warrior of the house of another.
 - 12 A freeman or servus caught in theft.
 - 13 Theft by clerks.
 - 14 A freeman discovered in theft.
 - 15 No merchant shall buy or sell horses or oxen unless they are necessary to him.
 - 16 Deprivation of the comital office for allowing buying and selling.
 - 17 All trade with foreigners.

At the time of the most pious King Ladislav, we, the magnates of the kingdom, held an assembly on the Holy Pannonian Mountain¹ and sought to determine how to prevent the deeds of evil men and how to promote the affairs of our people.

- 1 Theft by anyone related to a nobleman.²

In the first place we have all established by oath that if any relative of a nobleman is discovered in a theft beyond the value of a hen, no one of them may conceal or defend him. It was also ordered that a thief, unless he retreats into a church,³ shall be hanged and all his property completely destroyed. And if through the carelessness of the man who caught him, he should flee to a church, or to the king's court, or to the feet of a bishop, it should cost him who did not take good care, the price of the theft.⁴ If he should flee from the hands of a guarantor,⁵ he shall escape the gallows, but nevertheless he shall be sold in another land together with the guarantor and his goods shall be appropriated by the royal treasury.

¹ The Benedictine Abbey of St. Martin, now called Pannonhalma, founded around 1000 and regarded as the premier monastic community of the realm.

² Princeps in the eleventh-twelfth century meant a magnate; a "great man of the realm."

2 Theft by a servus.⁶

If a servus is caught in theft it is not possible to commute the price of his nose, unless he retreats to a church or the royal court or to the feet of the bishop; and if he does retreat, it should cost his keeper the price of the theft.⁷ And if he is caught the second time, he shall be hanged.

3 Tying up a thief.

Whoever ties up a thief, shall have the right to tie him and lead him to a judge,⁸ whether he has bound him justly or unjustly. If anyone, however, should prohibit the binding, he shall pay fifty-five *pensae*⁹ and render account for his offense by being bound himself.

4 Purgation of theft by someone accused of being a thief by a whole village.¹⁰

If the residents of an entire village one after another should accuse some- one of being a thief, he

³ Cf. Stephen II: 18. See: György Bónis “Első törvényeink sorsa és az egyházi menedékjog” [The fate of our first laws and ecclesiastical asylum]. Regnum, 3 (1938–39), 75–97.

⁴ Venditio means “sale”, or “sale-price”; traditionally translators and commentators have implied that in this law venditio refers to the portion of confiscated goods that are due to the captor of a criminal.

⁵ Fidejussor, i.e. “surety”. On his duties, see Gy. Bónis, “Les sûretés personnelles en Hongrie du XII^e au XVII^e siècle” Receuil de la Société Jean Bodin pour l’histoire comparative des institutions, 29 (1971), 725–765, espec. 727ff..

⁶ The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). In the printed version of DRMH, the editors decided to avoid coming down on either side and translated servus and ancilla &c. as “bondman” or “bondwoman” intending to escape the decision, but that was awkward. Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the “easy way out” by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader.

⁷ See above, n. 4.

⁸ That is, to a royal judge. Nothing is known about these judges mentioned in the early laws. (In those of St. Stephen, they appear in chapters borrowed from Bavarian law.) For the procedure, see Ladislás III: 9.

⁹ The pensa auri was equivalent to the contemporary Byzantine gold solidus (Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325], Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1916. [repr. 1991], pp. 158–168)

¹⁰ This section shows the application of public accusatory proceedings in the prosecution of criminals shall be tried by ordeal.¹¹ If he appears clean,¹² the village shall pay one pensa to the priest. But if he is found guilty, all his property shall be confiscated by the king, of which a fourth part shall be given to the villagers. If certain persons should individually accuse someone of being a thief, they shall receive one pensa. If, however, one group [of villagers] accuses the thief and another defends him, their defense shall not be accepted, and after the thief has been tried by ordeal they shall have no share in the fourth part of the confiscation if he should be found guilty.

5 The search for stolen property.

If someone is pursuing the traces of a stolen object, he shall send a messenger to the village where the clues have led him, lest the villagers disturb the traces by turning out their beasts. But if they defiantly do so, they shall pay for the lost objects. If, however, the villagers have turned out their beasts before the arrival of the messenger, the investigators shall search each house as they please. If he, whose property was lost, goes with suitable witnesses to look for the object at the place where he suspects it to be and is impeded, those who obstructed him shall be tried by ordeal. If found guilty, they shall perish like thieves; but if found innocent, they shall pay fifty-five pensae and afterwards be tried by ordeal.¹³

6 The judgment of a judge against a servus or a freeman.

If a judge does not cut the nose of a servus or does not hang a freeman, he shall lose all he has, except his sons or daughters, and the judge himself shall be sold. If he hangs an innocent man, however, he shall pay one hundred ten pensae and restore all the hanged man's goods. If he acquits himself with two suitable witnesses, he shall take fifty-five pensae from the man who had him brought to court. If an ordeal is held and the judge is found innocent, his accuser shall suffer the same punishment which the judge would have suffered. And if he has greater means than the judge, he shall lose his freedom as well.

7 Traders or merchants.

No one shall buy or sell except in the market. If, in violation of this anyone buys stolen property, everyone shall perish: the buyer, the seller, and the witnesses. If, however, they agreed to sell something of their own, they shall lose that thing and its price, and the witnesses shall lose as much too. But if the deal was made in the market, and agreement shall be concluded in front of a judge, a toll-gatherer, and witnesses, and if the purchased goods later appear to be stolen, the buyer shall escape penalty on the testimony of the judge and the toll-gatherer; the witnesses, however, shall produce the seller.

¹¹ Judicium here meant in fact an ordeal. In Hungary, records of ordeals are known only from the thirteenth century. See: Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, J. Karácsonyi, S. Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903); cf. I. Zajtay, "Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle", Revue d'histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562 and M. Lupesco Makó, "Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the 'Regestrum Varadiense'" Mediævalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. For the European-wide practice of recourse to the "judgment of God", see R. C. van Caenegem, "La preuve dans le droit du moyen âge", Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l'histoire comparative des institutions, 17 (1965), 691–753, trans. J. R. Sweeney and D. A. Flanary as "Methods of Proof in Western Medieval Law", Academiae Analecta, Academie voor Wetensch., Lett. en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. d. Lett., 45, No. 3 (1983), 85–127. – This kind of collective denunciation was abolished in the Golden Bull of Andrew II, see 1222:6.

¹² That is, innocent.

¹³ The practice described in this chapter is analogous to the Germanic Spurfolge, for which see Reallexikon der Germanischen Altertumskunde, ed. J. Hoops (Strasbourg: Trübner, 1911–1919), IV, 209f. with literature.

8 On the killer.

If someone kills a man with a drawn sword, he shall be sent to prison by royal judgment and all his property, namely vineyards, farmlands, servants, and slaves, shall be divided into three parts, whence two parts shall be given to the kinsman of the victim, the third part to the sons and wife of the killer. But if he has property worth less than one hundred ten pensae, he shall lose his freedom as well.¹⁴

9 Anyone committing theft within his own kindred.

If anyone respecting these laws and guided by divine grace catches an offspring, cousin, or any near relative in the commission of a theft, this person shall neither be hanged nor suffer mutilation, but, if a commoner, shall be sold abroad. If a noble be taken in the same crime by his kindred, he shall not be sold, but handed over for forced labor.

10 Anyone's servus caught in theft.

If anyone discovers his servus in the crime of theft of his own or another's property, in accordance with the preceding declaration, judges shall not forbear from imposing the cutting off of the nose.¹⁵

11 The invasion by a warrior¹⁶ of the house of another.

If a noble or warrior invades the house of another noble and causes a fight there and beats the other man's wife, two-thirds of his property, if he has enough, shall be given for the commission of the crime, one-third shall remain for his wife and sons. If, however, he lacks property, he shall be led with his head shaven around the market-place bound and whipped, and sold in this state. Others who were with him, if freemen, shall redeem their crime with fifty-five bezants;¹⁷ if bondmen, shall be punished by the same penalty as their master. Foreign slaves who instigated a fight without the knowledge of their masters shall be sold and half their price shall be given for the crime, the other half shall revert to their masters.

12 A freeman or bondman caught in theft.

If someone, freeman or servus, should be caught in theft, he shall be hanged. But if he flees to the church to evade the gallows, he shall be led out of the church and blinded.¹⁸ A srevus caught in theft, if he does not flee to the church, shall be hanged; the owner of the stolen goods

¹⁴ This chapter moderates the severity of the "law of the drawn sword", found in Stephen I:16 and 35.

¹⁵ See above, ch. 6.

¹⁶ Miles ("warrior") was a lesser knight.

¹⁷ Bizancii were equal to gold pensae; see Hóman, Pénytörtörténet p. 164, where assumptions of possible later interpolation of this passage, exactly because of this word, are refuted (n. 3).

¹⁸ It is not quite clear how this measure should tally with the rule included in chapter 2 above. In the case of servi, moreover, the effect of this law is more severe than that of Stephen II:6, where the death penalty was imposed only for the third offense.

shall take a loss in the lost goods. The sons and daughters of a freeman caught in theft who fled to the church, was led out and blinded, if they are ten years old or less, shall retain their freedom; but if they are older than ten years they shall be reduced to servitude and lose all their property. A servus or freeman who steals a goose or a hen shall lose one eye and shall restore what he has stolen.

13 Theft by clerks.

Anyone in the clerical order, who has stolen a goose or a hen, fruit or some- thing similar, shall be corrected by his master with switches, and shall restore what he has stolen; if he has stolen anything larger he shall be degraded by his bishop and be sentenced in accordance with ordinary legal procedure.¹⁹

14 A freeman discovered in theft.

If a freeman has stolen anything worth ten pennies,²⁰ he shall be hanged; if he has stolen anything worth less than ten pennies he shall repay twelve times the value of the theft and pay an ox. A servus who commits such a theft shall pay double and lose his nose. A fugitive servus who is caught in theft somewhere, shall be blinded. And we have decreed that neither shall he be hanged, nor his tongue cut out; if his master shall find him, he shall demand from him what was lost.

15 No merchant shall buy or sell horses or oxen unless they are necessary to him.

No merchant anywhere along the frontiers²¹ of this land shall presume to sell or buy a horse or an ox. But he may buy a horse necessary to him exclusively for transport or oxen suitable for plowing, if he wishes.

16 The sale of horses and oxen without permission.

If someone without the king's license brings a horse to the frontier in order to sell it, the horse shall be taken away from him by the ispán of the frontier²² and the owner of the horse shall be put in prison until he is verified by the testimony of his ispán; if he is guilty he shall die as a thief; if, however, he escapes [the ordeal] free and safe he shall lose the horse which he brought.

17 Deprivation of the office of ispán for allowing buying and selling.

Ispáns of the frontier shall be deprived of their office of ispán if they allow horses and oxen to be sold beyond the frontiers of this country without the king's license. The guardians of the border, ¹⁹ Presumably after having been defrocked these clerks were handed over to the secular court. The text, however, is susceptible to other interpretations.

²⁰ "Heavy" pennies (denarii) were first minted in c. 0.781 gr weight in the later years of King Ladislas; see (Hóman Pénztörténet p. 231f.). The measures are quite harsh considering that the value of 10d might have been equal to one of the smaller household animals (a sheep or pig) since a young ox was worth 40d=1 pensa.

²¹ Early medieval Hungary was surrounded by a wide area of "borderland" (indagines regni) in which natural and artificial obstacles hindered the passage save at gates (portae) ; see Hansgerd Göckenjan, Hilfsvölker und Grenzwächter im mittelalterlichen Ungarn (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1972) pp. 5-11.

²² The ispán (comes) of a border county or border region enjoyed greater authority than his colleagues inland; for example, the ispán of Co. Pozsony, commander of the important western gates, is usually listed among the high officers of the realm.

commonly called őr,²³ shall lose their freedom if they are poor and committed the crime without the knowledge of the ispáns. The officers among these guardians found in the same crime, shall perish together with all they possess, only their sons and daughters shall remain free.

18 All trade with foreigners.²⁴

Aliens who come to the frontier from other regions to buy a horse or to trade in other things shall go to the king with a messenger from the ispán of the frontier and may, with the king's licence, buy and sell in the presence of the king's bailiff²⁵ whatever and however much they have been allowed.

Here ends the second book.

²³ Őr, Hungarian for "guard"; here: frontier guard; on these, see Göckenjan, Hilfsvölker, pp. 12–22

²⁴ Hospes, literally: "guest"; was the terms used for immigrant settlers. As the context here refers to temporary visitors in contrast to settlers, we prefer the translation of "foreigner."

²⁵ The bailiff (in the early laws called pristaldus, probably from a Slavic loan-word, pristav*; later homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge): the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. In early laws, the bishop's man collecting the tithe is also called pristaldus.

THE LAWS OF KING LADISLAS I OF HUNGARY

(1077–1095)

[BOOK THREE]

(Lad 3)

St. Ladislas I (1077–1095) was the second king of Hungary to leave a collection of statutes to posterity. During the four decades preceding his reign, the social and ecclesiastical order established by St. Stephen suffered much in the course of foreign intervention, civil war, and pagan uprisings. The new laws introduced harsh measures for the restoration of property and public order.

Traditionally three “books” of laws have been ascribed to King Ladislas, and all earlier editions and commentaries cite this legislation in tripartite form. “Book I” of the old collections, however, is in fact mainly ecclesiastical legislation consisting of the canons of the Synod of Szabolcs of 1092. As only “Book II” and “Book III” are entitled to be regarded as royal decreta, “Book I” is now published as “Canons of the Synod of Szabolcs”[Syn. Szab.] . The traditional designation and sequence of the secular laws of King Ladislas (Books II and III) has been retained to facilitate access to older editions and references.

Since these laws have survived only in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century transcriptions rather than in medieval manuscripts, there is considerable controversy about their dating. Mónika Jánosi (1945-95) suggested that one should speak about the redaction rather than the dating of these legislative documents, as the latter cannot be ascertained. The Synod of Szabolcs may contain all ecclesiastical (and some secular) legislation passed on several occasions during Ladislas’s time. Books II and III have to be judged similarly as collections of decrees of different times. Jánosi accepted Büdiner’s suggestion (even if that was challenged by Györffy, p. 13) for dating Book III to the reign of Géza I (1074-77)—in part perhaps to Salomon’s (1073-74)—and explained the ascription of all these laws to Ladislas because of the saintly king’s high reputation. A final redaction of all these texts may have taken place as late as King Béla III’s reign (1173-96).

The opening sentences of both collections state that they were decrees of a group, probably of the king and his council, but in the formulation of subsequent articles abrupt grammatical changes in the subject pronouns from singular to plural, and from first person to third, also suggest that these texts originated at different occasions and were compiled into one body only later, when their origin and the different bodies that had passed the laws were no longer known.

MSS: Codex Thuróczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 90v–94r.

Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 22r--26r.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1, 75-89 [=MTvT/CJH]; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman], pp. 172-80 (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904)

LIT: M. Büdinger, Ein Buch ungarischer Geschichte 1058–1100 (Leipzig: Teubner, 1866); Henrik Marczali, Magyarország története az Árpádok korában 1038–1301 [History of Hungary in the Age of the Arpads 1038–1301] (Bp.: Athenaeum, 1896=A magyar nemzet története [History of the Hungarian Nation], ed. Sándor Szilágyi, II); Pál Angyal, “I. Endre és Szt. László büntetőtörvénykönyve” [The Criminal Laws of Andrew I and St. Ladislav], Magyar Jogászegyleti Értekezések (1941), pp. 71–85; György Györffy, “Szent László”, in László király emlékezete [Memory of King Ladislav] (Bp.: Magyar Helikon, 1977), pp. 13–15; Mónika Jánosi, Törvényalkotás Magyarországon a korai Árpád-korban [Making of Law in the Early Árpadian Age] (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 1996). pp. 104-28. Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006).

DECRETA S. LADISLAI REGIS

[LIBER TERTIUS]

Incipit liber tertius. Capitulationes eiusdem:

- I. De centurionibus et decurionibus.
- II. De his, qui aliorum servientes detinent.
- III. De palatino comite.
- IV. De quolibet fure ad ecclesiam fugiente.
- V. De servo vel libero in eadem culpa ad ecclesiam fugiente.
- VI. De muliere in furto inventa.
- VII. De puella furtum faciente.
- VIII. De furibus decem vel sex denariorum valentium.
- IX. De his, qui capiunt furem.
- X. De his, qui in expeditione furantur.
- XI. De negotiatoribus euntibus de civitate in civitatem.
- XII. De fure in curia nobilium capto.
- XIII. De collectoribus fugitivarum rerum.
- XIV. De his, qui equos a cursoribus dimissos retinent.
- XV. De his, qui decretum regis spernunt.
- XVI. De iudicibus.
- XVII. De furibus ad ecclesiam fugientibus et se innocentes proclamantibus.
- XVIII. Ut nullus cum fure convenire audeat.
- XIX. Nemo ducat furem ad alium iudicem.
- XX. De usucapionibus.
- XXI. De his, qui recipiunt servum vel lixas alterius.
- XXII. De iudice eiecto et constituto.
- XXIII. De falsis iudicibus.
- XXIV. De iudice litigium differente.
- XXV. De iudicibus sigillum mittentibus.
- XXVI. De spernentibus sigillum iudicum.
- XXVII. De his, qui domi fecerint pugnam.

XXVIII. De cursoribus, qui ultra tertiam villam equos duxerint.

XXIX. De querentibus perditarum rerum.

I De centurionibus et decurionibus.

Hoc decreverunt, hanc legem constituerunt: ut nuntius regis per omnes civitates dirigatur, qui congreget centuriones et decuriones eorum, qui vulgo ewrii vocantur, cum omnibus sibi commissis, et precipiat eis, ut si quem furti culpabilem sciunt, ostendant; et qui pro culpabilibus ostensi fuerint, si quod non sint culpabiles, iudicium portare voluerint, iudicium detur illis. Quosque nominant ewrii, illi patiantur sub decenario numero, quorum unus pro X portet iudicium; si fuerit salvus, reliqui IX salvi fiant, sin autem IX portent iudicium, unusquisque pro se. Ille autem, qui pro IX iudicium portaverit, ipse etiam pro se portet, sed eque iudicium.

Post hec inquiratur a cunctis optimatibus et populo, si quam villam sciant furto diffamatam; et si quam dixerint, dicat nuntius regis villanis, ut quos fures, sciant in illa, illos reddant. Quos autem rediderint, si iudicio se velle defendere dixerint, ne prohibentur. Sed qui fures antea auditi fuerant, illis nequaquam detur iudicium.

Preterea eiusdem ville villani per decem et decem dividantur, et decimus pro IX portet iudicium. Si fuerit ipse mundus, reliqui IX mundi sint; si culpabiles sint, sicut supra diximus, unusquisque pro se portet, decimus autem, qui pro IX portaverat, ipsemet eque iudicio probetur.

Deinde nuntius regis de villa in villam vadat, sciscitando a villanis, ut ubi furem sciunt, monstrent. Notum etiam faciat, totius Hungarie principes sacramentum fecisse, quod neque furi parcant, neque celant eum, ipsi quoque similiter faciant. Et si rustici dixerint, iusiurandum se velle observare, tunc ostendant fures, ubi sciunt. Sed si postea aliquis fures celasse eos accusaverit, et ita periuri inventi fuerint, pro commutatione lingue decem pensas solvant et canonice penitent.

II De his, qui aliorum servientes detinent.

Precipimus etiam, ut idem regis nuntius palam faciat omnibus, tam nobilibus, quam ignobilibus, imprimis episcopis, abbatibus, comitibus, postea vero minoribus, quod a tempore regis Andree et ducis Bele et a descriptione iudicis Sarkas nomine apud quemcumque aliqui civium vel illorum, qui dicuntur ewnek vel servi detinentur, in assumptione sancte Marie omnes regi presententur. Quod si quis rennuerit, dupliciter reddat; vel si quis defendere voluerit, in predicta festivitate veniat ad curiam et defendat.

Veniant et illi omnes, qui dicuntur wzbeg ad curiam in eadem festivitate et secundum quod regale iudicium ordinaverit, postmodum ratum permaneat. Et si quis ultra predictum terminum aliquem illorum, quos tunc reddi precipimus, detinuerit, dupliciter reddat et LV pensas propter transgressionem solvat. Et si qua suspicio de illo, qui alterius rem detinebat habita fuerit, eo quod ille, quem retinuerat, fur et latro diffamabatur, ipse expurget se iudicio; si culpabilis fuerit, ut fur et ipse diiudicetur.

Illi quoque, qui dicuntur vulgo wzbeg, cuicumque persone si adhererint, representent eos regi in assumptione sancte Marie; quod si quis transgressus fuerit, bis totidem reddat et insuper propter legis fracturam LV pensas adhibeat.

III De palatino comite.

Placuit etiam, ut si aliquando palatinus comes domum ierit, regis etcurie sigillum, que in vice eius remanserit, illi dimittat, ut sicut regis una est curia, et ita unum sigillum persistat. Domi vero comes idem quamdiu manserit super neminem sigillum mittat, nisi super eos dumtaxat, qui vocantur udornic et qui spontanea voluntate iverint ad eum, illi ei liceat iudicare. Quod si aliter fecerit, LV pensas solvat. Similiter et ducis comes, qui super suos, quam alios iudicaverit, eadem sententia corrigatur.

IV De quolibet fure ad ecclesiam fugiente.

Si quis liber furatus fuerit, et in ecclesiam fugerit, cuius ecclesie refugium quesivit, illius servus sit. Ille autem, cuius suasionem evasit, parte sua careat. Et si presbiter illum postea emancipaverit, et ipse vice eiusdem ecclesie servus sit. Ille vero, qui furatus fuerit, venundetur in aliam patriam, et si postmodum huc reversus fuerit, tollantur ei oculi.

V De servo vel libero in eadem culpa ad ecclesiam fugiente.

Servus autem, qui furatus fuerit et ad ecclesiam fugerit, domino suo reddatur, et cuius consilio fugit, det ecclesie duas pensas. Et si liber furtum fecerit, sed neque captus, neque ligatus in ecclesiam fugerit, ipse similiter sit servus ecclesie, et cuius erat fur, parte sua non careat. Eo modo si servus ad ecclesiam fugerit, una pensa dominus eius eum redimat, cuiusque res furatus fuerat, illi totum restauret. Item si servus magnum quid et tantum furatus fuerit, quantum dominus eius restaurare non poterit, cuius erat, unam pensam ecclesie donet et servus sit ecclesie.

VI De muliere in furto inventa.

Si qua mulier habens maritum furtum fecerit, nasum perdat et venundetur, et cum tota substantia sua, cum qua post viri sui mortem cum alio viro posset maritari, pereat. Et si vidua idem fecerit, alterum oculum perdat et exceptis partibus filiorum suorum cum parte sua anichiletur.

VII De puella furtum faciente.

Si que innupta puella furtum fecerit, venundetur, et nunquam ad libertatem redeat. Et si quis emancipaverit, pretio careat, illa autem in curiam regis ducatur.

VIII De furibus decem vel sex denariorum valentium.

Si liber, quod decem denarios valeat, furatus fuerit, cum omni substantia sua pereat; si minus, alter oculus eruatur, et secundum sancti Stephani decreta diiudicetur. Item si servus VI denariorum pretium furatus fuerit, careat oculis; si minus, oculo, et quod furatus fuerit, dominus eius duppliciter restituat.

IX De his, qui capiunt furem.

Quocienscumque quis furem ceperit et ligaverit, per tres dies tantum teneat, in quarto ante iudicem statuatur; et si forte se furti conscios inventurum dixerit, sex septimanarum spatio indulgentiam habeat, et interim furti conscios, quos se inventurum promiserat, inveniat; si autem non invenerit, regali sententia dampnetur. Si vero plus, quam per tres dies eum tenuerit, et in quarte, sicut diximus, iudici non presentaverit et postea vel a parentibus furi, vel a domino, si dominum habet, declamatio venerit, ante iudicem statuatur, et quia eum vinculatum tenuit et secundum legem tertia vel quarta die non presentaverit, ipse ante iudicem statuatur, et quia iniuste tenuit furem, X pensas solvat, fur autem secundum legem diiudicetur. Et si qui contumax iudicium iudicum transgreditur, sex pensas solvat, iudex vero per vim furem accipiat et si fur iudicium quesierit, et iudicio dato inculpabilis fuerit, de his sex pensis unam sancte ecclesie donet; et si culpabilis fuerit, cum omni substantia sua in sumptum regis exportetur.

X De his, qui in expeditione furantur.

Si rex in expeditione fuerit, et interim furem capi contigerit, qui cepit, firmiter teneat, sed postquam rex et primates redibunt, ultra quem terminum dixi, tenere non presummat. Quod si aliter fecerit, sex pensas enumeret.

De eademve.

Si quis in expeditione furtum fecerit, cum omnibus rebus suis extirpetur.

XI De negotiatoribus euntibus de civitate in civitatem.

Si quis de civitate in civitatem vadens emerit vel vendiderit, et si quod prius vendidit, postea furatum esse apparuerit, ille qui vendidit, sicut fur diiudicetur, et qui testes fuerint, iudicio discutiantur; si culpabiles inventi fuerint, sicut fures, ita diiudicentur.

XII De fure in curia nobilium capto.

Si quis in curia nobilium furtum fecerit, nuntietur vel eiusdem curie domino vel pristaldo eius. Et si forte contigerit, quod neuter domi sit, expectent per X dies; si in undecimo neuter illorum venerit, ante iudicem statuatur et secundum legem tractetur.

XIII De collectoribus fugitivarum rerum.

Rerum fugitivarum collector, quem vulgariter joccedeth dicunt, quitquid colligit, ad civitatem eiusdem provincie congreget, et regis agazo et comitis eiusdem civitatis in suburbio stabulum faciant, ibi usque ad festivitatem sancti Michaelis quitquid pecorum collectum fuerit, servetur; due partes fugitivorum hominum, ioch scilicet, donentur regis pristaldo, tertia pars comiti et usque ad prenominatum festivitatem detineantur, de quibus post festivitatem sancti Michaelis, quando dividuntur, nuntius episcopi decimam partem accipiat. A festividade sancti Martini usque ad festivitatem sancti Georgii congregentur oves et boves et simili modo dividantur. Et si interim rerum fugitivarum collector, quem dixi, hec transgressus fuerit, exceptis filiis et uxore eius, cum omni substantia perdatur; si comitis collector fugitivorum liber fuerit, simili modo disperdatur, si servus, comiti auferatur. Si regis fugitivorum collector de his, qui collegit, alicui dederit, ambo perdantur; et si quis et quitquam de talibus negaverit, quantum negavit, duodecies tantum reddat.

XIV De his, qui equos a cursoribus dimissos retinent.

Si quis equos, quos cursores dimittunt, habuerit, per tres spetimanas ad ecclesiam vel mercatum monstrandi causa ducat. Et si dominus eius non venerit, donet eum regis collector. Similiter de equis fiat a furibus dimissis, ut qui furem cum equoprehenderit, furem det iudici, equus vero suus sit.

XV De his, qui decretum regis spernunt.

Quicumque ergo regis et principum decreta fregerit, si episcopus est, secundum voluntatem regis diiudicetur; si comes, a comitatu degradetur; si centurio, honore privetur et insuper LV pensas solvat; si miles, similiter LV pensas solvat.

XVI De iudicibus.

Volumus, ut unusquisque iudex in parochia sua iudicet.

XVII De furibus ad ecclesiam fugientibus et se innocentes proclamantibus.

Si qui fures, servi vel liberi ad ecclesiam subintraverint, et se innocentes esse proclamaverint, iudicio probentur. Quod si rei apparuerint, quasi qui ecclesiam non intrassent, iudicentur; si vero culpam confessi fuerint, lege beati Stephani discutiantur.

XVIII Ut nullus cum fure convenire audeat.

Nemo cum fure convenire audeat; si autem quis fecerit, LV pensas perdat.

XIX Nemo ducat furem ad alium iudicem.

Volumus etiam, ut si quispiam furem ceperit, ante illum iudicem discutiatur causa, in cuius termino captus fuerit fur.

XX De usucapionibus.

Usucapiones capiantur a festo sancti Georgii usque ad festum sancti Johannis Baptiste et ducantur in civitatem, teneanturque usque ad festum sancti Michaelis, presententurque assidue in mercato, ut si quispiam suam repererit personam, redimat XC denariis, equum XII, bovem V, ex quibus due partes regi, tertia comiti tribuantur. Si vero usque sancti Michaelis festum inventi non fuerint, dividantur predicto modo, tamen nullo pacto vendantur vel cellentur, sed tantum labore eorum utatur. Quod si collector vendiderit vel celaverit, triplum reddat, ipseque X pensas persolvat. Comes vero si idem fecisse probatur, LV pensas persolvat. Simili modo iubemus, ut qui usucapiones tenuerint a tempore regis Bele, usque ad festum beati Stephani dimittant.

XXI De his, qui recipiunt servum vel lixas alterius.

Interdicimus etiam, ut nullus recipiat servum alterius vel lixas; si quispiam autem receperit, si comes fuerit, sciat se duppliciter cum LV pensis reddendum, si minister, duppliciter cum XXV pensis, si plebeus, duppliciter cum V pensis. Quod si receptus vel pro furto, vel pro aliquo crimine latuerit, et receptor conscius reatus illius fuerit, et negaverit se fuisse conscium, si comes est, iuramento se purget et insuper LV pensas persolvat; si vero plebeus, simili iuramento purgetur et insuper V pensas persolvat, et si quid contra eum latro proclamaverit, exaudiatur.

XXII De iudice eiecto et constituto.

Si quis iudicum non diffinivit litigium, antequam eius potestas auferatur, veniat ad iudicem constitutum et sicut iudicare disposuerat, cum eo discernat, et exinde recipiat nonam partem iudicii, iudex vero decimam.

XXIII De falsis iudicibus.

Si qui falsi iudices in occulto iudicare aliquid cognoscerentur, presententur iudici, in cuius termino reperti fuerint, inquisitque ab eis causa commissi, quod diiudicaverint, dupplum reddant, ipsique X pensas proferant.

XXIV De iudice litigium differente.

Si quis distulerit iudicium litigii ultra XXX dies, vapuletur.

XXV De iudicibus sigillum mittentibus.

Possit iudex sigillum suum mittere super quoscumque, exceptis presbiteris et clericis necnon comitibus. Si quis autem iudicem iniuste iudicasse proclamaverit, et non probaverit, V pensas solvat; si vero iudex convictus fuerit, iudicium in dupplum restituat et insuper V pensas persolvat. Iudex pro suo iudicato, nisi in se, uno anno, postea non introducatur.

XXVI De spernentibus sigillum iudicum.

Si quis sigillum iudicis negligens ad causam non venerit, primo V pensis puniatur; si secundo, totidem; si tertio, rationem perdat et tonsus vendatur pro debito.

XXVII De his, qui domi fecerint pugnam.

Si qui domi pugnaverint et ad iudicem non venerint, nichil querat iudex. Si venerint, ad eius fiat libitum. Quod si concordati aliquid iudici inde dederint, tertiam sibi, II partes regi reservet.

XXVIII De cursoribus, qui ultra tertiam villam equos duxerint.

Nemo cursorum audeat ducere equum ultra tertiam villam vel accipere ad ecclesiam euntium vel redeuntium, sive ad curiam episcoporum seu comitum, nec de presbiteris et clericis ac in curribus eorum. Accipiat autem qualescumque invenerit equos, ut regis legatio citius expediatur. Si quis autem cursorem verberaverit, LV pensis, si lora retemptaverit, decem pensis puniatur.

XIX De querentibus perditarum rerum.

Si quis servum fugitivum vel quodcumque perditum querere voluerit, a nemine prohibeatur. Si quis autem prohibuerit, vel querentem verberaverit, decem iuvencis mulctabitur valentibus decem pensas.

Explicit decretum sancti regis Ladislai.

THE LAWS OF KING LADISLAS

Book III.

Here begins the Third Book. Its chapters are:

1. Centurions and decurions.
2. Those who detain the servants of others.
3. On the count palatine.
4. The flight of any thief to a church.
5. The flight to a church of a bondman or freeman for the same crime.
6. The woman discovered in a theft.
7. The commission of theft by a girl.
8. Thieves who steal ten or six pennies' worth.
9. Those who catch a thief.
10. Those who steal during a campaign.
11. Merchants going from castle to castle.
12. The thief captured in the court of nobles.
13. Collectors of stray things.
14. Those who retain the horses left by couriers.
15. Those who scorn the decree of the king.
16. On judges.
17. Thieves fleeing to the church and proclaiming themselves innocent.
18. No one shall dare to negotiate with a thief.
19. No one shall bring a thief to another judge.
20. On usucaptions.
21. Those who receive male or female slaves of others.
22. Former judges and incumbent judges.
23. False judges.

24. Postponement of a lawsuit by a judge.
25. The sending of judges' seals.
26. Those who scorn judges' seals.
27. Those who fight a duel at home.
28. Couriers who lead their horses farther than the third village.
29. Those searching for lost things.

1 Centurions and decurions.¹

They² have decreed this and they have established this law: the king's messenger shall go to all the castles³ and assemble the centurions and decurions of those who are commonly called *őr*⁴ together with all who are committed to them: and he shall order them to point out anyone whom they know to be guilty of theft. The ordeal⁵ should be administered to those who have been pointed out to be guilty, if they wish to undergo the ordeal to prove they are not guilty. Those who are called őr shall be arranged in tens, one of whom shall undergo the ordeal on behalf of the ten, if he is cleared unscathed, the other nine shall be unscathed; if not, however, each one shall also undergo the ordeal. Moreover, he who underwent the ordeal on behalf of the nine shall also undergo the ordeal for himself. Afterwards all the magnates and people shall be asked if they know of a village infamous for theft, and if they name any village, the royal messenger shall call on the villagers to deliver up those whom they know to be thieves there. Those whom they have delivered up may not be prohibited from defending themselves by ordeal if they say they want to. But the ordeal shall not be administered to those who were previously reputed to be thieves.

In addition the villagers of the same village shall be divided into groups of ten and the tenth person

¹ The system of “tens” and “hundreds” with their heads called centurions and decurions seems to have applied to different serving strata of early medieval Hungarian society (György Györffy, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft der Ungarn um die Jahrtausendwende, Wien–Köln–Graz: Böhlau, 1983 [Also published as Studia Historica Acad. Sc. Hung. 186. Bp.: Akademiai, 1983], pp. 93–101). Parallels can be found both in the Frankish state (cf. Th. Mayer, “Staat und Hundertschaft in fränkischer Zeit”, in Mittelalterliche Studien [Lindau: Thorbecke, 1959], pp. 104–120) and in the neighboring kingdoms of Poland and Bohemia (cf. O. Kossmann, Polen im Mittelalter [Marburg: Herder-Institut, 1971], p. 72ff, and more recent literature in Györffy, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft p. 208)

² Referring to some kind of assembly.

³ Castles were the centers of the counties.

⁴ Őrök (Pl.) were guards who served not only on the borders (see Ladislav II: 17), but also in royal castles; György Györffy, István király és műve [King Stephen and his work]. Budapest: Gondolat, 1977, pp. 204–205 and Hansgerd Göckenjan Hilfsvölker und Grenzwächter im mittelalterlichen Ungarn. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1972.

⁵ Iudicium portare, literally “to carry the ordeal,” refers to the ordeal. Records of ordeals by hot iron at Várad (Nagyvárad/Oradea) are known only from the thirteenth century, see: Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, J. Karácsonyi, S. Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903); online : <https://www.arcanum.hu/hu/online-kiadvanyok/Varadi-varadi-jegyzokonyv-regestrum-varadinense-1208-1235-2/> ; cf. I. Zajtay, “Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle”, Revue d'histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562 and M. Lupesco Makó, “Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the ‘Regestrum Varadiense’” Mediævalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. For the European-wide practice of recourse to the “judgment of God”, see R. C. van Caenegem, “La preuve dans le droit du moyen âge”, Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l'histoire comparative des institutions, 17 (1965), 691–753, trans. J. R. Sweeney and D. A. Flanary as “Methods of Proof in Western Medieval Law”, Academiae Analecta, Academie voor Wetensch., Lett. en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. d. Lett., 45, No. 3 (1983), 85–127.

shall undergo the ordeal for the nine. If he shall be clean,⁶ the remaining nine will be clean, if they are guilty, each one shall undergo the ordeal himself, as we have said above, and the tenth who underwent it on behalf of the nine shall be tried by ordeal again for himself. After that the king's messenger shall go from village to village asking the villagers to point out whom they know to be a thief. He shall also declare that since the magnates of Hungary have taken an oath neither to be lenient to a thief nor to hide him,⁷ they should do the same. And if the peasants say that they wish to observe the oath, then they should expose the thieves where they know them to be. But if afterwards anyone accuses them of hiding thieves, and are thus found to have committed perjury, they shall pay ten pensae in commutation for their tongues and do penance according to the canons.⁸

2 Those who detain the servants of others.

We further ordain that the same royal messenger shall publicly make it known to all, nobles and non-nobles alike – first to the bishops, abbots and ispánok, then to the lesser men – that any of those detained from the time of King Andrew and Duke Béla⁹ and when the estate survey of the judge Sarkas¹⁰ was made, whether men of the castle¹¹ or those called ínek or *servi*¹² shall be given to the ⁶That is, innocent.

⁷See, Ladislás II: 1.

⁸This decree represents a reduction of the penalty for perjury imposed in the laws of St. Stephen (see Stephen I: 17).

⁹Andrew I (1047–1060) shared power with his brother, King Ladislás' father (the later King Béla I, 1060–1063), for many years.

¹⁰The polyptych or survey—probably of the lands and men on the royal property—made by Judge Sarkas (or Sarchas) is unfortunately lost, but has been dated to c. 1060–1063. It is regarded as the “Hungarian Domesday Book.” See: Györffy, István király, p. 246.

¹¹*Cives* in the early centuries were dependent men attached to the castles of the royal ispáns for their defense and maintenance. Their exact social status has been a matter of long debate—just as that of the servile polutaion in general, see below n. 12. The discussion was mainly between Károly Tagányi and László Erdélyi in Történelmi Szemle, 3–4 (1914–1916); on these historians, see F. Rottler, “Beiträge zur Kritik der Historiographie des frühen Mittelalters: Über die Geschichtsanschauung László Erdélyis”, Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica., 3 (1961), 121–152; and S. B. Vardy, “The Hungarian Economic History School” Journal for European Economic History, 4 (1975), 121–136.

¹²In the text ewnek. This archaic Hungarian word is now understood to have meant “commoner” or “poor man” in the eleventh century and was probably pronounced in (Pl. ínek); cf. ínség, “hunger” or “shortage” in modern Hungarian, see Györffy, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, pp. 129–140). The meaning of servi is problematic. The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last king by the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary.¹³ If any- one refuses this, he shall pay double,¹⁴ but if anyone wishes to defend [his title to the men], he shall come to the court on the said feast and defend it.

All those called *üzbé*¹⁵ shall come to the court at the same feast and whatever shall be ordained by royal judgment shall be valid for them. And if anyone detains beyond the aforesaid date any of those whom we have ordered to be returned, he shall remit double and pay fifty-five pensae because of his offense. And if there happens to be suspicion of a person who keeps something belonging to another, he shall be denounced as a robber and thief by him whose property he retained; and he shall clear himself by ordeal and if he is guilty, he, too shall be judged as a thief.

Also if any of those commonly called *üzbé*¹⁵ should adhere to any person whatsoever, he shall be returned to the king on the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin Mary; if anyone refuses to do so, he shall remit twice as much for the offense and pay an additional fifty-five pensae for the breaking of the law.

3 On the count palatine.¹⁶

It is also agreed that when the count palatine returns home he shall entrust the seal of the king and the court to the man who remains in his place, for just as the king has one court so there should be but one seal. But as long as that same count remains at home he shall send the seal to word on the matter. We, therefore, took the “easy way out” by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader.

¹³ August 15

¹⁴ Here and in the following articles the Latin text distinguishes between reddere meaning “return” or “render” and solvere meaning “pay” or “render”; the usage is not consistent, but permits the assumption that stolen or appropriated goods (including servants) were to be “returned” two- or three-fold in kind, and additional fines were “paid” in coin or other valuables. Note the rather high amount of fines (fifty-five pensae). The pensa auri was equivalent to the contemporary Byzantine gold solidus (Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325], Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1916. [repr. 1991], pp. 158–168)

¹⁵ A Slavic loan-word (zbe) meaning “refugee”; Györffy (Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, pp. 186–187) suggests that the reference is actually to Slavic (or other foreign) peasants who fled to Hungarian lords and churches. Such aliens were subject to the king, hence the demand for their return

¹⁶ The palatine (comes palatines) was originally the head of the king’s household. By the mid-twelfth century he had become and highest officer in the realm, the king’s deputy and commander of the royal host. He gradually moved out of the court and served as the king’s itinerant judge administering justice to the nobles. The names of almost all palatines are known from c.1150 onward; The election or selection of the palatine became a contested issue between king and nobility.

no one,¹⁷ except only to those who are called *udvarnok*¹⁸ and to those who come to him voluntarily, whom he is permitted to judge. If he should do otherwise, he shall pay fifty-five pensae; Similarly the ispán of the duke,¹⁹ if he judges others besides his own people, shall be subject to the same sentence.

4 The flight of any thief to a church.

If a freeman has committed a theft and fled to a church, he shall be the servus of that church whose asylum he sought.²⁰ The person who persuaded him to escape shall lose his portion.²¹ If the priest should later manumit him, he himself shall be the servus of the church in his stead, but the person who committed the theft shall be sold in another country. If subsequently he should return here, he shall lose his eyes.

5 The flight to a church of a servus or freedman for the same crime.

A servus who has committed theft and fled to the church, shall be returned to his master, and the man who advised him to flee shall give two pensae to the church. And if a freeman committed a theft but is not caught or bound, and he flees to the church, he similarly shall be the servus of the church, and the man whose goods he stole shall not lose his share. In the same manner, if a servus flees to the church, his master shall redeem him with one pensa and make complete restitution to the man whose goods were stolen. Also, if the servus has stolen something even greater than his master's ability to restore, the owner of the servus shall give one pensa to the church and the servus shall belong to the church.

6 The woman discovered in a theft.

If a married woman commits a theft, she shall lose her nose and be sold, and she shall lose all her ¹⁷ In the early Middle Ages summons to court was given by sending the judge's seal to the accused. One such bull (billog) has actually survived; see Emil Jakubovich, "I. Endre törvénybeidézô ércbilloga" [The Metal Summoning Bull of Andrew I], Turul, 47 (1933), 68–78. On the possible Slavic models for this procedure, see Milán Sufflay, "Az idéző pecsét a szláv források világánál" [The Summoning Seal in the Light of Slavic Sources], Száz., 40 (1906), 293–312. See also W. Ewald, Siegelkunde, 2nd ed. (München: Oldenbourg, 1972), pp. 29–30; and Ferenc Eckhart, "Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter," MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558, here pp. 407–9.

¹⁸ The udvarnoks (from Hung. udvar, from Slavic dvor, "court") were peasants on settlements attached to the royal household, supplying it with agricultural produce grown on their plots (hence occasionally called panisdator, i.e., bread giver), in contrast to servi designated as ploughmen or craftsmen, messengers, fishermen, and the like, working on the royal domain with no land or equipment of their own.

¹⁹ In the eleventh century a younger member of the dynasty received part of the land as ducal territory; see above, ch. 2, and Dániel Bagi, "The dynastic conflicts of the eleventh century in the Illuminated Chronicle," in: Studies on the Illuminated Chronicle, János M. Bak and László Veszprémy, eds. (Budapest: CEU Press/National Széchenyi Library, 2018) 139–58. The ispán of the duke (in this case of Ladislas' younger brother, Levente) presumably performed the same functions in the service of the duke as those performed by the palatine for the king's court.

²⁰ Cf. Stephen II. 18 and Ladislas II: 1–2. See: György Bónis, "Első törvényeink sorsa és az egyházi menedékjog" [The fate of our first laws and ecclesiastical asylum]. Regnum, 3 (1938–39), 75–97.

²¹ Namely of the confiscated goods of the thief.

own property with which she could have married another after the death of her husband.²² If a widow commits the same crime, she shall lose one eye and be punished by forfeiture of her [widow's] portion, except for that intended for her sons.

7 The commission of theft by a girl.

If an unmarried girl commits a theft, she shall be sold and never returned to freedom. And if anyone manumits her, he shall lose her price, but she shall be brought to the king's court.

8 Thieves who steal ten or six pennies' worth.²³

If a freeman has stolen something worth ten pennies, he shall perish with all his property; if less, one eye should be plucked out and he shall be punished according to the decrees of St. Stephen.²⁴ Again, if a servus steals something worth six pennies, he shall lose his eyes, if less, only one eye, and his master shall make double restitution of what he has stolen.

9 Those who catch a thief.

However often someone seizes a thief, he shall hold him for only three days; on the fourth day he shall haul him before a judge.²⁵ If perhaps he says he himself will find accomplices to the theft, he shall have a period of six weeks within which to find the accomplices whom he promised to find; if he does not find them, however, he shall be condemned by royal sentence. If he keeps the thief for more than three days, and he does not present him to a judge on the fourth day as we have declared, and afterwards word comes from the kinsman of the thief or from his master, if he had one, that he should be brought before a judge, that man himself shall be presented to the judge. Because he held the thief in fetters and not present him to the law on the third day or fourth day, but held him unjustly, he shall pay ten pensae. The thief, however, shall be punished according to the law. And if any insolent man violates the judgment of the judges, he shall pay six pensae, and the judge shall take the thief by force. If the thief ask for the ordeal, and he is found innocent, one of these six pensae he shall go to the holy church;

²² This is an early reference to the dower retained as the wife's property, apparently already established in customary law; cf., however, Stephen I: 26. Dower (dos, dotalitium): was originally the "price of the bride" paid by the bridegroom's family to that of the bride, then a grant of the husband to his wife on the occasion of their marriage. The dower was usually given both in land and chattels, but the woman did not have free disposal of the land so given, which was managed together with her husband's goods. After her husband's death, the widow could keep the dower unless she remarried. In this case, the kinsmen of the deceased husband redeemed the dower from her. The term often also included those valuables that were brought by the bride in the marriage (res parafernales), which remained with the wife.

²³ This law is quite harsh; for the amount of the fine and the money minted under King Ladislas, "Heavy" pennies (denarii) were first minted in c. 0.781 gr weight in the later years of King Ladislas; see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet, pp. 231f.). The measures are quite harsh considering that the value of 10d might have been equal to one of the smaller household animals (a sheep or pig) since a young ox was worth 40d=1 pensa.

²⁴ Cf. Stephen II: 7. This reference, and the one below in ch. 17, suggest the knowledge and the ongoing validity of the laws of St. Stephen.

²⁵ That is, a royal judge. Nothing is known about these judges mentioned in the early laws. (In those of St. Stephen, they appear in chapters borrowed from Bavarian law.)

and if he is found guilty, he shall be exiled and all his wealth shall go to the king's treasury.

10 Those who steal during a campaign.

If while the king is on a campaign a thief happens to be caught, the man who caught him shall keep him firmly, but after the king's and the magnates' return he shall not presume to hold him beyond the deadline I have set. He who shall do otherwise shall pay six pensae.

On the same.

If someone has committed a theft during a campaign, he shall be thoroughly destroyed together with all his goods.

11 Merchants going from castle to castle.²⁶

If someone goes from castle to castle buying and selling, and if having sold something which later turns out to have been stolen, the seller shall be punished as a thief, and those who have acted as witnesses shall be examined by ordeal; if they are found guilty they shall be punished as thieves.

12 The thief captured in the court of nobles.

If someone committed a theft in the household of a noble, it shall be made known either to the lord of that household or to his bailiff.²⁷ And if by chance neither of them should be at home, one should wait ten days; and if on the eleventh neither of them shall have arrived, the thief shall be hauled before the judge and treated according to the law.²⁸

13 Collectors of stray things.

The collector of stray things, who is commonly called jókszedő,²⁹ shall bring whatever he has

²⁶ The word civitas can mean "county", "city", and "castle". Since the centers of counties were castles and few other semi-urban settlements existed at that time, it is certain that in the present instance such fortified settlements are meant. See Stephen I: 17, with n. 17.

²⁷ Great landowners had their own bailiffs, just like the king. The bailiff (in the early laws called pristaldus, probably from a Slavic loan-word, pristav*; later homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge) was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, ispán or other lords, who performed similar tasks.

²⁸ The right of a noble or his bailiff to judge cases of theft in his own household (curia) constitutes a type of judicial immunity. The fact that the royal judge had jurisdiction in default, however, points to the limited character of this privilege in the eleventh century.

²⁹ Joccedeth, interpreted as jókszedő, from jó, jók, "good(s)" and szedő, "gatherer" seems to have been a special officer in charge of retrieving alienated (royal) property. Antal Bartal (Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis Regni Hungariae. Budapest: MTA, 1901; repr. Hildesheim–New York: Olms, 1970, p. 353, s.v. jocorydech) suggests a rather unlikely etymology, from Scottish (!) Tokioderach, "a decurion of justice", and interprets the office as a general guardian of peace, pandur ("gendarme").

collected to the castle of the district³⁰ in which he gathered them, and the king's master of horse³¹ and the groom of the ispán of the same castle shall build a stable in the bailey, where all the cattle collected shall be kept until Michaelmas.³² Two-thirds of the fugitive men, that is the jók,³³ shall be given to the king's bailiff and the third part to the ispán; and they shall be detained until the said feast; and when after Michaelmas they shall be divided, the agent of the bishop shall receive the tenth part. Between the Feasts of St. Martin and St. George³⁴ the oxen and cows shall be collected and divided in the same way. And if the collector of stray things, whom I have mentioned, should violate this ordinance, he with all his property shall perish except for his sons and wife; if the ispán's collector of stray things is a freeman, he shall be taken from the ispán. If the king's collector of stray things gives anything out of what he had collected, both he and the recipient shall perish; and if someone denies anything about such things, he shall pay twelve times what he has denied.

14 Those who retain the horses left by couriers.³⁵

If someone has the horses left by couriers, he shall lead them for three weeks to the church or the market for display. And if their master does not come, he shall give them to the king's collector.³⁶ Likewise, with the horses of thieves: anyone who catches a thief with a horse, shall give the thief to the judge and retain the horse.

15 Those who scorn the decree of the king.

Anyone at all who violates the decrees of the king and the magnates shall be judged according to the king's will if he is a bishop; shall be deposed from his office if an ispán, shall be deprived of his commission and pay and additional fifty pensae if a centurion; and shall likewise pay fifty pensae if a warrior.

16 On judges.

³⁰ The text has provincie, hence, although it is likely that the collection was done by counties, the more general term "district" is preferred

³¹ Regis agazo: this officer of the household, originally in charge of the king's horses, later became a military commander and the equivalent of a marshal, but there is no continuity between this mention of a royal groom and the later master of the horse, first known from 1217, see Attila Zsoldos, Magyarország világi archonológiája [Secular archontology of Hungary] (Budapest: História, 2011) p. 56.

³² 29 September.

³³ See above, n. 29. Apparently the fugitive men were especially regarded as "goods."

³⁴ From 11 November to 24 April.

³⁵ This chapter and chapter 28 below show that in eleventh-century Hungary among the different royal servants were messengers who had the right to requisition horses. Györffy (István király, p. 242) assumes that their master was the comes preconum, mentioned as ostiary in the Hungarian Chronicle c. 92; see: János M. Bak, László Veszprémy, eds. Chronica de gestis Hungarorum &c. Chronicle of the deeds of the Hungarians &c. (Budapest-New York: CEU Press, 2018, CEMT) p. 176

³⁶ See above, ch. 13, n. 29.

It is our will that each judge give sentence within his own district.³⁷

17 Thieves fleeing to the church and proclaiming themselves innocent.

If thieves, whether slaves or freemen, go into church and proclaim themselves innocent, they shall be tried by ordeal. If they are found guilty, they shall be judged as though they had not entered the church, but if they confess the crime, they shall be examined according to the law of St. Stephen.³⁸

18 No one shall dare negotiate with a thief.

No one shall dare to bargain with a thief, if, however, anyone should do this, he shall lose fifty-five pensae.

19 No one shall bring a thief to another judge.

It is also our will that if anyone catches a thief, the case shall be examined by that judge within whose district the thief was caught.

20 On usucaptions.³⁹

Usucaptions shall be seized between the Feasts of St. George and St. John the Baptist,⁴⁰ and shall be brought to the castle and held till Michaelmas. They shall be constantly displayed in the market so that if anyone shall find his man, he shall redeem him for ninety pence, a horse for twelve, and an ox for five; out of which two-third are owed to the king, one-third to the ispán. If they have not been claimed by Michaelmas, they shall be divided in the prescribed way, but shall not be sold or hidden, rather only their labor shall be used. If a collector⁴¹ sells or hides them, he shall remit threefold and pay ten pensae. And if an ispán should do the same, he shall pay fifty-five pensae. Similarly, we command that those who have usucaptions since the time of King Béla,⁴² shall give them up by the Feast of St. Stephen.⁴³

21 Those who receive male or female servi of others.

We forbid anyone to receive the slave or maidservant of others; but if anyone does receive them he

³⁷ The instruction here seems to aim at prohibiting judges from acting in counties of their neighbors and is related to chapter 19. below

³⁸ Probably referring to Stephen II: 6–7. See also Bónis, “Első törvényeink sorsa és az egyházi menedékjog.”

³⁹ In Roman Law this term means the acquisition of rights of ownership through prolonged use or possession, often for a year or two (Corpus Iuris Civilis. Editio stereotypa [Berlin: Weidmann, 1882], Cod. 7.24; 7.28; Dig. 41.3, Inst. 2.6). Here usucaption refers to missing or stolen items held for a long time

⁴⁰ That is, from 24 April to 24 June.

⁴¹ See above, ch. 13, n. 29

⁴² Béla I (1060–1063); see above, n. 9.

⁴³ August 20

should know that he shall remit twice⁴⁴ fifty-five pensae if he is an ispán, he shall remit twice with twenty-five pensae if a minor official,⁴⁵ and if he a commoner, he shall remit twice with five pensae. If the person received is connected either with theft or any other crime, and the receiver is an accomplice to that crime but denies being an accomplice, he shall clear himself by oath and pay an additional fifty-five pensae if he is an ispán; and if he is a commoner, he shall clear himself by a similar oath and an additional five pen- sae, and if the robber shall say anything against him, he shall be heard.

22 Former judges and incumbent judges.

If a judge did not bring a lawsuit to completion before his authority was withdrawn, he shall come to see the incumbent judge and discuss with him the judgment he had intended, and receive the ninth part from the judgment and the [incumbent] judge the tenth.⁴⁶

23 False judges.

If false judges⁴⁷ are known to have rendered judgment on anything in secret, they shall be hauled before the judge within whose district they were discovered, and after his inquiry into the case they shall refund twice the amount they assessed in judgment and pay him ten pensae.

24 Postponement of a lawsuit by a judge.

If someone should delay judgment in a lawsuit for more than thirty days, let him be beaten.⁴⁸

25 The sending of judges' seals.

A judge may send his seal⁴⁹ to anyone, except priests and clerks⁵⁰ and also ispáns. But if someone protests that the judge has sentenced unjustly, and he does not prove it, he shall pay five pensae. But if the judge shall be convicted, he shall make restitution of twice the judgment and pay five pensae. The judge shall be liable for his judgment for no more than one year.

26 Those who scorn the seal of judges

⁴⁴ The text is unclear whether “twice” refers to the doubling of fines plus a penalty of fifty-five pensae. Marczali (Magyarország, p. 110) assumed that two separate chapters have been conflated in the existing copies

⁴⁵ The term minister is not often used in medieval Hungarian texts; judging from the context it refers here to minor office-holders

⁴⁶ Judicial fees were the tenth and the ninth of the fine assessed; see Imre Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [The Hungarian judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and diverse dynasties] (Budapest: MTA, 1899), pp. 442–450.

⁴⁷ This chapter suggests the existence of “private” arbitrators holding “secret” sessions; it may also refer to “judges” passing sentence on the basis of their tribal authority

⁴⁸ In spite of the rather radical cure proposed here, the dragging on of legal cases remained a problem for centuries; see, e.g., Comp. ante 1400: 8.

⁴⁹ See above, ch. 3.

⁵⁰ This is a confirmation of the privilegium fori of the clergy; cf. Stephen I: 4

If someone disregards the seal of a judge and does not come to the suit, the first time he shall be penalized by five pensae; the second time by the same amount; the third time he shall lose his suit and be shaven and sold for the debt.

27 Those who fight a duel⁵¹ at home.

If some people fight at home and do not come to the judge, the judge shall take no action. If they come, he shall act as he pleases. If they arrive at an agreement and thereafter give anything to the judge, he shall retain the third part for himself, and two-thirds for the king.

28 Couriers who lead their horses farther than the third village.

No courier shall dare lead a horse farther than the third village, or take one from those going or returning from church, or to the court of a bishop or ispán, or from priests and clerks and their wagons. Let him take horses wherever he finds them, so that the king's mission shall be expedited more quickly.⁵² But if someone beats the courier, he shall be penalized fifty-five pensae; if he detains him by the reins, ten pensae.

29 Those searching for lost things.

If someone should want to search for a fugitive servus or anything lost, no one shall stop him. But if anyone stops or beats a searcher, he shall be fined ten steers worth ten pensae.⁵³

Here ends the law of the holy King Ladislas.

⁵¹ It is unclear whether duels fought in private or simply domestic fighting is meant

⁵² See above, ch. 14.

⁵³ On the equivalence of the young steer (tinó) and the pensa, see Alán Kralovánszky, "A tinópénz kérdéséhez I. István korában" [On the question of steer-money in the age of Stephen I]. Alba Regia, 14 (1975), 283–286.

THE LAW OF KING COLOMAN OF HUNGARY (1095–1116)
(probably before 1104) (Colo)

The collection of laws bearing the name of King Coloman (Kálmán) emerged from a mixed assembly of magnates and prelates convened at Tarcál. The purpose of this gathering was to review the legislation of King Stephen—not only the laws known from that king’s extant collections but others now lost as well—in order to modify and improve the laws in the interest of the general welfare of the kingdom and for the maintenance of Christian society. The deliberations were in all likelihood conducted in the Hungarian language, leading some historians to believe the original text was composed in Hungarian and later set down in Latin by the hand of the priest Alberich (Büdinger, p. 152f.). The identity of Alberich, one of the many foreign priests resident in Hungary at this time, remains otherwise unknown.

The long prefatory epistle—unique among the royal legislative collections both for its florid style and its insights into the circumstances which produced this decretum—reveals the existence of a debate between the proponents of innovation and the advocates of ancient custom which, despite the abundance of conventional rhetorical forms, has the ring of authenticity. The contents of the legislation itself, like those of earlier collections, are both secular and ecclesiastical. Some of the individual measures presume the ongoing cooperation of churchmen and royal officers in supervising the Christian commonwealth. It is noteworthy that in this collection the severity of some earlier punishments is moderated; that the influence of “Gregorian” reforming ideas on ecclesiastical legislation is more pronounced than in the reign of King Ladislas; and that numerous regulations touching upon royal revenue point to a firm establishment of the new order, monarchical and Christian, envisioned a century earlier by King Stephen.

Despite the detailed information contained in the preface, no exact date can be assigned to this collection. As Archbishop Seraphin, to whom the proem is dedicated, died in 1104, it may be assumed to have been written before that date. This text, just like the earlier laws, was not preserved in an original medieval manuscript, and is known only from fifteenth- and sixteenth- century copies.

MSS:

“Codex Thuróczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 94v–99r.

“Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, ff. 26r–35r.

EDD: Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István. Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman] (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904.), pp. 181--94; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1, 92–121.

LIT: M. Büdinger, Ein Buch ungarischer Geschichte 1058–1100. (Leipzig: Teubner, 1866) pp. 150–158; P. Angyal, “A büntetőjog fejlődése Kálmán uralkodása idején” [Development of criminal law under the reign of Coloman], in Emlékkönyv Illés József, Ferenc Eckhart, Alajos Degré, eds. (Budapest.: Stephanaeum, 1942), pp. 1–14. Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006); György Györffy, István király és műve [King Stepehn and his work] (Budapest: Gondolat, 1977).

DECRETUM COLOMANI REGIS

(1095–1116)

Incipit decretum Colomanni dei gratia regis Hungarie. Seraphin archipresuli divinarum igne virtutum ardenti Albericus, quamvis unus ex minimis, tamen servus sanctitatis nuncupatus in pallacio celestis contemplationis.

Quoniam fiduciam talem habemus per Christum, non quod sufficientes simus cogitare aliquid an nobis, quasi ex nobis, sed sufficiencia nostra ex deo est, cum spiritualis gratia inspirationis mentem tuam celestis sapientie thezauro ditaverit et quam plurimis disertis ac didascalici meriti viris lucidas contubernii tui officinas, quasi totidem gemmis ornaverit, haud parum ingenioli mei reformidat rusticitas, dum me, ut ita dicam, elinguem ac pene totius urbanitatis exsortem iubeas o presul regalium instituta collationum recolare vel senatoria regni totius decreta quasi ieiunio latescentis orationis nostre recapitulare.

Neque enim ad regalia consilia me consultricis prudentie inculta provehit materies, nec tenuis rei pro foribus stantem intromittit despecta pauperies, quia vero obedientie eligo magis operam dare, quam caritati omnia speranti aliquid denegare malo etiam ultra vires obtemperare presumere, quam presumptuose minime obtemperare. Quamvis enim inperitia mea dictandi non prestet facundiam, caritas tamen obedientiam non negat; porro nec in hoc opere proprii arbitrii vestigia figo, verum previis alieni itineris nisibus insisto, ob quam videlicet causam si quid inerrabundo vestigio liberius evagatus meus deviaverit calamus, nec ambigo, quam facilis aput te sit venie locus, que res pigram etiam impulit huius consilii moram.

Sed sunt fortasse nonnulli, qui sine rationis circumspectione idem, unde sermo est, concilium Tursollinum autument esse superfluum, minus provide asserentes antiquis potius priorum insistendum esse relatibus, quorum profecto quam frivola, quamque sit inconsulta coniectio, non est supervacuum paulisper commemorari, quia hi regni detractores magis proprio consulunt arbitrio, quam communiter regni propectui adminis- trando. Nam quis ambigat a sancto patre nostro Stephano, viro quippe apostolico legem populo nostro datam in quibusdam austeriorem, in quibusdam vero tollerabiliorem, in his quoque intensius vindicantem atque in aliis remissius indulgentem, nec quemquam tamen absque discipline verbere dimittentem cum predestinationis tempus nullum adhuc verum adduxisset fidei sponsorem, nec hoc quidem preter dispensationis respectum credi nephas est.

Nam cum tempore predicti patris universum regnum eius barbaricis servierit incultibus, ac rudis coactusque christianus contra commonitorium sancte fidei stimulum adhuc recalcitraret, adhuc contra penitentialia ulticis virge verbera remorderet, opere pretium fuit, ut sancte discipline coactio in fidelibus quidem ad conversionem fidei, sed conversis fieret ad iustitiam penitentiae peccati. At christianissimus rex noster Conlumbanus columbine gratia simplicitatis cum omni virtutum discretionem praeditus, postquam vidit adultam fidem perfecte religionis robor accepisse, legalis vinculum cathene cogitavit relaxare prudenter, utpote perpendens indignum esse, si iam spontaneum fidei militem legalis pene timor torqueret, quem nec ipsa mors ab agnita iam confessione veritatis abstrahere potuisset.

Hic nimirum cum videret propter civilia bella usque ad tempus ipsius ingravesscensia paternis traditionibus iam magna ex parte solutis regni consultum labefactari, curie honorem vilescere, timens, ne miles, insolens pacis, domesticus tamen virtutis hospes, irrevocabilis fieret iniquitatis, regni principibus congregatis, totius senatus consultu prefati regis sanctae memoriae Stephani legalem textum recensuit, de quo, si rem consideres, nichil comminuit, sed auxit, non tam, quasi fundator, sed superedificator, quatenus primitiva plantaria salubri velut respersionis infusione irrigata iustitiae percipiant incrementa. Et ille quidem destructor fuit infidelium, exactor legis per transgressionem, iste iam fidelium recte conversationis augmentator in iustificatione. Ille lorica fidei populum induerat, iste terrene ambitionis superfluentia cingulo iustitiae precegebat; ille gladio spiritus verbi dei perterritus, iste galea salutis decoravit.

Postremo hunc uterque regum finem rebus imposuit, ut, dum debita ultrix pena filios perditionis consumeret, filios predestinationis refoveret. Non enim sine causa rex gladium portat, dei enim minister est, vindex in iram eius, qui malum agit, nam principes non sunt timori boni operis, sed mali. Quis enim est, qui noceat vobis, si boni emulatores fueritis? Hactenus hec.

Contra supradictos autem huius concilii detractores de singulis capitulis, quae ab re esse mentiuntur, possem etiam scribendo satisfacere, nisi epistolaris ego sermonis modum excedens modestiae tuae, o presulum decus, aures timuissim fastidire. Possunt tamen illa ex his colligi, quae moderata satis brevitate prescripsi.

Verumtamen tu domine, qui in huius populi linguae genere minus me promptum consideras, si quid calamus a suscepti itineris tramite declinaverit, tua queso solita in me benivolentia et supervacua reseces et imperfecta suppleas, errata corrigas, commode dicta paterna gratia proveas et antequam in aures prodeant publicas. cure tuae digitum dignanter inponas, utque tuo dumtaxat doctissimo digna constitui examine tuo etiam iudicio a detrahentium muniantur livore.

I. Placuit regi et communi concilio, ut dotis cuiuslibet possessiones monasteriis seu ecclesiis a beato Stephano rege disposite inconvulse remaneant.

II. Quia populus noster magnis saepe tam viae, quam inopiae laboribus pregravatus pro qualibet necessitate curiam regalem adire non potest, bis in anno, id est in festivitate apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi et in octavis sancti Michaelis synodum in unoquoque episcopatu celebrari constituimus, in qua tam comes et comites, quam reliquorum magistratuum potestates ad suum episcopum conveniant, ad quam quicumque etiam sine sigillo vocatus non venerit, reus iudicii erit.

- III. Alienigena presbiter vel dyaconus cum commendatitiis literis recipiatur. Qui vero hactenus recepti sunt, si iure venerint, examinentur, quatenus de quibus aliqua aures nostras pulsant infamia, hi ab officio cessent, donec vel iudicio purgentur, vel de terraeliminentur.
- IV. Nullus indigena sine fideiussore recipiatur.
- V. Episcoporum et comitum capellani vel reliquorum, per sigillum episcopi vel archiepiscopi ad causandum cogantur.
- VI. Si clericus cum laicis causam habet, per sigillum iudicis laicus cogatur; si vero laicus habet causam cum clerico, per sigillum episcopi vel archipresbiteri clericus cogatur, ab eisque coram iudice suo examinentur.
- VII. Si duo comites pro causa aliqua dissideant, in supradicto synodo ventillentur.
- VIII. Si duo abbates contenderint, in eadem synodo iudicentur.
- IX. Maiores ministri regis vel ducis et capellani, quorum personis indignum est coram iudice infra se conferre, in eadem synodo iudicentur.
- X. Si quis superbus iudex ad predictam synodum venire neglexerit, suo accusatore iudicetur.
- XI. Si maiores ministri regis et ducis vel inter se vel cum maioribus contenderint et ad iudicem venire contempserint, cum iudice eorum causas discutiant.
- XII. Ducis ministri, qui in mega regis sunt et regis, qui in mega sunt ducis, ante comitem et iudicem, minores vero ante iudicem delitigent.
- XIII. Si comes cum comite contenderit, vel populus eius, seu synodica discretio seu vicinus comes causas eorum discutiat.
- XIV. Nullus presumat secularis iudex sigillum clerico dare.
- XV. Quia eo minus videtur valere curia, cominus suppetunt necessaria, ne nostra habundantia in eius superfluat penuria, placuit omnes piscinas, preter quas sanctus Stephanus donaverat, sumptui regali reddere, quia indignum erat nobis recedentibus curialem nobiscum honorem recedere, ubi prestat nos et venientes copiam honoris invenire.
- XVI. Similiter decrevimus piscinas monasteriis vel ecclesie datas alias quidem reddere, sed necessarias cottidiano fratrum usui relinquere, nullas vero nisi superfluas auferre.
- XVII. Vinee, mansiones, terre, a regibus quibuscumque date, perseveranter his quibus dabantur, permaneant.
- XVIII. Silvas ecclesiis datas minime auferri concedimus.
- XIX. Veteres coloni eiecti, terram non habentes alibi, ad suam revertantur. Si terra eorum data est monasteriis vel ecclesiis, et ipsi aliam habent, hoc inviolabiliter ita permaneat.
- XX. Possessio quolibet a sancto Stephano data, humane successionis quoscumque contingat successores vel heredes. Possessio vero ab aliis regibus data de patre descendat ad filium, qui si defuerint, succedat germanus, cuius filii etiam post mortem illius non exheredentur. Germanus autem predictus si non inveniatur, regi hereditas deputetur.

XXI. Hereditas emptitia nulli heredi auferatur, sed tantum eodem testimonio confirmetur.

XXII Iudicium ferri et aque in aliqua ecclesia fieri interdiximus, nisi in sede episcopali et maioribus preposituris, necnon Posonii et Nitrie.

XXIII. Iudex iniuste causas discutiens ad curiam regis cum sigillo cogatur, sed sine sigillo ad synodum.

XXIV. Si quis ad conventum episcoporum et comitum venire neglexerit, iudicetur. Ipsi vero sic sollicite conveniant, sic subnixa cura considant, sicque summa diligentia equi libraminis trutinam compensent, quatenus nec hincque per odium innocentiam condempnent, nec illinc per amicitiam culpam defendant.

XXV. De tributis autem et vectigalibus, sicut comitibus tertiam partem dare decrevimus, ita decimam quoque episcopis censemus, quia tam novi quam veteris testamenti pagina decimas dandas esse proclamet, incautum igitur et inconsultum est, si instituta sanctorum presumamus infringere, que summa potius devotione debemus adimplere.

XXVI. Si quis in testimonium adductus alicuius veritatem sua nititur attestazione probare, huius testimonium sic recipi iubemus, si presertim sit confessus peccata sua sacerdotibus, si denique aratrum habeat, ut et sit cautela veri testimonii per sacerdotem in confessione et mendacis culpe redemptio fiat in possessione.

XXVII. Nullus audeat perhibere testimonium, nisi confessus peccata. Cuiuscunque testimonium falsum inveniatur, eius testimonium amplius non recipiatur.

XXVIII. Si pristaldus iudicis pro causa diiudicata ab aliquo verberabitur, ad hunc a comite comitatus mittatur, et quicquid deliberatum est, totum auferatur vi.

XXIX. Iudicis pristaldos tales esse precipimus, quales idoneos testes fieri iusseramus supra.

XXX. Si pristaldus iudicis in legatione eius iniuste quid egerit, dampnetur cum iudice inique ei mandante.

XXXI. Dampnum a iudice per pristaldum alicui iniuste illatum de rebus iudicis restituatur.

XXXII. Si quis terram alterius ad possidendum sibi iniuste usurpaverit, cum in iudicio reus fuerit, tantumdem de propria terra perdat, insuper decem pensas persolvat.

XXXIII. Mercatores ob id solum, ut ditescant, venalium rerum dediti studiis, pristina duplicent tributa; pauperes vero, qui de mercato vivunt, persolita tributa persolvant.

XXXIV. Si quis de propriis et domesticis rebus quid in foro vendiderit, lege sancti Stephani tributum reddat.

XXXV. Si quis hospitum acola terram civium cohabitat, aut iuxta medietatem substantie civilium expeditionem faciat, aut VIII denarios solvat.

XXXVI. Quando rex vel dux in comitatum aliquem intraverit, tunc megalis equus exercitualis prestetur, qui si quo casu mortuus fuerit, XV pense domino equi donentur. Si vero aliquomodo, sed non usque ad mortem leesus fuerit, predicti pretii pars dimidia pro equo reddatur.

Si magna fama marchiam intraverit, comes nuntios II equis exercitualibus IIII ad regem dirigat, qui cum proprio cibo illuc pervenientes, pretium viatici sui a palatino comite exigant, et tantumdem ad reditum suum. Si vero equi illorum mortui vel lesi fuerint, tot pense, quot supra diximus, pro equis reddantur, sed si sani redeant, pro una via exercituali deputetur.

XXXVII. In quamcumque civitatis megam rex digrediatur, ibi iudices II megales cum eo commigrent qui et contentiones populi illius discreto examine dirimant, et ipsi, cum clamor populi ingravescat, a comite palatino diiudi- centur.

XXXVIII. Si rex forte cuiquam comiti vel ministro aliquem de civibus dimiserit, solus in expeditionem pergat; sin autem ad populum, unde exiit, revertatur.

XXXIX. Omnibus interdiciamus tenere quemquam de civibus ad fugam facientem absque regis licentia; at si quis tenuerit, quasi legis fracturam emendet.

XL. Comites, si propriis in villis suos liberos habuerint, de quibus equos accipere et C pensas possint colligere, lorica unum regi de sumptu illo procurent. Si vero XL pensas, militem absque lorica educent, ac si minus, suis hoc propriis usibus reservent.

XLI. Si rex aliquem vagum servum alicui donaverit, hic medium caput eius tondat; quod si non fecerit, X pensas amittat. Cui si uxorem dederit, etiam illam cum eo perdat.

XLII. Quicumque absque regis licentia vagum tenuerit, LV pensas solvat. Et si aput dominum quicquid sit furatus, dominus a crimine iudicio purgetur, et qui fideiussor eius fuerat, illum ostendat, idemque si inculpabilis fuerit, eandem legem persolvat, quam retentor eius; et si non habet, propriam libertatem amittat.

XLIII. Si quis vagum apprehensum tenuerit, a domino eius I pensa exigatur.

XLIV. Si quis iocusidarius vagum, quem tenet, pro XC denariis alicui dederit, X pensas persolvat et totidem emptor illius. Ubicumque equites, emptores, viatores venerint V, si voluerint, nummis tantum capecium comparent. Qui vero minoris pretii acceperit, aut qui maioris fecerit, LV pensas persolvat.

XLV. Denarii VIII, qui de liberis singulis colligebantur, a modo non accipiantur. De civilibus ebdomadariis octo denarios precipimus colligi, inter quos scilicet, si quis liber non a rege, sed ab ipsis civibus. Si autem liberi, qui regi per fines eorum transmigranti equos, currus subductorios et servitia stipendiaria suppeditabant, IIII denarios persolvant. Et similiter liberos, qui cum eis cohabitare consenserint, aut exeant.

XLVI. Si quis ysmahelitas in ieiunio seu comestione porcineque carnis abstinencia vel in ablutione aut in quolibet sue facinore deprehenderit, ysmahelite regi deputentur. Qui vero eos accusabat, de substantia eorum partem accipiat.

XLVII. Unicuique ville ysmahelitarum ecclesiam edificare, de eademque villa dotem dare precipimus. Que postquam edificata fuerit, media pares ville ysmahelitarum villam emigret, sicque altrinescus sedeant, et quasi unius moris in domo, nunc nobiscum, una eademque ecclesia Christi, in divina unanimiter consistant.

XLVIII. Ysmahelitarum vero nullus audeat filiam suam iungere matrimonio alicuius de genere sua, sed nostra.

XLIX. Si quis ysmahelitarum hospites habuerit, vel aliquem in convivium vocaverit, tam ipse, quam convivae eius de porcina tantum carne vescantur.

L. Si quis homicida apud comitem vel quemlibet inveniatur, per nuntium episcopi ad penitentiam queratur, qui si mittere rennuerit, eadem cum homicida sententia feriat.

Parricidia et cetera, que pretitulavimus homicidia, episcoporum censure vacare decrevimus, qui iuxta qualitatem facinorum et personarum, prout ipsis visum fuerit, canonice huiusmodi deliberentur, simplicia vero huiusmodi homicidia ab archidiacono et iudice seculari iudicentur, de quibus et ipsi nonam et decimam partem inter se dispartiant.

LI. Fur captus per triduum ligatus sine manuum siccatione et ignis concrematione teneatur, quarta autem die ad iudicem ducatur.

Fur quando ducitur a pristaldo domini sui, una ibi tantum familia sit, inde unus cum fure eat, qui si ire noluerit, iudex iudicare non formidet. Si vero ibi nulla familia fuerit, ad viciniorem domini illius locum iudex ligatum dirigat regi aut fur iudicetur.

LII. Si fur ductus salvus in iudicio apparuerit, captor eius iudicetur sententia, sed non aboculetur.

LIII. Si furi capto furtum proponi non possit, detur iudicium; in quo si salvus appareat, captor illius privetur substantia, quantam ipse fur dictus habere dinoscitur, non autem aboculetur. Fur inventus in iudicio culpabilis, aboculetur.

LIV. Si quis furatus quadrupes animal vel pretium eius, aut vestimentum pretii XX denariorum furetur, ut fur iudicetur.

LV. Si quis sola suspitione furem ceperit, ut fur culpabilis in iudicio iudicetur.

LVI. Uxor furis, que particeps est sceleris mariti, marito mancipetur servituti. Filii quoque eorum XV annorum et ultra, matris penam sortiantur; qui vero infra XV fuerint, impune dimittantur.

LVII. De strigis vero, que non sunt, ne ulla questio fiat.

LVIII. Mulieres partum suum necantes archidiacono oblate penitentiam agant. LIX.

Raptus mulierum episcopus seu archidiaconus diiudicet.

LX. Malefici per nuntium archidiaconi et comitis inventi iudicentur.

LXI. Adulteri episcopo vel archidiacono adducti debitis penarum iudiciis deputentur.

LXII. Si in villa, qua rex fuerit, equus perdatur, nullus de villa illa emendet; sed si circa partes illas latronum villa fuerit, hii ligentur.

LXIII. Si equites viatores in villa iacuerint, et equos perdiderint, a villanis hec emendentur; si vero extra villam, nullus de villa persolvat.

LXIV. Qui in tribus conciliis causam suam legaliter diffinire noluerit, eius querimonia amplius non auditur.

LXV. Nullus comitum vel militum in ecclesia persumpmat sibi vindicare potestatem preter solum episcopum.

LXVI. Presbyteri et abbates seu cuiuslibet persone dignitatis ecclesie decimationem persolvant, in cuius territorio agriculturam exercent aut vindemiant.

LXVII. Bigami et viduarum vel repudiarum mariti a coniugiis cessent illicitis, vel a cleri excludantur consortiis.

LXVIII. Missa non celebretur, nisi consecratis in locis, nisi causa necessitatis aliqua existente, et tunc in tentorio, seu alio mundo loco, sed vie tantum ac itineri hec vacet necessitas, non venationi, nec sine tabula itineraria.

LXIX. Reliquie sanctorum per viam non portentur, nisi a bono et religioso clerico.

LXX. Nullus, qui in clero estimatur, vestibus utatur laicalibus, utpote fisso pellicio vel tunica sparsa, manica gilva, rubra stragula vel viridi clamide, caliga seu cappa, calceo picto vel sericato, camisia quoque et tunica et serico; non in pectore conserantur nodis vel fibulis, sed amplexantur collum quasi.

LXXI. Quatour tempora in suis, ut hactenus mos fuit, locis celebrentur.

LXXII. Officium de Sancta Trinitate post octavas Penthecostes celebretur.

LXXIII. Sepulture christianorum non nisi in atriis ecclesiarum fiant.

LXXIV. Nullus Judeus Christianum mancipium emere vel vendere audeat, aut in suo servitio tenere sinatur; nunc vero qui habet, si interea datis sibi induciis non vendat, amittat.

LXXV. Agriculturam autem si quis eorum habet, paganis hanc mancipiis exercent. Possessiones quidem Judei, qui possunt emere, habeant, sed ipsi nusquam, nisi ubi sedes episcopalis est, manere sinantur.

LXXVI. Nullus habitantium in Hungaria, adiacentibusque Hungarie regionibus Hungaricum equum emere audeat. Quod si quis emeret, ac ut eum furatus sit, sibi impositum fuerit, infra Hungariam et usque ad fines Hungarie tantum causam sue excusationis protendere ei liceat. Cum vero equi venditorem in extrema querere voluerit patria, non illuc ire permittatur, sed ferri iudicium portet. Si reus apparuerit, pro fure iudicetur; si mundus, non ut fur teneatur, sed pretio, quo emerat, solummodo careat.

LXXVII. Nemo servum in genere Hungarorum vel quemlibet in Hungaria natum, etiam alienigenam, nec ancillam, exceptis lingue alterius servis, qui ab aliis ducti sunt regionibus, nec aliud animal preter boves masculos extra Hungariam vendere vel ducere audeat. Quod si quis comitum infringeret, aut honore suo privetur, aut duas rerum suarum partes amittat, tertia vero substantie portio uxori atque heredibus suis remaneat.

LXXVIII. Quisque comitum in comitatu suo tertiam ibique partem habeat de tributo. Rex vero ad plenum de tributo omnium similiter duas partes habeat.

LXXIX. Singuli comites per quemcunque suorum voluerint denarios, qui per universas Hungarie partes colliguntur, quantum super unoquoque centurionatu fuerit collectum, nominatim sub certo scribentes numero. Strigonium usque ad festum sancti Michaelis mittant. Neque prius rege comites vel centuriones partem accipiant, sed in eodem loco, videlicet Strigonii, fiat omnium partium divisio. Si quis autem usque ad tempus presignatum nummos illos cum pleno illuc numero non attulerit, duppliciter reddat.

LXXX. Liberi quique ac hospites, sicut Sclavi vel ceteri extranei, qui in terris laborant aliorum, pro libertate tantum denarios dent, non alios etiam denarios insuper pro opere aliquo dare cogantur.

LXXXI. De castellanis autem tam pro opere, quam pro libertate denarii accipiantur.

LXXXII. Egressuri de Hungaria a theloneariis tam regis, quam comitis, qui exitus tenent, sigillum querant, quod telonearius regis ab una parte cum sigillo comprimat, ab altera parte thelonearius comitis figura comitis sui concludat. Si quis absque tali sigillo egredi temptaverit, ut legis prevaricator L pensas persolvat.

LXXXIII. Si quispiam falsum testimonium alicui imposuerit, id est de eo pluribus ex villis sive rixe sive odii causa adtestantibus, ferro probetur iudicio; ac si mundus fuerit, impositor culpe X pensas solvat. Quod si reus erit, sane quidem res eius permaneat, sed ad modum crucis ferro in genis excoquatur, ut amplius testimonium ipsius refutetur.

LXXXIV. Si quis autem de furto accusatus ad ecclesiam fugerit, non illico teneri pro fure culpabili eum iudicamus, sed iudex cum presbitero ecclesie ipsius eum interroget, utrum culpabilis sit, necne; et si reum se esse fatebitur, pro ecclesia de obcecatione oculorum seu aliorum detruncatione membrorum liberetur. Si vero se non esse furem dixerit, excusandi se potestas ei non negetur, sed non de periculis supradictis eum ecclesia liberabit, si reus postea esse probabitur.

Item, si quis fur esse ab aliquo accusabitur, fur furti signo aput ipsum reperto vel comprobato, quod pro tali causa aliquid ulli restauraverit, unde de villis aliis plures eum criminabantur.

THE LAW OF KING COLOMAN (1095–1116)

Here begin the laws of Coloman, by the grace of God, king of Hungary.¹

To Archbishop Seraphin,² burning with the fire of divine virtues, from Alberich,³ who, although the least, is nevertheless called a servant of holiness in the palace of heavenly contemplation.

We, through Christ, have such boldness not because we ourselves are able to think anything as it were by ourselves, but because our strength is from God.⁴ The grace of spiritual inspiration has enriched your mind from the treasure of heavenly wisdom and adorned the halls of your household with numerous men of eloquence and hard-earned learning as with so many gems. Thus, the crudeness of my weak, scarcely sufficient intellect stands in dread when you, O Bishop, command that I, inarticulate and almost utterly devoid of refinement, if I may say so, sift the ordinances of royal gatherings and summarize in my meager distinction, emaciated by fasting, the decrees of the council for the entire kingdom.

Neither am I, on account of any natural ability in rendering wise counsel, brought into royal consultations; nor am I on account of my humble state and despised poverty admitted to the council, but have stood before the doors. But because I choose to pay greater heed to obedience than to deny anything to love which hopeth all things,⁵ I prefer to venture beyond my powers in order to obey rather than presumptuously to do too little. Although, because of my lack of experience in composition, I am bereft of eloquence, still love cannot refuse obedience.⁶ Furthermore, in this work, I am not following the path of my own choosing, but I pursue the course trodden by others before me, for which reason I have no doubt of finding easy pardon in you if my freely wandering

¹ Coloman used the expanded royal style including Croatia and Dalmatia—acquired through the efforts of both Coloman and King Ladislas between 1091 and 1105—only in charters for that kingdom. The archaic, or “personal-ethnic”, form of rex Hungarorum or Pannoniorum was used interchangeably with the “territorial” form, rex Hungariae (as here) until c. 1120–1130; Bálint Hóman, “A magyar nép neve és a magyar király címe a középkori latinságban” [The Name of the Hungarian People and the Style of Hungarian Kings in Medieval Latinity] (originally in Történelmi Szemle [1917]), Történetírás és forráskritika (Bp.: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1938), pp. 191–250, espec. 227–228.

² Seraphin was Archbishop of Esztergom c. 1095–1104; see Nándor Knauz, ed. Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 2 volumes. Esztergom: Horak, 1874–82, 1: 68f

³ Nothing more is known of the priest Alberich than what he tells about himself in the proemium, that is, that he was “poor” (perhaps a monk) and that he did not understand the language of the Hungarians well; see István Borzsák, “A magyar Horatius” [The Hungarian Horace], in Róbert Falus, ed., Horatius (Budapest: Bibliotheca, 1958), p. 287f.

⁴ 2 Cor 3: 5.

⁵ Cf. 1 Cor 13: 7.

⁶ Cf. Sancti Benedicti Regula Monachorum, c. 68: “... ex caritate confidens de adiutorio Dei obediat,” that is: “... let him obey out of love, trusting in the help of God,” St. Benedict’s Rule for Monasteries, trans. L. J. Doyle (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press [c. 1948]), p. 96 pen deviates from the oft-uncertain tracks, which condition has also brought about the extended delay of this enterprise.

But there may, perhaps, be some who without due consideration maintain that the Council of Tarcál,⁷ of which I speak, was superfluous, asserting with little wisdom that it is preferable to hold to the ancient propositions of those who lived in an earlier day. It might be useful to consider for a little while how frivolously presented and rashly advanced these assertions are, because these detractors of the kingdom are following their own individual instinct rather than furthering jointly the progress of the kingdom. For who may doubt that the law given to our people by our holy father Stephen,⁸ that truly apostolic man, was in certain matters more harsh and in others more lenient, in some matters more punitive and in others more gently indulgent, but let no one escape the rod of discipline. Although the time of predestination had not yet brought about any firm advocate of the faith, yet it would be wrong to believe that all this could have occurred contrary to divine intention.

Since in the time of the said father this entire kingdom wallowed in barbaric crudity, and the rough, coerced Christian converts kicked against the admonitory prod of holy faith and answered the penitential lashes of the switch of correction with bites, it was most necessary that the coercion of holy discipline converted nominal believers to the faith while it called the already converted to account for their sins through penance. But the most Christian King Columban,⁹ endowed with the artless grace of a dove and with all discernment of the virtues, after having seen that mature faith had acquired the strength of perfect religion, wisely considered releasing the bonds of legal fetters, or rather he deemed it unseemly that the now willing soldiers of the faith, whom not even death would be able to keep from confessing the truth recently embraced, should be tormented by the fear of legal punishment.

When he saw that, owing to civil wars which grew even worse down to his own time, the legal order of the kingdom which had already lost in large measure its ancestral traditions was destroyed and that the honor of the court was held for naught, fearing lest the warrior unused to peace and the settled guest unused to valor should become irrevocably men of iniquity, he assembled the magnates of the kingdom and reviewed with the advice of the entire council the text of the laws of the said King Stephen of holy memory. From this, if you examine the matter closely, he did not take anything away, but rather added to it, not however as a “founder” but as a “continuator” so that the tender seedlings showered, as it were, by this wholesome watering may attain the growth of justice. And while he [Stephen] was the destroyer of unbelievers and the enforcer of the law against transgressors, the other [Coloman] is the strengthener of upright believers in righteousness. The former armed the people with the shield of faith, the latter has surrounded the excesses of worldly ambition with the girdle of justice. The former struck fear in souls with the sword of the word of

⁷ Although different corrupt spellings are found in the manuscripts (Tursollium, Cursollium), the meeting is believed to have been held in Tarcál, Co. Zemplén in north-eastern Hungary

⁸ The writer, Alberich, in spite of his foreign origins, here identifies himself with “our people” and “our” holy father, Stephen.

⁹ Note the play on the name: Coloman–Columban: columba, “the dove”.

God, the latter adorned them with the helmet of salvation.

This object of both kings was set down so that while deservedly avenging punishment should consume the sons of perdition, the sons of predestination should be cherished. For the king beareth not the sword in vain, for he is the minister of God, revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil, for rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Who is he that will harm you, if you be followers of what is good?¹⁰ So much for this.

Moreover, I would even be able to respond in writing to the above mentioned disparagers of particular provisions of this council, which they falsely assert to be unnecessary, if I did not fear to tire the ears of your modesty, O glory of bishops, by going beyond the compass of this introductory letter. Nevertheless, anyone can infer that response from what I have written down here in reasonably moderate brevity. Nonetheless, you my lord who knows that I am not very familiar with the language of these people, if my pen should stray from the path of my chosen route, I implore your customary benevolence toward me to prune the excesses, to supply the defects, to correct the errors, to promote with patient grace what has been properly expressed. I ask that you, before these should come to the public ear,¹¹ kindly to set your loving fingers to them so that at least what I have set down correctly, should according to your most learned scrutiny be further protected by your judgment against the malice of critics.

1 It pleased the king and the general council that possessions given to monasteries and churches by the holy king Stephen shall remain undisturbed.

2 Since our people are often as much burdened by the hardship of travel as by poverty, and cannot come to the royal court whenever necessary, we order that twice yearly, namely on the feast of the Apostles Philip and James and during the octave of St. Michael¹² a synod be held in each bishopric at which the ispán, or ispáns as well as authorities in other offices shall assemble with their bishops,¹³ and whoever does not appear, even if summoned without a seal,¹⁴ shall be deemed guilty.

¹⁰ The author has strung together passages from Romans 13: 4 and 13: 3, and 1 Peter 3: 13, in that order.

¹¹ Note here and the earlier references to tiring the archbishop's ears, the assumption that this writing would be read aloud

¹² That is, 1 May and 6 October, the latter being eight days after Michaelmas (29 September). This measure is the beginning of what became the "octavial" courts, later four annually.

3 A foreign priest or deacon shall be received only with commendatory letters. Those who have already arrived shall be examined to learn whether they came legally, so that whoever we hear has a bad name shall be suspended from office, until they are cleared by judgment or expelled from the land.

4 No foreigner may be received without a surety.¹⁵

5 The chaplains of bishops, ispáns, and others shall be summoned to appear at court by the seal of the bishop or the archbishop.¹⁶

6 If a clerk has a suit with a layman, the layman shall be summoned by the seal of the judge; and if a layman has a suit with a clerk, the clerk shall be summoned by the seal of the bishop or archpriest¹⁷ and tried by them in the presence of the former's judge.

7 If two ispáns have any sort of legal dispute, they shall be heard in the above mentioned synod.

8 If two abbots should litigate, they shall be judged in the same synod.

¹³ Something else than the annual diocesan synod familiar in the Western church is intended here. The fact that these synods were to hear petitions from persons who otherwise would have appeared at the royal court and the presence of ispáns and other royal officers make this distinction clear. (The ispán/comes was a royal officer in charge of a county or a castle district; however, apparently the higher strata of freemen were in general referred to as comites). There is only one, rather inconclusive, reference to such a mixed synod from 1111 (see [Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest: MTA, 1923–61). 1: 43], hence it is unlikely that it became a general practice. The earliest documented diocesan synod dates from the late twelfth century (1198), when the Bishop of Vác received approval to hold an annual synod on the feast of the Nativity of the Blessed Virgin (8 September), not one of the feasts specified here; see P.C. Péterffy, Sacra concilia ecclesiae romano-catholicae in regno Hungariae celebrata (Pozsony: Royer, 1741), I, 81–85; and O. Hageneder and A. Haidacher, Die Register Innozenz' III. (Graz-Köln: Böhlau Nachfolger, 1964), I, 412

¹⁴ Sine sigillo: usually parties were summoned by the sending of a seal (see Ladislav III: 3); but twelfth-century evidence suggests that citation by an agent of the court (per hominem) was also practiced (cf. Milán Sufflay, in Századok, 40 [1906], 310, referring to a charter of King Stephen III of 1167 [Szentpetery, Regesta No. 112]; hence the reference here as well as below, in ch. 23, may be to such an alternative procedure.

¹⁵ The text has indigena (“native”) instead of “foreigner,” but that does not make sense. It is possible that this word, which in the later Middle Ages meant a foreigner who had acquired resident status, crept in during later copying of the decretum. On the legal duties of a surety, see, Ladislav II: 1 (with n. 5).

¹⁶ This chapter and the following one confirm in somewhat more technical detail clerical exemption from secular jurisdiction (privilegium fori). See, Stephen I: 4, with n. 7, and also below, ch. 14

¹⁷ In the time of King Coloman the archdeacon (Hung.: főesperes), also called archpriest (see Syn. Szab. I: 4), was an administrator of a district without immediate pastoral duties; cf. Anton Szentirmai, “Der Ursprung des Archidiakonats in Ungarn” Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht, 7 (1956), 231–244; and idem, “Das Recht des Erzdechanten (Archidiakon) in Ungarn während des Mittelalters,” Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan. Abt. 43 (19–), 132–201

9 The major officers and chaplains of the king or the duke¹⁸ for whom it would be demeaning to be brought before an inferior judge, shall be judged in the same synod.

10 If an arrogant judge should fail to come to the said synod, he shall be judged by his accuser.

11 If the major officers of the king and the duke litigate either among themselves or with magnates and refuse to go to a judge, they shall clear the case with their judge.¹⁹

12 Officers of the duke who are in a royal county²⁰ and those of the king who are in a ducal county shall litigate before the ispán and the judge, the lesser ones before the judge.

13 If there is a lawsuit between ispáns, or between their peoples, their cases shall be heard either by the synod or the neighboring ispán.

14 No secular judge shall presume to summon a clerk.

15 Because our royal court would appear the meaner the more it lacks necessities, it is our pleasure, lest our riches be outshone by its poverty, that all fish ponds revert to the royal fisc except those granted by St. Stephen, because it was shameful that what was subtracted from us subtracted from the honor of the court where it is proper that we and those who come here find an abundance of honor.

16 Similarly we have decreed that although other fish ponds given to monasteries or churches are to be returned, those for ordinary necessities shall be left for the use of the brothers and only the excess shall be taken away.

17 The vineyards, fields, and lands granted by any king shall remain forever with those to whom they were given.

18 We do not permit forests given to churches to be taken away.

19 Dispossessed former peasants²¹ shall, if they have no land elsewhere, return to their own place. If their land was given to monasteries or churches, and they have other land, this grant shall remain inviolable.

¹⁸ In the eleventh and early twelfth century, younger brothers of the king were given the title of dux and part of country assigned to them as a kind of apanage, see, Ladislav III: 9, with n. 19. Now see also Dániel Bagi, "The dynastic conflicts of the eleventh century in the Illuminated Chronicle," in: Studies on the Illuminated Chronicle, János M. Bak and László Veszprémy, eds. (Budapest: CEU Press/National Széchenyi Library, 2018) 139-58.

¹⁹ The reference is unclear. Judex eorum may refer to the comes curiae regis ((Hung. országbíró): originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200)), or to the palatine who at that time also acted as judge of the royal household

²⁰ Mega is Latinized from the Hungarian word megye, meaning "county" or probably also "border of a county, which may have been the original Slavic meaning, whence the loan came.

²¹ It is not known, what kind of people are meant here. These coloni may have been poor freemen whose lands the king assigned to ecclesiastical lords; apparently some of them could move to other lands, in which case the donation was permanent. The exact meaning is debatable. The word is borrowed from Classical Latin, where it meant agricultural slaves settled on their lord's land; in Hungary it came to be used for

20000 Any possession given by St. Stephen shall devolve to any successor or heir in natural succession. But possessions given by other kings shall pass from father to son, and in the absence of sons the father's brother should inherit, and upon his death his sons may not be disinherited. If the said uncle can not be found, the inheritance shall be assigned to the king.²²

21 Inheritance of purchased property shall not be taken away from any kind of heir, but shall be confined by the same testimony.²³

22 We forbid holding the ordeal by iron and water in any church except an episcopal see, the greater collegiate churches, and in Pressburg and Nitra.²⁴

23 A judge who decides cases unjustly shall be summoned to the king's court with a seal, but to the synod without a seal.

24 He who neglects to come to the assembly of bishops and ispáns shall be condemned. They, however, shall assemble with such care, deliberate with such attention, and balance the scales of the tenant peasants only in the later fifteenth century, perhaps referring to the deterioration of the condition of tenant peasants (jobbágy, jobagio). Here, clearly, just a Classicism, as it refers to peasant with (lost) property.

²² This chapter seems to be the first differentiation of what became regarded as "ancestral" and "acquired" property. The "grants by St. Stephen" probably included also those allodial possessions that remained in the hands of the original clans, for which traditional inheritance by birth was the custom. For later donations the law sought to establish a more limited hereditary right, with escheat in the case of extinction of the male branch (defectio seminis); see Eszter Waldapfel, "Nemesi birtokjogunk kialakulása a középkorban" [Development of Our Noble Property Rights in the Middle Ages], Századok 65 (1931), 131–167, 259–272, espec. 143–157

²³ This chapter refers to the inheritance of possessions bought for money (possessio emptitia in later legal terminology), which were regarded as mobile property and freely heritable; see Waldapfel, as above, and also József Holub, "A vásárolt fekvő jószág jogi természete régi jogunkban" [The Legal Character of Purchased Real Property in Our Ancient Law], in Sándor Domanovszky, ed., Emlékkönyv Károlyi Árpád (Budapest: Sárkány, 1933), pp. 246–254

²⁴ The episcopal sees of this time were Esztergom, Eger, Győr, Pécs, Vác, Veszprém, Kalocsa, Csanád/Cenad 0(Nagy)vár/Oradea, Zagreb, and one in Transylvania; see Gábor Thoroczkay, "The Dioceses and Bishops of St. Stephen," in: Attila Zsoldos, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country. A Newborn Kingdom in Central Europe: Hungary (Budapest: Lucidus, 2004) pp. 49–68. The collegiate churches, the provosts of which were appointed by the king, included Arad, Óbuda, Székesfehérvár, and Titel. These and several later episcopal and collegiate foundations came to function as loca credibilia, where judicial functions were combined with the privilege of authenticating documents; see Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555 and Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Rady, Martyn, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003), 25–35. Pressburg, (today: Bratislava, Slovakia) was an important border fortress and its collegiate church enjoyed special status (see [C. Rimely], Capitulum insignis Ecclesiae Collegialis Posoniensis... [Possoni: Angermeyer, 1880]); Nitra was to become the twelfth episcopal see of Hungary, but its organization was not completed until the last years of Coloman's reign (see Erik Fügedi, "Kirchliche Topographie und Siedlungsgeschichte im Mittelalter in der Slowakei", Studia Slavica Acad. Sc. Hung., 5 [1959], 363–400)

justice with equal weight so very diligently that they neither condemn innocence out of hatred on the one hand, nor defend guilt out of friendship on the other.

25 Just as we have decreed that a third of the tolls and customs be given to the ispáns, so we also assign a tenth to the bishops; because the pages of both the Old and New Testament declare that a tithe ought to be given to them, it would be unwise and ill advised if we presumed to break the rule of the saints which we ought rather to fulfill with utmost devotion.²⁵

26 If someone adduced as a witness strives to prove the truth of another by his own testimony, we order that his testimony to be so received that first he shall confess his sins to the priest and that second, he shall have a plow,²⁶ so that there shall be a safeguard for true testimony through the priest in the confession and through property available to redeem the crime of lying.

27 No one should dare bear witness until he has confessed his sins. And if anyone's testimony is proven false, henceforth his testimony will not be accepted.²⁷

28 If a bailiff²⁸ of a judge is beaten by anyone on account of a decision rendered in a case, in consequence of this the ispán of the county shall send word and whatever had been decided [by the judge] shall be taken away by force.²⁹

²⁵ On the division of revenues between the king and his officers, Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Period," in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018.) pp. 255–64 on the ecclesiastical tithe Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn", Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan. Abt. 61 (1975) 228–257.

²⁶ The law probably refers not only to the implement, but by implication also to the possession of land; aratrum was used in medieval sources for both. Estimates of the size of "a ploughland" in the early twelfth century are rather uncertain: it could have been as small as 50 or as large as 120 ha. (Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1916), pp. 491–494; L. Bendeffy, "Középkori hossz- és területmértékek" [Medieval Measures of Length and Surface], in Fejezetek a magyar méréstudomány történetéből (Bp.: MTA, 1959), p. 83f.

²⁷ Apparently not willful perjury is meant—that was punished more severely (see below, ch. 83), though less harshly than in Stephen I: 17.

²⁸ The bailiff (pristaldus, probably from a Slavic loan-word, pristav*; later called homo regius, i.e. royal bailiff, or homo of any other judge) was the executive officer of a judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. In early laws, the bishop's man collecting the tithe is also called pristaldus. In the eleventh century the bailiff may have been identical with the bilochus, an officer of the court delivering the seal of summons (Hung: billog).

²⁹ The text is obviously corrupt in all manuscripts, as the object of the passive clause "be sent by the ispán" is missing. Most editors of the CJH amended it to mean that the culprit be sent to the ispán, but the manuscripts do not support such a reading. At any rate, the gist of the matter is that the ispán has to act as the authority to enforce the sentence if the bailiff is hindered by violent resistance from so doing.

29 We command that the bailiffs of judges shall have the same qualifications as those demanded for suitable witnesses in the chapter above.³⁰

30 If a judge's bailiff does anything unjust while acting officially, he shall be punished together with the judge who ordered him to act unjustly.

31 Restitution to anyone for damage caused by a judge through his bailiff shall be made from the judge's goods.

32 If someone who unjustly usurped possession of the land of another is found guilty by ordeal, he shall lose the same amount of his own land and pay additionally ten pensae.

33 Merchants entirely devoted to business for the purpose of growing rich shall pay double the old customs levy, but the poor who live from trade shall pay the usual levy.

34 If someone sells something in the market from his own domestic goods, he shall pay the customs levy set by the law of St. Stephen.³¹

35 If a guest lives adjacent to the land of men of the castle,³² he shall either take part in their campaigns to the extent of half of his property or pay eight pennies.³³

36 When the king or the duke enters any county, he shall be given a war horse from the county;³⁴ in case it should die, fifteen pensae shall be given to the owner of the horse. If, however, it should be in any way injured, half of that price shall be paid for the horse.

³⁰ Ch. 26, above

³¹ No such law of King Stephen has been preserved in the extant collections. This is clear evidence that the legislation of St. Stephen was more extensive than the surviving record indicates. Presumably, the customs levy in the law of St. Stephen is identical with the "old" or "usual" levy cited in chapter 33. Evidence for the tricesima, which probably was first an internal toll or the royal portion of customs granted to nobles and churches, dates from much later; see Zsigmond Pál Pach, A harmincadvám eredete [The origin of the thirtieth customs]. Budapest: Akadémiai, 1990, now also Boglárka Weisz, "Az Árpád-kori harmincadvám," in: Erősségénél fogva várépítésre való. Tanulmányok a 70 éves Németh Péter tiszteletére, Juan Cabello, C. Tóth Norbert, eds. (Nyíregyháza: Jóna András Múzeum, 2011) pp. 267-78.

³² The exact social category described by civiles or cives is unclear, they may have been freemen obligated to military service of the castles; see Stephen I: 8 with n. 12.

³³ The "eight-penny-tax" seems to have been imposed on all free men wherever they lived (see also below, chapters 40, 45, 79–81), and was collected into the early thirteenth century; see F. Eckhart, A királyi adózás története Magyarországon 1323-ig [History of Royal Taxation in Hungary until 1323] (Arad: Réthy, 1908), pp. 14–29; see also Weisz as n. 25, above.

³⁴ It appears that the king and the duke were entitled to the use of the best war horse in the county (equus megalis exercitualis). This no doubt stems from the king's function as military commander; György Györffy (István király és műve, p. 240) cites evidence for the existence of "the king's horses" (equos regis) from the late eleventh century, but these seem to be kept on the royal domain. The claims of the king to supplies for his entourage (descensus), mentioned in the thirteenth century may have been a late version of these

If major news reaches the marches,³⁵ the ispán shall send two messengers equipped with four war horses to the king. They shall provide their own food on the way there and shall claim the cost of travel and an equal amount for the return journey from the count palatine.³⁶ If, however, their horses shall die or be hurt, as many pensae as we have mentioned above shall be paid for the horses, but if they return unhurt, the trip will be deemed a military campaign.

37 If the king enters the border of a county,³⁷ two judges from that county shall go with him, and they shall, after careful review, decide the lawsuits of its people; and they shall be judged by the count palatine if a popular outcry arises against them.

38 If the king perchance dispatches a man of the castle to an ispán or an official, he shall only go on campaign, otherwise he shall be returned to the people whence he came.

39 We forbid anyone to keep a man of the castle who escaped without the king's permission, and if anyone keeps such a man, he shall pay a fine for having broken the law.

40 If ispáns have free men in their villages from whom they can get horses and collect one hundred pensae, they shall provide the king with one man in armor out of this income. If, however, they can collect only forty pensae, they shall produce a soldier without armor, and if less, they shall retain this amount for their own use.

41 If the king grants a stray *servus*³⁸ to anyone, he shall shave half his head; if he does not do so, he shall lose ten pensae. If he has given him a wife, he shall lose her with him.

42 Anyone who keeps a fugitive without the king's permission shall pay fifty-five pensae. And if anything was stolen from the house of his master, the master shall be cleansed by ordeal and shall present his guarantor, and even if he should be innocent he shall pay the same amount as the ³⁵ The "marches" (border counties) (confinia, indagines) refers to a fairly wide area around the settled parts of the Carpathian basin (at least until the mid-thirteenth century), with wastes and obstacles protecting the center of the kingdom, permitting access only through gates (portae). The ispán in charge of the generally larger counties that bordered the frontier was also commander of border guards (örök) and controller of the access routes, hence an especially important royal officer (see Hans-Gerd Göckenjan, Hilfsvölker und Grenzwächter im mittelalterlichen Ungarn. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1972 5–11.). See also Ladislás II: 15–16, with n. 18–19.

³⁶ The comes palatinus was at this time still essentially the head of the royal household; to become the highest officer of the realm, itinerant judge and deputy of the king.

³⁷ For mega (Hungarian: megye), see above, n. 20.

³⁸ The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the "easy way out" by keeping the Latin term and leaving the man who retained the fugitive.³⁹ If he has nothing to pay, he shall lose his freedom.

43 A fugitive caught and held by someone shall be redeemed by his master with one pensae.

44 If a collector of lost things⁴⁰ who holds a fugitive gives him to anyone for ninety pennies, both he and the buyer shall pay ten pensae. Mounted men, merchants, and travelers, wherever they go, shall purchase a stack of grain,⁴¹ if they wish, for five pennies. Anyone who receives a lesser price or raises it higher shall pay fifty pensae.

45 The eight pennies which were collected from every freeman shall henceforth not be taken.⁴² We order eight pennies to be taken from those men of the castles who serve for a week, among whom, namely are those who are free of the men of the castle but not of the king.⁴³ Those freemen, however, who usually furnish the king with horses, transport wagons, and services for pay when he passes through their region, shall pay four pennies. And the freemen who decided to live with these men shall do likewise, or leave.

46 If anyone catches Ishmaelites⁴⁴ in fasting, or while eatingin abstaining from pork, or bathing, ³⁹The passage is unclear. Why the fugitive's original master, who suffered a loss through theft, should be forced to undergo the ordeal, and why if he is proven innocent, he must pay the same large fine as the fugitive's protector cannot be understood. The text must be corrupt in both manuscripts.

⁴⁰On the jókszedő, see Ladislav III: 13, with n. 28

⁴¹*Capecium*, from Hungarian kepe, a number of sheaves stacked in the form of crosses or other piles; "...the amount of grain in a capecium cannot even be guessed" (Hóman, Pénztörténet., p. 484), as we know neither the size of the sheaves nor the number of them in a usual stack. A modern kepe may contain nine to twenty-seven sheaves, of course, of different sizes, largely depending on regional practice. The right of travellers to free or cheap fodder is legislated in a near-contemporary constitution of Emperor Henry IV: Iuramentum pacis a. 1085, MGH LL, II. 59

⁴²See above, ch. 35 with n. 32.

⁴³*Hedbomadarii* were men of the castle (as well as dependent cultivators on private estates) who enjoyed a certain amount of freedom by being obligated to serve only three days per week. György Györffy, in Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft der Ungarn um die Jahrtausendwende, (Wien-Köln-Graz: Böhlau, 1983) pp. 151–3 [Also published as Studia Historica Acad. Sc. Hung. 186. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1983] compared them to the Anglo-Saxon gebur (freedmen, who served two days weekly) and pointed to parallels in the Lex Baiuvariorum I: 1, 13 (MGH LL, III, 180, 6–10)

⁴⁴"Ishmaelites" were Muslims of probably Turkic origin who lived in medieval Hungary not only as tradesmen (see Syn. Szab. 9), but also as settled villagers obliged to military service; cf. Göckenjan, Hilfsvölker (s.v. kaliz). This chapter and those that follow demonstrate the king's attempts at their assimilation, which appears to have been so successful that when Abu Hâmid from Granada visited Hungary in 1153 he found that his coreligionists were about to vanish by becoming Christians. The "Ishmaelite" or "Saracen" counts, tax farmers, and other officers of the Chamber, repeatedly referred to in the thirteenth century (see 1222: 24; 1231: 18), were probably later immigrants from Volga-Bulgaria (see Görgy Györffy, "Ungarn von 895 bis 1400," in Europäische Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte im Mittelalter, ed. J. A. van Houtte, Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1980. [Handbuch der europäischen Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte, ed. H. Kellenbenz, II], pp. 625–55, here p. 645 and B. Mátyás, "Az Árpád-kori magyarországi muszlimok eredete," [Origin of Árpadian age Muslims in Hungary] Fons 21 (2014), 315–329). See also S. Balic, "Der Islam im mittelalterlichen Ungarn", Südost-Forschungen, 23 (1964), 19–35, and now: Nóra Berend. At the or in any of their misdeeds, such Ishmaelites shall be considered to belong to the king. He who accuses them, however, shall receive a part of their property.

47 We command that each village of the Ishmaelites shall build a church, and from each of these villages an endowment shall be given. After it has been built, half the Ishmaelites shall leave the village and settle in another place, and they shall thenceforth live united in custom together with us in that house which is one and the same Church of Christ, harmoniously in one religion.

48 No Ishmaelite shall dare marry his daughter to anyone of his own people, but only to one of us.

49 If an Ishmaelite has a guest, or anyone invited to dinner, both he and his table companions shall eat only pork for meat.

50 If a killer is found in the house of an ispán or anyone else, he shall be asked to do penance by a messenger of the bishop, and if he refuses to extradite him, he shall suffer the same punishment as the killer.

We have decreed that parricide and other crimes which we have classified as homicide pertain to the judgment of the bishops and shall be judged in accordance with canonical procedure depending upon the magnitude of the crime and the status of the person as they see fit; simple homicide, however, shall be judged by the archdeacon⁴⁵ and the secular judge, who shall divide the ninth and the tenth part⁴⁶ between them.

51 A captured thief shall be tied up and held for three days without having his hand seared and burned by fire, but on the fourth day he shall be brought to the judge.

When the thief is taken by the bailiff of his master, if there is a “family” in that place, one of them shall go with the thief, and if he does not want to go, the judge shall not hesitate to judge him. If, however, there is no “family,” the judge shall send him bound to the nearest estate of his lord and the thief is to be judged at law.⁴⁷

52 If a thief brought to judgment shall appear innocent in the ordeal, his captor shall be judged, but not blinded.⁴⁸

53 If it is not possible to establish that the captured thief was responsible for the theft, he shall be gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and “Pagans” in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) esp. pp. 6-8, 84-7, 237-44

⁴⁵ See above, n. 17.

⁴⁶ The reference here may be to the judicial fines of the tenth and the ninth (see Ladislav III: 22, n. 46) or to two-tenths of the confiscated property of the killer (cf. Ladislav II: 8).

⁴⁷ Familia in medieval texts tends to mean (religious) “community” or “household settlement” rather than “family” in the modern sense. The measures in this passage aim at assuring that if there were other servants living in the location, a fellow-servus accompanied the thief to the judge, probably in order to guide the convicted and –according to the law (see below) blinded– man back to his home granted an ordeal; if he appears innocent, his captor shall be deprived of as much property as the alleged thief is known to have had, but he shall not be blinded. The thief found guilty in the ordeal shall be blinded.

⁴⁸ Blinding as customary punishment for theft was already decreed in Ladislav III: 8; a contemporary law of Emperor Henry IV contains similar clauses (Constitutio pacis generalis a. 1103. MGH LL, II, 60)

54 If someone should steal a four-footed animal or its equivalent, or clothing of the value of twenty pennies, he shall be judged a thief.

55 If someone has seized a thief on mere suspicion, he shall be judged as a proven thief in the ordeal.

56 The wife of a thief, who was an accomplice in the crime of her husband, shall be reduced to the same servitude as the husband. Their sons fifteen years and older⁴⁹ shall share their mother's punishment; those under fifteen, however, shall be released.

57 Concerning vampires, who do not exist, no inquiry shall be made.⁵⁰

58 Women who kill their offspring shall be taken to the archdeacon and do penance.

59 The bishop or the archdeacon shall be the judge in cases of abduction of women.⁵¹

60 Sorcerers discovered by messengers of the archdeacon and the ispán shall be judged by them.⁵²

61 Adulterers brought before the bishop or archdeacon should be punished with the ⁴⁹ Legal age does not seem to have been settled at this time; in the laws of Ladislav (II: 12) ten-year old children are exempt from their parents's punishments. For a general discussion of the issue, see Joseph. Holub, "Le rôle de l'âge dans la droit hongroise du moyen âge," Revue d'histoire de droit française et étrangère, 1 (1922), 78–140.

⁵⁰ This passage concerning the striga was for a long time interpreted as proof for King Coloman's enlightened ideas on witches. The actual interpretation is more difficult. The original meaning of striga (derived from strix, a screech owl believed capable of sucking blood from young children, see Pliny the Elder, Historia naturalis, 11, 39, 95 § 232 and Ovid, Metamorphoses, 7, 269) was indeed a certain kind of witch, able to change form, and apparently cannibalistic. Lombard and Carolingian laws punished those who believed in such pagan myths (e.g., Cap. de part. Saxon, c. 6, MGH Cap., I. 68f.; Ed. Rothari c. 376, ed. F. Beyerle, Leges Langobardorum 643–886, 2nd ed. [Witzenhausen: Deutscher Institutsverl., 1962], p. 91; cf. The Lombard Laws, trans. K. Fisher Drew [Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1973], p. 126f.), but gradually striga seems to have become the name for all kinds of witches and vampires. It is in this general sense that King Stephen legislated against them (see above Stephen I: 33). James B. Russell in Witchcraft in the Middle Ages (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell Univ. Press, 1972), p. 97, is inclined to see a "debate" between King Coloman and his predecessors in which he represents the more traditional ecclesiastical view, along the lines of the Carolingian denial of the existence of form-changers. Russell appears not to have noted that the word striga is used in a different sense here in contrast to the decreta of Stephen and Ladislav. It is highly unlikely, therefore, that Coloman was responsible for an "unusual reversal of policy" as he suggests.

⁵¹ Cf. Stephen I: 27, with n. 35

⁵² This article modifies the law of St. Stephen (I: 34) which had left the punishment of malefici to the injured party and only diviners were to be judged by the bishop; here sorcery is treated as a public delict and prosecuted by the joint royal-ecclesiastical court appropriate punishments.

62 If in a village visited by the king a horse is lost, no one from that village should make amends, but if there is a village of thieves nearby in that region, those people shall be held responsible.

63 If mounted travelers should rest in a village and lose their horses, the villagers shall make amends to them; but if the loss occurred outside the village, no one from the village shall pay.

64 He who declines to have his suit legally decided in three councils,⁵³ shall not have his case heard any further.

65 No ispán or warrior shall presume to claim any authority in the church except the bishop himself.⁵⁴

66 Priests and abbots or any other ecclesiastical dignitaries shall pay the tithe to the church of the region in which they are engaged in agriculture or viticulture.

67 Bigamous [priests]⁵⁵ or the husbands of widows or of women repudiated by their husbands shall give up these illicit marriages or be excluded from the clergy.

68 Mass shall not be celebrated except in consecrated places, unless compelled by reason of necessity, but only if this necessity is a journey or travel and not a hunt, and then only in a tent or any clean place and not without a portable altar.

69 The relics of saints shall be carried only by a good and religious clerk.

70 No one recognized to be a clerk shall wear secular clothing, namely: a slit fur cloak or spotted tunic, pale yellow gloves, a red striped coat, a green mantle, boots or a fur cap, painted or silken footwear, silk shirts and tunics, and these are not to be held together at the breast by knots

⁵³ The text reads concilia, which can refer to the royal council, the semi-annual assembly decreed above in ch. 2, or some local or central court session. From later evidence four annual court sessions are known. The threefold summons is a characteristic feature of several Germanic law codes and became an integral part of Hungarian judicial procedure.

⁵⁴ The prohibition seems aimed at practices limited to the proprietary church on which see Anton Szentirmai, "Die Anfänge des Rechts der Pfarrei in Ungarn," Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht, 10 (1959), 30–35; and Elemér Mályusz, "Die Eigenkirche in Ungarn," Studien zur Geschichte Osteuropas [Gedenkschrift für Hans Felix Schmid], 3 (1966), 76–95.

⁵⁵ The concept of bigami mentioned here is derived ultimately from 1 Tim 3: 2 and 12. It passed from early church practice into Byzantine canon law, and thence into this decretum (cf. also Syn. Szab. I). It is an explicit prohibition of all second marriages to those in both major and minor orders. In Byzantine history this canonical prohibition was a significant issue in both the Moechian and Tetragamist controversies. The inclusion of this measure, therefore, serves to document Byzantine influence in the Hungarian church; see Anton Szentirmai, "Der Einfluß des byzantinischen Kirchenrechts auf die Gesetzgebung Ungarns im XI–XII. Jahrhundert." Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinistischen Gesellschaft, 10 (1961), 76–79; and in general, Gyula Moravcsik, Byzantium and the Magyars, (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1970) pp. 102–118 with literature.

or fibulae, but are to be such as embrace the neck, as it were.⁵⁶

71 The Ember days shall be observed in their places as has been customary.⁵⁷

72 The office of the Holy Trinity shall be celebrated after the octave of Pentecost.⁵⁸

73 Burials of Christians shall take place only in churchyards.

74 No Jew should dare to buy or sell Christian slaves, nor may he retain any in his service; and he shall lose those which he has now, if he does not sell them in the allotted time.⁵⁹

75 If, however, one of them has agricultural land, he shall farm it with pagan slaves. Jews, if they can afford it, are permitted to hold property, but they themselves may not reside outside episcopal sees.

76 No inhabitant of Hungary and the regions adjacent to Hungary should dare to buy a Hungarian horse. If someone buys one, and he is accused of having stolen it, he is permitted to extend the scope of his defense within and up to the borders of Hungary. But if he wishes to search for the seller of the horse in foreign lands, he shall not be allowed to go there, but shall be put to the ordeal of iron. If he is found guilty he shall be sentenced as a thief, and if innocent, he shall not be regarded as a thief but shall be deprived of the price at which he bought it.

77 No one should dare to sell or convey outside of Hungary a male or female slave of Hungarian origin or anyone born in Hungary, even one of foreign parent- age, except for slaves of other languages who were brought in from other regions, nor [should they export] any animal except male cattle. If an ispán should violate this decree, either he shall be deprived of his office, or he shall lose two-thirds of his property; a third of his wealth, however, shall remain for his wife and heirs.

78 Every ispán shall have a third part of the customs levy from his county. But the king shall have two-thirds of all customs in full.⁶⁰

79 Every ispán shall send to Esztergom before Michaelmass by whichever of his men he wishes those pennies collected in all parts of Hungary, noting names and specific amounts he

⁵⁶ Black cloth or uniform robes do not seem to have been required for the clergy before the eleventh century, when local councils began to legislate on details of clerical attire. The Council of Melfi (1089–1090) forbade clerks to wear sumptuous or slashed garments (c. 13. see Mansi XX: 724); later the Second Lateran Council (1139) came out against slashed and brightly colored clothing (c. 4, ibid., XXI: 527); see “Costumes ecclésiastiques”, in Dictionnaire de droit canonique, IV, 701–706

⁵⁷ See Stephen I: 10

⁵⁸ The Feast of the Holy Trinity was celebrated since the tenth century on the Sunday of the Octave of Pentecost. At first it was only a regional observance in Liège which gained European-wide popularity. In 1334 Pope John XXII mandated its universal observance

⁵⁹ This article is repeated in Col. Iud. I; there more elaborate restraints than those found in ch. 74 and 75 are placed upon the Jews has collected from each centurionate.⁶¹ Neither the ispáns nor the centurions shall receive a portion any sooner than the king, rather the division of all portions shall be made in that same place, namely in Esztergom.⁶² If someone, however, does not bring these monies in full within the prescribed deadline, he shall pay double.

⁶⁰ On this arrangement, see Weisz, “Royal revenue” (as n. 25).

80 Every freeman and guest, who works in the fields of others, just like the Slavs and other outsiders.⁶³ shall pay only the pennies for their freedom, and shall not be compelled to give additional pennies in lieu of any other work.

81 From the men of the castles⁶⁴ pennies shall be received for both their freedom and in lieu of work.

82 Those who wish to leave Hungary, shall request a seal from the tollgatherers of both the king and the ispán who guard the border crossings. It shall be pressed on one side by the royal toll gatherer and on the other by the comital toll-gatherer with the image of his ispán. If someone tries to depart without such a seal, he shall pay fifty pensae as a violator or the law.

83 If someone is accused of having borne false witness against anyone, and many persons from the village testify to this because of a quarrel or out of hatred, he shall be tried by the ordeal of iron; and if he is proven innocent, the accuser shall pay ten pensae for his guilt. But if he is proven guilty, his goods shall remain intact, but his cheeks shall be branded in the form of a cross, so that

⁶¹ On the centurions and the centurionate, and the organization of certain military service populations, see Ladislav III: 1, with n. 1

⁶² Esztergom (Latin: Strigonium, German: Gran) became the residence of the prince probably as early as the reign of Géza; see György Györffy, “Vom Namen Estrigen bis zu Parquan. (Die Ausbildung Grans im Spiegel seiner Namen)”, in Hungaro-Turcica: Studies in Honor of Julius Németh (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1976). St. Stephen preferred Székesfehérvár in his later years because that was on the newly opened pilgrimage route to Jerusalem (Györffy, István király, pp. 316–318), but Esztergom remained a royal residence until the thirteenth century when King Imre (Emeric) granted the royal palace to the Archbishop of Esztergom and Imre’s successors later moved to Buda; see A. Kubinyi, Die Anfänge Ofens (Berlin: Duncker & Humblot, 1972)

⁶³ The reference here is obviously not to the different Slavic populations that lived in Hungary at the time of the Magyar’s arrival, but to Slav colonists who came as settlers (hospites), together with other “guests”, see Erik Fügedi, “Das mittelalterliche Königreich Ungarn als Gastland” in Die deutsche Ostsiedlung des Mittelalters als Problem der europäischen Geschichte, ed. Walter Schlesinger, Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1975, 471–507 and István Kniezsa, “Ungarns Völkerschaften im XI. Jahrhundert,” Archivum Europae Centro-Orientalis, 4 (1938), 240–412. The continuity between the different Slavic elements and the Slovaks of Northern Hungary (so named first in fourteenth-century sources) is debatable; see Györffy, “Ungarn von 895 bis 1400,” pp. 642–643.

⁶⁴ Castellani is a rarely used term for the men of the castle, (jobagiones castri), dependent freemen obligated to military service, attached to a royal castle and commanded by the ispán in the eleventh and twelfth centuries.

henceforth his testimony shall be repudiated.⁶⁵

84 If someone accused of theft flees to the church, we decree that he shall not be judged immediately as guilty of the theft, but the judge together with the priest of that church shall question him whether he is guilty or not; and if he confesses himself to be guilty, he shall be free from blinding or amputation of limbs for the sake of the church.⁶⁶ If, however, he says that he is not a thief he shall not be denied permission to clear himself; but if he later should be proven guilty, he shall not be free from the above mentioned dangers on account of the church.

Similarly if someone is accused by another of being a thief, and the evidence of the theft shall be found on him or otherwise proved, he shall restore any of those things for which numerous people from the villages incriminated him.⁶⁷

⁶⁵ This article reduces in fact the punishment for perjury in Stephen I: 17. The branding (cf. the branding of witches in a similar form in Stephen I: 33) serves the same purpose as the loss of the hand: it marks the perjurer indelibly so that his oath would never again be accepted

⁶⁶ The right of sanctuary is documented in earlier collections (Stephen II: 18; Ladislav II: 1–2). The present article has the effect of further protecting the accused not only from hanging but also from blinding and mutilation; see György Bónis, “Első törvényeink sorsa és az egyházi menedékjog” [The fate of our first laws and the right of ecclesiastical asylum], Regnum 3 (1938-9) 75-97.

⁶⁷ The surviving copies end here in mid-sentence.

STATUTES OF KING COLOMAN OF HUNGARY CONCERNING THE JEWS

(1095–1116)

(Col. Iud)

These statutes expand on the limitations imposed on Jews by the laws of St. Ladislav and Coloman and in particular regulate monetary and market transactions. It has been suggested (Baron, p. 213) that special laws for the Jews in Hungary became necessary after the influx of a sizeable number of refugees from Bohemia who had fled the attacks of Crusaders on the Jewish communities there.

Earlier published editions included these articles together with a few synodal canons in what had been called Book II of the Decretum of King Coloman. In the Codex Thuróczi they precede the statutes of the Synod of Esztergom, while in the Codex Ilosvay they are joined to the Laws of Coloman. Závodszy correctly recognized them as constituting a separate set of statutes.

MSS: “Codex Thuróczi”, a fifteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Clmae 407, ff. 102v—103r.

“Codex Ilosvay”, a sixteenth-century manuscript, formerly in the Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; presently Széchényi National Library, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4023, f. 35r.

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Iuris Hungaricia, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) I, 120–21, Monumenta Hungariae Judaica, A. Friss, ed. vol. I: 1092–1539 (Budapest: Wodianer, 1903), pp. 2–4 [from Magyar Törvénytár]; Levente Závodszy, A Szent István, Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the laws and synodal decrees from the times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman] (Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904), pp. 195–6.

LIT: Alexander [Sándor] Scheiber, “Hungary”, in The Dark Ages: Jews in Christian Europe 711–1096, ed. Cecyl Roth (s. 1: Jewish Historical Publications, 1966 = World History of the Jewish People, II, 3), pp. 313–318; S. W. Baron, A Social and Religious History of the Jews, 2nd ed. (New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1957), III, 211–213, 332–333; Nóra Berend. At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and “Pagans” in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000) pp. 74–5; Géza Komoróczy, A zsidók története Magyarországon [History of the Jews in Hungary] 2 vols. (Budapest: Kaligram, 2012) 1: 97–9; Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006)

CAPITULA COLOMANNI REGIS DE IUDEIS
[1095–1116]

Colomannus gracia dei rex Hungarorum hanc legem dedit Iudeis in regno suo commorantibus:

I. Ut nullus Iudeus presummat deinceps Christianum mancipium cuiuscunque lingue vel nationis emere aut vendere, aut in servitio suo retinere; et quis hoc decretum transgrediatur, dampnum Christiani mancipii apud eum inventum patiat.

II. Si Christianus Iudeo aut Iudeus Christiano duarum vel trium pensarum pretium accomodare voluerit, mutuator a mutante vedimonium recipiat et testes Christianos ac Iudeos in testimonium assumant, ut si forte alter alteri quod mutuaverat denegaverit, vadimonio tamen et testibus utriusque comprobetur.

III. Si autem ultra tres pensas alter alteri quidquam accomodaverit, vadimonium et testes, ut predictum est, assumant et quantitatem pecunie et nomina testium in cartulam scribere, ac sigillo utriusque, mutuatoris scilicet et mutuantis sigillari faciant, ut si quando alter alteri in hac re vim inferre voluerit, scripto ac sigillo utriusque veritas comprobetur.

IV. Si Iudeus a Christiano, aut Christianus a Iudeo aliquid emere voluerit, coram ydoneis testibus Christianis et Iudeis rem venalem emat, eandemque rem et nomina testium in cartula scribere faciat, et cartulam illam cum sigillo utriusque, venditoris scilicet et emptoris insignatam apud se custodiat, ut si quando in hac emptione furti reus aliquo arguatur, dominum rei furtive, que apud se recognita est, et testes prenomatos producat et liberetur.

V. Si autem dominum furtive rei et apud se recognite producere non poterit, cartulam vero sigillatam ostenderit, iuramento testium inscriptorum purgatus evadet.

VI. Si autem testes Christianos non habuerit et Iudeos ydoneos produxerit, et iuramento eorum secundum legem Iudeorum purgatus, furti compositionem quadruplo persolvat. Quod si nec dominum recognite rei invenerit, nec cartulam sigillatam produxerit, more patrio deiudicetur, compositionem furti duodecies persolvat.

STATUTES OF KING COLOMAN CONCERNING THE JEWS
[1095–1116]

Coloman, by the grace of God, king of the Hungarians,¹ established the following law for the Jews residing in his country:

- 1 That no Jew henceforth shall dare to buy or sell a Christian slave, of whatever language or nation, or to keep him in his service² and if someone breaks this law, he shall lose the Christian slaves found with him.
- 2 If a Christian wants to lend the value of two or three *pensae*³ to a Jew, or a Jew to a Christian, the lender shall receive a pawn from the borrower and enlist the testimony of Christian and Jewish witnesses so that if one should deny that he borrowed [from the other], it may be proven by the pawn and the witnesses for both parties.
- 3 If, however, anyone shall have lent more than three pensae to another, they shall take both the pawn and the witnesses, as said before, and they shall have the amount of money and the names of witnesses written down in a charter⁴ and affixed with the seals of both the lender and the borrower so that if anyone should wish to take action against the other in this matter, the truth shall be proven by the writing and the seals of both parties.
- 4 If a Jew wants to buy anything from a Christian, or a Christian from a Jew, he shall buy the merchandise in front of suitable Jewish and Christian witnesses, and have the same item and the names of the witnesses written down in a charter and he himself shall keep that charter bearing the seals of both the seller and the buyer, so that if it should be claimed at any time that someone is guilty of theft, he shall produce the owner of the stolen object which he has acknowledged to be in his hands, as well as the witnesses, and he shall go free.

¹ Coloman used the expanded royal style including Croatia and Dalmatia—acquired through the efforts of both Ladislas I and Coloman between 1091 and 1105—only in charters for that kingdom. The archaic, or “personal-ethnic”, form of rex Hungarorum (as here) or Pannoniorum was used interchangeably with the “territorial” form, rex Hungariae until c. 1120–1130; Bálint. Hóman, “A magyar nép neve és a magyar király címe a középkori latinságban” [The Name of the Hungarian People and the Style of Hungarian Kings in Medieval Latinity] (originally in Történelmi Szemle [1917]), Történetírás és forráskritika (Budapest.: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1938), pp. 191–250, espec. 227–228.

² Cf. Coloman 74; Syn. Strig. 63. The earliest legal prohibition of Jews holding Christian slaves dates from A.D. 387, found in the Theodosian Code (3.1.5.1.128). The prohibition was repeated in somewhat different form in Justinian’s Codex 1.10.2.11.62

³ A pensa [auri] was a: money of account in eleventh-century Hungary, equal to one Byzantine gold solidus (or bezant), or to the value of a steer (young ox), or 40 pennies.

⁴ Bernát L. Kumorowitz (“Die erste Epoche der ungarischen privatrechtlichen Schriftlichkeit im Mittelalter [11–12. Jh.],” in Etudes Historiques [Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1960], pp. 253–290; also published as Studia Historica Acad. Sc. Hung., 21 [1960]) has demonstrated that such cartulae sigillatae were in fact issued and can be regarded as the earliest private charters in Hungary. Cf. also László Mezey, “Anfänge der Privaturkunde in Ungarn und die glaubwürdigen Orte” Archiv für Diplomatik 18 (1972) 209–302, here pp. 290–300.

5 If, however, he cannot produce the owner of the stolen object acknowledged to be in his hands, but shows the sealed charter, he shall escape trial on the strength of the oath of the inscribed witnesses.

6 If, however, he did not have Christian witnesses and produced suitable Jews and has been cleared by their oath in accordance with the law of the Jews, he shall pay quadruple the composition for theft.⁵ But if he should not locate the owner of the object, or produce the sealed charter, he shall be judged by the custom of the land and shall pay twelve times the composition for theft

⁵ The amount of the original composition would depend upon the value of the stolen object and the social status of the thief; see, for example, Ladislav II: 13, 14, 15

CONSTITUTIONS OF THE SYNODS HELD UNDER KING COLOMAN OF HUNGARY

Synod of Esztergom, 1104–12)

(Syn. Strig.)

This collection contains both the canons of a synod held under King Coloman, most probably during the archbishopric of Lawrence of Esztergom, who occupied the see from 1105 to 1116, and additional synodal statutes for which no dates are indicated in the manuscripts.

The date of the synod that enacted seventy-two of these canons, conventionally referred to as the Synod of Esztergom, has been the subject of extensive debate. The oldest and best manuscript (Codex Pray) does not refer to Archbishop Lawrence (mentioned only in the Cod. Thuróczi), hence various dates have been proposed.

Gyula Pauler (pp. 448–449) and, following him, László Erdélyi (pp. 47–48) argued that this synod may have preceded that of 1092 because some of the demands formulated in it seem to have been fulfilled either by the decrees of the Synod of Szabolcs or by measures contained in the decretum of Coloman. These suggestions have been rejected by most historians.

We have no grounds, therefore, to assume that the Synod of Esztergom predates the archiepiscopate of Lawrence, or to postulate the existence of another, unknown Lawrence, who may have held the office between 1077 and 1094 as Erdélyi (p. 47, n. 1) was obliged to do. After the study of eight manuscripts and the scholarly literature, Mónika Jánosi came down to dating the synod to 1104–12; Dorottya Uhrin, surveying the evidence, came to the same conclusion. Present consensus is that these canons may have been passed at several synods (their number is unusually high for one meeting!) and an unknown redactor put them together.

Although for reasons of easy reference we have retained the appellation “Synod of Esztergom”, there is no basis for calling it the “first” Esztergom synod (Závodszy, p. 197), since there is no evidence whatsoever for the location of the later, undated synods.

The present text is based on a new transcription made mainly from the Codex Pray by Ferenc Döry, whose arrangement of the canons and arguments for the dating have also been followed. For a comparison with earlier editions, see the Concordance.

MSS: Codex Pray, a liturgical manuscript compiled in 1192–1195 A.D., Széchényi

National Library (OSZK), Budapest, Nyelvelmékek MS 1, ff. I–III/

Codex Thuróczi, ff. 99v–102v.

Codex Festetich, a sixteenth-century manuscript formerly in the Archives of the Prince Festetich family, Keszthely, presently in OSZK, Budapest, Fol. Lat. 4355, ff. 101r–108v. “

Codex Nádasdy, a sixteenth-century manuscript, at one time in the possession of Count Palatine Pál Nádasdy, presently in the Eötvös Lóránd Tudományegyetem Könyvtára [Library of the Lóránd Eötvös University], Budapest, MS G.39, ff. 46r–50v.

Codex Debrecen, a sixteenth-century manuscript, presently in the Református Főiskolai Könyvtár [Main Library of the Reformed Theological College], Debrecen, R 466, unfoliated.
and a few later others (see now Uhrin as below)

EDD: Ignacius Batthyány, Leges ecclesiastici regni Hungariae et provinciarum adjacientium 3 vols. (Alba-Carolina: Typis episcopalibus 1785–1827) II, 119–122; Levente Závodszy, A Szt. István, Szent László és Kálmán korabeli törvények és zsinati határozatok forrásai [Sources of the Laws and Synodal Decrees from the Times of St. Stephen, St. Ladislav, and Coloman], Budapest: Szt. István Társulat, 1904. pp. 197–210.

LIT: Gyula Pauler, A magyar nemzet története az Árpádházi királyok alatt [History of the Hungarian Nation under the Kings of the Árpád Dynasty], 2nd ed. (Budapest.: Athenaeum, 1899), I, 129–130, 448–450; László Erdélyi, Magyarország törvényei Szent Istvántól Mohácsig. Művelődéstörténeti összehasonlító fejezetekbe írta [The laws of Hungary from St. Stephen to Mohacs: In comparative cultural historical chapters], Budapest: Eggenberger, 1942, pp. 47–56; L. Balics, A római kath. egyház története Magyarországon [History of the Roman Catholic Church in Hungary] (Budapest.: Szt. István Társulat, 1885), I, 50–64; G. Adriányi, “Die ungarischen Synoden,” Annuario historiae conciliorum 8 (1976) 541–75, here espec. p. 543; Mónika Jánosi, “Az első ún. esztergomi zsinati határozatok keletkezésének problémái” [Problems of the origin of the canons of the so-called first Esztergom synod], Acta Universitatis Szegediensis Attila József nominatae. Acta Historica 83 (1986), 23–30; Lothar Waldmüller: Die Synoden in Dalmatien, Kroatien und Ungarn. Von der Völkerwanderung bis zum Ende der Arpaden (1311) (Paderborn &c: Schönigh, 1987); Ferenc Makk and Gábor Thorczkay, eds. Írott források az 1050–1116 közötti magyar történelemről [Written sources to Hungarian history 1050–1116] (JATE, Szeged, 2006); Dorottya Uhrin, “Az ún. I. és II. esztergomi zsinat és a Pray-kódex” [The so-called first and second Esztergom Synod and the Codex Pray] in Írások a Pray Kódexről, Zsófia Ágnes Bartók and Balázs Horváth, eds. (Budapest: Argumentum &c. 2019) pp. 19–28.

DECRETA SYNODORUM HABITORUM SUB COLOMANNO
REGE

[Synodus Strigoniensis] 1105–16

[Sancti spiritus adsit nobis gratia.] Inprimis interpellandus est rex:

- I. Ut cause clericorum vel ecclesiasticarum rerum canonice finiantur.
- II. Ut omni dominico die in maioribus ecclesiis evangelium et epistola et fides exponantur populo, in minoribus vero ecclesiis fides et oratio dominica.
- III. Ut omnis populus in Pascha et Penthecosten et Natali Domini penitentiam agat et communicet. Clerici vero in omnibus maioribus festis communicent.
- IV. Ut omnes ecclesiastici ordines in maioribus ecclesiis habeant et officium suum exhibeant.
- V. Ut canonici in claustro et capellani in curia literatorie loquantur.
- VI. Ut idiote presbyteri non ordinentur, qui vero ordinati sunt, discant aut deponantur.
- VII. Ut nullus aliquid de ritu gentilitatis observet; qui vero fecerit, si de maioribus est, XL dies districte peniteat, si autem de minoribus, VII dies cum plagis.
- VIII. Si quis descriptas festivitates non feriaverit, eadem lege iudicetur.
- IX. Si quis pro facinore commisso iniunctam penitentiam negligens ab episcopo excommunicatus in eadem perversitate obierit, in cimiterio non sepeliatur, nec a presbyteris.
- X. Si quis infirmatus presbyterum non vocaverit, nisi subitanea causa fuerit, eodem modo fiat de eo; parentes vero eius aut uxor XL dierum penitentia multentur. Si autem parentes non habuerit, villicus cum duobus senioribus ville idem iudicium subeat.
- XI. Ut hi, qui ad episcopatum promovendi sunt, si matrimonio legitimo iuncti sunt, nisi ex consensu uxorum, non assumantur.
- XII. Episcopus, si tres partes de acquisitiis ad utilitatem ecclesie fideliter contulisse videtur, liceat ei agere de quarta, quod voluerit.
- XIII. Episcopi, qui iam obierunt, necque ecclesie sue providerunt, sed tantum filios suos ditaverunt, placuit inde medietatem auferre et ecclesie reddere. Monasteria vero talium in potestatem succedentis episcopi transeant et faciat, quod inde melius visum fuerit.
- XIV. Si quis eorum, qui ecclesiis presunt, res earum dissipaverit, duplo restituat. Si non habet, deponatur, donec emendet.
- XV. Nullus episcopus aut presbyter in propriis locis servos ecclesie teneat.
- XVI. Unaquecunque ecclesia circa se in proximo habeat parochiam suam.
- XVII. Ecclesia non consecretur, si dos et terra prius non dantur.

- XVIII. Nullus presbiter sine titulo ordinetur. Nullus habeatur in clero, qui non est adtitulatus alicui ecclesie.
- XIX. Nullus clericus de alio episcopatu vel provincia sine commendatitiis litteris suscipiatur.
- XX. Episcopus ad episcopum sine litteris et sigillo legationem non mittat.
- XXI. Hospites clerici, qui de alienis partibus venerunt, aut legitimos testes producant aut ad ferendam formatam redeant. Qui vero infamati sunt, omnino discedant, nec redeant, nisi cum formata.
- XXII. Nullus episcopus aut presbiter aut abbas missam celebrare audeat contra voluntatem presbiteri ecclesie.
- XXIII. Quicumque ad titulum ordinatus est vel cum professione susceptus, non privetur ordine vel honore, nisi super certis criminibus iudicio canonico. Sed neque ipse recedere audeat, nisi forte ad maiorem promoveatur gradum, quod etiam episcopus suus benigne debet consentire.
- XXIV. Si quis se oppressum existimat, liceat sibi concilium episcopale appellare. Si quis vero clericorum aut abbatum in causis ecclesiasticis relicto episcopali iudicio regalem curiam aut seculare iudicium adierit, causam perdat aut penitentia emendet.
- XXV. Ordo divinorum officiorum vel ieiuniorum secundum libellum, quem collaudavimus, ab omnibus teneatur.
- XXVI. Vita et victus canonicorum secundum regulam ipsorum ab episcopo disponantur.
- XXVII. Si quis hospitum canonice regule se sponte subdiderit, nichil ad filium eius pertineat, nisi forte et ipse idem voluerit. Si quis vero clericus servus ecclesie fuerit, filii eius ad pristinam servitutem non redeant, sed inter liberos ecclesie habeantur.
- XXVIII. Nullus servus clericus ordinetur, nisi antea dominus eius plenam sibi dederit libertatem.
- XXIX. Presbiteris uxores, quas in legitimis ordinibus acceperunt, moderatius habendas provisa fragilitate indulsumus.
- XXX. Qui diaconatum vel presbiteratum sine matrimonio adepti sunt, uxorem ducere non licent.
- XXXI. Uxores episcoporum episcopalia predia non inhabitent.
- XXXII. Si quem episcopus excommunicaverit, hoc regi et fratribus suis datis litteris indicet.
- XXXIII. Nullus extra ecclesiam in tentorio vel in aliqua domo missam celebrare aut audire audeat, nisi rex aut episcopi et comites et abbates illi, qui tentorium aut aliquid huiusmodi divino solummodo cultui preparatum habere possunt, et hoc tantummodo, quando sunt in via.
- XXXIV. Abbates mitram, sandalia, cirothecas, nolam ad capellam vel cetera episcopalia insignia non habeant, neque baptizent, neque penitentiam dent, neque ad populum sermonem faciant.
- XXXV. Abbas provisa facultate monasterii cum episcopo ad duo aratra unum monachum regulariter vestitum et instructum teneat, et regulam beati Benedicti omnes monachi sciant et intelligant.
- XXXVI. Ut abbates raro de monasteriis egrediantur, neque ad regem, neque ad remotas possessiones sine conscientia episcopi pergant, ubi tamen diutius immorari non debent.
- XXXVII. Abbates parentibus suis non plus, quam ceteris pauperibus solatium faciant. Quod si abbas inventus fuerit bona monasterii dissipasse aut dispersisse, ipse deponatur et substantia illa

- ecclesie reddatur.
- XXXVIII. Nullus episcopus aut presbiter monachum ordinet.
- XXXIX. Si quis monachalem habitum habet, aut monasterium intret, aut habitum perdat et penitentie subiaceat.
- XL. Nullus presbiter conventionem de missa pro oblatione faciat.
- XLI. Nullus ecclesiam emere vel vendere presumat. Si quis ecclesiam vendiderit aut presbiterum suum sine culpa abiecerit, delator illius culpe partem magistri illius eo anno accipiat.
- XLII. Nullus de baptismo vel sepultura pretium exigat.
- XLIII. Nullus festiuitates vendere presumat.
- XLIV. Ut iudicium ferri in quadragesima, sicut in aliis diebus, excepta causa effusionis sanguinis detur.
- XLV. Ut qui ferrum accipit, in designato loco ponat.
- XLVI. Nichil legatur neque cantetur in ecclesia, nisi quod fuerit in synodo collaudatum.
- XLVII. Si quis presbiter in convivio vel kalendis cogentes ad potum viderit, arguat eos, et si eum non audierint, ipse exeat et archidiacono eos accuset, qui eis penitentiam VII diebus iniungat. Quod si ipse presbiter non exierit, ab officio suspendatur et XL dies peniteat. Si presbiter coegerit vel coactus fuerit inebriatus, deponatur. Si quis presbiterum inebriatum invenerit, ante episcopum vel archidiaconum III pensas ab eo accipiat, et si idem presbiter secundo inebriatus fuerit, deponatur. Si quis de nobilibus ad potum coegerit vel coactus fuerit inebriatus, XL dies peniteat. Si vero in hoc perseveraverit, excommunicetur.
- XLVIII. Episcopi in unaquaque civitate duas domos ad coercendos penitentes faciant.
- XLIX. Si quis de maleficio accusatus convictus fuerit, secundum canones peniteat. Si accusator, quod iniecit, probare non poterit, eidem penitentie subiaceat.
- L. Si qua mulier a viro suo fugerit, reddatur marito suo semel et bis; tertia vice, si nobilis est, adiciatur penitentie sine spe coniugii; si de plebe, venundetur sine spe libertatis.
- LI. Si quis uxorem suam adulteram probaverit, si voluerit, ducat aliam; illa vero, si nobilis est, sine spe coniugii peniteat; si plebeia, sine spe libertatis venundetur. Quod si probare non poterit, idem iudicium maritus patiat, et illa, si voluerit, maritetur. Eodem modo, qui cum alterius uxore vel que cum marito alterius peccat, iudicetur.
- LII. Si quis puellam rapuerit vel violaverit, si nobilis est, canonice penitentie cum compositione subiaceat. Qui vero hoc persolvere non poterit, tonso capite secundum iudicium regis Ladislai venundetur.
- LIII. Si quis sponsam rapuerit alterius, si illa non consensit, reddatur proprio sponso; raptor vero, si nobilis est, compositionem canonicam faciat et sine spe coniugii peniteat; si non poterit compositionem dare, sine spe libertatis venundetur.
- LIV. Si quis uxorem fugiens se sponte debitorem fecerit, unde se expedire nolit propter odium, quod in uxorem habet, semper in servitute permaneat. Et si unquam liber videatur, iterum venundetur, uxor vero eius, cui velit, nubat.

- LV. Si quis de clero secundam uxorem vel viduam vel repudiatam duxerit, deponatur.
- LVI. Bigami presbyteri, qui ad ordines suos redire voluerint, ex consensu uxorum suarum recipiantur.
- LVII. Similiter, si presbyter concubinam habuerit, deponatur.
- LVIII. Ut canonici regulam canonicam sciant et intelligant.
- LIX. Si quis clericorum furti arguitur, ab episcopo vel archidiacono iudicetur. Si reus inventus fuerit, deponatur et bona sua perdat; si nichil habuerit, vendatur.
- LX. Ne clerici tabernarii vel feneratorum sint. Quicumque in tabernaria domo biberit, si clericus est, deponatur; si laicus, in testimonium non recipiatur.
- LXI. Ut clerici testes non sint, nisi in testamento morientis vel pro sacramento, vel pro iudicio.
- LXII. Iudei servos vel ancillas neque proprios, neque venales, neque mercenarios Christianos habere audeant.
- LXIII. Nullus Christianus carnes ab eis spretas emere presumat.
- LXIV. Decretum est et sancti concilii auctoritate sanctitum, ut de propriis horreis seu cellariis aut ovilibus monasteriorum et ecclesiarum et omnium, qui in clero sunt, decime non exigantur, excepta IIII parte parochiani presbyteri.
- LXV. Ut omnes archidiaconi breviarium canonum habeant.
- LXVI. Presbyteri quoque ecclesiarum iuxta ecclesiam domum habeant.
- LXVII. Servi ecclesiarum, si boves proprios habuerint, dimidiam partem de his, que araverint, accipiant, si autem cum bubus magistrorum suorum araverint, duas partes inde magistri ecclesiarum habeant.
- LXVIII. Quicumque de his, qui in clero sunt, ad synodum episcopi sui non venerit, usque ad laicum deponatur.
- LXIX. Si quis alterius servum vel servientem talem, qui domino suo sine ipsius voluntate alienari non potest aut quemlibet de civili populo litteras docuerit, seu clericum fecerit, absque conscientia et concessione domini sui, ipsum redimat et insuper L pensas persolvat.
- LXX. Si quis homicidium fecerit, secundum decreta Ancirani concilii peniteat.
- LXXI. Clerici repudiarum viduarumque mariti, necnon et bigami ab ordine deponantur, et si teneant ecclesiam, careant ecclesia.
- LXXII. Nullus clericus, nullus comes quemlibet clericum suscipiat ad divinum officium tenendum, nisi per manus sui parochiani episcopi.
- LXXIII. Ex auctoritate apostoli pro regis nostri salute et regni nostri salute et regni eius stabilitate in omnibus cotidie ecclesiis orandum censemur et districte precipimus.
- LXXIV. Ut si quis contra regis salutem aut dignitatem quolibet modo aliquid conspiraverit, aut conspirare aliquid temptaverit, seu temptanti sciens consenserit, anathematizetur et omnium fidelium communione privetur.
- LXXV. Ut si quis huiusmodi aliquem noverit, et probare valens non indicaverit, predictae subiaceat damnationi.

- LXXVI. Ut si qua mulier a viro suo fugerit, reddatur ei, et quotiens fugerit, restituatur ei, quia scriptum est, quod Deus coniunxit, homo non separet.
- LXXVII. Ut si quis uxorem suam coram legibus adulteram probaverit, ipsa penitentiae subiaceat, et postea si voluerint, reconcilientur, aliter innupti permaneant.
- LXXVIII. Ut si quis sponsam alterius rapuerit, sponso reddatur, raptor vero legibus subiaceat.
- LXXIX. Ut si quis uxorem exosam habens, sponte servituti se subdiderit, ut ab exosa separetur, uxor eum salva libertate sequatur, aliter innupti permaneant.
- LXXX. Ut clerici bigami et viduarum et repudiatarum mariti temporalibus ecclesiae beneficiis et cunctis dignitatibus ecclesiasticis priventur.
- LXXXI. Ut nullus episcoporum aliquem promoveat clericorum ad diaconatum vel ultra, nisi prius continentiam voverit, et si uxorem habuerit, ex eius fiat consensu idem promittentis.
- LXXXII. Ut nullus coniugatus presbiter aut diaconus altari deserviat, nisi prius uxori concedenti et continentiam voverit locum separatam et necessaria vite temporalis provideat, et secundum apostolum habens, quasi non habentem se esse intelligat.
- LXXXIII. Ut nullus laicus ecclesiae potestatem habeat.
- LXXXIV. Si presbiter altari deserviens concubinam habuerit, illa auferatur, ipse vero iuxta preceptum episcopi fructu peracto penitentiae ad ministrandum altari restituatur ecclesiae.
- LXXXV. Ut villa, in qua est ecclesia, ab ecclesia longius non recedat; quod si recesserit, X pensas persolvat et redeat.
- LXXXVI. Si quis festa vendiderit, pretium acceptum quadruplo restituat, ipse vero penitentiae subiaceat.
- LXXXVII. Si quis descriptas festivitates non celebraverit, sic vindicetur in eum: si liber est, tribus diebus peniteat; si servus, septem plagis multetur.
- LXXXVIII. Placuit sancte synodo, ut omnis coniugalis desponsatio in conspectu ecclesiae, presente sacerdote, coram idoneis testibus, aliquo signo subarrationis ex consensu utriusque fieret, aliter non coniugium, sed opus fornicarium reputetur.
- LXXXIX. Si quis presbiter bigamus propter uxorem divinum officium reliquerit, omni ecclesiastica dignitate privetur, et inter laycos deputetur.
- XC. Decretum est in sancta synodo ab omnibus episcopis, ut populus sancte ecclesiae decimas omnium, quae possident, servi vero ecclesiae parochiano presbitero tres denarios impendant.

CONSTITUTIONS OF THE SYNODS HELD UNDER KING
COLOMAN

[Synod of Esztergom] 1105–1116

[May the grace of the Holy Spirit be with us] In particular the king is to be asked:¹

That lawsuits concerning clerks or ecclesiastical matters be determined canonically.²

- 1 That every Sunday in the greater churches the Gospel, Epistle, and Creed be expounded to the people, but in minor churches only the Creed and the Lord's Prayer.³
- 2 That all the people on Easter, Pentecost, and Christmas go to confession and communion.⁴ Clerks, however, shall take communion on each major feast.
- 3 That all clerks in the major churches be in orders and exercise their office.
- 4 That the canons in the cloister and the chaplains in the court converse in learned

¹ Závodszy (p. 197) provides the incipit: Sancti spiritus adsit nobis gracia [May the grace of the Holy Spirit be with us], but notes that this is not contained in the Cod. Thuroczi, which in turn has the following heading: Incipiunt capitula de synodalibus decretis domini archiepiscopi Laurencii Strigoniensis metropolitani et decem suffraganeorum suorum [Here begin the chapters from the synodal decrees of lord archbishop Lawrence, metropolitan of Esztergom and his ten suffragan bishops]

² That is, according to canon law as administered in ecclesiastical courts. This is an affirmation of the privilegium fori; see Stephen I: 4 and Coloman 5. On the place of this synod in the development of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in Hungary, see György Bónis, "Entwicklung der geistlichen Gerichtsbarkeit in Ungarn vor 1526." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, 80, Kanonistische Abteilung, 49 (1963), 174–235, here pp. 186–187.

³ Carolingian church councils commanded all priests to instruct the faithful each Sunday in the meaning of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer; see c. 8 of the Council of Rheims (813) and c. 4 of the Council of Châlons (813) as transmitted by Burchard of Worms, Decretum (II: 62–63, PL 140, col. 637). The word fides in the present text may refer to the Athanasian Creed (Quicumque vult) which, since Carolingian times, was known as the fides Athanasii; see R. McKitterick, The Frankish Church and the Carolingian Reforms, 789–895 (London: Royal Historical Society, 1977), p. 52

⁴ In the Carolingian era confession had been prescribed for the faithful once annually during Lent (see the text of the Council of Rheims cited above); but from the beginning of the tenth century it ceased to be exclusively associated with Lent and was performed more frequently; see H. Jedin and J. P. Dolan, Handbook of Church History (New York: Herder, 1969), p. 303. The obligation to receive communion on Easter, Christmas, and Pentecost was, of course, of even older origin and failure was punished by excommunication; see Burchard, Decretum, II: 76, (Migne, PL 140, col. 639), citing c. 5 of the Synod of Agde, A.D. 506

fashion.⁵

- 5 That no uneducated priests be ordained, but those who have been ordained shall learn or be deposed.⁶
- 6 That no one celebrate anything taken from heathen rituals;⁷ but he who does, shall maintain strict penance for forty days for anything from the major observances, or for seven days with flogging for anything from the lesser observances.⁸
- 7 If someone does not celebrate the prescribed feasts, he shall be judged according to the same law.⁹
- 8 If someone, who has neglected to perform the penance imposed for the commission of a sin and was excommunicated by the bishop, dies in the same state, he shall not be buried in the cemetery, nor by priests.
- 9 If someone does not summon the priest on his deathbed, he shall be treated in the same manner, unless he should die suddenly; but his relatives or his wife shall be punished with forty days penance.¹⁰ If he had no relatives, however, the village reeve¹¹ and two elders of the village shall be punished in the same way.
- 10 Those who are to be elevated to the episcopate may not assume the office if they are bound by legitimate marriage, unless they have the consent of their wives.¹²

⁵ I.e., in Latin

⁶ This is an ancient requirement for the priesthood. Patristic writers were insistent upon solid clerical education grounded in the Scriptures; see, for example, St. Augustine, in the De Doctrina Christiana and the lapidary comment of St. Jerome: ignoratio scripturarum, ignoratio Christi est [He who does not know the Bible, does not know Christ]. Early church councils required priests to be learned both in sacred scripture and the canons; cf. the Fourth Council of Toledo (A.D. 635). c. 25, Mansi X, 626–627

⁷ Cf. Stephen I: 13; the immediate source of this canon has not yet been identified, but for purposes of comparison it is worth noting that the Roman Penitential specified a forty-day penance of bread and water for those who willingly participated in satanic rites involving herbs and potions, whereas a lesser seven-day fast (not flogging) was prescribed for those who pronounced curses or disparagement against their enemies; see Burchard, Decretum, II, coll. 964–965

⁸ The meaning of majores and minores is unclear. It may refer to kinds of sinners of different age or social status or rather to two kinds of pagan practices, major and minor ones.

⁹ See c. 7, above.

¹⁰ Cf. Stephen I: 12

¹¹ Villici are mentioned in Stephen I: 9, and seem to have been some kind of village elders. In later texts they are both representatives of the lord of the village and elective speakers of the villagers. .

¹² Western church practice since the time of the later Roman Empire imposed continence upon married clergy including bishops. Clerical promotion was prohibited for those who did not put aside their wives according to the fifth-century collection known as the Canones ecclesiastici sanctorum Apostolorum and

- 11 A bishop who has ostensibly left three-quarters of his wealth faithfully for the use of the church, may dispose of the remaining quarter as he wishes.
- 12 From bishops who died without having provided for their churches but rather only enriched their sons, half shall be taken from them and given to the church.¹³ Their monasteries, however, shall pass to the authority of the succeeding bishop and he may do what seems better to him.
- 13 If someone in charge of churches has squandered their goods, he shall make double restitution. If he does not have the means, he shall be deposed until he mends his ways.
- 14 No bishop or priest shall keep *servi*¹⁴ of the church on his own property.
- 15 Each church shall have around it an adjacent parish.
- 16 A church shall not be consecrated if it has not first been given an endowment and land.¹⁵
- 17 No priest shall be ordained without an assignment. There shall be no one among the clergy who has not been assigned to some church.¹⁶

the canons of the Council of Toledo (A.D. 400), c. I. The Fathers, notably St. Augustine, insisted that continence within marriage had to be agreed upon by both the husband and the wife; see J. Gaudemet, L'Eglise dans l'empire romain (Paris: Sirey, 1958 = G. LeBras, ed., Histoire du droit et des institutions de l'Eglise en Occident, III), pp. 159–63, 551f

¹³ I.e., from the son's inheritance. Lóránt Szilágyi (in Emma Lederer. Szöveggyűjtemény Magyarország történetének tanulmányozásához, I. rész 1000–1526 [Chrestomathia to the Study of the History of Hungary, Pt. I: 1000–1526] (Budapest: Tankönyvkiadó, 1974) p. 60) suggested that the monasteries referred to would also have been inherited by the son(s). On the children of the clergy, see Bernhard Schimmelpfennig, “Ex fornicatione nati: Studies on the Position of Priest's Sons from the Twelfth to the Fourteenth Century,” Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History, NS, 2 [12] (1979), 1–50, with reference to earlier literature

¹⁴ The exact status of male and female servile persons in eleventh-century Hungary has been the object of scholarly debates for at least a century (see also above, n. 11). In the printed version of DRMH, the editors decided to avoid coming down on either side and translated servus and ancilla &c. as “bondman” or “bondwoman” intending to escape the decision, but that was awkward. Most recently, Cameron Sutt, in Slavery in Árpád-era Hungary in a Comparative Context (Leiden: Brill, 2005) argued—with extensive discussion of the relevant literature—quite convincingly for regarding them slaves, but this is not the last word on the matter. We, therefore, took the “easy way out” by keeping the Latin term and leaving the decision to the reader. In this case, it seem likely that the law is about slaves.

¹⁵ The words dos and terra can be understood as meaning the property rights and income of a parish church, including its equipment, rectory, cemetery, arable lands, dependent servants, and tithes; see also, Stephen II: 1.

¹⁶ This canon aims to assure that every priest be ordained to a definite ecclesiastical office (titulus), a measure that goes back to the Council of Chalcedon (A.D. 451, c. 6) which prohibited “absolute ordinations”, even though the practice did not entirely cease; see H. E. Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte, 5th ed. (Köln: Böhlau, 1972), pp. 129f

- 18 No clerk shall be received from another bishopric or province without commendatory letters.¹⁷
- 19 No bishop shall send a legation to another bishop without letters and seal.
- 20 The foreign clerks, who have come from alien lands, shall either produce legitimate witnesses or return to obtain letters of credence.¹⁸ But those who are infamous shall all depart not to return unless with a letter of credence.
- 21 No bishop, priest, or abbot shall dare to celebrate mass against the will of the priest of the church.¹⁹
- 22 Whoever was assigned to a parish church or made his profession,²⁰ shall not be deprived of his order or honor, unless for specific crimes according to canonical judgment. But neither should he dare to leave, unless perchance he should be elevated to a higher grade, for which his bishop also must willingly give consent.
- 23 If someone considers himself oppressed, he is allowed to appeal to episcopal judgment. If, however, a clerk or abbot forsakes episcopal jurisdiction in cases concerning clergy and goes to the royal court or to secular judgment, he shall lose his case and do penance.²¹
- 24 The order of the divine offices and of fasting shall be kept by all according to the book which we approve.²²
- 25 The life and means of support of canons shall be arranged by the bishop according to their

¹⁷ Cf. Coloman 3. The early church legislated against clerical travel and unauthorized absence by requiring clergy to obtain litteraturae commendantiae from the local bishop; see Jean Gaudemet, L'Eglise dans l'Empire Romain (IV^e-V^e s.) (Paris: Sirey, 1959), p. 181. This legislation also found its way into Burchard's Decretum II, 136–137, (Migne PL 140, col. 648).

¹⁸ See above. The possession of formata was made a prerequisite before clergy from a foreign province could minister to the faithful in c. 2 of the Council of Meaux (A.D. 845), cited in ibid., col. 649

¹⁹ The inclusion of the bishop, who of course is the superior of the parish priest, in this instance is unusual. This interesting case was not discussed by Antal Szentirmai, "Die Anfänge des Rechts der Pfarrei in Ungarn" Österreichisches Archiv für Kirchenrecht 10 (1959) pp. 31–35

²⁰ I.e., accepted into the regular clergy

²¹ This sentence and the second part of c. 27 below have been treated as separate chapters in earlier editions, hence our numbering differs from them; see the Concordance below

²² The libellus containing the divine offices and fasts may have been a sacramentary with the liturgy of the mass as well as a calendar or possibly a type of handbook for priests. It has been suggested, among many others, by Peter von Váczy in: Die erste Epoche des ungarischen Königtums, (Pécs: Danubius, 1935) pp. 118–119) that this canon refers to the libellus in romano ordine contained in the Codex Pray (ff. V–XXVI), now identified as the Micrologus of Bernold of Constance composed during the reign of Emperor Henry IV (d. 1106); its text is in Migne PL 151, coll. 977–1022

rule.²³

- 26 If some foreigner²⁴ voluntarily submits himself to the rule of canons regular, no property shall pertain by right to his son, unless by chance he wants him to have something. If, however, a clerk was a servus of the church, his sons shall not revert to their former servitude, but be counted among the freemen of the church.
- 27 No slave²⁵ shall be ordained a clerk, unless his master has given him full liberty beforehand.²⁶
- 28 In consideration of human frailty, we allow priests to live with restraint with the wives whom they have taken in accordance with legitimate practices.²⁷
- 29 Those who have entered the diaconate or the priesthood unmarried are not allowed to take wives.²⁸
- 30 The wives of bishops shall not inhabit the episcopal estates.
- 31 If a bishop has excommunicated someone, he shall signify this by letters to the king and to his fellow bishops.

²³ Edith Pásztor (Sulle origini della vita comune del clero in Ungheria, [Vita e Pensiero, Milan 1962], p. 78) assumes that early twelfth-century canons regular in Hungary did not own property, and this clause, therefore, entrusts the bishops with both their supervision and provisioning. Which “rule” is meant by the word regula cannot be decided, as there were several of them in use in the chapters of canons. Pásztor (ibid.) suggests that the rule of Pope Gregory VII for canons regular may have been the one accepted in Hungary because passages from it are included in the Micrologus of the Codex Pray (see above, n. 23). Ch. Dereine pointed out, however, that in the eleventh century regula did not necessarily refer to a written rule but rather to the canons’ way of life in general (“Vie commune, règle de saint Augustin et chanoines réguliers au XI^e siècle” Revue d’histoire ecclésiastique. 41 (1946), 400 quoted by Pásztor. “Sulla origini”, p. 78)

²⁴ Hospes, was the term used for foreign “guests,” that is, immigrants of various estate, from knights to peasant and clerks. See: Erik Fügedi, “Das mittelalterliche Königreich Ungarn als Gastland”, in: Schlesinger, W., ed. Die deutsche Ostsiedlung des Mittelalters als Problem der europäischen Geschichte, (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1975), pp. 471-507.

²⁵ The context suggests that servus be translated here as “slave.”

²⁶ This ancient prohibition is found in many canonical collections. e.g., in Burchard’s Decretum, II, 24, (Migne PL 140, col. 629). The expression plena libertas [full liberty] suggests that there had also been manumissions and grants of liberty with limitations. On this, see now I. Bolla, A jogilag egységes jobbágyosztály kialakulása Magyarországon [The Development of a Legally Uniform Tenant-Peasant Class in Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1983), espec. pp. 43–57.

²⁷ Cf. Syn. Szab. 3; apparently a decade or so after the Synod of Szabolcs this key issue of the Gregorian program was still unresolved in Hungary. See also the canons below

²⁸ Cf. c. 22 of the Canones Apostolorum in Burchard, Decretum, II. 62–63, (Migne PL 140, col. 646).

- 32 No one shall dare to celebrate or to hear mass in a tent or in any house outside the church, except the king or those bishops, counts, and abbots who may have a tent or something of this sort prepared exclusively for divine service, and this only if they are on a journey.²⁹
- 33 Abbots shall not have a mitre, sandals, gloves, a little bell for their chapel, or other episcopal insignia,³⁰ nor shall they baptize³¹ or administer penance or preach a sermon to the people.
- 34 An abbot, if the means of his monastery permit, shall together with the bishop keep one monk regularly clothed and instructed for every two plough-lands,³² and all monks shall know and understand the Rule of St. Benedict.
- 35 Abbots shall leave their monasteries rarely, and without the permission of the bishop may not visit the king or far-away possessions, where they ought not to stay for very long.
- 36 Abbots shall not give more alms to their relatives than to other poor. If an abbot is found to have squandered or scattered the goods of the monastery, he shall be deposed and the property restored to the church.
- 37 No bishop or priest shall ordain a monk.³³
- 38 If someone possesses a monk's habit, he shall either enter a monastery or lose the habit and do penance.
- 39 No priest shall bring suit concerning the offering of a mass.
- 40 No one shall presume to buy or sell a church.³⁴ If someone sells a church or expels his priest

²⁹ Cf. Syn. Szab. 29

³⁰ On these insignia, see Ph. Hoffmeister, Mitra und Stab der wirklichen Prälaten ohne bischöflichen Charakter (Stuttgart: Enke, 1928), pp. 3–23, who mentions this canon in the context of other synodal statutes (e.g., c. 6 of the Synod of Poitiers A.D. 1100, Mansi XX, 1123) which prohibits the use of pontifical insignia by abbots without explicit privilege

³¹ Even before these canons were promulgated, the abbot of St. Martin of Pannonhalma had secured from Pope Paschal II (8 December 1102) a solemn privilege confirming the abbot's right to baptize in the churches subject to his jurisdiction (Migne PL 163: 105)

³² "Two ploughs" means here two plough lands: their exact size is unknown, and this chapter was often adduced for estimating it. Estimates of the size of "a plough land" in the early twelfth century are rather uncertain: it could have been as small as 50 or as large as 120 ha. (Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1916), pp. 491–494; L. Bendeffy, "Középkori hossz- és területmértékek" [Medieval Measures of Length and Surface], in Fejezetek a magyar mérésügy történetéből (Bp.: MTA, 1959), p. 83f.

³³ The implication is that monks be left in their cloisters and not made secular priests.

³⁴ This is evidence of the effect of the Gregorian reform program upon local Hungarian ecclesiastical legislation. Reform synods under papal leadership since the mid-eleventh century had repeatedly prohibited without cause, the informer of this crime shall receive the proprietor's portion [of the income from the church] for that year.³⁵

- 41 No one shall demand payment for baptism or burial.
- 42 No one shall presume to sell the feasts.
- 43 The ordeal of iron shall be administered in Lent just as on other days, except in the case of the spilling of blood.³⁶
- 44 He who has received the iron shall put it down at the designated location.³⁷
- 45 Nothing shall be read or sung in church, except what has been approved in the synod.³⁸
- 46 If a priest sees someone forcing [another] to drink at a banquet or in a confraternity,³⁹ he shall reproach them, and if they do not listen to him, shall go out and accuse them before the simony in all its forms (including those referred to in cc. 42–43 below); see Hans Erich Feine, Kirchliche Rechtsgeschichte. Band 1: Die katholische Kirche. Auf der Grundlage des Kirchenrechts von Ulrich Stutz. (Böhlhaus Nachfolger, Weimar 1950), p. 258

³⁵ The bounty promised to the informer suggests the contradictory nature of the reception of reforming ideas, as the function and the income of a “proprietor” (magister) is taken for granted only a sentence after the prohibition of simony

³⁶ Records of ordeals by hot iron at Várad (Nagyvárad/Oradea) are known only from the thirteenth century, see: Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, J. Karácsonyi, S. Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903) ; online : <https://www.arcanum.hu/hu/online-kiadvanyok/Varadi-varadi-jegyzokonyv-regestrum-varadinense-1208-1235-2/>; cf. I. Zajtay, “Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle”, Revue d’histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562 and M. Lupesco Makó, “Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the ‘Regestrum Varadiense’” Medievalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. For the European-wide practice of recourse to the “judgment of God”, see R. C. van Caenegem, “La preuve dans le droit du moyen âge”, Recueils de la Société Jean Bodin pour l’histoire comparative des institutions, 17 (1965), 691–753, trans. J. R. Sweeney and D. A. Flanary as “Methods of Proof in Western Medieval Law”, Academiae Analecta, Academie voor Wetensch., Lett. en Schone Kunsten van België, Kl. d. Lett., 45, No. 3 (1983), 85–127

³⁷ The usual practice was to carry the hot iron for nine paces and then put it down in a designated spot; see H. C. Lea, The Ordeal, ed. E. Peters (Philadelphia: Univ. of Pennsylvania Press, 1973), p. 41.

³⁸ See c. 25 above.

³⁹ These confraternities—called calenda or kalenda, because they met on the first day of every month—were sodalities or religious associations organized to promote pious works. Similar associations existed in many countries of Europe; Bishop Atto of Vercelli in his Capitulary (Cap. 29, Mansi XIX: 250) refers to kalends that consisted only of clergy. In Hungary laymen were also included (cf. B. Majláth, “A ‘kalandos’ társulatok” [The Calends Associations], Századok 19 [1885], 563–78); they survived into our own times as burial associations in some rural communities; see Ernő Tárkány Szűcs, Magyar jogi népszokások, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1981, repr. 2003) pp. 189–190. See also Syn. Szab. 14 and 39.

archdeacon, who shall impose upon them seven days' penance. If the priest himself does not go out, he shall be suspended from office and do forty days' penance. If a priest forced someone to become drunk or, forced by another, becomes drunk himself, he shall be deposed. If someone finds a drunken priest, he shall get three pensae from him in the presence of the bishop or the archdeacon, and if the same priest is drunk a second time, he shall be deposed.⁴⁰ If some noble forced someone to drink or, being forced, became drunk, he shall do penance for forty days. If, however, he perseveres in this, he shall be excommunicated.

- 47 Bishops shall establish two houses in each county⁴¹ for the confinement of penitents.
- 48 If someone is accused and found guilty of sorcery,⁴² he shall do penance according to the canons. If the accuser cannot prove what he charged, he shall be subjected to the same penance.
- 49 If a wife shall flee from her husband, she shall be given back to him the first and second time; the third time, if she is a noble, she shall do penance without the hope of marriage; if she is a commoner, she shall be sold without the hope of freedom.⁴³
- 50 If someone has proven that his wife was an adulteress, he may, if he wishes, take another; but the woman, if a noble, shall do penance without the hope of marriage; if a commoner, she shall be sold without the hope of freedom. But if the husband cannot prove it, she shall suffer the same punishment, and she may marry, if she wishes. The same punishment is due to him who sins with another man's wife, or to her who sins with another woman's

⁴⁰ Canons 42 and 43 of the Canones Apostolorum prescribe excommunication for bishops, priests, and deacons given to gambling and drunkenness, and deposition for the habitually inebriated; see Burchard, Decretum, XIV, 5–6, col 891. The Penitential of Theodulf of Orléans specifies that a priest who becomes drunk through ignorance shall do penance on bread and water for seven days, through negligence for fifteen days, and through contempt for forty days; see ibid., XIV, 8. The efficacy of this canon in prohibiting clerical drunkenness must have been marginal. A century later, Hungarian clerics had the unflattering reputation in some quarters for overindulgence. The author of the Casus Parisiensis, a thirteenth-century commentary on the canons of the Fourth Lateran Council, noted that c. 15 prohibiting clerical drunkenness was intended to correct this abuse especially among the English, the Poles, and the Hungarians; see A. Garcia y Garcia Constitutiones concilii quarti Lateranensis una cum commentariis glossatorum (Vatican City: Bibliotheca Apostolica Vaticana, 1981 = Monumenta Iuris Canonici, Ser. A: Corpus Glossatorum, 2), p. 469

⁴¹ Civitas can mean both “county” and “city”.

⁴² Cf. Stephen I: 34. According to James R. Russell—in Witchcraft in the Middle Ages (Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell Univ. Press, 1972), p. 73—the ecclesiastical punishment for maleficium in most Carolingian penitentials was a three-year penance, although one especially harsh text prescribed a three-stage penalty for repeat offenders: first, public humiliation; second, mutilation; and third, placed “at mercy”. The normal secular punishment was death.

⁴³ The intention of this canon was to insure the stability of marriage, a general concern of early medieval legislation. To be “sold without the hope of freedom” (in earlier laws described as “sold abroad”, e.g., Ladislav II: 19; III: 14) meant reduction to chattel slavery

husband.⁴⁴

- 51 If someone abducts or rapes a girl, he shall be subjected to canonical penance with composition, if he is a noble. He who cannot pay, however, shall be sold with shaven head according to the laws of St. Ladislav.⁴⁵
- 52 If someone abducts the betrothed of another man without her consent, she shall be given back to her betrothed;⁴⁶ the abductor, however, shall make canonical composition and do penance without the hope of marriage if he is a noble; if he cannot pay the composition, he shall be sold without the hope of freedom.
- 53 If someone fleeing his wife makes himself voluntarily a debtor⁴⁷ and then does not want to settle the debt because of the hatred he bears toward his wife, he shall always remain in servitude. And if anytime he be deemed to be free, he shall be sold again, his wife, however, may marry whomever she wishes.⁴⁸
- 54 If a clerk marries a second wife, a widow, or a repudiated woman, he shall be deposed.⁴⁹
- 55 Bigamous priests, if they want to return to their orders, shall be taken back with the consent of their wives.⁵⁰

⁴⁴ Cf. Syn. Szab. 13 and 20. The former canon permitted the husband to marry again, even if he killed his adulterous wife, while the latter contains the prohibition of a second marriage in contrast to the present canon. These contradictions point to the problematic value of arguments concerning the date of the Esztergom synod based on inconsistencies between different sets of synodal decrees

⁴⁵ Cf. Stephen I: 27, where, however, commoners are also permitted to pay a composition. Being sold into slavery with head shorn was a punishment for fornication with another man's ancilla according to Stephen I : 28 and of warriors for breaking into the house of another in the laws of Ladislav (II : 11)

⁴⁶ This canon may be seen as an indication of the church's attempt to protect marriages already in the stage of desponsatio pro futuris against the popular practice of abduction of girls (see above, n. 35, p. 81). The penalty here is much higher than in Stephen I: 27. Cases of abduction, however, recurred well into the thirteenth century according to the Registrum Varadinense, p. 163, No. 23 (anno 1213).

⁴⁷ Szilágyi (in Lederer, Szöveggyűjtemény, p. 35) glosses the word debtor here, based on a parallel passage in c. [79] below, as "slave."

⁴⁸ Cf. Stephen I: 30 with slightly different arrangements.

⁴⁹ Cf. Colo. 67 for this and the next canon.

⁵⁰ The concept of bigami mentioned here (and earlier in Syn. Szab. 1) is derived ultimately from 1 Tim 3: 2 and 12. It passed from early church practice into Byzantine canon law, and thence into this decretum (cf. also Colo. 67). It is an explicit prohibition of all second marriages to those in both major and minor orders. In Byzantine history this canonical prohibition was a significant issue in both the Moechian and Tetragamist controversies. The inclusion of this measure, therefore, serves to document Byzantine influence in the Hungarian church; see Anton Szentirmai, "Der Einfluß des byzantinischen Kirchenrechts auf die Gesetzgebung Ungarns im XI–XII. Jahrhundert." Jahrbuch der österreichischen byzantinistischen

- 56 Similarly, if a priest has a concubine, he shall be deposed.⁵¹
- 57 Canons shall know and understand the rule of canons regular.⁵²
- 58 If a clerk is accused of theft, he shall be judged by the bishop or the archdeacon. If he is found guilty, he shall be deposed and shall lose his goods; if he has none, he shall be sold.⁵³
- 59 Clerks should not be tavern-keepers or money-lenders. Whoever drinks in a tavern,⁵⁴ if a clerk, shall be deposed; if a layman, his testimony shall not be accepted.
- 60 Clerks shall not be witnesses except in cases of last wills of the dying, for oaths, or for ordeals.
- 61 The Jews shall not dare to have Christian servi or *ancillae*⁵⁵ either or their own, or for sale, or hired.
- 62 No Christian shall presume to buy the meat they despise.⁵⁶
- 63 It is decreed and inviolably established by the authority of the holy synod that tithes shall not be demanded from the barns or the cellars or sheepfolds of the monasteries and churches and of all who belong to the clergy, except for the fourth part of the parish priest.⁵⁷

Gesellschaft, 10 (1961), 76–79; and in general, Gyula Moravcsik, Byzantium and the Magyars, (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1970) pp. 102–118 with literature.

⁵¹ The prohibition of clerical concubinage is another well-known part of the Gregorian reform program

⁵² On the rule referred to here, see above, n. 23.

⁵³ Cf. Ladislav II: 13; but the penalty of being sold into slavery is explicitly harsher.

⁵⁴ Both St. Augustine and the canons of the Councils of Carthage forbade clerics from eating or drinking in a tavern unless compelled by the needs of a journey, while the canons of the so-called Council of Laodicea excommunicated all clerics who even entered a tavern. (Taverns were associated with gambling and prostitution.) For the early texts, see Burchard, Decretum, II, 129–131, (Migne PL 140 cols. 647–648).

⁵⁵ Cf. Colo. 74–75 and Syn. Szab. 10. For additional restrictions placed on Jews, see also Col. Iud.

⁵⁶ The sale to Christians of meat which did not conform to their dietary rules was seen as a major “abomination” of Jews; see, for example, Agobard of Lyon (d. 840/41). De insolentia Judaeorum, III, PL 104, col. 73; and Solomon Grayzel, The Church and the Jews in the XIIIth Century (Philadelphia: Dropsie College, 1933), p. 72, with notes and bibliography

⁵⁷ According to the Roman tradition of the quadripartition of tithes, equal portions were to be distributed to the bishop, the clergy, the poor, and for the fabric of the church. Over time, disbursement to the clergy generally came to be interpreted as that reserved for the priest celebrating the sacraments in the church to which the title was owed. The present canon has the effect of guaranteeing this quarter for the parish priest, while exempting monastic foundations, churches, and individual clerics from the remaining three-quarters of the tithe. It was precisely in the early twelfth century that monasteries, largely through papal concession,

- 64 All archdeacons shall possess a compendium of canon law.⁵⁸
- 65 Priests assigned to churches shall also have houses near the church.⁵⁹
- 66 Servi of churches, if they have their own oxen, shall retain half of what they cultivated; if, however, they ploughed with their master's oxen, the proprietors of the church shall have two-thirds.⁶⁰
- 67 Anyone who is a clerk who does not come to the synod of his bishop, shall be reduced to the status of a layman.
- 68 If someone taught reading to another man's slave or to a servant who cannot be alienated from his master without the master's consent, or to anyone in the secular population of the men of the castle,⁶¹ or made him a clerk without the knowledge and approval of his master, he shall redeem him and pay an additional fifty pensae.
- 69 If someone committed homicide, he shall do penance according to the decrees of the Council of Ancyra.⁶²
- 70 Clerks, who are husbands of repudiated women or widows or who are bigamists,⁶³ shall be deposed, and if they hold a church, they shall lose it.
- 71 Neither a cleric nor a count shall take a clerk for the purpose of holding the divine office, except by the hand of his diocesan bishop.

were permitted to retain the tithes from their own agricultural production and the annual increase of their livestock. See Giles Constable, Monastic Tithes from their Origins to the Twelfth Century (Cambridge: Cambridge Univ. Press, 1964), pp. 43–51, 235–37

⁵⁸ This canon and c. 59 above point to the active role of Hungarian archdeacons in the administration of canon law early in the twelfth century. Unfortunately, which canonical collection was meant cannot be determined; breviarium was used rather indiscriminately; see Bónis, "Entwicklung", p. 186, n. 31.

⁵⁹ Canon 5 of the Council of Meaux required priests to reside adjacent to their churches; see Burchard, Decretum, II, 107 (Migne PL 140 coll. 644–45).

⁶⁰ For the sharecropping arrangements of this canon; see Györffy, Handbuch, p. 634

⁶¹ Castle warriors (jobagiones castri) were a dependent freeman obligated to military service, attached to a royal castle and commanded by the ispán in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, see Attila Zsoldos, A szent király szabadjai – Fejezetek a várjobbágyok történetéből. [The freemen of the Holy King – Chapters from the history of the castle warriors] (Budapest: MTA TTI, 1999).

⁶² The council of Ancyra (Ankara, Turkey) was held in A.D. 314. Canon 22 specifies the appropriate penance for different types of homicide; see Mansi II, 534

- [73.]⁶⁴ By the authority of the Apostle⁶⁵ we decreed and strictly command prayers to be offered daily in all churches for the welfare of our king and our kingdom and for the steadfastness of his reign.
- [74.] If someone conspires in any way whatsoever against the welfare or dignity of the king, or attempts to conspire, or knowingly agrees to such an attempt, he shall be anathematized and excluded from the community of the faithful.⁶⁶
- [75.] If someone should know anyone of this sort, and does not speak out though he can prove it, he shall suffer the same punishment.
- [76.] If a woman flees from her husband, she shall be returned to him, and as often as she flees she shall be brought back,⁶⁷ because it is written: what God hath joined together let no man put asunder.⁶⁸
- [77.] If someone has proven his wife to be an adulteress before the law, she shall do penance, and afterward, if they wish, they shall be reconciled, otherwise they shall remain unmarried.⁶⁹
- [78.] If someone abducted the betrothed of another, she shall be given back to her betrothed, but the abductor shall suffer according to the laws.⁷⁰
- [79.] If someone out of hatred for his wife voluntarily submits himself to slavery in order to be separated from the woman he detests, the wife may follow him preserving her freedom otherwise they shall remain unmarried.⁷¹
- [80.] Bigamous clerks and husbands of repudiated women and widows shall be deprived of the temporalities of church benefices and of all ecclesiastical dignities.⁷²
- [81.] No bishop shall promote any clerk to the diaconate or higher orders, unless he has previously sworn an oath of chastity, and if he had a wife, if he swore with her consent

⁶⁴ The following canons, Nos. [73]–[88], were issued by some other synod. Their text is also contained in the Codex Ilosvay, f. 34v.

⁶⁵ Cf. I Tim 2: 1–3

⁶⁶ Cf. Stephen II:18.

⁶⁷ Cf. above, c. 50.69

⁶⁸ Mt 19:Mk10: 9

⁶⁹ Cf. Syn. Szab. 20 and above, c. 51

⁷⁰ Cf. above, c. 53.

⁷¹ Cf. above, c. 54; this canon, however, prohibits the second marriage of the abandoned wife.

and she made the same promise.⁷³

[82.] No married priest or deacon shall serve at the altar, unless his wife has previously agreed and has sworn an oath of chastity and he has provided her with a separate place and the necessities of daily life, and understands himself to be, according to the Apostle, like those who having wives remain as though they had none.⁷⁴

[83.] No layman shall have control over a church.⁷⁵

[84.] If a priest serving at the altar has a concubine, she shall be expelled, but he having completed the penance imposed upon him according to the instructions of the bishop shall be restored to the service of the altar.⁷⁶

[85.] A village in which there is a church shall not move far from it; but if it has moved, it shall pay ten pensae and return.⁷⁷

[86.] If someone has sold the feasts,⁷⁸ he shall refund four times the amount he received, but he himself shall do penance.

[87.] If someone does not celebrate the prescribed feast,⁷⁹ he shall be punished as follows: if he is free, he shall do penance for three days, if a servus, he shall suffer seven lashes.

[88.] It is resolved by the holy synod that every marriage shall take place in the sight of the Church, in the presence of a priest, before suitable witnesses, with some token of the consent of both partners to the betrothal, otherwise it shall be deemed no marriage but a work of fornication.⁸⁰

⁷³ For this and the following canon, cf. above, cc. 11 and 29–31

⁷⁴ I Cor 7: 29

⁷⁵ This canon is the most clear cut declaration of the Gregorian program prohibiting lay interference with the church. It may be seen as connected to King Coloman's renunciation in the early twelfth century of lay investiture. Traditionally, Coloman's declaration had been associated with the Synod of Guastalla (A.D. 1106; Mansi XX, 1211–1212), but documentary evidence for such an exact date is wanting; see U.-R. Blumenthal, The Early Councils of Pope Paschal II: 1100–1110 (Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies, 1978), p. 38, with references to the older literature

⁷⁶ Cf. above, c. 57

⁷⁷ Cf. Syn Szab. 19 with n. 20

⁷⁸ Cf. above, c. 43

⁷⁹ Cf. above, c. 8

⁸⁰ This canon reflects the most advanced canonical principles of the age by requiring four elements for the validity of marriage: public declaration, clerical and lay witnesses, a token, and—above all—the consent of the partners and of no one else. These aspects of marriage were addressed a few decades later by both Gratian and Peter Lombard, but in their entirety did not become church law until the Council of Trent which prohibited clandestine marriages. Even if this canon should prove to be an interpolation of the later twelfth century, it still represents a very early and mature formulation of ecclesiastical theory on marriage. See

- (89.)⁸¹ If a bigamous priest quits the divine office on account of his wife, he shall be deprived of all ecclesiastical dignity and regarded as a layman.⁸²
- (90.) It is decreed by all the bishops in holy synod that the people of the Holy Church shall pay a tenth of all they have,⁸³ but servi of the church shall pay three pennies to the parish priest.

Michael M. Sheehan, "Choice of Marriage Partner in the Middle Ages: Development and Mode of Application of a Theory of Marriage", Studies in Medieval and Renaissance History, NS, 1 [11] (1978), 1–33, espec. 6–8, with references to recent research. The editors gratefully remember Professor Sheehan for his counsel on this matter and on several other passages in the synodal constitution.

⁸¹ This canon and the last one are fragments from yet another undated synod. They are not found in the Codex Pray but only in the later codices; in the Cod. Thuróczi and Cod. Ilosvay they follow immediately after the statutes of King Coloman concerning the Jews (Col. Iud.)

⁸² Cf. above, cc. 71 and 80

⁸³ Cf. Stephen II: 18

THE GOLDEN BULL OF KING ANDREW II OF HUNGARY 1222

This privilege, the “Golden Bull” of Andrew II (1205–35), so-called from its solemn pendant seal of precious metal, has for centuries been regarded as the cornerstone of noble liberties. In fact it was the king’s response to a protest of major nobles who wanted changes in the royal government and may have been supported by a simultaneous rebellion of lesser royal men, the servientes regis, who demanded guarantees for their status. The latter group considered their situation threatened by the increasingly powerful barons who had benefitted from the decline of the royal domain. From 1351 onward the Golden Bull in its 1222 redaction was confirmed by almost every king of Hungary down to 1916, except that in 1687 the clause granting the right of resistance was renounced by the estates and therefore omitted.

None of the seven originals mentioned below (1222: 31) have survived. The best text is in a charter issued by Hungarian prelates in 1318 and presented to King Charles I for his confirmation (which he refused) and in the text of King Louis I’s decretum of 1351. For the present edition the collation of several medieval confirmations, prepared by Géza Érszegi, has been used. The division into articles, introduced in the later transcriptions, has been retained in order to facilitate modern reference.

MSS: (Authenticated copy of 1318) Primatial secular archives, Esztergom, Lad. V. No. I.; additional Mss are listed by Érszegi (see below), p. 6ff.

EDD: Géza Érszegi, “Az Aranybulla” [The Golden Bull], in Fejér megyei történeti évkönyv [Historical Yearbook of County Fejér], 6 (1972), 14–19; also: De bulla aurea Andreae II regis Hungariae MCCXXII. Lajos Besenyei, Géza Érszegi, Maurizio Pedrazza Gorlero. eds. (Verona: Edizioni Valdonega, 1999). Magyar Törvénytár: CJH, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., Bp.: Franklin, 1896 ff.I, 130–145; Walther Näf, “Herrschaftsverträge des Spätmittelalters”, in Quellen zur neueren Geschichte (Bern: Historisches Seminar der Universität, 1951), pp. 7–15. Older editions are listed in Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, Bp.: MTA, 1923–61, No. 379, p. 125f.

Online (incomplete): https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Golden_Bull_of_1222

LIT: László Blazovich, “The origins of the Golden Bull and its most important provisions as reflected in Hungarian constitutional and legal history” in De Bulla Aurea pp. 181–190; Géza Érszegi, “A history of the genesis of the Golden Bull and how it was handed down through the ages, with comments on its text” in De Bulla Aurea pp. 191–201; Martyn Rady, “Hungary and the Golden Bull of 1222” Banatica. 24 (2014) II: 87–108 (with text and English translation); Joseph Deér, “Der Weg zur Goldenen Bulle Andreas’ II.”, Schweizer Beiträge zur allgemeinen Geschichte, 10 (1952), 104–138; Elemér Hantos, The Magna Charta of the English and of the Hungarian Constitution: A Comparative View of the Law and Institutions of the Early Middle Ages (London: Kegan, Trench, 1904)(very dated!); György Bónis, “The Freedom of the Land in Medieval Hungarian Law,” Anciens Pays et Asemblés d’Etats/Standen en Landen, 53 (1970), 93–116; James R. Sweeney, “The Decretal Intellecto and the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222,” in Album Elemér Mályusz (Brussels: Librairie Encyclopédique, 1976), pp. 89–96; József Gerics, “Von den universi servientes regis bis zur universitas nobilium regni Hungariae,” ibid., pp. 97–108; Ilona G. Bolla, “Az Aranybulla-kori társadalmi mozgalmak a Váradi Regestrum megvilágításban” [German summary: “Die sozialen Bewegungen zur Zeit der Goldenen Bulle im Lichte des Regestrum von Wardein”], Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica., I (1959), 84–105. Additional older literature can be found in the notes to Zoltán. J. Kosztolnyik, “De facultate resistendi: Two Essential Characteristics of the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222,” Studies in Medieval Culture, 5 (1975), 97–104.

BULLA AUREA 1222

In nomine Sancte Trinitatis et individue unitatis. Andreas Dei gracia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Galitie, Lodomerieque rex in perpetuum.

Quoniam libertas tam nobilium regni nostri quam etiam aliorum instituta a sancto Stephano rege per aliquorum regum potentiam ulciscencium aliquando iram propriam aliquando eciam attendencium consilia falsa hominum iniquorum vel sectantium propria lucra fuerat in quam plurimis diminuta, multociens ipsi nobiles nostri serenitatem nostram et predecessorum nostrorum regum suorum precibus et instancia multa pulsaverunt super reformatione regni nostri.

Nos igitur eorum petitioni satisfacere cupientes in omnibus — ut tenemur— presertim, qui inter nos et eos occasione hac iam sepius ad amaritudines non modicas est processum, quod — ut regia honorificencia plenius conservetur — convenit evitari, hoc enim per nullos alios melius fit quam per eos, concedimus tam eis quam aliis hominibus regni nostri libertatem a sancto rege concessam ac alia ad statum regni nostri reformandum pertinencia salubriter ordinamus in hunc modum:

- I. Ut annuatim in festo sancti regis, nisi arduo negotio ingruente vel infirmitate fuerimus prohibiti, Albe teneamur solemnizare. Et si nos interesse non poterimus, palatinus procul dubio ibi erit pro nobis, ut vice nostra causas audiat et omnes servientes, qui voluerint, libere illuc convenient.
- II. Volumus eciam quod nec nos nec posteri nostri aliquo tempore servientes capiant vel destruant favore alicuius potentis, nisi prius citati fuerint et ordine iudiciario convicti.
- III. Item nullam collectam nec liberos denarios colligi faciemus super predia servientum nec domos nec villas descendemus nisi vocati. Super populos etiam ecclesiarum ipsorum nullam penitus collectam faciemus.
- IV. Si quis serviens sine filio decesserit, quartam partem possessionis filia obtineat, de residuo — sicut ipse voluerit — disponat. Et si morte preventus disponere non potuerit, propinqui sui, qui eum magis contingunt, obtineant. Et si nullam penitus generationem habuerit, rex obtinebit.
- V. Comites parochiani predia servientum non discuciant, nisi in causa monetarum et decimarum. Comites curie parochiani nullum penitus discuciant, nisi populos sui castri. Fures et latrones biloki regales discuciant, ad pedes tamen ipsius comitis.
- VI. Item populi coniurati in unum fures nominare non possint, sicut consueverant.
- VII. Si autem rex extra regnum exercitum ducere voluerit, servientes cum ipso ire non teneantur, nisi pro pecunia ipsius et post reversionem iudicium exercitus super eos non recipiet. Si vero ex adversa parte exercitus venit super regnum, omnes universaliter ire teneantur. Item — si extra regnum cum exercitu iverimus — omnes, qui comitatus habent vel pecuniam nostram, nobiscum ire teneantur.

- VIII. Palatinus omnes homines regni nostri indifferenter discuciat, sed causam nobilium, que ad perditionem capitis vel ad destructionem possessionum pertinet, sine conscientia regis terminare non possit: iudices vicarios non habeat, nisi unum in curia sua.
- IX. Curialis comes noster, donec in curia manserit, omnes possit iudicare et causam in curia incohatum ubique terminare, sed manens in predio suo pristaldum dare non possit nec partes facere citari.
- X. Si quis iobagio habens honorem in exercitu fuerit mortuus, eius filius vel frater congruo honore sit donandus et si serviens eodem modo fuerit mortuus, eius filius — sicut regi videbitur — donetur.
- XI. Si hospites videlicet boni homines ad regnum venerint, sine consilio regni ad dignitates non promoverentur.
- XII. Uxores decedentium vel condemnatorum ad mortem per sententiam vel in duello succumbentium vel ex quacumque alia causa non fraudentur dote sua.
- XIII. Iobagiones ita sequantur curiam vel quocumque proficiscantur, ut pauperes per eos non opprimantur nec spolientur.
- XIV. Si quis comes honorifice se iuxta comitatus sui qualitatem non habuerit vel destruxerit populos castri sui, convictus super hoc coram omni regno dignitate sua turpiter spoliatur cum restitutione ablatorum.
- XV. Agasones, caniferi et falconarii non presumant descendere in villis servientum.
- XVI. Integros comitatus vel dignitates quascumque in predia seu possessiones non conferemus perpetuo.
- XVII. Possessionibus etiam quas quis iusto servitio obtinuerit, aliquo tempore non privetur.
- XVIII. Item servientes accepta licentia a nobis possint libere ire ad filium nostrum seu a maiori ad minorem nec ideo possessiones eorum destruantur. Aliquem iusto iudicio filii nostri condemnatum vel causa Item servientes accepta licentia a nobis possint libere ire ad filium nostrum seu a maiori ad minorem nec ideo possessiones eorum destruantur. Aliquem iusto iudicio filii nostri condemnatum vel causa incohata coram ipso, prius-quam terminetur coram eodem, non recipiemus nec e converso filius noster.
- XIX. Iobagiones castrorum teneantur secundum libertatem a sancto rege institutam. Similiter et hospites cuiuscumque nacionis secundum libertatem ab inicio eis concessam tenantur.
- XX. Decimo argento non redimantur, sed — sicut terra protulerit — vinum vel segetes persolvantur et si episcopi contradixerint, non iuvabimur ipsos.
- XXI. Episcopi super predia servientum equis nostris decimas non dent nec ad predia regalia populi eorundem decimas suas apportare teneantur.
- XXII. Porci nostri in silvis vel pratis servientum non pascantur contravoluntatem eorum.
- XXIII. Nova moneta nostra per annum observetur a pascha usque ad pascha et denarii tales sint quales fuerunt tempore regis Bele.
- XXIV. Comites camere monetarii, salinarii et tributarii nobiles regni, Ismaelite et Iudei fieri non possint.
- XXV. Sales in medio regni non teneantur, nisi tantum in Zaloch et in Zeged et in confiniis.

- XXVI. Possessiones extra regnum non conferantur; si aliquae sunt collate vel vendite, populo regni ad redimendum reddantur.
- XXVII. Marturine iuxta consuetudinem a Colomanno rege constitutam solvantur.
- XXVIII. Si quis ordine iudiciario fuerit condemnatus, nullus potentum eum possit defendere.
- XXIX. Comites iure sui comitatus tantum fruantur, cetera ad regem pertinentia scilicet cibrones, tributa, boves et duas partes castrorum rex obtineat.
- XXX. Item preter hos quatuor iobagiones scilicet palatinum, banum et curiales comites regis et regine duas dignitates nullus teneat.

Et ut hec nostra tam concessio quam ordinatio sit nostris nostrorumque successorum temporibus in perpetuum valitura, eam conscribi fecimus in septem paria litterarum et aureo sigillo nostro roborari ita: quod unum par mittatur domino pape et ipse in registro suo scribi faciat; secundum penes hospitale; tertium penes templum; quartum apud regem; quintum in capitulo Strigoniensi; sextum in Colocensi; septimum apud palatinum, qui pro tempore fuerit, reservetur ita, quod ipsam scripturam pre oculis semper habens nec ipse deviet in aliquo in predictis nec regem vel nobiles seu alios consenciat deviare, ut et ipsi sua gaudeant libertate ac propter hoc nobis et sucesoribus semper existant fideles et corone regie obsequia debita non negentur. Statuimus etiam quod, si nos vel aliquis successorum nostrorum aliquo umquam tempore huic dispositioni contraire voluerint, liberam habeant harum auctoritate sine nota infidelitatis tam episcopi quam alii iobagiones ac nobiles regni nostri universi et singuli presentes ac posteri resistendi et contradicendi nobis et nostris successoribus in perpetuum facultatem. Datum per manus Cleti aule nostre cancellarii et Agriensis ecclesie prepositi anno verbi incarnati millesimo ducentesimo vicesimo secundo venerabili Iohanne Strigoniensi, reverendo Ugrino Colocensi archiepiscopis existentibus, Desiderio Chanadiensi, Roberto Vesprimiensi, Thoma Agriensi, Stephano Zagrabiensi, Alexandro Varadiensi, Bartholomeo Quinque Ecclesiensi, Cosma Iauriensi, Briccio Vaciensi episcopis existentibus regni nostri anno decimo septimo.

THE GOLDEN BULL OF 1222

In the name of the Holy Trinity and Indivisible Unity. Andrew, by the grace of God, King of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, and Lodomeria¹ In perpetuity.

Since the liberties established by St. Stephen the king² in favor of the nobles³ of our realm as well as of other persons have been diminished in many respects by the authority of certain kings, some of whom in personal anger took vengeance, others of whom paid heed to the false counsel of wicked and self-seeking men, these same nobles have repeatedly importuned our Serenity and that of their kings, our predecessors, with numerous petitions and entreaties for the reform of our kingdom.

We therefore desire to fulfill their requests in all respects, as we are obliged to do, especially because between them and us this circumstance has often led to no inconsiderable bitterness, which ought rightly to be avoided for the better preservation of the royal dignity which can be done better by no one other than by them. We grant both to them and to other men of our kingdom the liberty given by the holy king, and we salubriously ordain what further pertains to the reformation of the state of our kingdom in this manner:

1 That we are bound to celebrate the feast of Saint Stephen annually in Székesfehérvár⁴ unless we should be beset by some urgent matter or prevented by illness. And if we cannot be present, the

¹ Kings of Hungary claimed sovereignty over Croatia and Dalmatia, acquired by Ladislas I and Coloman, and also over certain areas in the northern Balkans (Rama or Bosnia from c. 1138, Serbia from 1202); Andrew II was actively engaged in securing the princely throne of Galicia and Lodomeria (Vladimir), northeast of the Carpathians, for his youngest son, Prince Andrew. Even though several of these “kingdoms” were but briefly under Hungarian control, the extended royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² It was general usage in the Middle Ages to assign “old law” to a venerable early king, such as Charlemagne, Edward the Confessor, or St. Wenceslas. Hence, there is no need to try to relate the liberties of 1222 to the actual legislation of St. Stephen. See: István Tringli, The Liberty of the Holy Kings. Saint Stephen and the Holy Kings in the Hungarian Legal Heritage, in: Attila Zsoldos, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country. A Newborn Kingdom in Central Europe: Hungary (Budapest: Lucidus, 2001) 127–82.

³ In the early thirteenth century the term nobilis still referred to the magnates only.

⁴ Annual courts of justice seem to have been held in the coronation city every August from the Feast of the Assumption of the Virgin to St. Stephen’s Day at least since the late eleventh century (cf. Ladislas III: 2 and 20), but may have been neglected. There is later reference to a court on 20 August under Béla III in 1185 See: Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest: MTA, 1923–61) No. 140; in general: György. Bónis. “The Hungarian Feudal Diet (13th to 18th Centuries),” Receuil de la Société Jean Bodin pour l’histoire comparative des institutions, 25 (1965), 287–307 palatine⁵ will definitely be there for us, and shall hear cases in our place, and all the *servientes*⁶ who wish shall freely assemble there.

2 It is further our wish that neither we nor our successors should at any time seize or cause the ruin of any serviens for the benefit of some magnate, unless they first be summoned and duly sentenced by judicial process.

3 Similarly, we shall levy neither the collecta nor the freemen's pennies on the estates of the servientes, and shall not exact hospitality in their houses or villages unless we have been called [there].⁷ We shall not collect any taxes at all from people attached to their churches.⁸

4 If a serviens regis should die without a son, his daughter shall receive a quarter of his

⁵ The count palatine was originally the head of the royal household; by the thirteenth century he was about to go out of court, become the itinerant judge of all nobles and as the deputy of the king the highest officer of the realm.

⁶ The servientes regis (for the first time mentioned here in a law or major privilege) were the upper strata of free warriors, who seem to have been the main supporters of the lords demanding the issue of the privilege. With the growth of private landowning, they tended to lose their immediacy to the king and began to organize themselves into some kind of corporations in the counties. They are seen as the precursors of the numerous stratum of the lesser nobility. See: Elemér Mályusz, Die Entstehung der ständischen Schichten im mittelalterlichen Ungarn (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1980, Studia Historica Acd. Sc. Hung. 137.

⁷ The term collecta has been applied in the eleventh and twelfth centuries to different extraordinary taxes that grew out of subsidies for war or payments in lieu of military service; see Ferenc Eckhart, A királyi adózás története Magyarországon 1323-ig [History of royal taxation in Hungary until 1323] (Arad: Réthy, 1908), pp. 32–73. In the thirteenth century it was gradually being replaced by the chamber's profit (see 1231:3), initially a fee levied against those refusing to accept the new money and replacing the royal income from the recurrent devaluation of the coins that has been suspended; see Bálint Hóman. Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325] (Budapest: MTA, 1916), pp. 442–445 and in general Lajos Thallóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary]. (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879). The freemen's pennies (eight-penny tax) were abolished (with exceptions) by King Coloman (Coloman 35 and 40), but seem to have survived; see Eckhart, A királyi adózás, pp. 14–29. Lifting the burden of hospitality to the king and his entourage, the droit de gîte (descensus) was promised by several successors of Andrew II, but was not kept; later in the century it was replaced by a monetary levy. On the royal revenues and their division in general, see now: Boglárka Weisz A királyketteje és az ispán harmada. Vámok és vámszedés Magyarországon a középkor első felében [The second part of the king and the third for the ispán: Tolls and their collection in Hungary during the first half of the Middle Ages] (Budapest: MTA BTK, 2013) and Eadem, "Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Age" in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) 255–64

⁸ There are few references to ecclesiastical matters in the Golden Bull, mainly because the privileges of the clergy had been confirmed by Andrew II in a separate charter issued earlier in the same year; cf. Szentpétery, Regesta, No. 378.

possessions⁹ but he shall dispose of the rest as he wishes. And if, prevented by death, he shall not have been able to make disposition, those relatives closer to him shall obtain [the possessions]. If he shall have no relatives at all, the king shall obtain them.¹⁰

5 The ispáns of counties¹¹ shall not render judicial sentences concerning the estates of the servientes except in cases pertaining to coinage and tithes. The ispáns of castles¹² shall render judicial sentences on no one except those attached to their castles. Thieves and robbers shall be judged by royal judges,¹³ but only in the presence of the ispán.

6 Similarly, people united in a sworn association shall not be able to accuse thieves, as they have been accustomed to do.¹⁴

7 If the king, however, wishes to lead an army outside the kingdom, the servientes shall not be obligated to accompany him unless it be at his expense and, after his return, he shall not permit

⁹ This is the first mention of the “filial quarter”, an institution which Antal Murarik (Az ôsiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the basic institutions of aviticitas] [Budapest: Sárkány, 1938], pp. 163–192) saw as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished this provision (Inst. Bk. III, tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, “Vita a leánynegyedről” [Debates on the filial quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92.

¹⁰ This arrangement of unlimited inheritance was rescinded in the only explicit alteration of the Golden Bull in the decretum of 1351 guaranteeing the inheritance rights of the entire kindred that was in all likelihood the traditional practice all the time. The right of the king to the masterless goods (escheat, in later legal terminology: caducitas), became later one of the main sources for new donations.

¹¹ The ispán (comes) was the royal official in charge of a county (or, occasionally, other territorial unit), collector of revenues and commander of the troops of the county’s warriors. On the original arrangement of this, see Attila Zsoldos, “The Legacy of St. Stephen,” in: Idem, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country, pp. 71–88.

¹² The ispán of the castle, or comes curialis, was generally the castellan of the central castle of the county, but later became the general deputy of the ispán of the county.

¹³ Biloki or billochi were royal judges, so named for their royal seal of summons: billog, old Hungarian for seal (see Ladislás III: 3).

¹⁴ Cf. the earlier elaborate arrangements for just such public accustation in Ladislás II: 4 judgment against them concerning the campaign.¹⁵ If, however, the army of an enemy should advance upon the kingdom, every one without exception is obligated to go. Also, if we lead an army beyond the realm, all those who hold counties or receive money from us are bound to accompany us.¹⁶

8 The count palatine shall judge without differentiation all the men of our realm, but cases concerning nobles condemned to capital punishment and loss of possessions shall not be concluded without the king's knowledge. He shall have no deputy judge except for the one at his own court.¹⁷

9 Our judge royal¹⁸ shall be able to judge all while he resides in our court and shall have the right to pass sentence anywhere in cases initiated at the court, but when he stays on his estates he shall not be able to dispatch bailiffs or cite parties to a suit.

10 If one of the baronial retainers¹⁹ who holds a honor²⁰ should die in a campaign, his son or brother is to be granted a similar honor; and if a serviens dies in the same way, his son shall receive whatever appears appropriate to the king.

11 If foreigners, indeed honorable men, come to the kingdom, they shall not be raised to

¹⁵ Eckhart (A királyi adózás, pp. 33f.) presents evidence that in the earlier Árpadian age fines were collected from those who, although obligated to military service, did not follow the king's call to arms. This passage seems to refer to such judicia exercitua.

¹⁶ The reference to soldiers serving the king for money (pro pecunia) is among the earliest citations of paid military service. It suggests that whereas the king had a claim on the military service of a wide stratum for the defense of the realm, the same soldiering elements were at his disposal for dynastic wars for pay only.

¹⁷ In contrast to this measure, the existence of two vicepalatini (or vicejudices palatini), one of whom resided in Buda or Pest, is documented in several different years in the late thirteenth century: see Imre Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [The Hungarian judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and diverse dynasties]. (Budapest: MTA, 1899), pp. 19, 66.

¹⁸ The judge royal, earlier called the ispán of the royal court (comes curialis regis), was the second highest officer of the household. Around 1230, when the palatine moved out of court, this officer became the main high judge of the realm.

¹⁹ In the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries the term iobagio previously referring to members of the royal retinue and a wider group of royal officeholders was used in general for magnates and high officers of the realm (cf. below art. 30). However, by the end of the century, it changed its meaning entirely and was to design peasants in seigneurial dependence; we translate it as "tenant peasants" who were personally free but subject to dues and the jurisdiction of their lords.

²⁰ Honores in general means here offices and commissions given to magnates by the king at his pleasure; it is most likely that the income from certain possessions was also attached to them. Honors became a standard element of administration in the fourteenth century, see Pál Engel, "Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom." Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

dignities without the consent of the kingdom.²¹

12 The wives of those who die either by capital punishment or in a duel or for any other reason, shall not be cheated out of their dower.²²

13 Baronial retainers shall follow the court or travel anywhere so long as they do not oppress or despoil the poor.

14 If any ispán does not honorably conduct himself according to the character of his comital office or brings ruin to those attached to his castle, and if this is proven, he shall make good the damage and be dishonorably deprived of his office in front of the whole kingdom.

15 Grooms, houndsmen, and falconers shall not presume to descend upon²³ the villages of servientes regis.

16 We shall not bestow whole counties or any other dignities as estates or possessions in perpetuity.²⁴

²¹ The term regnum meant in the Middle Ages not only the kingdom but also the great men of the country, in particular the royal council. J. Holub ("La représentation politique en Hongrie au moyen âge," Etudes présentées à la Commission Internationale pour l'histoire des assemblés d'états, 18 [1958], 84) put it thus: "Qu'était ce regnum?...aux XI^e–XII^e siècles, il designait les notables qui conseillaient le roi dans la gestion de ses affaires." In this passage the "consent of the regnum" and below (1222: 14) the formulation coram regno suggest that in the early thirteenth century a greater circle of nobles, possibly the assembled diet, was meant by regnum. On the development of this term, see L. Peter, "Antecedents of the Nineteenth Century Hungarian State Concept", D. Phil. Thesis, Univ. of Oxford, 1966, espec. pp. 410ff.

²² The dos was originally the price of the bride, but by this time it had also meant the gift given to the bride by the bridegroom at the time of the marriage: see, Ladislav III: 6. The death in a duel may refer to judicial duels which were used in trials even after ordeals were discontinued

²³ On the descensus, see n. 7, above.

²⁴ This passage summarizes the opposition to King Andrew's "new institutions" (novae institutiones) and the practice of grants in perpetuity introduced by him in the preceding decades. The king described this program in 1217 thus: "On the counsel of some of our magnates we have altered the conditions of our realm that has been conserved by the ancients, and distributed castles, counties, lands, and other revenues of our abundant Hungary to our barons and knights as inheritable possession in perpetuity" – see: Nándor Knauz, ed. Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 2 volumes (Esztergom: Horak, 1874–82) : 216; and Szentpétery, Regesta, p. 154, which seem to have been followed by several others under Andrew II, e.g., in 1206 Co. Gora (ibid., No. 258), in 1215 Co. Esztergom to the archbishop (ibid., No. 300; the authenticity of this charter, however, has recently been challenged by R. Marsina, Codex diplomaticus et epistolaris Slovaciae, 1 [Bratislava: Academia scientiarum Slovaca, 1971], p. 156), and c. 1220 Co. Locsmánd (see Gyula. Kristo, "A locsmándi várspánság felbomlása" [The Dissolution of the County of Castle Locsmánd], Soproni Szemle No. 2 [1969], p. 134ff.). The motives and actual results of this policy have long been debated; see I. Rákos, "IV. Béla birtokrestaurációs politikája [The Policy of Béla IV on Restoration of Properties], Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila József nominatae, Acta Historica, 47 (1974), 3–8 with older literature.

17 Also, no one shall at any time be deprived of possessions acquired by honorable service.²⁵

18 Similarly, servientes who have received permission shall be free to go from us to our sons, or from the older to the younger, without their possessions being wasted.²⁶ We shall not receive any one whom our son has condemned legally or whose case has been opened before him until it shall be concluded in his court, and our son shall do likewise.

19 Castle-warriors²⁷ shall be preserved in the liberties established by the holy king. Similarly foreign guests of whatever nationality shall be preserved in the liberties originally granted to them.²⁸

²⁵ This article probably refers to the revindications of “undeserved” royal grants, which King Andrew seems to have begun when churchmen and certain baronial groups questioned the wisdom of his “new institutions”. Archbishop John of Esztergom was identified by the king in 1217 as a stubborn opponent of his novae institutiones (Knauz, Monumenta, I: 217). Later Archbishop Ugrinus of Kalocsa is thought to have called on Rome in 1225 prompting Pope Honorius III to warn the king against diminishing his royal dignity by lavish donations and urging him to respect this clause; see James Ross Sweeney, “The Decretal Intellecto and the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222,” in Album Elemér Mályusz (Brussels: librairie Encyclopédique, 1976), pp. 89–96; here p. 95. The king’s action may not have been very extensive or systematic, and the evidence on them is scant. The record of ordeals in Oradea (Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum. . . eds. János Karácsonyi and Sándor Borovsky. Nagyvárád: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903; online: <https://www.arcanum.hu/hu/online-kiadvanyok/Varadi-varadi-jegyzokonyv-regestrum-varadinense-1208-1235-2/>) refers to two mandates (edictum est) to recover lost royal land (Nos. 315 and 317) and in 1220 a royal charter refers to lands taken back earlier from a certain udvarnok (Szentpétery, Regesta, No. 358). Nevertheless, these haphazard changes in grants and revindications may have caused considerable insecurity among the recipients of royal grants

²⁶ Prince Béla was crowned “junior king” in 1203 and by 1222 governed a considerable area of the country: his younger brother, Kálmán (Coloman), had been crowned King of Halich (Galicia) in 1217 but was overthrown and imprisoned in 1219/20; the youngest, Prince Andrew was betrothed to Maria of Novgorod-Smolensk and created Duke of Halich in 1222. While the text may refer to the transfer of loyalty from the “senior” to the “junior” king, it likely refers to a shift from the older to the younger princes

²⁷ Castle warriors (jobagiones castri) were dependent freeman obligated to military service, attached to a royal castle and commanded by the ispán in the eleventh to thirteenth centuries. With the transfer of many castles to private hands and the transformation of the military system along Western models, these militiamen were gradually replaced by the noble levy. As proprietors of small possessions on former castle estates, many a castle warrior rose into the lesser nobility. This social category gradually vanished during the fourteenth century. See, Attila Zsoldos, A szent király szabadjai – Fejezetek a várjobbágyok történetéből. [The freemen of the holy king : Chapters from the history of the castle warriors] (Budapest: MTA TTI, 1999).

²⁸ King Andrew was especially solicitous to grant privileges to immigrant hospites: his charter for the German (Saxon) settlers of Transylvania, the Andreanum, remained the basic legal document of that community for centuries; for its several editions, see Szentpétery, Regesta, No. 443. For the general context, see H. Helbig, “Die ungarische Gesetzgebung des 13. Jahrhunderts und die Deutschen,” in Walter Schlesinger, ed. Die deutsche Ostsiedlung des Mittelalters als Problem der europäischen Geschichte, (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1975), pp. 509–526

20 The tithe should not be paid in silver, rather, as the earth brings it forth, it should be rendered in wine and grain,²⁹ and should the bishops object, we shall not support them.

21 The bishops shall not give the title from properties of servientes for our horses, nor shall their people be obliged to convey these titles to royal estates.³⁰

22 Our pigs shall not be pastured in the forests or meadows of the servientes against their will.

23 Our new coins shall be valid for a year from Easter to Easter, and pennies shall be the same as they were under King Béla.³¹

24 Ishmaelites and Jews shall not be allowed to become counts of the chamber of the mint, of salt, and of tolls [or] nobles of the realm.³²

²⁹ This resistance of the producers to the obvious attempts of the church to collect the tithe in coin, which forced them to market their crops, was not successful; within a year, Pope Honorius III rescinded the validity of this article (29 March 1223; cf. Augustinus Theiner, Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, I, Roma: Typis Vaticanis, 1859 (repr. Osnabrück: Zeller, 1968) I, 38–39, Nos. 78–79), and the 1231 reissue omitted it.

³⁰ One possible interpretation of this unclear section is that bishops had been obligated to supply fodder to the king's horses from the tithe collected on the servientes' estates. L. Juhász ("Az Aranybulla megromlott 21. cikkéhez" [On the Corrupt Article 21 of the Golden Bull], Filológiai Közöny, 4 [1958], 99–103) suggests another translation: "The bishops shall not receive a tithe from the king's horses pastured on the estates of the servientes." It is possible that this is in some way related to the war-horses the king was entitled to receive from the counties (see above, n. 33, p. 91).

³¹ Bálint Hóman, in Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325] (Budapest: MTA, 1916), pp. 303–307, suggested that the comparison refers to King Béla I (1060–3), whose good oboli (with 1.644 g pure silver content) were indeed not matched by the coinage of the subsequent century. Such a "long memory" is rather unlikely and the reference is most probably to the coins of King Béla III (1172–96). However, the surviving good pennies of his—see Lajos Huszár, Münzkatalog Ungarn. Von 1000 bis heute (Budapest–Munich, 1979) pp. 60–71—are not sufficient to unequivocally decide the issue. On the early coins in special, see L. Kovács, A kora Árpád-kori magyar pénzverésről. Érentani és régészeti tanulmányok a Kárpát-medence I. (Szent) István és II. (Vak) Béla uralkodása közötti időszakának (1000–1141) érmeiről [On early-Arpadian age coinage. Numismatic and archaeological studies on the coins of the Carpathian Basin of the period between the reign of St Stephen I and Béla II (1000–1141)] Varia Archaeologica Hungarica, 7 (Budapest: Régészeti Intézet, 1997).

³² The translation corrects the text at this point assuming a missing vel or et (meaning "or") in the spirit of the article's renewal as 1231: 31. Older translations, including Näf's attempted to understand the passage to mean that offices in the chambers were to be reserved for nobles of the realm. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) restated the prohibition of the council of Toledo against the promotion of Jews to public offices (Conc. IV. Lat., Tit. 69, Mansi, XXII: 1057, and Gregory IX. Decretales, V.6.16.). This restriction was explicitly extended to pagans. In 1221 the papacy expressed concern that a large Jewish population existed in Hungary and ordered both King Andrew and Queen Yolanda not to impede the liberation of Christian slaves or free them from Muslim hands: see Theiner, Vetera monumenta I, 30, Nos. 58–59. See now also:

25 Salt should not be stored in the center of the kingdom except in Szalacs and Szeged, but in the borderlands.³³

26 Possessions shall not be granted outside of the realm; if some have been given or sold, they shall be returned to the inhabitants of the realm for a reimbursement.

27 The mardurina shall be rendered in the manner established by King Coloman.³⁴

28 If any one has been duly sentenced in judicial proceedings, no magnate should defend him.

29 Ispáns shall enjoy only the rights of their office; the king shall receive the rest which pertains to him, namely: the bucket tax, tolls, the ox-tax,³⁵ and two-thirds of the castle dues.

Nora Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and 'Pagans' in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000- c.1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) pp. 152-5. As to the financial officers of the time, see Márton Gyöngyössi, "13. századi budai és esztergomi kamaraispánok" [Counts of the chamber in Buda and Esztergom in the 13th C.] Az Érem 71. 2 (2015) 1–17.

³³ Szalacs is in Co. Bihar, Szeged in Co. Csongrád along the Tisza River; royal salt trading posts are known to have existed at the border in Co. Zala, in Pozsony, in Sopron and in Vasvár. While salt was not yet a royal monopoly (regale) in this period, the rich salt mines on royal land in Transylvania and northern Hungary allowed the kings virtually to control the production and distribution of salt, from which they gained considerable income: see O. Paulinyi, "A sóregálé kialakukása Magyarországon" [The Development of the Salt Monopoly in Hungary], Századok, 57–58 (1923/24), 627–647; and Beatrix F. Romhányi, "Salt Mining and Trade in Hungary before the Mongol Invasion" in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) 182–204.

³⁴ The mardurina was originally a tax of one marten pelt annually from each inhabitant of Croatia and Slavonia (see V. Klačić, "Marturina, Slavonska daca u srednjem vijeku" [The Mardurina: A Slavonian Tax of the Middle Ages], Rad Jugoslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti, 157 [1904], 114–123; M. Kostrenčić et al., Lexicon latinitatis medii aevi Jugoslaviae (Zagreb: Concilium academicarum scient. et art. SFR Jugoslaviae, 1961–78), fasc. 4, pp. 701–702). There is no contemporary evidence among known charters or extant legislation about King Coloman having instituted this payment; Andrew II, however, in a charter of c. 1224–1228 specified that the inhabitants of the banatus were to pay twelve Friesach pennies per household (mansio) "sicut tempore regis Colomanni consuetum fuerat" [as was usual in the times of King Coloman]; see T. Smičiklas, Codex diplomaticus regni Croatiae, Dalmatiae et Slavoniae (Zagreb: Academia Scientiarum, 1904). III, 140, No. 214. The mardurina was explicitly commuted into a money payment in 1231: 33. See also Weisz, as nWeiss

³⁵ Little is known about these royal levies. The first of them, the "bucket-tax," was a levy on vineyards; see Antal Bartal, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis Regni Hungariae. (Budapest: MTA, 1901; repr. Hildesheim–New York: Olms, 1970), p. 125 s.v. "Chybrio" [from Hung. csöbör, "bucket"]. The ox-tax may have been similar to the levy rendered for many centuries by the Transylvanian Székely; see Eckhart, Adózás, pp. 78–80. The royal portion of the counties' revenues amounted to an annual sum of 25 thousand marks in the late twelfth century, about 13 percent of the king's monetary income; see Hóman, Pénztörténet. p. 433; cf. György Györffy, "Ungarn von 895 bis 1400," in Europäische Wirtschafts- und Sozialgeschichte im Mittelalter, ed. J. A. van Houtte, Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1980. [Handbuch der europäischen Wirtschafts-

30 Similarly, no one other than these four baronial retainers – the palatine, the ban,³⁶ the judge royal, and the judge of the queen’s court³⁷ – shall hold two offices.

And in order that this grant and ordinance or ours shall be valid in our time as well as in that of our successors in perpetuity, we ordered seven exact copies to be drawn up and authenticated with our golden seal, so that one copy shall be sent to the lord pope and he shall have it copied into his register,³⁸ the second copy shall be kept in the custody of the Hospital,³⁹ the third in the custody of the Temple,⁴⁰ the fourth with the king, the fifth at the cathedral chapter of Esztergom, the sixth at und Sozialgeschichte, ed. H. Kellenbenz, II], 625–55 here p. 654; now also Weisz, A királyketteje. (as n. 7, above).

³⁶ The ban was the governor of Croatia, Dalmatia (when under Hungarian control), and Slavonia (the region between the rivers Drava and Sava). Occasionally, members of the dynasty, other times great men of the realm held this title; it was always a powerful position, with its own mint and supported by the assembly of local lords and nobles of the “kingdom of” Croatia, including membership in the royal council.

³⁷ On the judge royal (comes curiae), see above, n. 17; the comes curiae reginae was an officer of similar duties, but with more limited authority due to the less extensive properties of the queen

³⁸ No copy has been located in the extant registers of Honorius III (1216–1227). It is significant that the reputation of the papal registers in the thirteenth century encouraged the framers of the Bull to believe that a copy transcribed into them provided a form of authentic preservation. A papal letter of 15 December 1222, addressed to the Bishop of Eger and the abbots of Egres and St. Gotthard, explicitly refers to reports received in Rome about the events which brought the Golden Bull into existence. Honorius ordered these prelates strictly to admonish and instruct “the multitude” not to presume to threaten “the king, his crown, the persons of his family, or their goods, not to mention the rule of law” (Theiner, Vetera monumenta, I, 36, No. 73). This was not, as Hantos (Magna Charta, p. 25) asserts, a condemnation of the Golden Bull, for it is clear that Honorius did not yet have a copy of the Bull at hand. The pope’s letter of 29 March 1223 (see above, n. 29) appears directed against clause 1222: 20 without reference to the existence of the Bull, only to reports received in Rome. A papal letter of 23 August 1225, however, refers to Andrew’s “law of perpetual duration” and to the contents of 1222: 16 and 24, thereby strongly suggesting access to a copy of the Bull in Rome by that time: see Sweeney, “The Decretal Intellecto,” p. 96

³⁹ The Order of the Knights of the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem, or the Hospitallers, established a house in Hungary during the reign of Géza II (1141–1162). This was the convent of St. Stephen the King, located in Székesfehérvár, see Zsolt Hunyadi, The Hospitallers in the kingdom of Hungary c. 1150–1387 (Budapest: CEU—METEM, 2010) pp. 102–4. As one of the major places of authentication it was logical to deposit a copy of the Bull in their house.

⁴⁰ The Order of the Knights of the Temple, or Templars, organized a province of Hungary and Slavonia no later than the reign of Stephen III (1162–1172). The Hungarian priory was located at Vrana on the Adriatic coast in Dalmatia, see B. Stossek, “Maisons et possessions des Templiers en Hongrie,” in: Zsolt Hunyadi, József Laszlovszky, eds. The Crusades and the Military Orders. Expanding the Borders of Medieval Latin Christianity (Budapest: CEU Press, 2001) pp. 245–51. A letter of Pope Alexander III dated 1169 or 1170 refers to a dispute between the Templars already established at Vrana and the Bishop of Scardona: see Smičiklas, Codex diplomaticus. I, 125, No. 120. The Master of the Temple in Hungary at the time of the Golden Bull may have been Pontius de Cruce who had accompanied Andrew on the Crusade in 1217–1218, that of Kalocsa, and the seventh with the incumbent palatine, so that he, having this document always in his sight, should not deviate from the foregoing terms in any respect, nor permit the king, the nobles, or anyone else to deviate from it, so that they should not only enjoy their liberty but also because of this remain ever faithful to us and our successors and not refuse the obligations rightly due to the royal crown.⁴¹

We have also decreed that if we or any of our successors at any time should seek to oppose the terms of this settlement, both the bishops and other baronial retainers as well as the nobles of the realm, singularly and in common, both present and future generations, shall by this authority have the right in perpetuity to resist and speak against us and our successors without the charge of high treason.⁴²

Given by the hand of Cletus, chancellor⁴³ of our court and provost of the church of Eger, in the year of the Incarnation of the Word one thousand two hundred twenty-two, ⁴⁴when venerable John is Archbishop of Esztergom,⁴⁵ the venerable Ugrinus the Archbishop of Kalocsa⁴⁶, Desiderius and who is attested in a royal grant of 1219; see Szentpétery, Regesta, No. 353.

⁴¹ The corona regia was here understood in the abstract sense of the royal dignity or kingly office to which services were owed; see J. Karpat. "Corona regni Hungariae im Zeitalter der Arpaden," in M. Hellman, ed., Corona Regni (Weimar: Böhlau Nachf., 1961), pp. 225–348, espec. 271f., 290ff., and 308ff ⁴² On the idea of right of resistance, see F. Kern, Gottesgnadentum und Widerstandsrecht im frühen Mittelalter: Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte der Monarchie (Leipzig: Koehler, 1914; English translation by S. B. Chrimes, Kingship and Law (New York: Praeger, 1956), pp. 1–147; for Hungary, see A. Degré, "Az ellenállási jog magyarországi története" [History of the Right of Resistance in Hungary], Jogtudományi Közlöny, 35 (1980), 366–377 and Zoltán J. Kosztolnyik, "De facultate resistendi: Two Essential Characteristics of the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222." Studies in Medieval Culture, 5 (1975), 97–104.

⁴³ Kilit, de genere Bél, chancellor 1219–240, bishop of Eger 1224–45. On the development of the office of chancellor from the comes capallae during the late twelfth and early thirteenth century, see A. Kubinyi, "Königliche Kanzlei und Hofkapelle in Ungarn um die Mitte des 12. Jahrhunderts," in Festschrift Fr. Hausmann (Graz: Akademische Verlagsanstalt, 1977), pp. 299–324; also I. Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan [Hungarian Diplomatics] (Bp.: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1930), p. 93ff.

⁴⁴ The list of office-holders, in this instance only prelates, was inserted into privileges issued by the chancellery of the kings of Hungary as an indication of date and authentication, and was not meant as a list of witnesses; the circle of persons so mentioned varied throughout the centuries: see Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan, p. 104

⁴⁵ John, archbishop of Esztergom 1205–22.

⁴⁶ Ugrin, de denere. Csák, archbishop of Kalocsa 1219–41.

Bishop of Cenad,⁴⁷ Robert of Veszprém,⁴⁸ Thomas of Eger,⁴⁹ Stephen of Zagreb,⁵⁰ Alexander of Oradea⁵¹, Bartholomew of Pécs,⁵² Cosmas of Győr⁵³, and Briccius of Vác,⁵⁴ in the seventeenth year of our reign.⁵⁵

⁴⁷ Desiderius (Dezső), bishop of Cenad 1202–29.

⁴⁸ Robert, bishop of Veszprém 1209–26, archbishop of Esztergom 1226–39.

⁴⁹ Thomas, bishop of Eger 1217–24.

⁵⁰ Stephen, bishop of Zagreb 1214–27.

⁵¹ Alexander, bishop of Oradea, 1219–30.

⁵² Bartholomew, bishop of Pécs 1219–c.1247.

⁵³ Cosmas, bishop of Győr 1219–c. 1223.

⁵⁴ Briccius (Bereck), bishop of Vác 1221–37.

⁵⁵ Andrew counted his regnal years usually from the date of his brother's, King Imre's, death (30 November 1204), but occasionally from the death of Imre's son, King Ladislas III, who preceded Andrew for a few months before he died in Vienna on 7 May 1205, having been expelled from Hungary by his uncle. Hence the seventeenth regnal year combined with the 1222 year of grace may refer only to the latter and suggests that the Golden Bull was issued some time before 7 May of that year: see Nándor Knauz, II. Endre szabadságlevelei [Andrew II's charters of liberty] (Pest: Eggenberger, 1869), p. 34

RENEWAL OF THE GOLDEN BULL OF KING ANDREW II OF HUNGARY, 1231

Nine years after its first issuance Andrew II found it necessary to renew the Golden Bull with a number of minor changes and one major alteration, namely that the nobles' right of resistance was replaced by the right and duty of the archbishop of Esztergom to excommunicate any king who should disregard the privilege. It has been argued that this alteration and some other additions regarding ecclesiastical property and the clergy were due to increased papal interest in Hungarian politics, expressed in numerous letters to King Andrew and in legations from Rome.

This text was not used in any later confirmation of the Golden Bull, not even for the 1318 transcript, although that was issued by a group of prelates. It survives in two copies, authenticated by Giacomo da Pecorara, Cardinal Bishop of Palestrina, papal legate to Hungary (1232–1234), and Hungarian prelates. The editors are indebted to Dr. Gabriele P. Scardellato for having collated these manuscripts in Rome with Theiner's published text for the present edition.

The passages repeated from the privilege of 1222 are set in italics and minor stylistic changes are disregarded. The arrangement and numbering of the articles are Döry's;

Notes are added only to the changes vis-à-vis the text of 1222.

MSS: (Authenticated copies of December 1232) Vatican Archives, Liber Censuum, Miscellanea, Arm. X, 1 foll. 274v–275v (ex 353–356); ibid., Cencii Camerarii Divers. Arm. XXV, 18, foll. 271–280v.

EDD: Augustinus Theiner, Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, I, (Rome: Typis Vaticanis, 1859; repr. Osnabrück: Zeller, 1968). 1, 107–111; Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest.: Athenaeum, 1901) 134–137 (opposite the 1222 text); older editions are listed in Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest: MTA, 1923–61).

LIT: See 1222

RENOVATIO BULLAE AUREAE 1231

In nomine Sancte Trinitatis et individue unitatis. Andreas Dei gratia Ungarie, Dalmatie, Chroatie, Rame, Servie, Galitie Lodomirieque Rex im- perpetuum.

Quoniam libertas tam nobilium regni nostri, quam etiam aliorum a sancto Stephano rege instituta, per aliquorum regum potenciam ulciscencium aliquando iram propriam, aliquando etiam attendentium consilia falsa iniquorum hominum fuit in quamplurimis diminuta, multociens ipsi nobiles nostri serenitatem nostram et predecessorum nostrorum, regum suorum, precibus et instancia multa pulsaverunt super reformatione regni nostri.

Nos igitur petitioni eorum satisfacere cupientes in omnibus ut tenemur, presertim quia inter nos et eos occasione hac iam sepius ad amaritudines non modicas est processum, quod — ut regia honorificencia plenius conservetur — convenit evitari, hoc enim per nullos alios melius fit, quam per eos, concedimus tam eis quam aliis iobagionibus et servientibus regni nostri libertatem a sancto rege concessam, ac alia ad statum regni nostri ordinandi pertinencia, in hunc modum confirmamus.

- I. In festo sancti regis, nisi arduo negotio regni nostri ingruente vel infirmitate prohibiti fuerimus, Albe tenemur sollempnisare, ut ibi oppressi sine timore querimonias suas nobis possint exponere: sed si nos non possumus interesse, palatinus interesse tenetur, ut vice nostra causas aludiat, et omnes servientes nostri et alii, qui volunt, libere et sine timore illuc convenient. Prelati ecclesiarum, ut archiepiscopi et episcopi, ad pauperum querimoniam audiendam, et infracte forte libertatis concesse confirmationem, nisi canonica prepedicione fuerint impediti, tenentur interesse. Si palatinus interim male administraverit negocia regis et regni, supplicabant nobis, ut utiliore loco eius constituamus, quem volemus, et nos eorum precibus annuemus.*
- II. Volumus, quod nec nos nec posterius aliquos unquam capiant vel destruant, nisi prius ordine iudiciario convenientur. Et cum ista sacramento nostro et principum nostrorum fuerint confirmata, si qui per nos vel per filios nostros, vel per quoscumque post idem tempus, scilicet decimo septimo anno regni nostri sine iudicio sunt spoliati, plene restituantur.*
- III. Item nullam collectam, nullam exactionem, nec lucum camere, quocumque nomine possit censi, occasione aliqua super homines cuiuscumque nationis vel condicionis colligi faciemus, illis exceptis, qui fisco regio in debito censu tenentur.*
- IV. Super domos servientum vel villas nec agasones, nec falconarii, nec caniferi, nec curriferi nostri descendant ipsis invitis; ubicumque autem alibi nos vel dictos officiales nostros descendere contingerit, iustam extimationem solvi faciemus, sicut continetur in sequentibus. Et quia preterea tam propter descensus nostros et domine regine ac filiorum nostrorum, quam etiam archiepiscoporum, episcoporum, baronum et nobilium nostrorum intolerabilia dampna et gravamina per totum regnum fieri videbamus, districte statuendo precipimus, ut* nichil recipiatur ad coquinam nostram vel nostrorum, nisi dato iusto precio. Similiter de annona et de vino, et aliis necessariis nichil recipiant, nisi dato iusto precio. Pro domestico autem, cui iusticia exhibita non fuerit, tres rustici de villa iurare debeant, et ad eorum iuramentum hospes quicumque fuerit, domestico plenam faciet iusticiam cum iudicio regali, vel dominus ville quicumque fuerit, sive archiepiscopus sive episcopus, sive nobilis, ille personaliter hoc verbo veritatis dicere teneatur. Quicumque vero nobiles iuxta formam statuti nostri iusticiam non fecerint, tales quilibet episcopus in sua diocesi excommunicet, et nos eos pro excommunicatis tamdiu habebimus, donec iniuriam passo satisfaciant competenter.

- V. Si quis serviens noster sine herede decesserit, quartam possessionum filia optineat, de residuo, sicut ipse voluerit, disponat. Et si morte preventus disponere non posset, propinqui sui qui eum magis contingunt, optineant. Et si nullam penitus cognationem habuerit, rex habeat.
- VI. Comites parrochiani predia servientum et villas ecclesiarum non discuciant, nisi in causa monete et decimarum. Curiales comites parrochiani nullum penitus discuciant, nisi populos sui castri. Fures, latrones, per bilotos regales discuciantur, ante pedes tamen comitis.
- VII. Populi coniurati fures nominare non possunt, nec per hoc innocens populus opprimatur.
- VIII. Nobis facientibus exercitum extra Regnum, nobiles nobiscum ire non tenentur, nisi comites et stipendiarii et iobagiones castri, et qui ex officio debito tenentur, et quibus amplas concessimus possessiones. Si vero exercitus super regnum venerit, universi et singuli ad defensionem patrie contra inimicos se opponere tenantur. Regresso superveniente exercitu, pro vindicta ipsos tenentur persequi.
- IX. Palatinus vero omnes homines indifferenter discuciet, preter personas ecclesiasticas et clericos, et preter causas matrimoniales et dotis, et alias ecclesiasticas, quacumque ratione videntur ad ecclesiasticum examen pertinere. Cause nobilium, que ad perdicionem capitis aut destructionem possessionum eorumden pertinent, sine consciencia regia per nullos iudices terminentur. Palatinus iudices vicarios non habeat, nisi unicum in curia sua, et caveat diligenter, ne contra presens statutum aliquem iudicet vel condempnet.
- X. Curialis comes noster, dum in curia nostra manet, omnes iudicet, et causam inchoatam in nostra curia ubique possit terminare: set existens in predio suo vel alibi extra curiam nostram, nec dare prestaldos, nec partes possit citari facere. Et quia multi in regno leduntur per falsos prestaldos, citationes vel testimonia eorum non valeant, nisi per testimonium diocesis episcopi vel capituli; nec falsificatus prestaldus possit se iustificare, nisi eorumdem testimoniis in factis maiorum; in factis minorum vicinorum conventuum vel claustrorum testimoniis. Prestaldum nullus per annum vel biennium, vel ultra secum detineat, nisi usque ad decisionem cause, ad quam impetavit.
- XI. Hospites nobiles ad regnum venientes, nisi incole esse velint, ad dignitates non promoveantur: per tales enim divicie regni extrahuntur.

- XII. Uxores decedencium vel condempnatorum per sententiam ad mortem, vel in duello succumbencium, aut alia ex quacumque causa non fraudentur dote sua. Uxores furum vel latronum ac eorum liberi pro delictis patrum non vendantur.
- XIII. Integros comitus vel dignitates in predia vel possessiones non transferemus.
- XIV. Statuimus iobagiones castrorum secundum libertatem a sancto rege constitutam, similiter et hospites cuiuscumque nationis secundum libertatem ab inicio eis concessam, perpetuo teneri.
- XV. Ad secandas indagines, ad fossata facienda, ad ortos, ad quecumque regia edificia, vel officinas servientium, vel ecclesiarum populos non cogemus.
- XVI. Preter vicesimam, quam ab antiquo reges habent: decimas non exigemus, quia per hoc populus gravatur.
- XVII. Porci nostri in silvis vel pratis servientum contra voluntatem eorum non pascantur.
- XVIII. Monete et salibus et aliis publicis officiis Iudei et Sarraceni non preficiantur.
- XIX. Possessiones extra regnum non conferantur: et si alique sunt collate vel vendite, populo regni ad redimendum reddantur, vel simpliciter recipiantur.
- XX. Item pro singulis marturinis quatuor pondera persolvantur: quantumcumque inde provenierit, tertia pars domino fundi, et due partes domino terre persolvantur.
- XXI. Comites iure sui comitatus sint contenti cetera ad regem pertinencia, scilicet cibriones, tributa, boves et due partes castrorum ad regis voluntatem, cui volet, distribuantur.
- XXII. Item quandocumque aliquos ordine iudiciario convinci contigerit, in voluntate nostra erit bona ipsorum penes nos retinere, vel aliis pro velle nostro distribuere, incendium tamen mitti nolumus super villas eorundem.

Ut autem hec nostris et successorum nostrorum temporibus firma et inconcussa permaneant, tam nos quam filii nostri prestito corporaliter sacramento confirmavimus, et tam nostro quam filiorum nostrorum sigillis fecimus roborari, spontanee consencientes, ut sive nos sive filii nostri et successores nostri hanc a nobis concessam libertatem confringere voluerint, Strigoniensis archiepiscopus, premissa legitima admonitione, nos vinculo excommunicationis et eos innodandi habeat potestatem. Datum anno ab incarnatione domini millesimo duccentesimo tricesimo primo: anno vero regni nostri vicesimo nono.

RENEWAL OF THE GODLEN BULL 1231

In the name of the Holy Trinity and Indivisible Unity. Andrew, by the grace of God, King of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, and Lodomeria, in perpetuity.

Since the liberties established by St. Stephen and the king in favor of the nobles of our realm as well as of other persons have been diminished in many respects by the authority of certain kings, some of whom in personal anger took vengeance, others of whom paid heed to the false counsel of wicked and self-serving men, these same nobles have repeatedly importuned our Serenity and that of their kings, our predecessors, with numerous petitions and entreaties for reform of our kingdom.

We therefore desire to fulfill their requests in all respects, as we are obliged to do – especially because between them and us this circumstance has often led to no inconsiderable bitterness, which ought rightly to be avoided for the preservation of the royal dignity which can be done better by no one other than by them. We grant both to them and to other baronial trainers and servientes regis of our kingdom the liberty given by the holy king, and we confirm what further pertains to be ordained for the state of our kingdom in this manner.

- 1 That we are bound to celebrate the feast of Saint Stephen annually in Székesfehérvár unless we should be beset by some urgent matter or prevented by illness, so that the oppressed can present their grievances there without fear. But if we cannot be present, the palatine is obliged to attend so that he can hear cases in our place, and all our servientes and others, who wish shall freely assemble there without fear.¹ The prelates of the churches, both archbishops and bishops, unless they shall be prevented by canonical impediment, are obliged to attend in order to hear complaints of the humble and confirm liberties which may possibly have been violated. If meanwhile, the palatine should badly manage the affairs of king and kingdom, they shall petition us to install a more suitable person of our choice in his place, and we shall look favorably upon their requests.²

¹ See 1222: 1

² This may be the first reference to the interference of the nobility with the choice of the count palatine, who in these times changed from being the head of the royal household to the itinerant general judge of the nobles. Norbert C. Tóth has recently demonstrated that ever since the election of Nicholas Zámbocki at a diet in 1342 (of which no decree survived), the palatine used the title palatinus regni Hungariae in which regnum means (as usual in medieval Hungary) the noble political nation; see “Az ország nádora” [The palatine of the ország] in Középkortörténeti tanulmányok 7, Attila Kiss P., Ferenc Piti and György

- 2 *It is further our wish that neither we nor our successors should at any time seize or cause the ruin of any one, unless he first be summoned and duly sentenced by judicial process.*³ And since these provisions had been confirmed by our oath and that of our magnates, whoever has been despoiled by us, our sons, or anyone else without judicial sentence since that time, namely, since the seventeenth year of our reign,⁴ complete restitution shall be made to him.
- 3 *Similarly we shall gather no collecta, no levies, nor the chamber's profit,*⁵ however it may be assessed, from anyone of whatever nation or rank on any occasion, except from those who are held to owe land-rent to the royal treasury.
- 4 Neither shall we, nor our grooms, nor falconers, nor houndsmen, nor teamsters descend upon the houses or villages of the servientes against their will; if, however, it should happen that we or our said officers should descend anywhere, we shall pay the just value as described below.⁶ And since on account of our descensus, that of the lady queen and our sons as well as that of the archbishops, bishops, barons, and our nobles we appear to have caused intolerable damage and hardship throughout our nobles we appear to have caused intolerable damage and hardship throughout our whole kingdom, we decree that it be strictly established that nothing should be received by our kitchen or theirs unless a just price has been paid. Similarly, no cereals, wine, or other necessities shall be received unless a just price has been paid.⁷ For the native husbandman who has been denied justice, three peasants⁸ from the village shall swear an oath and on their oath the foreign guest, whoever he was, shall render to the husbandman full justice in the royal fine,⁹ or the lord of the village, whoever he is, whether archbishop, or bishop, or noble shall personally be held to pass judgment.¹⁰ But those noblemen who do not render justice according to these terms of our statute shall be excommunicated by the bishop of their diocese and Szabados, eds. pp. 439-50 (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 2013) Later the diets claimed the right to elect the palatine, but this did not become accepted practice until the late Middle Ages.

³ See 1222: 2

⁴ I.e., 1222, the date of the first Golden Bull

⁵ The lucrum camerae, a direct tax, replaced the king's income from the annual re-issue of money with less value that has been discontinued; see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325] (Budapest.: MTA, 1916. [repr. 1991]) p. 442f, and note 8 to 1222.

⁶ Cf. 1222: 15

⁷ On the descensus, previously the duty of hosting the king, but here a kind of tax, see 1222: 15. It is noteworthy that the issue is treated here in much greater detail than nine years before. The reason for this is not known.

⁸ Rustici means “peasants” in general, without precise social identification.

⁹ The “royal fine” was higher than (usually double) the “common fine.”

¹⁰ Lit. “Speak these words of truth”, which may refer to the replacement of the peasants’ oath or to passing judgment.

will be regarded excommunicate by us until they have properly given satisfaction to the person who suffered the injury.

- 5 *If a serviens of ours should die without an heir, his daughter shall receive a quarter of his possessions but he shall dispose of the rest as he wishes. And if, prevented by death, he shall not have been able to make disposition, those relatives closer to him shall obtain [the possession]. If he shall have no relatives at all, the king shall obtain them.*¹¹
- 6 *The ispáns of counties shall not render judicial sentences concerning the estates of the servientes and in villages or churches except in cases pertaining to coinage and tithes. The ispáns of county castles shall render judicial sentences on no one except those attached to their castles. Thieves and robbers shall be judged by royal judges but only in the presence of the ispán.*¹²
- 7 *People united in a sworn association shall not be able to accuse thieves, lest they oppress the innocent folk.*¹³
- 8 *When we lead the army outside the kingdom, the nobles do not have to come with us except for the counts, hired soldiers, castle warriors, and both those who are obliged to serve by reason of their office and those to whom we have granted substantial possessions. If, however, the army of an enemy should advance upon the kingdom, everyone without exception is obliged to oppose the enemy for the defense of the fatherland. And if the attacking army retreats, they must pursue if for revenge.*¹⁴
- 9 *The count palatine shall judge without differentiation all the men of our realm except ecclesiastical persons and clerks, and cases concerning marriage, dowry, and other ecclesiastical matters which appear to belong for whatever reason to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.*¹⁵ Cases concerning nobles condemned to capital punishment and loss of their possessions shall not be concluded without the king's knowledge by any judge. The palatine shall have no deputy judge except for a single one at his own court. And he should

¹¹ See 1222: 4

¹² See 1222: 5 and note the exemption of ecclesiastical property from comital jurisdiction.

¹³ Cf. 1222: 6

¹⁴ Cf. 1222: 7; the term pro defensione patriae may indicate the emergence of a certain personal identification with the homeland, for which other documents of the time offer additional indications. See Joseph Deér, "La sentiment nationale hongroise au moyen âge," Nouvelle revue de Hongrie, 29 (1936), 411–19 and Idem, "Entstehung des ungarischen Nationalbewusstseins", East Central Europe/l'Europe de Centre-Est. Eine wissenschaftliche Zeitschrift, 20-23 (1963-68) Pt. 2, 11–54. The obligation to pursue the retreating enemy is not found elsewhere describing the duties of the general levy.

¹⁵ Cf. 1222: 8, with a repeated confirmation of the sphere reserved to canonical jurisdiction; see György Bónis, "Entwicklung der geistlichen Gerichtsbarkeit in Ungarn vor 1526." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, 80, Kanonistische Abteilung, 49 (1963), 174–235., here pp. 191–197.

be careful not to judge or condemn anyone contrary to these statutes.¹⁶

- 10 *Our judge royal shall be able to judge all while he resides in our court and shall have the right to pass sentence anywhere in cases initiated at our court, but when he stays on his estates or elsewhere outside our court, he shall not be able to dispatch bailiffs or cite parties to a suit.*¹⁷ And because many people suffer harm from false bailiffs, their summons or testimony shall not be valid without the witness of the diocesan bishop or the chapter. The accused bailiff should clear himself in major matters only by their testimony; in minor matters by the testimony of neighboring convents or monasteries.¹⁸ No one shall keep a bailiff with him for a year or two or longer, but only until the case for which he was commissioned is completed.
- 11 If guests, foreign noblemen, come to the kingdom, they shall not be raised to any position of dignity, unless they wish to become residents, without the consent of the kingdom; because such persons take away the riches of the realm.¹⁹
- 12 *The wives of those who died either by capital punishment or in a duel or for any other reason shall not be cheated out of their dower.*²⁰ The wives of thieves and robbers and their children shall not be sold for the crimes of the fathers.
- 13 *We shall not bestow whole counties or any other dignities as estates or possessions in perpetuity.*²¹
- 14 We order that castle-warriors shall be preserved in perpetuity in the liberties established by the holy king, similarly foreign guests of whatever nationality in the liberties originally ¹⁶ See 1222: 8.

¹⁷ See 1222: 9

¹⁸ This article suggests a gradual change in judicial procedure from the older style of personal summons and testimony of the pristaldus, (bailiff) as repeatedly prescribed in the decreta of Stephen, Ladislas, and Coloman, to one based on the cooperation of ecclesiastical authorities which had always been in charge of ordeals but now were also to supply authentic witnesses and to serve in the written administration of justice as loca credibilia. See Ferenc Eckhart, "Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558; László Mezey, "Anfänge der Privaturkunde in Ungarn und der glaubwürdigen Orte," Archiv für Diplomatik, 18 (1972), 209–302; see also 1267: 3 (with n. 10). The procedure of "keeping the bailiff" is not clear.

¹⁹ Cf. 1222: 11. The clause demanding "resident" status for eligibility of office suggests that there were foreign knights who came to stay only for a while at the king's court. No legal procedure is known for this period by which indigenatus (the legal term used later for becoming a Hungarian nobleman) could be acquired. A charter of Andrew III of 1300 contains in one edition (C. Wagner, Analecta Scepusiensia, 1 [Wien: Trattner, 1774], p. 115) the words novus incola for the grantee, but it is unclear whether the donation itself made him a resident.

²⁰ See 1222: 12.

²¹ See 1222: 16.

*granted to them.*²²

- 15 We shall not force the dependents of the servientes and the churches to cut fences or dig ditches, to work in the gardens or other royal buildings and workshops.
- 16 We shall not collect a tithe beyond the twentieth that is due to the king by ancient custom, because that burdens the people.
- 17 *Our pigs shall not be pastured in the forests or meadows of the servientes against their will.*²³
- 18 *Jews or Saracens shall not be counts of the chamber of the mint or of the salt or other public officers.*²⁴
- 19 *Possessions shall not be granted outside of the realm; and if some have been given or sold, they shall be returned to the inhabitants of the realm for a reimbursement, or simply reclaimed.*²⁵
- 20 Similarly, for every marten pelt four *pondera*²⁶ are to be paid. From whatever sum this amounts to, one-third shall go to the lord of the property and two-thirds to the lord of the land.²⁷
- 21 *Ispáns shall be content with the rights of their office, the royal income, namely, the bucket tax, tolls, the ox-tax, and two-thirds of the castle dues shall be distributed according to the wish of the king.*²⁸
- 22 Similarly, whenever anyone should be condemned by judicial procedure, their goods may ²² See 1222: 19.

²³ See 1222: 22.

²⁴ See 1222: 24, but here the intention is clear.

²⁵ Cf. 1222: 26, but here with the legal basis of simple confiscation of properties granted to foreigners.

²⁶ Cf. 1222: 27. A pondus was 1/12 of a quarter (ferto) = 1/48 of a mark = c. 4.3–5.1 g of silver. According to Gyula Pauler (A magyar nemzet története az Árpád-házi királyok alatt [History of the Hungarian Nation under the Kings of the Árpád Dynasty], 2nd. ed. [Budapest: Athenaeum, 1899], II. 112), this formal monetarization of the tax at this time also implied an increase, because four pondera were equal to 20d while previously the mardurina was only twelve pennies.

²⁷ Dominus terrae means the king; see Péter von Váczy, A szimbolikus államszermlélet kora [The Age of the Symbolic Idea of State] (Pécs: Minerva, 1932), p. 58, n. 22 with parallel passages. For the connections between dominus terrae/princeps terrae in Hungarian usage and contemporary German legal terminology, see József Gerics, “Über das Rechtsleben Ungarns um die Wende des 13–14. Jahrhunderts,” Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica. 17 (1976), 78–79, n. 136 either be retained by us or given to whomever we wish, as it pleases us. But we do not wish their villages to be burnt down.²⁹

²⁸ See 1222: 29; on the distribution of some of the royal revenue, see Boglárka Weisz A királyketteje és az ispán harmada. Vámok és vámszedés Magyarországon a középkor első felében [The second part of the king and the third for the ispán: Tolls and their collection in Hungary during the first half of the Middle Ages] (Budapest: MTA BTK, 2013).

In order that these shall be firm and unchanged in our time as well as in that of our successors, we have confirmed them by our corporeal oath and those of our sons, and validated them with our seal and those of our sons.³⁰ We agree of our free will that if we, our sons, or our successors attempt to infringe upon this liberty which we have granted, the archbishop of Esztergom shall have the authority, after proper warning, to bind us, or them, in the chains of excommunication.³¹ Given in the year of the Incarnation of the Lord one thousand two hundred thirty-one, and in our twenty-ninth regnal year.³²

²⁹ The (apparently older) copy in the MS Arm. XV: 1 has volumus, i.e., that the king wishes that the villages be burned; but this does not make sense, as the measure is clearly aimed at abolishing an archaic punishment.

³⁰ Prince Béla was crowned “junior king” in 1203 and by 1222 governed a considerable area of the country: his younger brother, Kálmán (Coloman), had been crowned King of Halich (Galicia) in 1217 but was overthrown and imprisoned in 1219/20; the youngest, Prince Andrew was betrothed to Maria of Novgorod-Smolensk and created Duke of Halich in 1222. While the text may refer to the transfer of loyalty from the “senior” to the “junior” king, it likely refers to a shift from the older to the younger princes.

³¹ This passage replaced the ius resistendi of 1222: 31; in the decades that followed, several archbishops had recourse to interdict, although the royal family was never personally excommunicated. On 25 February 1232, Archbishop Robert attempted to force the royal government by interdict to dismiss Jewish and Muslim counts of the chamber and farmers of royal revenue. In 1235, the archbishops and Bishop John of Bosnia, plenipotentiary of Cardinal Legate Giacomo da Pecorara, Bishop of Palestrina, again placed the royal household under excommunication to enforce the agreement of Bereg. (22 August 1233) See: Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest: MTA, 1923–61) No. 599) on the same and related matters.

³² The twenty-ninth regnal year does not fit the Year of Grace in either counting used by Andrew’s chancellery (from November 1204 or May 1205). Nándor Knauz in II. Endre szabadságlevelei [Andrew II’s charters of liberty] (Pest: Eggenberger, 1869), p. 45f., after reviewing the different solutions proposed by historians, decided that the regnal year was miscalculated or the copies are mistaken. The date of 1231 A.D. is beyond doubt, in light of the actions of Archbishop Robert in early 1232 (see above) based on this document

CONCORDANCE

dDRMH 1231

Kovachich, Vestigia
comitiorum

1	1–3
2	4–5
3	6
4	7–10
5	11
6	12–13
7	14
8	15–16
9	17–19
10	20–22
11	23
12	24–25
12–22	26–35

PRIVILEGE FOR THE LESSER NOBLES BY KING ANDREW II, 1267

This relatively short decretum is, in fact, the royal grant of a number of demands made by lesser landowners, who in the king's view were still servientes regis, but who styled themselves nobiles. These nobles since the 1230s exercised some power locally in the counties and were occasionally summoned to regional meetings during the civil war and the virtual partition of the realm between the king and his older son, Stephen. Probably under the leadership of western Hungarian noblemen, a sizeable group of them held a meeting in or near Esztergom in 1267 and submitted a series of complaints to the king, the "junior king" Stephen, and Prince Béla. The king and his sons, probably in the course of the following month, acceded to a number of them. Partially based on the Golden Bull of 1222 the archiepiscopal copy of which the petitioners may have consulted in Esztergom, the decretum specifies several privileges for the lesser nobles in matters of taxation, military service, and inheritance. It also accommodates their concerns about the crown's support for franchised villages and towns. The historical circumstances of its origins and its contents make this decretum, according to Jenő Szűcs, "the lesser nobility's very own charter."

MSS: (original) MNL OL DI 622.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: I. Szentpétery, Középkori oklevélszövegek [Texts of Medieval Charters] (Budapest: Egyetemi Nyomda, 1927). pp. 53–55; Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901) pp. 168–169. Other editions are listed in Imre Szentpétery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest: MTA, 1923–61) No. 1547.

LIT: E. S. Kiss, "A királyi generális kongregáció kialakulásának történetéhez" [Contributions toward the history of the formation of the royal congregatio generalis], Acta Universitatis Szegediensis de Attila József nominatae, Acta Historica, 39 (1971), 15–18; I. Rákos, "IV. Béla birtokrestaurációs politikája," [The property-restoration policy of Béla IV] ibid., 47 (1974), 9–11; J. Szűcs, "Az 1267. évi dekrétum és háttere. Szempontok a köznemesség kialakulásához" [The decretum of 1267 and its background: Aspects on the formation of the lesser nobility], Mályusz Elemér Emlékkönyv [Festschr. E. M.] ed. É. H. Balázs, E. Fügedi, F. Maksay (Bp.: Akadémiai, 1985) pp. 341–394.

PRIVILEGIUM 1267

Nos B[ela] Dei gratia rex Hungarie et St[ephanus] per eandem iunior rex Ungarie et dux Transsilvanus ac Bela iunior dux totius Sclavonie significamus omnibus presentes litteras inspecturis, quod nobiles regni Ungarie universi, qui servientes regales dicuntur, ad nos accedentes petierunt a nobis humiliter et devote, ut ipsos in libertate a sancto rege St[ephano] statuta et obtenta dignaremur conservare, ut ipsi tanto nobis et chorone tenerentur fidelius et affectuosius famulari, quanto eos gratiosioribus libertatibus dotaremus. Quorum petitiones et instantias considerantes fore iustas et legitimas, habito baronum nostrorum consilio et assensu duximus admittendas, attendendo, quod per hoc invigilari de commodiori debeat statu regni.

I. Statuimus itaque, quod collecte vel exactiones ratione camere vel aliqua alia ratione de populis nobilium nullo umquam tempore recipi debeant, nec victualia, nec etiam ratione descensus per nos vel per alios molestari.

II. Item volumus, quod omnes terre castri vel udvornicorum, ad quas populi nostro nomine vel domine regine sunt congregati, castro et udvornicis restituantur, ne ipse ville gaudere debeant privilegiato nomine hospitum liberorum.

III. Item ordinavimus, quod nullus ex nobilibus propter malam suggestionem debeat sine strepitu iudicii per nos captivari, incarcerari vel dampnari rebus seu persona, sed tractus in iudicium presentibus baronibus, exclusis ira, odio vel favore iudicetur iuris ordine observato.

IV. Item concessimus, quod nobiles petita licentia et optenta ad quemcunque nostrum se transferre voluerint, transferendi liberam habeant facultatem, nec propter hoc possessiones eorum destruantur.

V. Preterea statuimus, quod terre nobilium, quas populi liberarum villarum nostrarum vel domine regine seu udvornici seu castrenses quacunque occasione occupaverunt et detinent, restituantur ipsis nobilibus secundum fidem et scientiam duorum baronum nostrorum, quibus nos et ipsi nobiles fidem duximus adhibendam.

VI. Item volumus, quod si aliquem de nobilibus sine heredibus mori contingeret, possessiones et bona ipsius medio tempore non distraherentur, nulli donentur, nulli conferantur, nulli perpetuentur, donec cognati et generationes eiusdem decedentis ad nostram presentiam evocantur et ipsis ac baronibus nostris presentibus de eisdem ordinetur, sicut dictaverit ordo iuris. Interim autem et possessiones et bona ipsius decedentis cognati et generationes debeant conservare.

VII. Item statuimus, quod si ad occupanda vel acquirenda regna et terras contingat exercitum nos movere, nobiles invitos ad exercitum non trahemus, nisi qui sponte voluerit proficisci vel pro nostra pecunia; nec etiam in subsidium filiorum nostrorum vel aliorum invitos ire aliquatenus compellemus.

VIII. Item ordinavimus, quod singulis annis in festo sancti regis unus ex nobis Albam venire debeat et de quolibet comitatu duo vel tres nobiles debeant convenire, ut in eorum presentia de omnibus dampnis et iniuriis per quoscunque datis et illatis omnibus querelantibus satisfiat.

IX. Item si aliquis ex nobilibus non habens heredem in exercitu mortuus fuerit, possessiones ipsius quocumque modo acquisite ad manus regias non devolvantur, sed cognato vel generationi decedentis in exercitu cedere debeant, ita videlicet, quod possessiones ipsius hereditarie generationi sue remaneant, emptitie vero vel acquisite, cuicunque in vita sua conferre voluerit, relinquantur.

X. Item cause nobilium sine petitionibus debeant expediri.

Et in hiis omnibus ac aliis libertatibus a sancto rege Stephano constitutis ipsos nobiles manutenebimus et conservabimus inviolabiliter. Sic nos Deus adiuvet et sancta Dei evangelia et vivificum dominice crucis lignum. Si quis autem nostrum in posterum presentis statuti et libertatis a sancto rege St[ephano] constitute transgressor extiterit, quod absit, ipsum dominus archiepiscopus Strigoniensis per censuram ecclesiasticam compellat ad premissa inviolabiliter observanda, prout id nos ipsi assumpsimus pari voto. Ut autem hec nostra ordinatio perpetuum robur obtineat firmatit, presentes eisdem litteras nostris sigillis fecimus communiri. Datum anno domini millesimo CC^o sexagesimo septimo.

PRIVILEGE OF 1267

We, Béla, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, and Stephen, by that same grace, junior king of Hungary and duke of Transylvania,¹ and Béla the younger, duke of all Slavonia,² notify all who see the present letter that the nobles of all Hungary, who are called servientes regis, came to us to ask humbly and devoutly³ that we deign to preserve them in the liberty granted and established by the holy King Stephen,⁴ so that they may serve us and the crown with greater faith and affection the more graciously we grant them liberties.⁵ Since we considered their petitions and requests both just and lawful, we have, with the counsel and assent of our barons, been moved to grant them, believing that the state of the realm shall be better safeguarded by this act.

1 We have ordered, therefore, that taxes or exactions assessed by the chamber⁶ or for any other reason should never be received from the dependents of the nobles, nor shall they be

¹ Stephen, the oldest son of Béla IV, was crowned rex primogenitus regis Hungariae in 1245, received the governance of Transylvania in 1257, and also ruled the Duchy of Styria (acquired from the Babenberg inheritance in 1254) between 1258 and 1261. After 1261, father and son fought continuous wars during which the country was partitioned, and Stephen governed the eastern part virtually as an independent ruler with the title rex iunior. Several peace treaties were arranged between the two parties, but the armed struggles always resumed. After his father's death, Stephen (V) became king, but died two years later, see Biographisches Lexikon zur Geschichte Südosteuropas, eds. M. Bernath and K. Nehring (München: Oldenbourg, 1981). IV. 186–188.

² Prince Béla (1243–1269), the youngest son of Béla IV, became duke of Slavonia and was entrusted with several counties in order to reorganize the country's western defenses in 1264. He fought on his father's side in the civil wars and predeceased him.

³ It is noteworthy that the clause concerning the nobles' petition is couched in the very same words found in the preamble of the famous charter of the servientes regis "on both sides of the Zala River" of 1232, the earliest documented evidence for the attempt to administer justice by the servientes of a county acting corporately: see Zala vármegye története. Oklevéltár [History of Co. Zala: Diplomatarium], I. Nagy, D. Véghely, and Gy. Nagy, eds. (Bp.: Zala vm. közönsége, 1886), I, 643–644

⁴ It was general practice in the Middle Ages to assign "old law" to a venerable early king, such as Charlemagne, Edward the Confessor, or St. Wenceslas. For Hungary, see: István Tringli, The Liberty of the Holy Kings. Saint Stephen and the Holy Kings in the Hungarian Legal Heritage, in: Attila Zsoldos, ed. Saint Stephen and His Country. A Newborn Kingdom in Central Europe: Hungary (Budapest: Lucidus, 2001) 127–82.

⁵ Szűcs (Mályusz Emlékkönyv) pointed out that this formulation mirrors exactly the arenga of royal grants in which the tanto-quanto clause usually refers to the king's granting "the more liberty to his faithful, the more services they perform"; for this view on royal-subject relations, see Peter von Váczy, Die erste Epoche des ungarischen Königtums (Pécs: Danubia, 1935), pp. 231ff., and A. Kurcz, "Arenga und Narratio ungarischer Urkunden des 13. Jahrhunderts", MIÖG, (1962, 336–338, for the topos do ut des)

⁶ The reference is to the Chamber's profit (lucrum camerae; see 1231: 3 with n. 4). This is made clear from similar but more unequivocal formulations in the charters about the peace concluded between the king and his son in 1266; see, e.g., Szentpetery, Regesta Nos, 1481 and 1848.

troubled for the exaction of descensus by us or by others.⁷

2 Further, it is our wish that all castle land or land in the hands of the udvarnoks on which people were brought together in our name or in that of the queen, shall be restored to the castle and to the udvarnoks lest the villages should come to enjoy the privileged name of free guests.⁸

3 Further, we ordered that no noble on account of evil counsel should be arrested, imprisoned, or harmed in his person or goods without a judicial hearing,⁹ but having been brought into court he should be judged in the presence of barons without wrath, hatred, or favor according to the rule of law.¹⁰

4 Further, we granted that nobles who wish to transfer their allegiance to either of us should, after requesting and obtaining leave, have the unrestricted right so to transfer, without their possessions being therefore wasted.¹¹

5 Furthermore we decreed that the lands of the nobles, which the people of our free villages¹²

⁷ This article and articles 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, and 9 below, depend on clauses of the Golden Bull; the formulation here, however, is more decisive and focused on concerns of the lesser nobles. Although prohibited in the privileges of 1222 and 1231, the collecta on the servientes was nonetheless levied in 1242, see Nándor Knauz, Lajos C. Dedek, eds., Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 3 vols. (Esztergom: HorakBuzarovics, 1874– 1924), I: 347; and the collection of the descensus (a levy replacing the mandatory hospitality to the king and his entourage, the droit de gîte) was also a recurrent complaint mentioned in the peace treaties between Béla and Stephen from 1262 (Szentpétery, Regesta, Nos. 1791 and 1801), from 1263 (ibid., No. 1346), and from 1266.

⁸ The “restoration” of castle land and land belonging to the servile udvarnoks (peasants on settlements attached to the royal household, supplying it with agricultural produce grown on their plots) was phrased in the language of royal recuperationes, a central concern in the earlier politics of Béla IV. but was in fact aimed at limiting the king’s settlement programs and his support of urban development

⁹ Cf. 1222: 2

¹⁰ The reference to ordo iuris may imply the abandonment of trial by ordeal, which would accord with contemporary European-wide practice. Although clerical participation in ordeals had been prohibited by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, the: Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, János Karácsonyi, Sándor Borovsky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense Lat. Rit., 1903) online : <https://www.arcanum.hu/hu/online-kiadvanyok/Varadi-varadi-jegyzokonyv-regestrum-varadinense-1208-1235-2/>—on which, see. I. Zajtay, “Le registre de Varad: Un document judiciaire du XII^e siècle”, Revue d’histoire du droit, 4, No. 32 (1954), 527–562—records the administration of ordeals as late as 1235. See also: M. Lupesco Makó, “Between Sacred and Profane: The Trial by Hot Iron Ceremony Based on the ‘Regestrum Varadiense’” Medievalia Transilvanica 3 (1999), pp. 5–26. Precisely when, after this date, Romano-canonical methods of trial replaced these judgments of God cannot be determined, but it is noteworthy that the loca credibilia which formerly served to administer the ordeal continued to function as centers of authentication of written documents; see Ferenc Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für österreichische Geschichtsforschung, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558. The ideal of a fair hearing before an impartial court subject to the rule of law is reminiscent of clause 39 of the English Magna Carta, but with important social differences.

¹¹ Cf. 1222: 18

¹² Libere ville included not only franchised villages but also towns and cities; see Erzébet Ladányi, “Libera villa, civitas, oppidum. Terminologische Fragen der ungarischen Städteentwicklung,” Annales

or those of the queen, or udvarnoks, or men of the castles have at any time occupied and retained, shall be restored to those nobles in accordance with the trust and wisdom of two of our barons, in whom we and these nobles shall have confidence.¹³

6 Further, we wish that if any of the nobles should die without heirs, his goods and property shall not for the moment be distrained or given to anyone, or granted to anyone by hereditary right until his relatives and clansmen have been summoned to our presence, and a decision has been given in their presence and that of our barons, just as the rule of law prescribes. In the meantime, however, the relatives and kinsmen of the deceased shall preserve his possessions and goods.¹⁴

7 Further, we decreed that if we happen to send an army to occupy or acquire kingdoms and territories, we shall not force the nobles into the army against their will, except for the person who wishes to join voluntarily or for money. We shall not compel anyone against his will to go to the aid of our sons or of anyone else.¹⁵

8 Further, we ordered that each year at the feast of the holy king, one of us shall come to Székesfehérvár and two or three nobles from each county shall gather so that in their presence satisfaction shall be given to all petitioners for all the damages and injuries caused and committed by anyone whatsoever.¹⁶

9 Further, if any noble should die on campaign without an heir, his property, no matter how acquired, shall not revert to the hand of the king, but shall be granted to a relative or kinsman of the man who died on campaign, specifically in the following manner: property which he had by hereditary right should remain with his kindred, but what was bought or acquired shall be left to whomever he wishes to give it during his lifetime.¹⁷

Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica., 18 (1977), 6–14

¹³ The “commissions” for land restoration were in fact very active in the years 1268–69 and frequently offered to the elected officers of the county nobles the chance to perform “governmental” tasks in executing the law; Szücs (Mályusz Emlékkönyv) cites several documents on their activities.

¹⁴ This article clarifies the circle of relatives entitled to inherit, going beyond the general clause of 1222: 4, having the effect of strengthening the noble kindred’s claim to lands while limiting that of the crown

¹⁵ The formulation is stronger than in 1222: 7 or 1231: 15–16; in fact, between 1240 and the date of this decretum King Béla commanded an army for defense only in two cases, while he “forced” or “compelled” his noble warriors besides his Cuman retainers into no less than fifteen campaigns of conquest into Bosnia, Bulgaria, Galicia, and Styria-Austria; see, e.g., H. Dienst, Die Schlacht an der Leitha 1246 (Wien: Österreichischer Bundesverlag, 1971); Ferenc Darkó, Byzantinisch-ungarische Beziehungen in der zweiten Hälfte des XIII. Jahrhunderts (Weimar: Böhlau, 1933); and V. Novotny, “Beiträge zur Geschichte Premysl Otakars II”, MIÖG, 31 (1910), 291–302

¹⁶ This article reflects the development of annual royal assizes into an assembly to which every county was supposed to send deputies: see György Bónis, “The Hungarian Feudal Diet (13th to 18th Centuries).” Receuil de la Société Jean Bodin pour l’histoire comparative des institutions, 25 (1965), 287–307 and Elemér. Mályusz. “A magyar köznemesség kialakulása” [Formation of the Hungarian lesser nobility], Századok, 76 (1942), 272–305, 407–434

¹⁷ Cf. art. 6 above; for the different forms of landed property, see, Coloman, 20–21 with nn. 22–23

10 Further, the cases of nobles shall be expedited without petitions.¹⁸

And we shall keep and preserve these same nobles inviolably in these and all other liberties established by the holy King Stephen, so help us God, His holy Gospels, and the life-giving wood of the Cross.¹⁹ But if any of us, God forbid, should be in the future a trespasser of the present statute and of the liberties established by the holy King Stephen, the archbishop of Esztergom shall compel him through ecclesiastical sanctions to observe the foregoing inviolably, just as we each equally agreed.²⁰ So that this our ordinance shall receive the force of eternal validity, we commanded this letter to be sealed with our seals. Given in the year of our Lord, one thousand two hundred sixty-seven.²¹

¹⁸ King Béla IV's reform demanding written petitions submitted to the judge royal and other royal officers was very much resented even prior to 1241; Roger of Oradea listed the matter of petitions as "the fourth cause" of tension between king and nobles, see his "Epistola in miserabile carmen &c. Epistle to the sorrowful lament &c." in Anonymus and Master Roger, tr. János M. Bak and Martyn Rady (Budapest-New York: CEU Press, 2010 CEMT 5) pp. 144-7. On the differentiation between this reform and the stipulation for written royal administration (probably ordered first by Béla III), see György Györffy, "A magyar krónikák adata a III. Béla-kori petícióról" [Reference in the Hungarian Chronicles to petitions in the age of Béla III], in Középkori kútfontok kritikus kérdései [Critical issues of our medieval sources], János Horváth, György Székely, eds. (Bp.: Akadémiai, 1974), pp. 333-338, where it is also shown that this article did not make an end of petitions, witness one from 1299, published in Gusztáv Wenzel, ed., Árpádkori új okmánytár. Codex diplomaticus Arpadianus continuatus, (Budapest.: MTA, 1860-78 [Monumenta Hungariae historica, Diplomataria] .)IV: 237

¹⁹ The reference is probably to a reliquary of the True Cross (staurotheka) on which the king and his sons swore the oath. There is ample evidence for such reliquaries among the treasures of the dynasty. The most famous is the Esztergom staurotheka but not known to be in the possession of the royal house; see A. Somogyi, "La staurotheque byzantine d'Esztergom", Balkan Studies, 9 (1968), 139-154. The so-called Závis-Cross (now in the Treasury of St. Vitus' Cathedral, Prague) was most likely in the royal treasury around 1267 until it came to Bohemia with the treasures of King Béla's daughter, Anna (on which see Joseph Deér, Die heilige Krone Ungarns [Graz: Böhlau Nachf., 1966], pp. 251-261). Béla's other daughter, [St.] Margaret, is reported to have owned a tábla which contained "the living wood of the Holy Cross", i.e., a lypsanotheka, according to her hagiographer, Lea Ráskai. The editors are grateful for these references to Dr. Éva M. Kovács, whose article, "Signum crucis-lignum crucis: A magyar kettős kereszt ábrázolásai" [Sign of the Cross-Wood of the Cross: Illustrations of the Hungarian Double-Armed Cross], in Eszmetörténeti tanulmányok a magyar középkorról, ed. György Székely (Budapest.: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1984) pp. 407-24 contains additional references.

²⁰ Cf. the sanction clause of 1231.

²¹ This charter was issued some time after 7 September 1267, which is the date of the meeting of the nobles; see Szentpétery, Regesta, No. 1531. The eschatocol, lacking the per manum clause, the list of dignitaries, and the regnal year, is surprisingly simple.

CORONATION DECRETUM OF KING ANDREW III OF HUNGARY, 1
SEPTEMBER 1290

King Andrew III (1290–1301) came to the throne amid an international struggle for control of Hungary. Not only did powerful baronial factions vie for power within the kingdom, but the succession to the throne was also contested. The Sicilian Angevins and their supporters claimed Hungary for Maria, Queen of Sicily and wife of Charles II, and her son Charles Martel. At the same time, the Habsburg emperor of Germany, Rudolf I, enfeoffed his son Albert, Duke of Austria and Styria, with the Kingdom of Hungary maintaining that it had been promised by Béla IV to their Babenberg predecessor, Frederick II, the Quarrelsome, in 1241. Finally the Hungarian episcopate, supported by the papacy—that in turn had claimed Hungary as a fief of St. Peter—secured the throne for Andrew “the Venetian,” son of Stephen, the posthumous son of King Andrew II and Tomasina Morosini, daughter of a Venetian patrician family. He was, in fact, the only—and last— male descendant of the founding Árpád dynasty.

His legislation began in an assembly held in Óbuda (Old Buda) soon after his coronation on 23 July 1290. The date of this assembly and of the decretum that emerged from it was established by Károly Szabó on the basis of the king’s itinerary and a donation charter issued from this gathering on 1 September 1290 in favor of the cathedral church of Esztergom, published in Nánndor Knauz., ed. Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 2 volumes. (Esztergom: Horak, 1874–82), 2: 267.

The law did not survive in the original. The only text that has come down to us is an authenticated copy made by the cathedral chapter of Gyulafehérvár (Alba Julia) and prepared at the request of Transylvanian nobles. It is likely that King Andrew reissued the decretum in 1291 for these nobles and for the Transylvanian Saxon (German) settlers who are frequently mentioned in the text. This assumption is strengthened by the observation that the king spent considerable time in Transylvania that year.

The charter, now in the Hungarian National Archives, is so seriously damaged in several places that whole passages are barely legible. The reconstruction of the text of certain articles is debated. The original seal no longer survives, but the cord by which it was affixed does remain.

MSS: (Authenticated copy) MNL OL D1. 30586.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search
--

EDD: Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato Corpore Juris Hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur, et obivioni postliminio, recenter erepta sunt . . . (Pest: Trattner, 1818) pp. 15–26; better editions are Franz Zimmermann and Karl Werner, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenbürgen (Hermannstadt: Michaelis, 1882), I, 173–176; and Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútforrásainak kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901), pp. 186–191 (with corrections by F. Dôry, Századok 40 [1906], 650).

LIT: Károly Szabó, “Az 1290-i óbudai országgyűlés végzései” [The Decisions of the diet of 1290 in Óbuda], Századok 18 (1884), 473–482; H. Helbig, “Ungarns Goldene Bulle von 1222 und die Adelsrechte in Siebenbürgen 1291”, in Album Elemér Mályusz (Brussels: Librairie encyclopédique, 1976), pp. 111–21.

1 SEPTEMBRI 1290

Andreas Dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Crouvacie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Cumanie Bulgarieque rex omnibus Christi fidelibus presentes litteras inspecturis salutem in omnium salvatore. Ad universorum tam presentium quam futurorum notitiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod cum anno Domini M^o [CC^o nonagesimo de voluntat]e et consensu venerabilium patrum archiepiscoporum, episcoporum, baronum, procerum et omnium nobilium regni nostri apud Albam in loco nostro cathedrali annuente Domino fuisset coronati et in regni gubernaculum successissemus iure et ordine geniture, habita congregatione generali, in ve[teri Buda, iura] ... nobilium regni nostri a sanctis progenitoribus nostris data et concessa, que in articulis exprimuntur sunt interempti, donationes pro eorum servitiis meritoribus per eunmuntur infrascriptis, inviolabiliter firma fide promisimus observate.

- I. Primum videlicet, quod omnia iura ecclesiarum in possessionibus, foris, tributis et aliis, que ecclesiis a sanctis vel aliis regibus progenitoribus nostris, sive aliis incolis regni nostri data sunt et concessa, conservamus et omnia integraliter restituemus ab ecclesiis occupata.
- II. Item nullum comitatum regni nostri ecclesiis vel earum prelatibus, baronibus vel nobilibus, alicui vel aliquibus imperpetuum conferemus, imitantes in hoc sanctorum progenitorum nostrorum, regum illustrium Hungarie vestigia pro modulo et pro posse. Promittimus etiam, quod dignitates seu comitatus regni nostri seu castra advenis vel hospitibus, aut paganis vel ignobilibus et hiis, qui in regno nostro nocumenta frequenter intulerunt, nullatenus conferemus, nec consiliis nostris interesse permittemus. Nec etiam barones suas dignitates in certa quantitate pecunie locare permittemus, nec vices suas sive iudicatus in parochia conferri ignobilibus patiemur.
- III. Item nullus sine testimonio capitulorum vel conventuum ad presentiam curialium comitum vel vicecomitum citari possit, nec comes iudicium recipere aut iudicare presumat absque quatuor nobilibus nominatis.
- IV. Item donationes, que per dominos Belam et Stephanum inclitos reges Hungarie felici recordation[um sunt facte], nullatenus revocamus, cum iidem mediante iustitia, felici successu et prospero regnum Hungarie gubernaverint et salubri semper consilio fuerint usi. Ne hoc pretermittimus, quod quia dominus rex Ladizlaus frater noster in etate tenera fuerat constitutus et regnum Hungarie Tartari, Te[utonic]i et Boemi frequenter invaserunt et quorundam nobilium regni nostri patres et fratres in defensione regni sunt interempti, donationes pro eorum servitiis meritoribus per eundem regem Ladizlaum iuste et legitime factas iuxta consilium archiepiscoporum, episcoporum et consiliariorum nostrorum per regnum deputatorum conservari faciemus. Collationes vero indebitas et iniustas tempore ipsius Ladizlai regis factas revocabimus consilio eorundem; hoc tamen expresso, quod collationes ab ipso rege Ladizlao factas usque festum sancti regis Stephani nunc venturum apud eosdem, quibus sunt collate, faciemus conservari, exceptis iuribus regalibus, videlicet castris, prediis, civitatibus, hospitibus et udvornicis, que nobis omnes et singuli, si qui habent vel tenuerunt, reddere et restituere promiserunt et assumpserunt.

- V. Item palatinum, magistrum tavernicorum nostrorum, vicecancellarium, iudicem curie ex consilio nobilium regni nostri ex antiqua consuetudine regni nostri faciemus, salvo tamen iure Albensis ecclesie et privilegio, quod Albensis ecclesia nostra in ipsa vicecancellaria habet et habere dignoscitur ab antiquo.
- VI. Item si aliqua potentis extrinseca ad invadendum regnum nostrum venerit, aut aliqua pars vel provincia regni ab obedientia regis vel potentia regni se abstraxerit aut alienare aliquo modo voluerit, nobiles regni nostri et Saxones Transilvani predia tenentes et more nobilium se gerentes nobis astare et adiuvare nos tenebuntur. Sed si ad occupandum regnum extrinsecum procedere vellemus, non nisi pecunia a maiestate nostra erogata procedere teneantur. Hoc etiam expresso, quod nobiles regni nostri et predicti Saxones regni Transilvanie cum nullo baronum nostrorum, coacti vel invitati, super factis et negotiis regni nostri intrinsecis vel extrinsecis absque nobis sine pecunia ire teneantur.
- VII. Item nullam collectam vel acones aut descensus super ipsos nobiles et Saxones prenotatos ac populos eorundem recipi faciemus, nec etiam occasione lucri camere nostre vel aliqua alia ratione exigi volumus ab eisdem. Et si monetam nostram in regno nostro currere facere voluerimus, de qualibet provincia quatuor boni homines cum comite parochiali ipsam monetam nostram currere faciant et quambiri. Nulla[m devalidationem] ipsius monete nostre in regno nostro fieri permittemus.
- VIII. Item si palatinus in regno nostro ad faciendum iudicium processerit, in qualibet provincia quatuor iudices deputati cum comite parochiali ire et iudicare debeant et ius, quod comitem parochialem in iudiciis contingit, ipsi comiti d[ari] plene volumus et persolvi. Si vero palatinus sinistre procedere intenderet, iidem quatuor homines cum comite ipsorum prohibere et nobis intimare teneantur.
- IX. Item statuimus, quod populos archiepiscoporum, episcoporum et ecclesiarum privilegiatarum in causis temporalibus nullus iudicum archiepiscoporum in foris seu villis predictorum archiepiscoporum nobiles regni nostri et populos eorundem possit iudicare. Hospites etiam liberarum villarum, regis scilicet et regine nobiles regni nostri non possint iudicare.
- X. Item impignorationes super transeuntes incolas regni nostri penitus volumus et fecimus aboleri.
- XI. Item omnia tributa tempore Ladizlai regis facta omnino extirpentur. Volumus etiam, quod in locis antiquorum tributorum populi nobilium et ecclesiarum tributa non persolvant, sed tantummodo mercatores de aliis regnis ad alia regna transeuntes.
- XII. Preterea turres sive castra super ecclesiis edificata aut locis aliis pro nocumento constructa penitus evellantur.

- XIII. Item possessiones, fora et castra quorumcunque per violentos detentores indebite occupate restituantur et reddantur.
- XIV. Item decimas frugum secundum statuta sanctorum regum solvere teneantur, ita videlicet, quod quilibet nobilis sive Saxo de numero nobilium de quolibet aratro unum fertonem pro decimis solvat, populi autem ipsorum nobilium et Saxonum de singulis capeciis solvant unum pondus et decimator non per se, sed cum homine parochialis comitis dicare debeat, [et] usque festum sancti Martini super iuramento populorum nobilium ipse decime persolvantur; post ipsum autem festum credatur decimatorum iuramento.
- XV. Item decime vini in autumnno in specie recipiantur cum musto; si vero tempus novi vini seu musti in exigendo distulerint, extimatio sive pretium solvatur pro musto.
- XVI. Item privilegium, quod cum bulla aurea consignatum fuerit, a cancellario decem marcis argenti redimi debeat aut marca auri. Si vero sub pendenti sigillo cereo fuerit, a vicecancellario marca argenti et a notario fertone redimatur. D[e litteris] aut[em] p[atenti]bus duo pondera solvantur et de cla[usis] unum pondus.
- XVII. ... am videlicet ... personaliter iudicabimus ordine iudiciario causas litigantium cognoscentes.
- XVIII. Item in quolibet anno semel omnes barones et nobiles regni nostri Albam ad congregationem debeant convenire [tractantes] de statu regni et inquirentes de factis baronum, qualiter quilibet ipsorum in suis comitatibus processerint et conservaverint iura regni, et secundum sua merita premia et demerita vel commissa supplicia ipso die secundum iudicium nostrum et consiliariorum nostrorum recepturi.
- XIX. Item concessimus, quod si quis nobilium sive Saxonum predictorum sine herede decesserit, possessiones sic decedentis hereditarie, emptitie et etiam acquisite nullatenus debeant confiscari, sed idem decedens propinquis suis aut alicui propinquorum seu uxori vel etiam ecclesiis pro remedio anime sue legare in morte et conferre in vita, cuicumque voluerit, liberam habeat facultatem.
- XX. Item, si qui nobiles aut alii nocumenta intulerint, si ex clementia regia personis eorum parcere oporteat, vel debeamus, querelantibus tamen iustitiam omnimodam faciemus.
- XXI. Item, si quis malefactorum coram aliquo iudice convictus aufugerit, nullatenus ipsum recipiemus nec etiam defensamus, et similiter per barones nolumus nec patiemur defensari.
- XXII. Preterea, si aliqui ex ipsis regnicolis nostris vi vel metu possessiones suas vendiderunt aut non vendentes instrumenta venditionis contra se pro potentibus confici coacti fuerunt, si huiusmodi violentia sive metus legitime et rationabiliter constiterit, instrumenta taliter confecta sint viribus vacuata et penitus re[derguta].
- XXIII. Item in possessiones nobilium seu Saxonum predictorum non possit introire extraneus ratione dotis aut ratione quarte filiabus debite, sed heredes decedentium vel proximiores de generatione sua redimant eas secundum extimationem iustam regni nostri consuetam.

- XXIV. Item comes parochialis ... [nobiles] regni nostri ac predictos Saxones Transilvanos non nisi in tribus articulis, videlicet furto vel latrocinio, facto decimarum et monetarum debeat iudicare.
- XXV. Item, si aliquis ipsorum per comitem parochialem se senserit aggravatum, ipsam causam revocet et reducat nostri iudici ad ...
- XXVI. ...cum centum hominibus infra vel supra iuraverint, non nisi quadraginta denarios purgationis solvere teneantur.
- XXVII. Item, si quis nobilium vel Saxonum prefatorum possessiones suas pro suis excessibus et maleficiis amittere debeat vel contingat, cognati ipsius et propinqui possessionem ipsam redimendi habeant facultatem, ne in possessionibus propriis et avitis extraneum doleant possessorem.
- XXVIII. Item volumus, quod woyvoda Transilvanus nobiles sive Saxones memoratos partis Transilvane et banus totius Sclavonie nobiles partis Drawane nullatenus descendere possint, nec ipsos in aliquo indebite aggravare.

Ut igitur hec nostra ordinatio ymmo potius a predecessoribus nostris regibus illustribus Hungarie primitus observata robur optineat perpetue firmitatis, presentes concessimus litteras duplicis sigilli nostri munimine roboratas. Datum per manus discreti viri magistri Theodori Albensis ecclesie prepositi, aule nostre vicecancellarii, dilecti et fidelis nostri, anno Domini M^o CC^o nonagesimo primo, octavo Kalendas Martii, regni autem nostri primo anno.

1 SEPTEMBER 1290

Andrew, by the grace of God, King of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria¹ to all the faithful in Christ who shall see this charter, greetings in the Savior of all mankind. It is our will to inform herewith all those in the present as well as in the future that when we were crowned in the year of the Lord 1290 by the benevolence of the Lord and by the will and consent of the archbishops, bishops, barons, magnates, and all the nobles of our realm at Székesfehérvár, the place of our residence, and when we by right and by order of birth acceded to the government of the realm, we, after having held a general assembly in Óbuda,² promised by firm faith inviolably to keep the rights of the nobles of our kingdom³ granted and established by our holy forebears, as expressed in the articles⁴ that follow.

- 1 First, we shall preserve all the rights of the churches to possessions, markets, revenues, and other things granted to the churches by our ancestors both the holy and the other kings, or by any other inhabitant of our realm, and we shall restore to them in entirety all that has been occupied.
- 2 Further, we shall not grant any county of our kingdom to churches or to their prelates, to barons or nobles, nor to any individual or group in perpetuity, following in this the example of our holy ancestors the illustrious kings of Hungary as far as possible.⁵ We promise neither to grant dignities, counties of our realm, or castles to newcomers or guests, or to pagans or non- noble persons, and those who have caused frequent damage to our country,⁶

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all, but the list in the royal style survived until the end of the kingdom in the twentieth century; see János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in: Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Reconstruction of Károly Szabó; in Századok, 18, as above.

³ That Andrew III swore an oath at his coronation to uphold the rights of the realm is recorded in the oldest extant report of a royal coronation in Hungary: Österreichische Reimchronik, vv 4241 ff., MGH Dt. Chron., 5, 1: 535.

⁴ The word articulus is used here for the first time for a passage in a law; it became the customary form of subdivision, systematically applied by the first editors of the Corpus Juris Hungarici.

⁵ This is a restatement of 1222: 16, which significantly includes churches and prelates as well as secular magnates.

⁶ Cf. 1222: 11 and 1231: 11. The exclusion of “pagans” may refer to the Cuman lords in the entourage of Andrew’s predecessor, Ladislas IV; the last clause was aimed at those barons, such as the Kőszegi–Güssing clan, who devastated the countryside and sided with the Habsburg claimants to the throne of Hungary; see J. Kaufmann, Eine Studie über die Beziehungen der Habsburger zum Königreich Ungarn in den Jahren 1278 bis 1366 (Eisenstadt: Burgenländisches Landesarchiv, 1970), p. 45ff.

nor to let them enter our councils. Moreover, neither shall we permit barons to farm their dignities in return for fixed sums of money, nor shall we tolerate their assignment of base-born persons to be their deputies or judges in the counties.⁷

- 3 Further, no one shall be summoned into the presence of the ispán of the castle or the *alispán*⁸ without a letter of attestation from a chapter or convent,⁹ nor shall the ispán presume to accept a judgement or judge without four elected nobles.¹⁰
- 4 Further, we shall in no way revoke the grants made by the lords Béla and Stephen, illustrious kings of Hungary of happy memory,¹¹ for they governed the realm of Hungary by means of

⁷ The distinction made here between nobilis and ignobilis implicit in the prohibition of office-holding by ignobiles, is a significant step toward closing the ranks of the nobility, a process characteristic of the thirteenth century all over Europe. For an overview and literature, see “Adel,” Lexikon des Mittelalters (München: Artemis, 1980), 1, 118–142. In fact, in Hungary the border between nobility and other landowners (homines possessionati) remained open well into the fourteenth century; see Gy. Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in Medieval Hungarian Law] (Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tudományos Intézet, n.d. [1947?]), pp. 445–457. See also: Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 20–22. -- No evidence is known about barons having “farmed” their offices in medieval Hungary; the law, however, may have aimed at stopping them from entrusting their county offices to familiars, who were remunerated in money and may not always have been nobles.

⁸ The vicecomes (alispán) was usually the castellan of the county’s central castle and the deputy of the ispán, in charge of the actual administration of the county, while ispáns of the late thirteenth century were often great lords, to whom the king assigned several counties. They were mostly familiars (noble retainers) of the ispán. These were lesser noblemen who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron or major landowner. They kept their noble privilege and were subject to their senior (dominus) only for service, for which they received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants.

⁹ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35. The procedure prescribed here seems to have replaced the summons by the judge’s (or the king’s) seal; cf. Ladislás III: 3; see Imre Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [The Hungarian judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and diverse dynasties] (Budapest: MTA, 1899), p. 188f.

¹⁰ The “four nobles” refer to the county magistrates elected by the community of the lesser nobles in each county. This is a further institutionalization of the noble counties’ participation in the administration of the realm, especially of justice.

¹¹ Béla IV and Stephen V.

justice with auspicious and prosperous result and they always followed wise counsel. Nor, because when our brother Ladislás¹² became king while a minor¹³ the kingdom was frequently invaded by Tatars, nobles of our realm were killed in the defense of the kingdom,¹⁴ shall we fail, with the counsel of the archbishops, the bishops, and our counsellors delegated by the kingdom¹⁵ to maintain the just and legitimate grants given for their meritorious services by the same King Ladislás. But we shall revoke the unwarranted and unjust grants made in the time of King Ladislás with the counsel of the same persons. We declare, nevertheless, that we shall preserve the grants made by the same King Ladislás in the possession of those to whom they were given until the coming feast of the holy King Stephen,¹⁶ with the exception of royal rights, namely, castles, estates, cities, guests, and udvarnoks,¹⁷ which if anyone should have or hold them, these persons shall promise and undertake to return and restore any and all of them to us.

¹² Ladislás IV, Andrew III's predecessor, was in fact his cousin.

¹³ Ladislás IV inherited the throne as a ten-year-old, and for five years the government was in the hands of his mother, Elizabeth, who ruled with the support of changing baronial factions.

¹⁴ The textual reconstruction of F. Döry (cf. Századok 40 [1906], 650) refers to the repeated campaigns of King Otakar II Premysl in the years 1273–1278 and to the incursions of the Habsburg Duke Albert of Austria in the last years of King Ladislás' reign.

¹⁵ Although the delegation of nobles to the king's council is mentioned only in Andrew III's later decretum (1298: 7), it is likely that a similar arrangement was introduced at his accession to the throne. The correct translation and interpretation of this passage depends to a great extent on the rendering of the term regnum. The term meant in the Middle Ages not only the kingdom but also the great men of the country, in particular the royal council. J. Holub ("La représentation politique en Hongrie au moyen âge," Etudes présentées à la Commission Internationale pour l'histoire des assemblées d'états, 18 [1958], 84) put it thus: "Qu'était ce regnum?...aux XI^e–XII^e siècles, il designait les notables qui conseillaient le roi dans la gestation de ses affaires." In this passage the "consent of the regnum" and elsewhere (e.g., 1222: 14) the formulation coram regno suggest that in the early thirteenth century a greater circle of nobles, possibly the assembled diet, was meant by regnum. On the problems and the development of this term, see László Peter, "Antecedents of the Nineteenth Century Hungarian State Concept", D. Phil. Thesis, Univ. of Oxford, 1966, espec. pp. 410ff.

¹⁶ 20 August.

¹⁷ Udvarnoks (from Hung. udvar, from Slavic dvor, "court") were peasants on settlements attached to the royal household, supplying it with agricultural produce grown on their plots (hence occasionally called panisdator, i.e., bread giver), in contrast to servi designated as ploughmen or craftsmen, messengers, fishermen, and the like, working on the royal domain with no land or equipment of their own. By this time, they may have become tenants on royal land.

- 5 Further, we shall appoint the palatine,¹⁸ our chamberlain,¹⁹ the vice-chancellor,²⁰ and the judge royal²¹ with the counsel of the nobles or our realm in accordance with ancient customs,²² saving, however, the right and privilege of the church of Székesfehérvár, because our church of Székesfehérvár possesses within itself the vice-chancellorship which it is recognized to possess since antiquity.²³
- 6 Further, if any foreign power should invade our kingdom, or if any portion or province of the realm should withdraw from the king's obedience or from the authority of the realm, or if it should decide to secede in any way, the nobles of our realm and those Saxons of Transylvania who hold estates and live nobly shall be obligated to join us and give us aid. But if we should determine to conquer a foreign kingdom, they shall not be bound to come unless money shall be paid to them from our majesty. It has also been stated that the nobles

¹⁸ The request of the nobility to have a say in the appointment of the palatine was recurrent throughout the Middle Ages and became more or less accepted by the kings from the mid-fourteenth century onward. Norbert C. Tóth has recently demonstrated that ever since the election of Nicholas Zámbocki at a diet in 1342 (of which no decree survived), the palatine used the title palatinus regni Hungariae; see "Az ország nádora" [The palatine of the ország] in Középkortörténeti tanulmányok 7, Attila Kiss P., Ferenc Piti and György Szabados, eds. pp. 439-50 (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 2013). For the meaning of ország/regnum, see n. 15, above.

¹⁹ The magister tavernicorum or the master of the tárnok (men in charge of supplies) was originally the household officer responsible for the victualling and other related needs of the court. He is first mentioned in 1135; see Attila Zsoldos, Magyarország világi archontológiája [Secular archontology of Hungary] 1000-1301 (Budapest: História, 2011), p. 61. By the thirteenth century he had become in fact lord chamberlain, called camerarius in the peace treaty between Andrew III and Albert of Austria (Urkundenbuch des Burgenlandes, ed H. Wagner et al. [Graz: Böhlau, 1965], p. 251). He is cited as "our" chamberlain to distinguish him from the same kind of officer of the queen.

²⁰ By the late thirteenth century the chancellor (usually a bishop or an archbishop) ceased to be immediately responsible for the writing office of the royal court: since the reign of Andrew II this task had passed into the hands of the vice-chancellor as in most other European countries; see Imre Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan [Hungarian diplomatics] (Budapest : MTA, 1930), pp. 84–86

²¹ The judge royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró) was originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200). From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda (Buda Vetus). The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. Some towns came to be briefly subject to this judge.

²² The meaning of this clause also depends on the translation of the term regnum (see above, n. 15).

²³ The Provost of Székesfehérvár (Alba Regia) was customarily entrusted with the vice-chancellorship; see Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan. The text is correct in drawing attention to the antiquity of the association of Székesfehérvár and the operation of the royal chancellery, for several canons of this collegiate foundation are among the earliest recorded scribes and notaries in royal service; see András Kubinyi, "Königliche Kanzlei und Hofkapelle in Ungarn um die Mitte des 12. Jahrhunderts," in: Herwig Ebner, ed. Festschrift für Friedrich Hausmann (Graz: Styria, 1977), pp. 299–324.

of our realm and the said Saxons of Transylvania shall not be coerced by any baron or compelled against their will to go on campaign without us or without money for the internal or external affairs of the kingdom.²⁴

- 7 Further, we shall not demand the collecta or the bucket-tax or the *descensus*²⁵ from the same nobles and the said Saxons and their men, nor do we wish to exact from them the chamber's profit²⁶ or any other tax. And when we wish to have our money to circulate in our kingdom, four good men from each county and the ispán of the county²⁷ shall issue and exchange the same money. We shall not permit any loss of value of this money of our kingdom.²⁸

²⁴ This article modifies the military obligations of the Transylvanian Saxons set out in the so-called Andreanum of 1224, where it is stated that five hundred knights (milites) shall serve the king within the kingdom, while one hundred shall serve if the king personally leads an external campaign, or in his absence only fifty on an expedition outside the kingdom (Franz Zimmermann, Karl Werner, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenburgen. (Hermannstadt: Michaelis, 1882) I, 34; see also Herbert Helbig, "Ungarns Goldene Bulle von 1222 und die Adelsrechte in Siebenbürgen" in: Album Elemér Mályusz: études / présentées à la Commission internationale pour l'histoire des assemblées d'États Székesfehérvár - Budapest, 1972. (Brussels: Editions de la librairie encyclopédique, 1976) pp. 111-21, here p. 118). Hungarian nobles had earlier been exempted from mandatory participation in foreign campaigns by Béla IV (see, 1267: 7) who enlarged the original provision of 1222: 7 (=1231: 15–16)

²⁵ Collecta was the general term for royal taxes, which may have originated in payments replacing military service, collected from a wide range of population from the twelfth century onward. The name of the "bucket-tax" (acones) is derived from a Hungarian measure of volume, the akó, which was roughly equal to 32 pints, approximately 50 liters; it was probably identical with the chibrio of 1222: 29. The descensus was by this time another type of royal tax, which developed from the mandatory hospitality owed to the king and his entourage (droit de gîte); cf. 1222:15, 1231:4 and 1267: 1.

²⁶ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae): was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber's profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. See: Thallóczy Lajos, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary] (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879); Boglárka Weisz, Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Period, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–

64. Exemption from its collection is first granted in the Golden Bull of 1231: 3. The Transylvanian Saxons, however, were explicitly obligated to pay 500 silver marks ad lucrum nostrae camerae according to the Andreanum (Zimmermann–Werner, Urkundenbuch, I. 34); see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325] (Budapest: MTA, 1916), p. 445, n. 1. The Saxon nobles, therefore, acquired here a parity with their Hungarian counterparts

²⁷ The boni homines probably refers here to the magistrates of the noble county; see above, art. 3. The decretum speaks throughout about the comes parochialis when referring to the ispán in charge of a county; documentary evidence suggests that the word comes became so widely used for men belonging to families in which several members were or had been ispáns regardless of their actual office, that it seemed necessary to specify when the reference was to an ispán in office

²⁸ Reconstruction by Döry. The meaning of this article is unclear because of a 3.7 cm long lacuna in the text.

- 8 Further, when the count palatine undertakes to render justice in our realm, four judges in each county and the ispán of the county ought to go and give sentence with him. We also wish that the right which falls to the ispán of the county in judgments²⁹ shall ... be fully conceded and paid to that ispán. If, however, the count palatine should be inclined to proceed incorrectly, these same four men with their ispán are bound to stop him and report to us.³⁰
- 9 Further, we ordain that no judge other than our own person shall be competent to judge the men of the archbishops, bishops, and privileged churches in secular cases, and none of the archiepiscopal judges in the markets and villages of the said archbishops shall be able to judge the nobles of our realm and their men. Nobles of our realm, moreover, shall not be permitted to judge the guests in the free villages, namely those directly subject to the king and the queen.³¹
- 10 Further, it is our will and action that reprisals against transients by the inhabitants of our realm shall utterly cease.³²
- 11 Further, all tolls set up in the time of King Ladislas³³ shall be entirely abolished. We also wish that only merchants passing through from one kingdom to another kingdom shall pay the customs at the old locations, not the men of the nobles and churches.
- 12 Further, all towers or fortresses built for harmful purposes over churches or other places shall be completely razed.
- 13 Further, anyone's possessions, markets, and castles unjustly seized by violent occupiers shall be returned and restored.
- 14 The tithe of produce shall be paid according to the statutes of the holy kings,³⁴ namely, so Zimmermann–Werner (Urkundenbuch, I 174) suggest devalidationem for the missing word.

²⁹ I.e., in the fines.

³⁰ This legislation, charging the county magistrates with checking the arbitrary judgements of the palatine, creates the formal procedure for restraining him which was absent from earlier decreta, e.g., 1231: 3.

³¹ Libere ville included not only franchised villages but also towns and cities; see Erzsébet Ladányi, “Libera villa, civitas, oppidum. Terminologische Fragen der ungarischen Städteentwicklung,” Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestiensis, Sectio historica, 18 (1977), 6–14.

³² The expression impignorationes is understood to mean repressalia. This translation was offered by Holub (Századok, 55 [1921], 133–134) based on a charter issued shortly after this decretum pertaining to a commercial treaty between Andrew III and Duke Albert I of Austria; see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), VI, 1, 184. Repressalia means the right of a citizen, harmed or injured by a foreigner, to make reprisals on any citizen whatsoever of the native country or town of the offending foreigner.

³³ Ladislas IV.

³⁴ See Stephen II: 19; Syn. Szab., 30, 40.

that all nobles and Saxons of noble estate shall pay one quarter mark³⁵ for every plough land³⁶ and the men of the nobles and Saxons shall pay one *pondus*³⁷ for every stack of grain,³⁸ and the collector of tithes shall not gather them alone but in company with a man of the county's ispán; and until the Feast of St. Martin³⁹ the tithes themselves shall be paid according to the oath of the men of the nobles but after that feast the oath of the tithe-collectors shall be trusted.⁴⁰

- 15 Further, the tithe of wine shall be collected in autumn is grapes and must; but if the time of the new wine or must was missed, the actual or estimated price shall be paid instead of must.⁴¹
- 16 Further, a privilege sealed by a golden bull shall be procured from the chancellor for ten marks of silver or one mark of gold. If it has a pendant wax seal, it shall be procured from the vice-chancellor for one mark of silver and from a notary for a quarter mark. [Two pondera shall be paid for letters patent and one for letters close]...⁴²
- 17..., namely... [that] we shall judge... personally according to the law, examining the cases of the litigants.⁴³
- 18 Further, once each year all the barons and nobles of the realm shall convene at Székesfehérvár, to consider the state of the realm and inquire into the actions of barons—how each behaved in his county and how he maintained the rights of the kingdom—and to receive ³⁵ Fertó from German Viertel (“quarter”) was 1/4 of a silver mark, about 51.7–61.4 g.

³⁶ Estimates of the size of “a ploughland” in the earlier Middle Ages are rather uncertain: it could have been as small as 50 or as large as 120 ha. See: Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1916), pp. 491–494; László Bendeffy, “Középkori hossz- és területmértékek” [Medieval Measures of Length and Surface], in Fejezetek a magyar mérésügy történetéből (Bp.: MTA, 1959), p. 83f.

³⁷ One pondus was 1/12 of a fertó, hence c. 4.3–5.1 g of silver.

³⁸ Capecium, from Hungarian kepe, a number of sheaves stacked in the form of crosses or other piles; “...the amount of grain in a capecium cannot even be guessed” (Hóman, Pénztörténet., p. 484), as we know neither the size of the sheaves nor the number of them in a usual stack. A modern kepe may contain nine to twenty-seven sheaves, of course, of different sizes, largely depending on regional practice.

³⁹ 11 November.

⁴⁰ On the procedure of oaths and estimations concerning tithes, see Syn. Szab.40.

⁴¹ Some editors read the last words as puri mustri, which does not make sense.

⁴² Reconstruction by Döry. This is the earliest known schedule of charges for procuring legal documents. Ferenc Eckhart (“Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter,” MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 [1913/15], 395–558, here. 492–497) has examined the range of charges levied for various types of documents issued by loca credibilia in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

⁴³ This article is almost wholly illegible in the authenticated copy. It is unclear whether certain cases are being reserved for the king’s personal cognizance, or whether in judging certain cases he shall take into account the personal status of the litigants.

on the same day their rewards for merits or punishments for omissions and misdeeds in accordance with our judgment and that of our councilors.⁴⁴

- 19 Further, we grant that if any of the nobles or aforesaid Saxons should die without heirs, the possessions of the deceased, whether hereditary, purchased, or acquired,⁴⁵ shall not be confiscated under any circumstances, rather the same deceased man shall have the unlimited right to bequeath them after his death or give them while alive either to his kindred, or any one of his relatives, or to his wife, or to churches for the salvation of his soul, or to whomever he wishes.⁴⁶
- 20 Further, if any nobleman or other person inflicted damages, and if it is suitable or necessary for us to pardon them by royal grace, we shall nevertheless render proper justice to the plaintiffs.
- 21 Further, if any criminal convicted by a judge escapes, we shall not receive or protect him, neither will we permit or tolerate our barons to protect him.
- 22 Besides, if anyone of the gentlemen of the realm⁴⁷ should sell his possessions because of pressure or fear or if not [wishing to]⁴⁸ sell should be coerced to sign an instrument of sale in favor of a powerful man, the instruments made out this way, if genuine and reasonable proof of force or fear shall be established, shall be repudiated as null and void.
- 23 Further, no outsider⁴⁹ shall enter the possessions of nobles or the aforementioned Saxons by right of dower nor by reason of filial quarter,⁵⁰ rather the heirs or near relatives of the ⁴⁴ Cf. . 1222: 1.

⁴⁵ Medieval Hungarian law distinguished these three kinds of landed property For donations the law sought to establish a limited hereditary right, with escheat in the case of extinction of the male branch (defectio seminis); see Eszter Waldapfel, “Nemesi birtokjogunk kialakulása a középkorban” [Development of our noble property rights in the Middle Ages], Századok 65 (1931), 131–167, 259–272, espec. 143–157. Possessions bought for money (possessio emptitia), were regarded as mobile property and freely heritable; see József Holub, “A vásárolt fekvő jószág jogi természete régi jogunkban” [The legal character of purchased real property in our ancient law], in Sándor Domanovszky, ed., Emlékkönyv Károlyi Árpád (Budapest: Sárkány, 1933), pp. 246–254. The distinction between acquired and purchased is not clear.

⁴⁶ This free alienation especially of allodial land, although several times expressed in the laws (e.g., Stephen I: 6, 1267: 9, etc.), ran against the tradition of kindred property and did not become general practice in medieval Hungary. The decretum of 1351 formally enacted the principle of entail (aviticitas).

⁴⁷ Regnicola, (lit.: “inhabitant of the realm”) was the term for those inhabitants who, as owners of land and lords of tenant peasants, enjoyed political rights; its equation with the “members of the estates” was gradual and hardly complete by the end of the Middle Ages. We translated it as “gentleman of the realm.”

⁴⁸ Lóránt Szilágyi’s interpretation in Emma Lederer, ed., Szöveggyűjtemény Magyarország történetének tanulmányozásához. I. rész 1000–1526 [Chrestomathy to the study of the history of Hungary. Part 1: 1000–1526] (Budapest: Tankönyvkiadó, n.d. [1964]), p. 88.

⁴⁹ Meaning, for example, a kinswoman’s husband from a different clan or kindred.

⁵⁰ The filial quarter (quarta [filialis]) was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land, especially in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. In law, the grant of the quarter in

deceased shall redeem them according to the just estimation customary in our kingdom.⁵¹

- 24 Further, the ispán of the county... shall judge the nobles of our realm and the said Saxons of Transylvania in three cases only, namely, theft, robbery, and matters pertaining to tithes and mints.
- 25 Further, if someone feels oppressed by the county's ispán, he shall retract his suit and bring it to our judgment to...⁵²
- 26 ...with one hundred men, more or less, they shall swear an oath,⁵³ they shall be bound to pay only forty pennies for the purgation.
- 27 Further, if any nobleman or aforementioned Saxon should have to lose or forfeit his possessions because of his crimes and excesses, his relatives shall have the right to redeem them so that they shall not suffer an alien possessor in their own and ancestral properties.⁵⁴
- 28 Further, it is our will that neither the voivode of Transylvania⁵⁵ nor the ban of all Slavonia⁵⁶ shall be allowed to exact descensus from either the nobles and Saxons in Transylvania, or land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. From the extensive literature, see, e.g. Péter Banyó. "Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére." [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92; Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 103–7.

⁵¹ Estimation (estimatio) meant the estimate of the value of immovable and movable property, usually on the traditional basis. The low common estimation assured kinsmen's and even neighbors' and abutters' ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed on families having to pay the filial quarter (see above) in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation. The estimatio fori represented the true market worth of goods.

⁵² Unclear sentence.

⁵³ Although the legal question addressed in this fragmentary article is unknown, the high number of "oath helpers" suggests that it refers to the purgatory oath of commoners. Oath (iuramentum) was a mode of proof that survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers. There were also special oaths, such as the oath sworn on the soil (iuramentum super terram), or the capital oath (iuramentum ad caput) that the defendant was not allowed to counter by his own oath.

⁵⁴ This article is also aimed at the protection of the common ("ancient") property of the clans or kindreds; cf. above, art. 22.

⁵⁵ The voivode was the king's representative in Transylvania.

⁵⁶ The ban (banus, Hung. bán, from Avar bajan or Slavic ban, pan = lord): was the royally appointed governor of the kingdoms of Croatia-Dalmatia, and/or the region called Slavonia between the rivers Drava and Sava. In the twelfth to thirteenth centuries members of the dynasty were frequently appointed bans with a ducal title. The political importance and income of the ban was significant and he was always a member of the royal council.

from the nobles beyond the River Drave or to burden them unjustly in any way.⁵⁷

In order that this our ordinance, or rather that which has hitherto been observed by our predecessors the illustrious kings of Hungary, shall obtain the force of perpetual validity, we have issued this charter confirmed by our double seal. Given by the hand of the prudent Master Theodore, provost of the church of Székesfehérvár,⁵⁸ the well-beloved and faithful vice-chancellor of our court, in the year of the Lord one thousand two hundred ninety-one, the eight day before the Kalends of March, in the first year of our reign.⁵⁹

⁵⁷ According to Andrew II's charter of 1224 in favor of the Saxons, the descensus (droit de gîte, supplying the travelling court, later a tax in money) was to be paid three-fold to the king when on campaign, but only twice to the voivode: once upon entering and the other upon exiting the province; see Zimmermann–Werner, Urkundenbuch, I, 35: cf. Helbig. “Adelsrechte”, p. 11.

⁵⁸ This is most likely the person who became bishop of Győr 1295-1307.

⁵⁹ 22 February 1291 is, in fact, the date of the Transylvanian reissue of the decretum.

LAW OF KING ANDREW III OF HUNGARY

5 AUGUST 1298

King Andrew III was challenged by internal and external enemies throughout nearly his entire reign. The powerful magnates (barones), owners of several castles and estates, continued to subject the lesser nobles and freemen to their rule and build up veritable petty lordships. The Angevin claimants to the throne offered support and legitimation to the rebellious magnates. It was amid such conditions that the clergy—Andrew’s supporters from the outset—and the lesser nobility held a diet in Pest where they submitted a series of articles to the king and his barons for approval. This was not the only legislation passed in the later years of Andrew III, for judicial documents refer to other statuta but these have not come down to us.

The decretum of 1298 has not survived in an original or any near-contemporary copy. The text is known only through a transcript issued by King Wladislas I (1440–1444). At his coronation, Wladislas was presented with a small book (libellus) and asked to confirm the privileges it contained (see the decretum of 20 July 1440). The contents consisted of this decretum, a set of additional legal norms (the Compilatio ante 1440), and the Golden Bull in its amended 1351 redaction. Wladislas’ confirmation survives in an original copy, but the parchment is in poor condition with several damaged spots and illegible passages.

MSS: (Copy of 1440) MNL OL DL. 13894

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801) I, 144–192, and Johannes Nicalaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium incliti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. . . (Pest: Trattner, 1818) pp. 42–53; S. L. Endlicher, Rerum Hungaricarum monumenta Arpadiana (St. Gall, 1849; rept. Leipzig: Harrassowitz, 1931), pp. 191–197 Hungarian annotated translation in: Emma Lederer. Szöveggyűjtemény Magyarország történetének tanulmányozásához, I. rész 1000–1526 [Chrestomathy to the study of the history of Hungary, Pt. I: 1000–1526] (Budapest.: Tankönyvkiadó, 1974). pp. 89–98.

LIT: I. R. Kiss, “III Endre 1298/99. évi törvénye” [The law of Andrew III of 1298–99], in Emlékkönyv Fejérpataky László (Bp.: Franklin, 1917), pp. 263–278; Lóránt Szilágyi “III. Endre 1298. évi törvénye” [The law of Andrew III of 1298] Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae, Sectio historica., 1 (1957), 135–171; József Gerics. “Über das Rechtstleben Ungarns um die Wende des 13–14. Jahrhunderts,” ibid., 17 (1976), 45–80; Idem, “Das Ständewesen in Ungarn am Ende des 13. Jahrhunderts”, in R. Vierhaus, e Herrschaftsverträge, Wahlkapitulationen, Fundamentalgesetze (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck, 1977), pp. 139–139.

5 AUGUSTI 1298

Tempore coronationis domini Andree regis illustris Hungarie, etsi non omnes conditiones seu libertates regni Hungarie ab antiquo observata, quedam, tamen ex ipsis libertatibus et conditionibus notabiles et plus necessarie publico scripto sigillo eiusdem domini regis vallato fuerint declarate, que quia iniquis hominibus et cupiditate excecatis pravitatibus intervenientibus minime fuerunt observate et ex tepiditate domini regis fuere penitus et postposite, regnum Hungarie in omni sui parte fluctuare fecit et per vastus varios ac plurimos ex potentia baronum et aliorum potentum provenientes in tantum annullari, ut ecclesie et nobiles, alii autem regnicole in suis rebus et facultatibus fere ad extremam exinanitionem devenirent. Quo viso idem dominus Andreas Spiritu Sancto suggerente aures aperuit sue clementie et fidelibus consiliis acquiescens congregationem indixit generalem ad hoc, ut per prelatos et viros ecclesiasticos, necnon et nobiles huius regni, exclusis quibuscunque baronibus, prout moris est, huic regno casuro et per nimios vastus diminuto salubriori consilio, quo posset, subveniretur iniquitatibus perversorum studio solertiori obviando. Nos itaque Johannes, Dei gratia archiepiscopus Colocensis, aule domini regis cancellarius. Petrus Transylvaniensis, Andreas Agriensis, Thomas Bosnensis, Benedictus Vesprimiensis, Quinqueecclesiensis Paulus per procuratores suos solempnes, Haab Vaciensis, Theodorus Jaurinensis, Michael Zagrabiensis, Emericus Varadiensis, Anthonius Chanadiensis ecclesiarum episcopi apud ecclesiam fratrum minorum in Pesth anno Domini millesimo ducentesimo nonagesimo octavo in festivitate beati Dominici confessoris cum omnibus nobilibus Hungarie, singulis Saxonibus, Comanis in unum convenientes accepta auctoritate, ex consensu domini regis et baronum totius regni, prouti ... invocata Spiritus Sancti gratia tractare cepimus de hiis, per que regie magnificentie et statui regni totius ac ecclesiarum et ecclesiasticarum personarum et ordinum aliorum consuleretur.

Ideo statuimus:

- I. Ut dominum Andream ex regalis stirpe descendantem revereamur tamquam dominum regni naturalem. Et ut in persona ipsius regalis dignitas secundum exigentiam sui culminis fulgere possit, omnia regalia pariter et reginalia per quamcunque et quandocunque indebite occupata pleno iure restituantur. Iura etiam ecclesiastica et nobilium in possessionibus, in foris, in tributis et aliis quocunque tempore et per quoscunque indebite occupata penitus restituantur. Barones et alii potenter agentes a vastibus et spoliis agendis omnino se referent et de hiis, que male gesserunt, regiam maiestatem offendendo, ad gratiam domini regis se conferant misericordiam petituri de commissis; et quod de cetero vastus, spoliationes, latrocinia et occupationes seu varia nocumenta cessent omnino. Et quicunque regalia et reginalia indebite occupata, possessiones etiam ecclesiarum et nobilium, fora, tributa hactenus indebite detenta non restituerint et infra spatium trium mensium a die congregtionis computandorum dimittere non curaverint, aut si qui de novo ad spoliandum et occupandum possessiones regales et reginales, ecclesiarum et nobilium contra hec statuta surrexerint, sententiam excommunicationis, quam in eos ex nunc auctoritate presentium proferimus, incurrant ipso facto, a quo absolvi non valeant, nisi apud archiepiscopum Colocensem, omnium episcoporum nichilominus consensu et assensu interveniente, et prehabita satisfactione competenti domini regis cedant iudicio pena debita puniensi. Possessionibus tamen omnibus ipso facto privati, deducta repensione dampnorum per tales illatorum, et eis, [quibus] intulerunt, assignatis vel adiudicatis, cetera possessionum partes in manus regias devolvantur, ita quod heredes eorundem propter excessus parentum legitima parte hereditatis denudati inter nobiles non debeant computari et ab actibus nobilium atque ab aditu [curie regis] ... exclusi maneant ab omnibus actibus legitime alieni. Si qui vero ex istis ... insurgerent, quos dominus noster rex Hugarie invocata et congregata regni sui deprimere non posset et penis supradictis adducere, licitum illi sit tale auxilium aliunde implorare, per quod convinci possit feritas delinquentium. Et si idem dominus noster rex huiusmodi delinquentes persequi non curaret et penis supradictis negligenter punire obmitteret, renunciando omni privilegio, si quod habet de eo, quod excommunicari non possit, per dominum archiepiscopum Colocensem omnium prelatorum consilio accedente, prout ad hoc dominus rex se per litteras suas speciales obligavit, excom[mu]nicetur et capella eius interdicatur. Barones etiam et alii nobiles, qui se huiusmodi dampnatis et dampn[atione dignis] adiunxerint, simili subiciantur ultioni. Et quia crescentibus excessibus crescere debet et pena, pro eo episcopi diocesani, in quorum diocesibus factum hoc a Deo et presenti statu dampnatum attemptatum fuerit, in ecclesiis et populis taliter dampnandorum interdictum ponant et positum tamdiu faciant observare, donec hec premissa operatione domini regis accedente finem capiant congruentem.

- II. Item munitiones et castella de novo absque licentia domini regis, vel que fuerint tales, de quibus detrimenta inferuntur vel in posterum inferri presumerentur, aut etiam quibus proprie possessiones non sufficiunt, minores etiam super ecclesias et monasteria facte sine dilatione omni deleantur; que si destructa non fuerint, detentores earundem munitionum sententiam excommunicationis ex nunc latam incurrant. Et nichilominus per dominum regem, ubi idem processerit, in regno, vel per palatinum reperte fuerint per quos dicte munitiones constructe fuerunt, in ius regium devolvantur nulla redemptione vel commutatione recepta. Que vero fuerunt aliorum, veris et propriis dominis restituantur.
- III. Item statuimus, quod usque ad tres menses a [die] presentis congregationis computandos omnibus levis, spoliatis seu depredatis per eos, qui leserunt et depredationem commiserunt, plena fiat satisfactio et ablaturum restitutio. Si vero per potentiam extorta fuerit, in remissionem non teneatur, sed hii, qui intra predictum terminum satisfacere non curaverint vel per potentiam sibi remissionem procuraverint, tanquam ex manifesta offensa sententiam excommunicationis ex nunc latam incurrant, et infidelitate notati regis cedant iudicio bonis et possessionibus omnibus illorum talium ad fiscum regium devolutis; dummodo per hominem domini regis ad hoc specialiter transmissum ac quatuor nobiles in qualibet provincia ad inquirendas et sciendas spoliationes preteritas et futuras deputatos domino regi fides fiat sub testimonio capitulorum, ubi hec damnatione digna fuerint commissa vel fuerunt. Si vero dicti quatuor nobiles ob favorem vel timorem aut recepto premio recusare vel huiusmodi depredationem false suggerere de hiis, que resciverunt, presumerint, excommunicationem incurrant ex nunc latam ipso facto, nichilominus domini regis cedant iudicio pena [debi]ta puniendi.
- IV. De spoliationibus autem a tempore congregationis inchoate factis decernimus statuentes, quod si per ipsos qua[tuor] homines per quamlibet [provinciam] electos episcopo diocesano de hiis constare poterit, extunc quilibet episcopus diocesanus illos tales in sua diocesi dampnabiliter delinquentes dampnatione dignos excommunicet et denunciaret arcibus ab omnibus evitandos. Et si qui religiosorum huiusmodi excommunicatos vel alios, ut superius est expressum, ad divina[?] sacramenta admiserint in vita vel in morte, extunc omnibus, qui de ista religione esse dignoscuntur, ab omnibus regnicolis elemosina denegetur. Et quicumque ex regnicolis fratribus illius religionis sibi proximis vel alienis contra hec statuta elemosinas porrexerint, excommunicationis sententiam exnunc latam incurrant ipso facto. Dominus autem rex eosdem excommunicatos sine strepitu iudiciorum, si de hiis per veridicam relationem constiterit, debita pena feriat, si celeri satisfactione non curaverint suos excessus emendari et absolvi non procuraverint sine mora. Barones etiam vel nobiles regni, si pro aliquibus malefactoribus intercesserint, in latam exnunc excommunicationis sententiam incurrant ipso facto.

- V. Statuimus etiam, ut sicut ex parte regnicolarum precipitur fieri occupatorum restitutio, sic etiam dominus rex ad omnium occupatorum, que ecclesiarum et nobilium esse dinoscuntur, restitutionem teneatur; quod si non fecerit, sententiam excommunicationis per dominum archiepiscopum ex consensu prelatorum ferendam incurrat. Et si aliqua pars regni quocunque titulo vel colore per quemcunque regum alienata extitisset, teneatur revocare et idem dominus rex ad ius regium, ut regnum Hungarie quasi quoddam ius totum suarum possit partium integritate gaudere, sententiam ipsius archiepiscopi Colocensis, quam de consensu prelatorum [ferre debet], incursum, si hoc legitimo impedimento cessante idem dominus rex neglexerit emendare.
- VI. Item statuimus, quod si duo fuerunt fratres aut plures ad invicem nulla divisione facta in suis possessionibus hereditariis et non acquisitis commorantes, unus illorum, qui utilior et aptior repertus fuerit inter ipsos, ad exercitum domini regis venire teneatur; qui si venire obmiserit, non ad plura iudicia seu gravamina exercitus, quam ad unum simul omnes teneantur.
- VII. Item statuimus, ut curia domini regis honorificentius regi possit et regnum Hungarie decentius gubernari, dominus noster rex singulis tribus mensibus singulos duos episcopos secundum exigantiam ordinis unum de suffraganeis Strigoniensis et alterum de suffraganeis Colocensis ecclesie, totidemque et quasi omnes nobiles regni, quos ex nunc elegimus, secum habeat congruis stipendiis de bono regio sustentandos. Et si idem dominus rex hoc facere obmiserit, quidquid preter consilium predictorum sibi applicandorum in donationibus arduis et dignitatibus conferendis vel in aliis maioribus fecerit, non teneant.
- VIII. Statuimus etiam, quod domina regina Hungarie debite dignitatis culmine gaudere possit, curia sua dignitatibus et honore in personis Hungarorum nobilium et non alienigenarum solempnius, sicut debet, ordinetur; et ut curia eiusdem domine regine decentius gubernetur, quosdam electos a domino rege barones ipsa domina regina habere teneatur; et regalia seu reginalia in tributis seu tricesimis cum omnium integritate percipi possint.
- IX. Statuimus, ut omnia tributa a tempore regis Ladislai facta penitus deleantur; et quicumque res aliquas in huiusmodi deletis tributis retinere presumpserint, sententiam excommunicationis incurrant, possessiones vero seu terre, ubi huiusmodi illicita exiguntur, ad ius regium devolvantur.
- X. Statuimus siquidem et perpetuo edicto stabilimus, ut ecclesia [regni Hungarie] tam in capite, quam in membre gaudere valeat suis libertatibus. Jura etiam ordinamus, imo ab antiquo ordinata declaramus, ut tempore vacationis bona et possessiones ecclesiarum nec per dominum regem vel ab eo missum, nec per eos, qui se nominant parochianos, occupentur, spolientur vel ledantur in parte vel in toto. Bona etiam decedentis episcopi dominus rex vel quelibet alia persona rapere non possit, sed utilitati ecclesie, cuius idem prelatus fuisse dinoscitur, si intestatus decedit, applicentur. Si vero compos sue mentis de hiis disposuerit, secundum promissionem iuris eis distr[ibui] debent, quibus fuerunt appromissa seu detentione cognatorum, servientium aut officialium episcopi decedentis a quocunque interveniente. Et si qui parochianorum vel aliarum personarum privatarum contra hec statuta venire presumpserint, quod absit, sententiam excommunicationis ex nunc latam incurrant ipso facto; et si qui collectas vel exactiones quascunque super populos ecclesiarum et nobilium facere presumpserint vel quoquomodo fiendas indixerint. Barones vero, qui in monasteriis ius patronatus non habent, ei super populos aliquarum ecclesiarum, ubi ius non habent, et etiam super populos nobilium descensus fecerint violentos, penam excommunicationis incurrant ex nunc latam.

- XI. Statuimus etiam potentum vel inpotentum aliquas provincias commetaneas duas vel plures aut etiam unam committat iudicandas sed omnes cause ad palatinum, dum provincias iudicat, vel tunc, dum non iudicat, ad parochiales iudices referantur; etsi aliqui huiusmodi provincias iudicandas assumpserint, sententia excommunicationis exnunc lata innodentur.
- XII. Item statuimus, quod nobiles servire valeant d[omi]ni[s], quibuscunque voluerint sua spontanea voluntate; et si qui potentum huiusmodi nobiles ad sibi serviendum vi vel potentia artaverint aut ipsos propter hoc in personis vel facultatibus suis leserint vel gravare contra hoc statutum venerint, excommunicationem exnunc latam incurrant ipso facto. Et si de huiusmodi depressione nobilium domini regi constiterit, tales depressores persequere teneatur digna ultione feriendos.
- XIII. Statuimus etiam, quod iudex curie regie vel alii quicunque iudices nobilem aliquem possessionatum ratione iudicii vel iudiciorum captivare non presumpant; quod ulterius ad alios consurgere etiam non possit honores.
- XIV. Statuimus etiam, quod palatinus castra tenendo in campis et graminibus, et non in villis vel civitatibus iudicare debeat vernali, estivali et autumnali et non yemali ... servetur, et quod ulterius ad alios consurgere etiam non possit honores.
- XV. Statuimus etiam, ut per totum regnum una regalis et celebris sit moneta quinquialitate combusta ad duos annos. In reliquis vero annis ex argento decime combustionis confecta per omnes regni civitates et villas, fora conti [...]currere debeat. Et si qui nobilium vel potentum in foro sue possessionis vel etiam aliis in locis sibi commissis secundum antiquam consuetudinem monetam eandem currere non fecerint, extunc iure fori priventur, et ipsum ius fori ad illum vel ad illos devolvatur, qui... modum in hoc et in aliis digno et debito feruntur [?] honore. Et nichilominus hii, qui eandem non assumserint monetam, ad collectam dimidii fertonis per singulas mansiones sue possessionis teneantur. Et si que persona ausu temerario monetam in sua possessione vel domo cudi fecerit, illa possessione vel domo privetur penam legis susceputura.
- XVI. Statuimus et perpetuo edicto stabilivimus, ut dominus rex libertates regnicolarum suorum et ecclesiarum tempore coronationis sue in litteris expressas et ea, que in presentibus statutis exponuntur ... [sententiam excommunicationis] domini archiepiscopi Colocensis, de consensu prelatorum ferendam incurrat. Et preter hec etiam alia, que in litteris domini regis tempore coronationis sue datis continentur, plenius attendantur et firmiter observentur.

XVII. Statuimus, ut omnes prelati, quos legitimum impedimentum non detinuerit, necnon et omnes barones et nobiles universi ad quindenas beati Georgii in Racus iuxta Danubium convenire teneantur, ut omnibus ibidem recensitis, que in litteris domini regis expressa continentur, institutis, que necessaria fuerint ...

XVIII. Observandum, quod sicut per barones, ita etiam per regem vel p[er reginam] Hungarie super populos ecclesiarum et monasteriorum nulla penitus collecta exigatur; et si contrarium factum fuerit, contrarium facientes [sententiam excommunicationis] per dictum dominum archiepiscopum Colocensem ad modum supradictum [ferendam] incurrant.

Et quia saluberrima statuta regio honori et statui regnicolarum magno remedio proficientia a predictis venerabilibus patribus et ab incolis totius regni Hungarie de legali consensu domini regis et baronum processerunt, prout in superioribus est expressum, pro [de...] concessa debitam reperiant firmitatem, [dominu]s rex et regni barones sigilla sua ad[latus] sigilli prelatorum huic carte statutorum apposuerunt.

5 AUGUST 1298

At the coronation of Lord Andrew, illustrious King of Hungary, the most notable and significant liberties and conditions, although not all the ancient conditions and liberties, had been promulgated in a public charter confirmed by the seal of the lord king¹; but because they were barely respected by evil and wicked men blinded by greed and entirely neglected through the laxity of the lord king, the Kingdom of Hungary in all its parts started to become unstable, and, due to the wasting and violence of the barons² and other mighty men, to be so destroyed that the churches, the nobles, and other inhabitants suffered almost total annihilation of their goods. Having seen this, the same Lord Andrew, guided by the Holy Spirit, opened the ears of his compassion and, accepting faithful counsel, convened a general assembly with the purpose that, to the extent possible, the prelates and clergy as well as the nobles of this kingdom—excluding any barons, as is customary³—should with sound advice against the wickedness and wily machinations of evil men come to the aid of this imperiled country diminished by enormous devastation.

Therefore we, John, by the grace of God Archbishop of Kalocsa, Chancellor of the court of the lord king,⁴ Peter, Bishop of Transylvania,⁵ Andrew of Eger,⁶ Thomas of Bosnia,⁷ Benedict of

¹ See 1290.

² The expression baro (mostly in the plural, barones) came to be used in the late thirteenth century for what had been a “baronial retainer” (jobagio) in the Golden Bull, though probably in a wider sense including the holders of royal office both in the counties and in the court. The word acquired its later meaning of a great landowner, regardless of royal office, only much later; see Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law]. Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tudományos Intézet, n.d. [1947]. p. 485, and Pál Engel “Honor, vár, ispánság: Tanulmányok az Anjou-királyság kormányzati rendszeréről [Honor, Castle, County: Studies on the Governmental System of the Angevin Monarchy], Századok 116 (1982), 883f; summarized in Pál Engel, “Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom.” Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

³ The translation of quibuscunque as “any” or “all” is debatable; cf. Szilágyi, in Lederer, p. 90, n. 1. The exclusion of barons from the deliberations has been seen as proof of an attempt by the clergy and the county nobility to form an alliance with the king against the powerful barons. It should be noted, however, that the meeting took place with their approval and the statutes were confirmed by them. The case suggests rather a precursor of what in the fifteenth century became a bicameral diet.

⁴ The archiepiscopal see of Esztergom was vacant, hence the archbishop of Kalocsa was charged to serve as the senior prelate of the realm in all the relevant passages of the decretum. The archbishop of Kalocsa was John II (1278–1301).

⁵ Peter, d. g. Monoszló, bishop of Transylvania 1270–1307

⁶ Andrew, bishop of Eger 1275–1304

⁷ Thomas, bishop of Bosnia c. 1287–c.1304

Veszprém,⁸ Paul of Pécs⁹ by his solemn proctors, Haab of Vác,¹⁰ Theodore of Győr,¹¹ Michael of Zagreb¹², Emeric/Imre of Oradea/Nagyvárad,¹³ Anthony of Cenad,¹⁴ convened at the Church of the Friars Minor in Pest, in the year of the Lord one thousand two hundred ninety-eight, on the feast of St. Dominic the Confessor¹⁵ with all the nobles of Hungary and some Saxons and Cumans, by the consent and authority of the lord king and the barons of the whole country, as... and after having invoked the grace of the Holy Spirit, undertook to treat these matters through which the magnificence of the king and the state of the whole kingdom, as well as of the churches, of ecclesiastical persons, and of other orders, shall be promoted.

Therefore we order:

1 That we all honor the Lord Andrew, a descendant of the royal family, as the natural lord of the kingdom.¹⁶ And in order that in his person the royal dignity shall shine as appropriate to its eminence, all possessions of the king and queen unjustly occupied by anyone at any time shall be restored to them with full rights. Ecclesiastical and noble rights to possessions, markets, tolls, and other things unjustly occupied whenever and by whomever shall be completely returned. The barons and other violent men shall entirely refrain from wasting and pillaging, and, instead of doing evil by which they offend the royal majesty, they shall submit to the king's mercy and ask his pardon; and henceforth wasting, pillaging, robbery, unlawful occupation, and other kinds of harmful deeds shall cease altogether. And anyone who does not return the wrongfully occupied regalities of the king and the queen and also the hitherto wrongfully held possessions, markets, and tolls of churches and nobles within three months after the date of the present meeting, or starts pillaging and occupying anew the possessions of the king, the queen, the churches, and nobles disregarding this statute, shall upon commission of the deed¹⁷ fall under the sentence

⁸ Benedict d. hg. Rád, bishop of Veszprém 1289–1311.

⁹ Paul II, bishop of Pécs c. 1287–1304.

¹⁰ Haab (=Ladislav Aba?), bishop of Vác 1294–1311.

¹¹ Theodore, bishop of Győr 1295–1307.

¹² Michael, bishop of Zagreb 1296–1303.

¹³ Imre, bishop of Oradea 1297–1317.

¹⁴ Anthony, OFM, bishop of Cenad 1298–1307.

¹⁵ 5 August. The church (convent) of the Friars Minor was founded 1253–6, near the eastern gate of Pest. See Beatrix Romhányi, "The monastic topography of medieval Buda," in Medieval Buda in Context, Balázs Nagy et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 204–28, here 208.

¹⁶ This statement aims at acknowledging Andrew's right to the throne which was contested during his entire reign, especially by the Sicilian Angevins and their adherents in Hungary and Croatia.

¹⁷ Excommunicatio ipso facto means that without any further judicial action the commission of the sin "automatically" imposes the sentence on the sinner; see Dictionnaire de droit canonique, V, 615–628 of excommunication passed against them herewith¹⁸ by the authority of this statute. They shall not be absolved save by the archbishop of Kalocsa¹⁹ with the unanimous consent and approval of all the bishops, and after they have made appropriate satisfaction to the lord king they shall be punished with the proper penalty. They shall, however, forfeit upon commission of the deed all their possessions, and, after the deduction of the damages they had caused – which are to be given to those whom they had harmed – the rest of their possessions shall fall into the king’s hands. Thus, their heirs shall be deprived of the legitimate part of their inheritance for the crimes of their parents, they shall not be regarded as nobles and shall be excluded from all acts of nobility and from entrance [to the king’s court]²⁰ and shall be deprived for- ever of their rights. And if some of them should... rebel, and our lord the king of Hungary having summoned and assembled the forces of the kingdom be unable to repress them, he shall have the right to request from elsewhere²¹ such aid as to enable him to subdue the ferocity of the criminals. And if the lord king does not bother to prosecute such criminals or does not permit the unruly to be smitten by the aforementioned punishments, then he shall renounce all privileges which he may have of being exempt from excommunication, and shall be excommunicated by the archbishop of Kalocsa with the counsel for all the prelates, to which our king has agreed in a special charter, and his chapel shall be placed under interdict. Barons and other nobles who join men so condemned or those who deserve condemnation shall be subject to the same punishment. And because increasing misdeeds demand increased retribution, the diocesan bishops in whose dioceses such deeds, condemned by God and the present assembly,²² are attempted, shall impose a ban on the churches and people of such miscreants and shall not lift it until the matter is suitably closed through the aforementioned actions of the lord king.

2 Further, fortifications and castles built recently without permission of the lord king,²³ or those from which harm was done or could be done in the future, or the possessions of which are insufficient²⁴—even the smaller ones built over churches and monasteries—shall be razed without

¹⁸ The decretum refers repeatedly to excommunicatio ex nunc. This is not a reference to any canonical punishment, but rather to the excommunication “now decreed” in this statute.

¹⁹ See above, n. 4

²⁰ Reconstruction of Henrik Marczali, in A magyar történet kútjöinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901) p. 192.

²¹ The possibility of asking aid “from elsewhere” must have implied a call on Albert I of Austria, who since 1296 was King Andrew’s father-in-law.

²² The use of the word status, in the sense of “assembly”, is seen by József Gericz (“Ständewesen”, p. 138f. and Idem, “Über eine ungarländische Anwendung des Terminus ‘Status’ in der Bedeutung ‘Versammlung, Congregatio’ im Gesetz von 1298,” Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae, Sectio linguistica, 7 [1976], 109–117) as a sign of the knowledge of Roman law and of the reception of imperial ideas on justice at the court of King Andrew III; cf. also Du Cange, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis, G. A. L. Henschel, ed. (Paris: Didot, 1846), VI, 364 delay; and if they be not demolished, their lords shall fall under the excommunication now decreed. And wherever the king or the count palatine, traveling in the kingdom, shall come across those who had built fortifications, they shall devolve to the right of the king without redemption or exchange. And if they belong to others they shall be returned to their true and proper lords.

²³ Royal licences for building castles began to be issued under Ladislas IV; see Erik Fügedi, Castle and Society in Medieval Hungary (Bp.: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1986), pp. 72–82

²⁴ The implication seems to be that lords of castles with insufficient appurtenances tended to

3 Further, we decree²⁵ that within three months from the day of the present assembly full satisfaction shall be given and the stolen things returned to all who were injured, despoiled, and robbed by those who injured and robbed them. And if it²⁶ was extorted by violence, it should not count as restitution, but those who did not render satisfaction within the given term or procured a remission by force, shall fall as manifest offenders under the now decreed sentence of excommunication and shall be subject to royal judgment for infidelity.²⁷ All the goods and possessions of such men shall fall to the royal treasury. Henceforth the man of the lord king whom the king sent out especially for this task and the four nobles in each county²⁸ commissioned to inquire into and take cognizance of past and future misappropriations shall report to the king with the corroboration of the chapters in whose area these condemnable acts have been or shall have been committed. And if the said nobles, due to fear or favor or money received, shall have dared to decline to report or to report falsely a robbery committed by someone whom they know, they shall be become robber barons; see ibid.

²⁵ Most of the articles begin with the words Item statuimus, which literally mean “we have decreed”. The use of the past tense would imply that the written law was seen merely as a record of the verbal decision passed in the assembly, and would be a significant indication of the king’s and the nobles’ view on legislation. The transmission of the text, however, is not sufficiently unequivocal to allow far-reaching conclusions on the basis of its grammar, and therefore, the present tense has been chosen for the translation

²⁶ That is, the plaintiff’s receipt of satisfaction (Szilágyi’s explanation in Lederer, Szöveggyűjtemény, p. 92).

²⁷ Nota infidelitatis meant technically lèse-majesté; see Imre Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [The Hungarian judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and diverse dynasties]. (Budapest: MTA, 1899). p. 388; initially, the two expressions were used as synonyms (see György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei [Elements of our medieval law] (Budapest: Közgazdasági, 1972), p. 299) but soon acquired a wider meanings. Then, the taint or charge of infidelity referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate subject to the now decreed excommunication and be punished with the proper penalty by the judgment of the king as well.

²⁸ See 1290: 3. The king’s bailiff (homo regius) was a nobleman, frequently selected by the plaintiff, who, accompanied by the witness of a cathedral chapter (locus credibilis), represented the royal court at the execution of legal transactions (summons, inspection of boundaries, institution, etc.). The four nobles (called iudices servientium or nobilium, szolgabírák) were both helpers of the ispán and representatives of the county’s nobility.

4 We by statute decree concerning the robberies committed since the beginning of this assembly, that if the diocesan bishop be properly informed by those four men elected in every county about these offenses, then he shall excommunicate those of offenders culpably deserving condemnation in his diocese and warn that they be strictly avoided by all. If any regular cleric should admit such excommunicates or others mentioned above, alive or dead, to the divine sacraments,²⁹ the order to which he is known to belong shall be denied alms by all gentlemen of this realm.³⁰ And any landed resident who, dis- regarding this statute, would give alms to a brother of that order, be he a relative of his or not, shall incur by this deed the now decreed sentence of excommunication. The lord king, if he shall receive true report concerning these excommunications, shall punish them with due punishment without the voice of a court of law, unless they hasten to correct their misdeeds, through satisfaction and procure absolution without delay. Even the barons or thenobles of the kingdom, if they should intercede for any of the malefactors, shall incur by this deed the now decreed sentence of excommunication.

5 We also decree that just as the landed residents have been ordered to restore the occupied things, the lord king shall also be obliged to return all occupied things that are known to belong to churches and nobles; should he fail to do so, he shall incur the sentence of excommunication from the lord archbishop with the consent of the prelates. And if the king should have alienated any part of the kingdom by any title or pretext, this lord king shall restore it to royal jurisdiction, so that the Kingdom of Hungary, as a legal whole, may enjoy the integrity of its parts;³¹ and if this same king fails without having been hindered by legitimate obstacle to correct this, he shall incur the sentence of excommunication from the archbishop of Kalocsa rendered with the requisite consent of the prelates.

6 Further, we decree that if two or more brothers are living together on their undivided hereditary, rather than acquired, possessions,³² one of them, who is found to be more useful and

²⁹ “Alive or dead” refers to burial in sacred ground as well as the other sacraments

³⁰ Regnicola (literally: inhabitant of the kingdom) meant in medieval Hungarian legal texts a politically enfranchised (landowning, noble) inhabitant of the realm; we translate it as “man/gentleman of the realm.”

³¹ An inalienability clause was included in Andrew III’s coronation oath according to the oldest extant report of a royal coronation in Hungary: Österreichische Reimchronik, vv 4241 ff., MGH Dt. Chron., 5, 1: 535. On it, see: Emma Bartoniek, “A koronázási eskü fejlődése 1526-ig,” [Development of the coronation oath till 1526] Századok 51 (1917) pp. 5-44, here pp. 7-9.

³² Medieval Hungarian law distinguished at least two kinds of landed property. For inherited property the law sought to establish a limited hereditary right, with escheat in the case of extinction of the male branch (defectio seminis); see Eszter Waldapfel, “Nemesi birtokjogunk kialakulása a középkorban” [Development of our noble property rights in the Middle Ages], Századok 65 (1931), 131–167, 259–272, espec. 143–157. Possessions bought for money (possessio emptitia), were regarded as mobile property and freely heritable; see József Holub, “A vásárolt fekvő jószág jogi természete régi jogunkban” [The legal character of purchased real property in our ancient law], in Sándor Domanovszky, ed., Emlékkönyv Károlyi Árpád (Budapest: Sárkány, 1933), pp. 246–254.. It was apparently quite common until the later Middle Ages that more suitable, shall be obliged to come to the royal host; and if he fails to come, they shall be jointly accountable for no more than one military fine or penalty.³³

7 Further, we decree that in order that the king's court be more honorably governed and the Kingdom of Hungary better administered, our lord king every three months shall have with him two bishops in sequential order, one from the suffragans of Esztergom and the other from the suffragans of Kalocsa, and an equal number of nobles on behalf of all the kingdom, whom we have elected at this time, and duly provide them with a stipend from the royal treasury. And if the lord king should fail to do this, whatever he shall do without having had recourse to the counsel of the aforesaid, whether in, conferring important grants and dignities or in other major things, shall be invalid.³⁴

8 We also decree that in order for the lady queen to enjoy the dignity befitting her status, the court shall be conducted more festively, as is appropriate, by dignitaries and officers from the Hungarian nobility and not by foreigners;³⁵ and in order that the court of the lady queen be more properly governed, the queen shall be obliged to retain certain barons chosen by the king³⁶ and she shall receive in full the tolls and customs duties due to the king and the queen.

9 We decree that all tolls established since the time of King Ladislas³⁷ be entirely abolished; and whoever dares to continue to exact any part of these abolished tolls shall incur the sentence of excommunication and the lands or possessions where these illicit dues were collected shall devolve to the right of the king.

10 We decree and by perpetual edict establish that the Hungarian church shall enjoy its liberties in ³⁸head and members. And we order, or rather declare the ordinance of old, that during the descendants of one landowner held their possessions undivided, postponing the legally complicated and cumbersome division (osztály) for generations.

³³ On the military fine, see 1222: 7.

³⁴ The establishment of such a council of prelates, magnates, and lesser nobles was the most far-reaching objective in the short-lived "corporatist" episode of the late thirteenth century; see Gerics, "Ständewesen," passim.

³⁵ Andrew's second queen was Agnes of Habsburg (1281–1364), the daughter of Duke Albert of Austria, whom he married in 1296.

³⁶ A reference to the queen's "baron" without further specification can be found in her charter of 29 April 1299; see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), IV/2, 20; see also H. von Liebenau, Hundert Urkunden zur Geschichte der Königin Agnes, Witwe von Ungarn 1288–1364 (Regensburg: Manz, 1869), p. 9, No. V. On the rather limited authority of the queens, see Attila Zsoldos, Az Árpádok és asszonyaik. A királynéi intézmény az Árpádok korában. [The Árpáds and their wives: The institution of queenship in the age of the Árpáds] Budapest: MTA Történettudományi Intézet, 2005).

³⁷ Ladislas IV.

³⁸ This clause may be a reference to the liberties granted to the clergy by Andrew II in 1222, parallel to the Golden Bull.

vacancies neither the lord king nor his envoy, nor those who call themselves “parochians”³⁹ shall occupy, waste, or deplete all or parts of the goods and possessions of the church. Neither the lord king nor any other person shall despoil the goods of a deceased bishop, but, if he died intestate, they shall be applied to the benefit of the church of which he was known to have been the prelate.⁴⁰ If he disposed of these with sound mind, they are to be distributed to whomever they were legally promised... or to the relatives, retainers, and officials of the deceased bishop... anyone’s intervention.⁴¹ And if a “parochian” or any private person should presume to act against these statutes, may God forbid, they shall incur the immediate sentence of excommunication now decreed; and so, too, those who dare to collect taxes or any other exaction from the people of the churches and of the nobles or who impose anything of that sort. But if barons who have no right of patronage⁴² over a monastery exact “hospitality” by force⁴³ from the people of the churches where they have no rights or from the people of nobles, they shall incur the penalty of excommunication now decreed.

11 We decree ... that the [king should not entrust judgment in the cases of] the powerful and the powerless in two or more adjacent counties or even one [to special judges],⁴⁴ but all cases shall be brought before the count palatine when he is passing judgment in the counties,⁴⁵ or to the county magistrates when he is not; and if any others dare to judge in such counties, they should be punished with the sentence of excommunication now decreed.

12 We also decree that nobles should be free to serve whichever lord they wish according to ³⁹ The meaning of the word parochiani is unclear; it may refer to the ispáns of the counties (comites parochiani), in contrast to “private persons,” or it may refer to nobles of the county or diocese (called comprovinciales), but the term is used nowhere else in either sense.

⁴⁰ The intention of this article is to prohibit the practice, common in the German church, of royal confiscation of the property of deceased bishops (ius spoli); see E. Schrader, “Bemerkungen zum Spolien- und Regalienrecht der deutschen Kirche im Mittelalter”, ZSRG, Germ. Abt. 84 (1967), 128–161, noting earlier literature. The reference to the ordinance of old may be to Syn. Strig. 12–13 or to canon 44 of the Synod of Buda of 1279. In the anarchic decades under Andrew III, powerful barons may have practiced this misuse as well.

⁴¹ Because of a gap in the text the connection of quocunque interveniente to the rest of the sentence is unclear.

⁴² On the right of patronage, as distinct from proprietary rights denounced in canon law, see Dictionnaire de droit canonique, II (1937), 692–703 with bibliography. For a discussion of this right in Hungary, see Ferenc Kollányi, A magán kegyúri jog hazánkban a középkorban [Private right of patronage in our country in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: MTA, 1906).

⁴³ By the late thirteenth century, the descensus, originally the obligation of hospitality to the king and his officers (droit de gîte) became a form of tax, cf. 1222: 15, 1231: 4, 1267: 1, 1290: 7. The expression descensus violentus is rare, and may refer to abuses in the decades of lawlessness when barons and their private armies exacted lodging and victuals from defenseless villagers.

⁴⁴ Szilágyi’s reconstruction (in Lederer, Szöveggyűjtemény p. 96)

⁴⁵ By the end of the thirteenth century it became general practice for the palatine to hold judicial assemblies (congregationes generales) during the circuit of the counties; see also below, art. 14; cf. Hajnik, A magyar bírósági szervezet, p. 13ff.

their own free will;⁴⁶ and if any of the powerful men would coerce such nobles by force or violence to serve him or dare to harm them in their persons or property, ... he acts against this statute, he shall incur the immediate sentence of excommunication now decreed. and if the lord king should know about such oppression of nobles, he is obliged to pursue these oppressors so that they be suitably punished.

13 We also decree that neither the judge royal,⁴⁷ nor any other judge should presume to arrest any nobleman or landowner⁴⁸ for judgment or judgments,⁴⁹ but if they should, they shall be deprived immediately of the office or judicial commission which they exercise.

14 We also decree that the palatine ought to render judgment, pitching camp in fields or pastures, but not villages or towns, in spring, summer, and autumn, but not in winter ... and that henceforth it should not be possible to ascend to other offices.⁵⁰

15 We decree that there shall be a single royal and general money of the eighth blanching⁵¹ for two years. In subsequent years silver money of the tenth blanching⁵² shall circulate in all towns and villages containing markets...⁵³ in the whole realm. And if any noble or powerful man

⁴⁶ This section refers to those lesser nobles who in ever greater numbers had by this time become retainers (servientes, familiares) of the great landowners (their domini).

⁴⁷ The judge royal was by this time the highest judge in the royal court, having, probably since 1239, a regular deputy, the vice-judex curiae regis, who resided in Buda, and was especially active in the late thirteenth century (if the issuance of charters is an accurate indication); see György Györffy, "Budapest története az Árpádkorban" [History of Bp. in the Árpadian Age], in Budapest Története [History of Bp.], ed. László. Gerevich (Budapest: Főváros Tanácsa, 1973), I. 335.

⁴⁸ See Gerics, "Rechtsleben", p. 65. The distinction made here between nobilis and ignobilis implicit in the prohibition of office-holding by ignobiles, is a significant step toward closing the ranks of the nobility, a process characteristic of the thirteenth century all over Europe. For an overview and literature, see "Adel," Lexikon des Mittelalters (München: Artemis, 1980), 1, 118–142. In fact, in Hungary the border between nobility and other landowners (homines possessionati) remained open well into the fourteenth century; see György. Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in Medieval Hungarian Law] (Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tudományos Intézet, n.d. [1947?]), pp. 445–457 and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 20–22. -- No evidence is known about barons having "farmed" their offices in medieval Hungary; the law, however, may have aimed at stopping them from entrusting their county offices to familiares, who were remunerated in money and may not always have been nobles.

⁴⁹ Judicium or judicia can also refer to fines.

⁵⁰ Partly due to a lacuna in the text, the exact reference of this last clause is unclear. It may be a restatement of 1222:30.

⁵¹ Coins of such fineness (in decimal terms: 0.800) were minted under Ladislas IV and in the early years of Andrew III; see Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. (Budapest: MTA, 1916), pp. 326–327.

⁵² Light coins (pennies) of 0.900 silver fineness are known from the last years of the thirteenth century; see ibid.

⁵³ Kovachich suggested the words "of equal value" for the gap.

will not permit these monies to circulate in accordance with ancient custom⁵⁴ in the markets in his possession or in other places under his control, he shall be deprived of his market privilege which shall devolve to the person or persons who... in these and other matters display proper respect. And nevertheless those who do not accept this money shall pay a tax of half a *fertó*⁵⁵ for every tenement⁵⁶ in their possession. And if any person should be so rash as to mint money on his property or in his house, he shall forfeit that property or house and be punished according to the law.⁵⁷

16 We order and have by perpetual edict confirmed that the lord king [shall observe] the liberties of the landed residents and of the churches included in the charter issued at the time of his coronation as well as everything set forth in the present statute... he shall incur [the sentence of excommunication] from the lord archbishop of Kalocsa rendered with the consent of all prelates. And beyond these, everything contained in the charter of the lord king given at his coronation shall be even more fully observed and firmly adhered to.⁵⁸

17 We decree that all prelates, not prevented by a legitimate hindrance, as well as all barons and nobles shall be bound to come together at Rákos near the River Danube⁵⁹ on the fifteenth day after the Feast of St. George⁶⁰ in order to review everything contained in the charter of the lord king, and to establish what is necessary...

18 Be observed that just as by the barons, so also by the king or [queen] of Hungary no taxes shall be exacted from the people of the churches and monasteries; and if anything contrary to this is done, the contravenes shall incur the sentence of excommunication pronounced by the ⁵⁴ Lóránt Szilágyi (in Lederer, Szöveggyűjtemény, p. 97) offers the reading: “brought into circulation by agents delegated according to ancient custom.

⁵⁵ Half a fertó was 1/8 of a silver mark, about 25.8–30.7 g.

⁵⁶ In the late thirteenth and early fourteenth century mansio came to mean the complex of tenant holdings (Hung.: telek) and a taxation unit.

⁵⁷ On counterfeit money, see Hóman, Pénztörténet pp. 472–473, where reference can be found to counterfeiters punished with forfeiture of all their property as early as 1253; see Imre Szentpetery, István Borsa, Az Árpád-házi királyok okleveleinek kritikai jegyzéke. Regesta regum stirpis Arpadiane critico-diplomatica, (Budapest.: MTA, 1923–61), No. 998 and from 1263, ibid., Nos. 1327 and 1372. While the prosecution of counterfeiting was formally decreed only much later, see in general Frigyes Kahler, “A magyarországi középkori pénzhamisítás (I. rész) [Medieval counterfeiting in Hungary. Part 1] Numizmatikai Közlöny 76–77 (1977–1978), 57–65. This seems to have been the first attempt at securing royal monopoly on minting.

⁵⁸ This article and the following two are barely legible in the transcript; the conjectures are those of Dôry, augmented by the suggestions of Szilágyi (in: Lederer, Szöveggyűjtemény, p. 98).

⁵⁹ The area that today is the northeastern part of Budapest, sometimes the place of muster of the army (e.g. in 1278 departing to the famous Battle of Marchfeld), became the regular meeting place of the assembly of the estates from the fifteenth century onward; see: János M. Bak and András Vadas, “Diets and Synods in Buda and Its Environs,” in: Balázs Nagy, Katalin Szende, András Vadas, eds. Medieval Buda in Context (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2016) pp. 322–44.

⁶⁰ 8 May. (The feast of St. George is held on 23 April.)

archbishop of Kalocsa in the aforesaid way.

And because these salutary statutes, which contribute much to the benefit of the royal honor and to the conditions of the landed residents, have emanated from the aforesaid venerable fathers and from the inhabitants of the whole Kingdom of Hungary with the legal consent of the lord king and the barons as stated above, for ... [the liberties] granted receive the necessary validity, the lord king and the barons of the realm have appended their seals to this charter of statutes next to the seals of the prelates.

DIVERSE DYNASTIES (1301–1490)

LAW OF KING CHARLES I OF HUNGARY OF c. 1320

This first piece of evidence on the judicial reforms of King Charles I has survived in a mid- fifteenth-century ars notaria, probably compiled by John of Uzsa, Canon of Eger. It was issued, so its proem states, following the virtual civil war of the first decades of the fourteenth century and was in all likelihood part of a series of similar reforms. References to its application can be found as early as 1326 and 1329, thus, it can safely be dated to the first or second decade of the century. The text identifies the measures as a decretum seu statutum, it was issued by the king and his council (not a diet) and came down to us in a formulary. Still, we follow the decision of the editors, Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, of the, Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457 (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH] in including it as the opening piece of the legislation of the Angevin kings.

MS.: (Ars Notaria) Österreichische Nationalbibliothek, Wien, Cod. 4276, ff. 104r–5r

EDD.: J. N. Kovachich, Formulae solennes styli in cancellaria curiaque regum, foris minoribus ac locis credibiliis Regni Hungariae usati (Pest: Trattner, 1799), pp. 2–3; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66). 7/11: 612–45 (dated 1316); DRH, pp. 73–5.

LIT.: Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judical system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899), pp. 445–46; Gyula Gábor, A megyei intézmény kialakulása és működése Nagy Lajos alatt [Development and functions of the county under Louis the Great] (Budapest: Grill, 1908), pp. 173–5; Lóránt Szilágyi, “III. Endre 1298. évi törvénye” [The 1298 law of Andrew III] .Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica 1(1957), 135–41; György Bónis, “Uzsai János Ars Notariaja” [The ars notaria of J. of Uzsa], Filológiai Közöny 7 (1961): 247. Ferenc Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter,” MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558.

SECUNTUR TRACTATUS, QUANDO IUDICIA PER HOMINES IUDICIS CURIE REGIE
VEL DOMINI PALATINI VEL CONVENTUUM ET IUDICUM NOBILIIUM IUXTA HUIUS REGNI CONSUECUDINEM EXIGI SOLENT A CONVICTIS.

Iuxta quam partem est sciendum, quod ante convalescentiam potentie serenissimi principis domini Karuli condam regis Hungarie felicitis memorie in diversis partibus ipsius regni non modice insolentie discordie lites et guerre necnon actus potentiales exerceri dinoscebantur, ita videlicet, quod pauperes et inpotentes per divites et potentes absque ulla misericordia opprimebantur, nullaue iustitia vel modica vigeat et regnabat, ideo pretactus dominus rex Karolus prelatorum et regni sui baronum salubri usus consilio super facto exactionis iudiciorum seu birsagiorum talem statutum fecit seu decretum, litteris suis hoc corroborando:

I. Quod dicta iudicia per homines memoratorum iudicis curie seu regni palatini et comitum ac iudicum nobilium non aliter, nisi mediante homine regio sub testimonio alicuius capituli vel credibilis conventus exigere possint a convictis, cuius quidem regalis statutionis hec est forma, quod quandocunque ipsorum iudiciorum exactores ad recipiendum iudicia per suos superiores destinantur, prius litteris regalibus receptis debent transire ad ipsa loca testimonialia, receptisque et adductis secum regio homine et testimonio capituli vel conventus transire debent ad sedem iudiciariam illius comitatus, in quo exigere oporteret iudicia prenotata: Et ibi prius litteris regalibus et registro domini sui superioris, utpote iudicis curie regie vel domini palatini vel comitis et iudicum nobilium, quis scilicet tunc talis exactor fuerit iudiciorum, perlectis et nobilibus illius comitatus in layca lingua reseratis aliquem competentem terminum assignare debent sic notificando et promulgando, ut convicti in iudiciis ad nostram sedem venientes se expedire niterentur iuxta continentiam registri prenotati. Qui si in terminis per eosdem iudiciorum exactores et regium ac capituli vel conventus homines ad id assignatis se expedire curaverint, extunc tales coram dicto regio et capituli hominibus retrahuntur de registro et recipiunt litteras expeditorias exactoris iudiciorum supradictorum, easdemque litteras pro maiori cautela postmodum confirmant in capitulo vel conventu aliquali, plures autem nobiles pro maiori cautela non litteras dictorum exactorum sed in relatione regii hominis et testimonii capituli vel conventus litteras expeditorias eorundem capituli vel conventus recipere procurant pro ipsorum expeditione. Si vero nobiles vel cuiuscunque conditionis homines in iudiciis convicti in termino, ut premissum est, assignato ab eisdem iudiciorum exactoribus se expedire non curaverint, extunc iidem exactores cum predictis regio et capituli hominibus vel conventus transire debent ad possessiones vel loca habitationis hominum in iudiciis convictorum, et in fine ville eorum conscendentes in signum pacis et iustitie hastam cum suo ferro in terram figere et tribus diebus facta legitima amonitione ibi expectare tenerentur solutioni et satisfactioni iudiciorum supradictorum, nil plus nisi victui necessaria recipientes. Et si talis convictus ibi se patienter expedierit, similiter de ipso registro retrahatur et littere expeditorie similiter emanentur, alioquin dictis tribus diebus transactis in rebus suis mobilibus et immobilibus sub federe impignorationis per eosdem iudiciorum exactores inibi recipi debent, quantum equipolleret vel se extenderet ad qualitatem iudiciorum.

II. Secundo est notandum, quod si exactores iudiciorum domini palatini vel iudicis curie regie ad tales processus egrediuntur, tunc regium hominem et testimonium capituli vel conventus quo supra ac hominem comitis necnon unum vel duos ex quatuor iudicibus secum ducere debent pro testimoniis. Qui quidem exactores iudiciorum res pro iudiciis exactas inter se taliter dividere debent, quod primo decimam partem prefatis regio et capituli vel conventus hominibus simul, et tertiam partem comiti et iudicibus nobilium reddere, duas vero partes pro suo superiori debent reservare. Si vero exactores iudiciorum comitis et iudicum nobilium ad tales processus egrediuntur, non sic, sed tantummodo regium hominem et testimonium capituli vel conventus et secum ducere debent et decimam partem exactorum iudiciorum regio et capituli et conventus hominibus reddere, residuum vero inter se dividere debent, sicut est mos eorum. Et tandem in fine, postquam omnia iudicia in tali comitatu egrediuntur et processus eorum rite terminantur, sepedictorum iudiciorum exactores ad ipsum capitulum vel conventum, cuius testimonium ad perficiendum exactionem duxerant, redire et unicuique litteras expeditorias dare tenerentur et pro seipsis etiam recipere ac prenominationis comiti et quatuor iudicibus nobilium in relatione regii hominis et testimonii dicti capituli vel conventus similiter litteras expeditorias dare tenerentur sic alternatim pro cautela, prout hec et alia et levius lucidius et limpidius in statutis ipsius domini regis Karuli continentur, que quidem statuta in singulis comitatibus regni Hungarie in litteris ipsius domini Karuli conscripta habentur et conservantur.

WHAT FOLLOWS DEALS WITH HOW JUDGMENTS¹ OUGHT TO BE EXACTED FROM THOSE CONVICTED ACCORDING TO THE CUSTOM OF THIS REALM BY THE MEN OF THE JUDGE ROYAL OR OF THE LORD PALATINE OR OF THE CONVENTS AND COUNTY MAGISTRATES.²

Be it known according to this division³ that prior to the recovery of power by the most serene prince, lord Charles of happy memory, the late king of Hungary, innumerable feuds, wars and acts

¹ After ordeals were abandoned in the mid-thirteenth century, the word iudicium usually meant fines, monetary punishments paid by parties at law for breaking procedural rules. Two-thirds of the fine usually went to the judge (parts of it also to the king or the ispán), one-third to the opposing party. Fines were an accepted part of litigation and were usually “rolled up,” balanced and paid off at the conclusion of the trial. Apart from bribes and other inducements, fines were the main source of income for judges.

² The Judge Royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró) was originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200). From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda. The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. The palatine, count palatine (comes palatines) was originally the head of the king’s household and highest officer in the realm. By the mid-twelfth century he had become the king’s deputy and commander of the royal host; he gradually moved out of the court and served as the king’s itinerant judge administering justice to the nobles. The palatine also became the judge of the Cumans. These judges sent out noblemen (royal or palatinal bailiffs) for the execution of various judicial tasks (institutions, inquests, etc.) who acted in concert with an emissary of the local convent that served as place of authentication, (loca credibilia). These were cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances.), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. The county magistrates (Hung.: szolgabíró) were elected judges and administrative officers of the noble county; the office gradually evolved into a local judiciary of which usually four were elected or selected for every county, later with responsibilities in a defined quarter (circuit, Hung. járás) of the county. Imre Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899), pp. 160–3.; Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte,” pp. 431–3.

³ The opening words both here and in art. 2 (sciendum, notandum), just as the title itself, are typical for formularies or textbooks (artes notariae) compiled for the use of notaries and other practitioners of law. On the role of these books in the training and practice of law in medieval Hungary, see György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei [Elements of our medieval law] (Budapest: Közgazdasági Kiadó, 1972), pp. 141–62.

of might were committed in different parts of the kingdom, whereby the poor and the weak⁴ were oppressed without any pity by the rich and powerful, and no justice or restraint flourished or prevailed.⁵ Therefore, the said lord King Charles, with the beneficial advice of the prelates and barons of his realm,⁶ issued this statute or decree concerning the procedure of exacting legal dues or fines,⁷ and corroborated it by his letter, as follows:

1 That the said fines are not to be demanded from a convicted party by the men of the aforementioned judge royal, the palatine of the kingdom or county ispáns and magistrates in any other way, save with the assistance of the king's bailiff and with the testimony of some chapter or authenticating convent.⁸ This royal ordinance should be carried out in this way: whenever collectors of fines are sent out by their superiors to receive fines, they shall go to these places of authentication after having obtained a royal mandate,⁹ and then they should proceed accompanied by a royal bailiff and the witness of the chapter or convent to the seat of the court of that county in which the said fines are to be exacted. And there, after the royal mandate and the register¹⁰ of their superior lord (that is, either the judge royal, the lord palatine or the ispán and the county magistrates, whichever of them ordered the fines to be collected) have been read and explained in

⁴ The words pauperes et impotentes, with biblical overtones (which in turn, go back, through Jerome's readings, to the political vocabulary of classical authors, such as Sallust and Tacitus), meant in the Middle Ages the lesser freemen, not the working poor or unarmed peasantry; see Karl Bosl, "Potens and Pauper: Begriffsgeschichtliche Studien zur gesellschaftlichen Differenzierung im frühen Mittelalter," in Festschrift für Otto Brunner (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1963), pp. 60–87.

⁵ At least since the death of King Andrew III, if not before, the country was exposed to open civil war between the supporters of the Angevin claimants to the throne and their opponents. Peace was not fully established before the death of King Charles' major adversary, Mathew Csák, lord of the northeastern parts of Hungary, on 18 March 1321. This date is, therefore, taken as a likely terminus post quem for this ordinance.

⁶ The wording suggests that this edict originated in the royal council. Before the later fifteenth century no clear distinction can be made between decreta emanating from this body and from the diet of lords, nobles and clergy. King Charles seems to have held a few diets between his "election" in 1312 and ca. 1320, but no legislation has survived from these. No diet is known to have been called after 1320; see Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790) p. 182.

⁷ On judicium, see n. 1, above; the second word, birsagium is a Latinized form of the Hungarian bírság, also meaning "fine." The use of both words is merely a rhetorical repetition here.

⁸ The comes, in Hungarian, ispán was by this time a royally appointed officer in charge of a county. In the Angevin period, these offices were often coupled with courtly (baronial) positions as honores and the actual administration of the county was in the hands of the alispán (vicecomes) and the elected magistrates (see above, n. 2). See: Pál Engel, "Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom." Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

⁹ Probably a letter of sentence (litterae sententiales), the record of a final judgment in a lawsuit is meant.

¹⁰ The two earliest registers of fines, which have survived from medieval Hungary are those of the judge royal from c. 1409; cf. Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954–) [=ZsO] 2, No. 7246.

the vernacular ¹¹ to the nobles of that county, they shall assign a suitable time and make it known and promulgate it so that those convicted should come to our seat of justice,¹² and strive to acquit themselves of the fine according to the content of the said register. If the convicted persons take care to acquit themselves within the time assigned by the collectors of fines, the king's bailiff, and the man of the chapter or convent, then these persons should be struck from the register in front of the said men of the king and the chapter and they should receive letters of quittance¹³ from the said collectors of fines. For greater surety they should have these letters confirmed afterwards by some chapter or convent. If several nobles pay a fine, they should arrange to receive a letter of quittance, for greater surety, not from the said collectors, but on the report of the king's bailiff and the witness of the chapter or convent—from the same chapter or convent for their quittance. If, however, nobles or men of whatever station convicted of a fine do not care to come to acquit themselves within the said time assigned by the collectors of fines, then these same collectors with the said men of the king and of the chapter or convent should go to the estates or places of residence of the men convicted of fines. When arriving at the edge of the village they shall thrust a spear with its head into the earth as a sign of peace and justice¹⁴ and, having given legitimate warning, ought to await for three days in that place payment and satisfaction of the said fines, receiving nothing but the necessities of life. And if such a convicted man has submissively acquitted himself, his name is likewise to be stricken from the register and a letter of quittance is to be issued in the same way. Otherwise, after the said three days have passed, sufficient movable and immovable property ought to be taken as security¹⁵ by the same collectors of fines, as is equivalent to, or amounts to, the sum total of the fines.

¹¹ Apparently such executionary procedures were opened in an assembly of nobles at the seat of the county, where the mandates were presented and translated into Hungarian (layca lingua) and a time period set for paying fines. No other details are known about these procedures.

¹² Szilágyi (p. 161) suggested and the editors of DRH accepted that the words referring to the royal court here are out of place and rather the sedes iudiciaria, the local court of the county is meant. The mistake may have been that of the copyist of the formulary.

¹³ The document called litterae expeditoriae was issued for the quittance of various kinds of payments, see Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte,” pp. 530–1.

¹⁴ Verbatim: “with its iron.” Note the archaic symbolic action at the opening of the proceeding; cf. András Alföldi, “Hasta—Summa Imperil: the spear as embodiment of sovereignty in Rome,” American Journal of Archaeology 63 (1959) 1–27; and Idem, “Zum Speersymbol der Souveränität im Altertum,” in Festschrift Percy Ernst Schramm zu seinem siebzigsten Geburtstag von Schülern und Freunden zugeeignet, Peter Scheibert, Peter Classen, eds. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1964) 1: 3–6. This peculiar use of the spear was noted by Jacob Grimm (Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer [Leipzig: Dieterich 1899, repr. Darmstadt: Wiss. Buchges. 1961], 1:120 in repr. 1:116), apparently as a symbolic action without Western European parallels.

¹⁵ Security (impignoratio), in fact a pledge, was an arrangement by which all or part of an estate was assigned together with its income to a creditor. Usually cattle, or in case of higher fines, land was seized. Such pledging could also be ordered by a judge for the benefit of a plaintiff entitled to satisfaction or in matrimonial suits (dower, filial quarter). The contract of pledge needed to be authenticated by a place of

2 Secondly, it to be noted that if the collectors of fines of the lord palatine or the judge royal go out to such proceedings, then they ought to take with them the king's bailiff and the witness of the chapter or convent (as above), as well as the ispán's man and one or two of the county magistrates as witnesses. These collectors of fines ought to divide among themselves in this manner the property seized in judgment: to give first a tenth to the aforementioned king's bailiff and likewise to the man of the chapter or convent, and then one-third share to the ispán and the magistrates, while two shares shall be reserved for their lord. If, however, only the fine-collectors of the ispán and of the noble magistrates out to such a proceeding, they shall not so divide, but— as• they ought to take with them the king's bailiff and also the witness of the chapter or convent— they shall give a tenth to the men of the king and of the convent or chapter, and divide the rest among themselves as is their custom.¹⁶ And finally at the end, when all fines are exacted in a county and all these procedures duly completed, the collectors of the oft-mentioned fines should return to the chapter or convent, the witness of which assisted them in accomplishing the collection, to give to each other, and receive for themselves, a letter of quittance; similarly, they should give letters of quittance mutually for surety to the aforementioned ispán and the four magistrates, on the report of the king's bailiff and the evidence of the said chapter or convent,¹⁷ just as these and other things are more clearly, lucidly, and plainly contained in the statutes of the lord King Charles, which are kept and preserved every county of the Kingdom of Hungary, written out-in the edicts lord Charles himself.¹⁸ authentication. Relatives had preemptory rights. The creditor had full rights to the usufruct of the pledged property and could pledge it further but had to return it at a set date (32 years was the usual maximum term). This practice basically followed the Roman legal institution of pignus and antichresis.

¹⁶ The text is unclear about the division when a tenth is given to the authentic witness; clearly one-third and two-thirds of the remaining amount is implied.

¹⁷ The formulary in which this text survived contains (as No.7) such a letter of quittance issued by a place of authentication for the collector of fines and notes that he should record exactly the sums collected; document No. 8 in the formulary is a certificate of the place of authentication about the proper exaction of fines, see Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich,, Formulae solemnes styli in cancellaria curiaque regum, foris minoribus ac locis credibiliis authenticisque Regni Hungariae . . . usati. (Pest: Trattner, 1799) pp. 5–6). On 16 May 1326 King Charles ordered certain chapters and convents to exact fines due to Count Palatine Philippe Drugeth in the manner prescribed in this decree and refers to this procedure as consuetudo regni; see Anjoukori Oklevéltár. Documenta res Hungaricas tempore regum Adegavensium illustrantia, vol. 10, László Blazovich, Lajos Gécsi, eds. (Budapest–Szeged: n. p., 2000) No. 201, p. 140.

¹⁸ None of the copies has survived, hence the other reforming statutes are unknown.

MANDATE OF KING CHARLES I OF HUNGARY

10 August 1324

This succinct mandate, issued on behalf of the bishop of Veszprém about the simplification of oath-taking, can be seen as an addition to the judicial reforms of Charles I. Even though issued only by the king in council and for a specific petitioner, the contents alter customary law and the text is styled statutum and edictum; hence, it is warranted to include it among the laws of the realm.

MS.: Original on parchment with remains of the great seal. Episcopal archives, Veszprém, No. 122

ED.: Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899) pp. 338–73; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301– 1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [=DRH], pp. 77–80.

LIT.: Hajnik, Bírósági, loc.cit.

MANDATUM 10 Augusti 1324

Nos Karolus dei gratia rex Hungarie significamus, quibus expedit, presentium per te[norem] universis, quod prelati et universi nobiles regni nostri nobis [in] partibus Transilvanis prope Cybinium in expeditione generali existentibus ad nostram accedentes presentiam sua nobis conquestione significare curarunt, quod apud nonnullos iudices et comites parochiales in regno nostro et specialiter in comitatibus Wesprimiensi et Zaladiensi huiusmodi consuetudo, imo potius corruptela in regnicolarum grave dispendium et iacturam iam inolevisset, ut nisi iurans vel prestans sacramentum, similiter et sui compurgatores vel codepositores iuramenti per uniformam verborum prolationem ut preiurans, et eadem verba et eosdem singulos articulos in receptione iuramenti, iuxta formam contestate litis propositos singillatim resumendo iuraverint, extunc iurans cum suis codepositoribus iuramenti tanquam periurii reputantur et tanquam succumbentes in causa pro convictis habentur, nec etiam iurantes, si in iurando verba iuramenti contingenter variaverint vel si verba singula et singulos articulos in receptione iuramenti propositos singillatim resumere nequiverint, ad resumendum et reiterandum ipsa verba et eosdem articulos amplius admittuntur, et sic plurimi causedicorum, alii in personis, alii possessionibus et nonnulli bonis omnibus extitissent hactenus contra iustitiam indebite condempnati. Per eosdem itaque prelatos et nobiles et specialiter pro parte venerabilis patris domini Herrici, dei gratia episcopi Wesprimiensis, aule domine r[egi]ne, consortis nostre karissime cancellarii, dilecti et fidelis nostri nobis fuit humiliter supplicatum, ut super hoc iusto eis ac debito statuti moderamine dignaremur de benignitate [regia] providere. Nos itaque, qui ex suscepti regiminis [debito subditorum] nostrorum gravamina sublevare, eosque sub iuris et iustitie regula. gubernare debemus, attendente[s, quod] regnicole nostri et specialiter populi ecclesie et episcopatus Wesprimiensis pretextu huiusmodi abusive consuetudinis atque corruptele indebite et calumpniose opprimuntur, de prelatorum et [bar]onum nostrorum consilio et consensu penitus abolentes consuetudinem huiusmodi provida deliberatione duximus statuendum, ut iurantes seu deponentes iuramentum, tam actor, quam reus, cum suis codepositoribus iuramenti in verborum succincta et compendiosa prolatione sua deponant iuramenta sub hac infrascripta forma exemplari, videlicet:

Petrus actor iurans contra Martinum reum dicat per hec verba: Ego Petrus iuro in animam meam, ut sic me deus adiuvet, quod Martinus in hiis, que super eum requisivi in iudicio, culpabilis mihi est, seu reus alias tenetur mihi in pecunia quam ab ipso petivi in iudicio Et similiter iuratur in ceteris casibus.

Item Martinus reus iurans contra Petrum actorem dicat per hec verba: Ego Martinus iuro in animam meam, ut sic me deus adiuvet, quod in hiis, que Petrus requisivit super me in iudicio, innocens sum et immunis, alias non teneor sibi in aliqua pecunie quantitate. Et similiter in omnibus casibus deponitur iuramentum.

Hoc expresso, quod si verba iuramenti non possent per uniformam verborum prolationem ad iuramentum proferri, saltem per alia quecunque verba eundem dumtaxat sensum importantia proferantur, et si in prolatione eorundem verborum deficerent vel in proferendo variaverint, ea resumendi et reiterandi semel, secundo et tertio liberam habeant facultatem. Unde palatino, iudici curie nostre, comitibus et universis iudicibus et iustitiariis in regno nostro nunc et pro tempore constitutis, quacunque dignitate, honore, nomine et titulo prefulgentibus, quibus presentes ostenduntur, regio edicto firmiter damus in mandatis, quatenus regnicolas nostros et specialiter universos populos ecclesie et epscopatus Wesprimiensis, tam in Wesprimiensi et Zaladiensi, quam in aliis comitatibus constitutos, cuiusvis status et conditionis ex[istant, contra] formam presentis edicti et statuti nostri in depositione et exactione iuramenti non debeant in aliquo aliquatenus aggravare, sed presens edictum et statutum [sub] pena capi[tis] et [sui hono]ris privatione debeant inviolabilius observare. Quicunque autem secus facere presumpserit, regiam indignationem se n[overit incur]surum. [Datum] in festo sancti Laurentii martyris, anno domini MoCCCco vicesimo quarto.

MANDATE OF 10 AUGUST 1324

We, Charles, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, make known to all to whom it may concern through the contents of these presents that the prelates and all nobles of our realm, who approached our presence while we were encamped on a general campaign¹ in Transylvania² near Sibiu, reported to us, complaining that among many judges and county ispáns of our kingdom, especially in the counties of Veszprém and Zala, such a custom or rather such an abuse had now become established, to the grievous loss and detriment of the people, that if someone swearing or taking an oath,³ as well as his oath-helpers or those swearing with him, should not swear by uttering words identical to those read to him at the taking of the oath⁴ and did not repeat the very same words and the same individual items one by one in accordance with the subject matter of the litigation as established at the admission of the oath,⁵ then the oath-taker and his oath-helpers

¹ The general levy was called against the rebellious “Saxons” (privileged German settlers of Transylvania); it was, as usual, commanded by the king personally.

² Medieval Hungarian texts usually speak of partes Transylvanae, i.e., Transylvanian parts of the kingdom, for the region between the forested mountains in the east of the Hungarian plain and the eastern and southern Carpathians was seen as enjoying only limited autonomy. We nevertheless translate the term simply as Transylvania.

³ Oaths remained the most significant formal proof even after the legal reforms of King Charles. However, they were now based on the written evidence presented in the early stages of the trial. The most usual way for a defendant of acquitting himself of a charge was to take the “purging” oath (compurgatio). Depending on the quantity and quality of evidence marshalled against the defendant, the judge decided whether a party was obliged to swear the oath alone or with a prescribed number of oath-helpers (compurgatores), who had to be “similar to him,” that is of the same estate. Originally (up to the mid-fourteenth century) the oath-helpers were also supposed to be material witnesses; who were in a position to prove the innocence of the defendant, later only their number and rank was relevant (see Hajnik, pp. 317 sqq.). In cases involving estates or other valuables, the number of oath-helpers was decided by the value of the case: the oath of a prelate or baron was worth 10 Marks, that of a noble 5 Marks, of a tenant peasant a quarter Mark.

⁴ The text of the oath that was to be repeated was read aloud by the man of the chapter or convent or by the king’s bailiff, both also serving as witnesses to the procedure (see Hajnik, p. 336). The necessity of precise pronunciation of oaths—and default for failure to use the exact wording—is typical of archaic legal proceedings. This practice remained in force for centuries and royal bailiffs were admonished to read the oath slowly, especially in cases involving extensive statements under oath (Hajnik, p. 339, n. 64; cf. Tripartitum Pars III, tit. 39). An exact parallel, for example, may be drawn with the legis actiones of early Roman law, wherein exact statement (and repetition) of the oaths, and so on, was required for proper procedure; Gaius Institutiones 4.11–2 (see, e.g., Joseph Antony Charles Thomas, Textbook of Roman Law [Amsterdam: North Holland], 1976, pp. 73sq.). The repetition of a “failed” oath, as allowed by this law, seems to have been permitted only—according to a decision of Voivode Thomas of 1342, see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 8/4:620—if the swearer did not move his hand from the altar, that is, in modern terms, “while still under oath.”

⁵ Text, date and circumstances of the oath were decided by the judge; it was usual to swear the oath in the church of the chapter or convent, as place of authentication, except the oath on the soil, which was to be sworn in a pit (grave) dug at the border of the disputed property, and the swearer had to speak the oath, dressed in burial cloths, with a clog of earth held above his head; the oath-helpers stood around the pit. On

would be considered to be perjurers and to have failed the oath and lost the case. Nor are the oath-takers permitted to repeat and state again the very words and the same items, if, in swearing the oath, they contaminated the oath by varying the wording or if they were unable to repeat word for word the language and specific items⁶ prescribed at the admission to the oath. Thus, many litigants have hitherto been convicted unfairly and contrary to justice, some in their person, some in their estates, and not a few in all of their goods. Therefore, these same prelates and nobles and especially the venerable father Lord Henry, by the grace of God bishop of Veszprém, chancellor of the court of the Lady Queen, our dearest consort⁷ and our well-loved and faithful subject, besought us humbly that we should deign to make just and proper provision from royal benevolence, concerning these matters. And so we, who have undertaken the governance, are obligated relieve the complaints of our subjects and to govern them under the rule of law and justice, considering that the inhabitants of the realm⁸ and especially the people of the church and bishopric of Veszprém are improperly and scandalously oppressed on the pretext of this type of abusive custom, with the advice and consent of the prelates and our barons, we have decided, after careful deliberation, to abolish this sort of practice, and we decree that those swearing or taking an oath, plaintiff as well as defendant,⁹ together with their oath-helpers, should take their oaths by a brief and concise speaking of words, according to the model form written below:

Peter, the plaintiff, testifying against Martin the defendant, should say these words: I, Peter, swear on my soul, so help me God, that in these things of which I have accused him at law Martin has offended against me, or, alternately, the defendant owes me money which sought from him at law. And let a similar oath be sworn in other cases.

Then, Martin, the defendant, testifying against Peter, the plaintiff, should say these words: I, Martin, swear on my soul, so help me God, that I am innocent and guiltless of these things of which Peter has accused me at law, or, alternately, I do not owe him any amount of money. And this, see Márta Belenyesy, “Le serment sur la terre au moyen age et ses traditions posterieures en Hongrie,” Acta Ethnographica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 4 (1955) 361–394.

⁶ The text has articuli, but the term “articles” came to be used for “articles of law”; hence, we avoided it here.

⁷ Henry, (d. 1334), was bishop of Veszprém, chancellor of the queen 1323–34. The bishops of Veszprém held by ancient custom the office of chancellor of the queen. The tradition may have had its roots in the eleventh century when the queen’s residence was in Veszprém; the bishops of the same see usually also crowned the queens.

⁸ In this case, the word regnicola—that usually means the enfranchised nobility of the realm—is best translated in the more general sense, for the measures touch on the life of all subjects.

⁹ Though the oath was usually taken by the defendant, under certain circumstances the plaintiff, too, could prove his right by taking an oath “on the head” (ad caput) of his opponent, which, if performed successfully involved capital sentence; hence the name. Capital sentence (sententia capitalis) meant loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction. If physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. Oaths on the soil (see n. 5 above) (super terram) could also be taken by either party (see Hajnik, pp. 314 ff.).

the oath is to be similarly sworn in all cases.

Let it be stated that if they are unable to speak the words of the oath word for word by an identical recital of words, at least the important items should be stated in other words, provided that the sense is the same, and if anyone should fail in the recital of words or should mix them up in quoting, he should have the unimpeded opportunity of at once reiterating and repeating them a second and a third time. Therefore, we firmly command by royal edict the palatine, our judge royal, the ispáns and all the judges and justices of our kingdom, who currently and for the moment hold office of whatever dignity, honor, name, and title they might have, to whom these presents are shown, that they shall not in any way oppress the inhabitants of the realm of whatever station or condition and especially the people dependent on the church and bishopric of Veszprém residing in the counties Veszprém and Zala or elsewhere, contravening the prescriptions of our present edict and statute concerning the taking and receiving of oaths, but they are bound to observe unchanged the present edict and statute ... under the threat of capital punishment¹⁰ and the deprivation of their honor. Moreover, whoever would dare to contravene this edict should know that he will incur royal displeasure upon himself. Given on the feast of St. Lawrence, the martyr, the year of Our Lord one thousand three hundred and twenty-four.

¹⁰ See n. 9, above.

PRIVILEGE OF KING CHARLES I OF HUNGARY
31 October 1328

This charter, issued in form of a privilege for the nobles of County Szepes repeats the essence of the decree of 10 August 1324, but adds to it an important paragraph about seigneurial jurisdiction. According to this, all tenant peasants and landless servitors are subject to the court of their lord, save in cases of major criminal delicts. In a charter of 17 January 1332 (MNL OL DI. 87019) King Charles referred to this—or an unknown, similar—decision as having been passed by the barons, prelates and nobles of the kingdom. This text is the first explicit mention of the seigneurial jurisdiction in a decree. It was unknown until published in Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [=DRH].

MS.: Original on parchment; only a yellowish-pink string, passed through four holes, remains of the pendant seal. MNL OL DI. 38882.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

ED.: DRH, pp. 82–84.

LIT: Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899); Kamill Szoika, A földesúri bírászkodás az Árpádkori Magyarországon [Seigneurial jurisdiction in Árpadian Hungary] (Budapest: Faculty of Law, 1944) [German summary pp. 75–8].

PRIVILEGIUM 31 OCTOBRIS 1328

[C]arolus dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Gallitie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, princeps Sallernitanus et honoris Montis Sancti Angeli dominus. Omnibus Christi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris presentium notitiam habituris salutem in omnium salvatore. Ad petitiones fidelium tanto benignius regia debet condescendere celsitudo, quando id petitur, per quod regno prospicitur et corone. Proinde ad universorum notitiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod quia nobiles de comitatu Scepesiensi fideles nostri suo et omnium hominum cuiusvis status in eodem comitatu existentium nomine ad nostram accedentes presentiam nostre maiestati declararunt, ut inter ipsos talis calumpniosa consuetudo ymo potius quedam corruptela haberetur, ut cum quilibet alterum in causam coram quovis iudice attraxerit et quamvis suam litem per plurimos articulos et verborum multiplicationem contra eum proposuerit, tandem si cuiusquam partium litigantium iuramentum deponere adiudicatum extiterit ipsi plurimi et multiplicati articuli in iudicio propositi in depositione seu serie iuramenti parti iuramentum deponere debenti omnino seriatim comprehendere et repetere committerentur, in siquidem huius modi iuramenti plurimis articulis in lite propositis multiplicati depositione fere omnes convincerentur, petentes a nostra celsitudine humiliter supplicando, ut quandam formam moderatam iuramenti perpetuo stabilem sub verborum collecta et succincta prolatione ipsorum multiplicatorum sensum articulorum plene comprehendentium regia auctoritate statueremus, ne amplius per huius modi calumpniosam consuetudinem aliquibus periculum possit in depositione iuramenti evenire.

Nos igitur ex regia pietate de qua debet nasci iustitia singularis et subiectorum onera sublevare, petitioni dictorum fidelium nobilium aures benignas inclinantes et eam—quia iusta et legitima erat—diligenter ad effectum perducere cupientes una cum prelati et baronibus regni nostri nobiscum in partibus Transsilvanis cum valido exercitu existentibus decernentes cunctis iuramentum deponere debentibus hanc specificam et exemplarem formam despositionis iuramenti perpetuo observandam duximus statuendam, Quod si Paulus agens contra Nicolaum defendentem iurare debebit qualiscunque sit sua actio et per quemcunque iudicem regni nostri existat iudicata iuret in hec verba dicens: Deus me ita adiuvet, quod Nicolaus in his omnibus, que contra ipsum in iudicio proposui, mihi reus est vel tanta quantitate pecunie sue tali re tenetur.

Consequenter quidem quilibet de coniuratoribus suis dicat: Deus me ita adiuvet, quod Nicolaus in his omnibus, que Petrus in iudicio contra ipsum proposuit, reus est vel tanta quantitate pecunie seu tali re sibi tenetur.

Item e converso si Nicolaus defendens contra Petrum agentem seu actorem iurare debebit iuret isto modo dicens: Deus me ita adiuvet, quod in omnibus per Petrum in iudicio contra me obiectis inculpabilis sum vel nulla quantitate pecunie seu re teneor sibi aut tanta pecunia seu tali re teneor sibi.

Consequenter autem quilibet de suis coniuratoribus dicat: Deus me ita adiuvet, quod Nicolaus in his omnibus, que Paulus in iudicio contra ipsum proposuit inculpabilis est vel sibi in nulla quantitate pecunie seu re tenetur aut tanta pecunia tenetur.

Hoc specialiter declarato, quod si quis iurans vel aliquis de suis coniuratoribus linguam habens impeditam etiam prescriptam moderatam formam depositionis iuramenti per uniformem verborum prolationem dicere non posset, sed per alia verba eundem sensum compleverit, pro iurato habeatur vel si prima vice quisquam iurans vel eius coniurator suum iuramentum premissio modo deponere nequiverit, secunda vice et tertia non tamen pluries repetendi suum iuramentum liberam habeat facultatem.

Super eo quoque ipsis nobilibus nobis querelantibus, ut ipsorum iobagiones ad nostram seu palatini vel comitis parochialis aut iudicum nobilium presentiam citarentur, statuimus committentes, ut quilibet iobagiones habentes in omnibus causis exceptis causis furti, latrocinii vel violentie seu incendii contra quospiam ipsi iidem suos iobagiones debeant et possint iudicare et nullus valeat eos ad alterius iudicis presentiam evocare; qui tamen ex parte iobagionum suorum si cuiusquam in reddenda iustitia negligentes extiterint, non sui iobagiones, sed ipsi idem ad presentiam ordinarii iudicis sui evocentur eo facto.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales novi et autentici sigilli nostri duplicis munimine roboratas. Datum per manus discreti viri magistri Andree prepositi ecclesie Albensis aule nostre vicecancellarii dilecti et fidelis nostri anno Domini M^o CCCo vicesimo octavo pridie Kalendas Novembris, regni nostri anno similiter XX^o octavo venerabilibus in Christo patribus et dominis fratre Ladizlao Colocensi archiepiscopo et aule nostre cancellario, Mesko Nitriensi, Benedicto Chanadiensi, Nicolao Iauriensi, Georgio Sirmiensi, Ladizlao Quinqueecclesiensi, Iwanka Waradiensi, fratre Petro Boznensi, Laurentio Waciensi, Andrea Transsilvano, Henrico Wesprimiensi, Chanadino Agriensi, et Ladizlao Zagrabiensi episcopis ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus, magnificis viris Iohanne palatino et comite Simigiensi, Demetrio magistro tawarnicorum nostrorum, Thoma woiwoda Transsilvano, Mykch bano totius Sclavonie, Paulo iudice curie nostre, Dyonisio dapiferorum, Stephano agasonurn nostrorum magistris, magistro Willermo comite Scepesiensi, Nicolao comite Posoniensi et aliis quam pluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

PRIVILEGE OF OCTOBER 31 1328

Charles, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, prince of Salerno, and lord of the Honor of Monte Sant'Angelo,¹ to all the faithful of Christ, present as well as future, to whose notice these presents may come, greetings in the Savior of all. The royal eminence ought to respond to the petitions of his faithful subjects all the more kindly when the kingdom and the crown profit by what is requested. Therefore, we wish to notify everyone by these words that our faithful subjects, the nobles of the county of Szepes,² approached our presence in their own name and in that of all men of whatever station in the county. They declared to our majesty that among them such a scandalous practice or rather such a corrupt procedure existed that when someone hauled another before a judge in a lawsuit and laid out his charge against him openly and in many particulars and a great number of words, then, when finally an oath was judged to be taken by one of the litigant parties, these several and numerous items presented in the trial have to be completely understood and sequentially repeated when taking or speaking the oath by the party who has to take the oath. The result is that nearly everyone is convicted when the swearing of oaths is complicated by numerous items presented in a lawsuit.³ They, humbly beseeching our eminence, requested that we establish for all time by royal authority a simplified form of oath of a succinct and brief utterance fully containing the sense of these multiple items, lest by this kind of scandalous practice people taking the oath be exposed to further dangers.

¹ The full royal style was used in those charters which were issued in the form of a privilege and corroborated with great seal of majesty. The “kingdoms” listed here were part of the royal style of the Árpádian rulers from c. 1270; with the exception of the first three they constituted claims of Hungarian rulers to lands south of the Sava and the lower Danube or east of the Carpathian Mountains. On these, see, János M. Bak, “Lists in the Service of Legitimation in Central European Sources.” In: L. Doležalová ed. The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing. (Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), pp. 34–45. To these Charles I added in 1323 those of “Prince of Salerno” and “Lord of the Honor of Monte Sant’Angelo” which his successors continued to use until 1386. Both domains formed part of the kingdom of Sicily and the Hungarian branch of the Angevin dynasty claimed them as their paternal inheritance. All the time, however, the honor (i.e., the barony) of Monte Sant’Angelo, situated on the Adriatic coast on the promontory of Gargano (some 175 km east-northeast of Naples), remained in the possession of the Durazzo line of the Angevins. (See Emile G. Léonard, Les Angevins de Naples [Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1954], pp. 322, 376.)

² It is not known why this edict was requested by and issued for the nobles of county Szepes (Špis, German: Zips); today part of Slovakia and Poland.

³ Oaths remained the most significant formal proof even after the legal reforms of King Charles. However, they were now based on the written evidence presented in the early stages of the trial. The most usual way for a defendant of acquitting himself of a charge was to take the “purging” oath (compurgatio). Depending on the quantity and quality of evidence marshalled against the defendant, the judge decided whether a party was obliged to swear the oath alone or with a prescribed number of oath-helpers (compurgatores), who had to be “similar to him,” that is of the same estate. Originally (up to the mid-fourteenth century) the oath-helpers were also supposed to be material witnesses; who were in a position to prove the innocence of the defendant, later only their number and rank was relevant (see Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet pp. 317 sqq.). In cases involving estates or other valuables, the number of oath-helpers was decided by the value of the case: the oath of a prelate or baron was worth 10 Marks, that of a noble 5 Marks, of a tenant peasant a quarter Mark. The text of the oath that was to be repeated was read aloud by the man of the chapter or convent or by the king’s bailiff, both also serving as witnesses to the procedure (see Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet p. 336).

We, therefore, from royal compassion, from which particular justice in particular instances ought to arise and which ought to relieve the burdens of the subjects, incline benign ears to the petition of the said faithful nobles; and, since that petition was just and legitimate, we, sincerely desiring to fulfill it, decided, together with the prelates and barons of our kingdom who accompany us with a strong army in Transylvania, to decree for perpetual observance that all those who have to swear an oath should follow this specific and exemplary form of taking the oath.

That if Paul, suing Nicholas, the defendant, must swear an oath, whatever his suit may be and by whichever judge of our realm the oath is granted, he should swear in these words, saying: So help me God, that in all these things which I have affirmed against him at law, Nicholas is an offender against me, or owes me such and such an amount of money or such and such an item.

Subsequently anyone from among his oath-helpers should say: So help me God that in all these things which Peter⁴ has affirmed against him at law Nicholas is the offender, or owes him such and such an amount of money or such and such an item.

The necessity of precise pronunciation of oaths—and default for failure to use the exact wording—is typical of archaic legal proceedings. This practice remained in force for centuries and royal bailiffs were admonished to read the oath slowly, especially in cases involving extensive statements under oath (Hajnik.

p. 339, n. 64; cf. Tripartitum Pars III, tit. 39). An exact parallel, for example, may be drawn with the legis actiones of early Roman law, wherein exact statement (and repetition) of the oaths, and so on, was required for proper procedure; Gaius Institutiones 4.11–2 (see, e.g., Joseph Antony Charles Thomas, Textbook of Roman Law [Amsterdam: North Holland], 1976, pp. 73sq.). The repetition of a “failed” oath, as allowed by this law, seems to have been permitted only—according to a decision of Voivode Thomas of 1342, see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 8/4:620—if the swearer did not move his hand from the altar, that is, in modern terms, “while still under oath.” Text, date and circumstances of the oath were decided by the judge; it was usual to swear the oath in the church of the chapter or convent, of authentication, except the oath on the soil, which was to be sworn in a pit (grave) dug at the border of the disputed property, and the swearer had to speak the oath, dressed in burial cloths, with a clog of earth held above his head; the oath-helpers stood around the pit. Though the oath was usually taken by the defendant, under certain circumstances the plaintiff, too, could prove his right by taking an oath “on the head” (ad caput) of his opponent, which, if performed successfully involved capital sentence; hence the name. Capital sentence (sententia capitalis) meant loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction. If physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. Oaths on the soil (super terram) could also be taken by either party (see Hajnik, Bíróági szervezet pp. 338–73, here 314 ff; see also: Márta Belényesy, “Le serment sur la terre au moyen age et ses traditions posterieures en Hongrie,” Acta Ethnographica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 4 (1955) 361–394.

⁴ In the second and third of these model oaths, the scribe has unconsciously substituted one model Christian name (Peter) for the correct model (Paul). In the last oath, the scribe used again the name with which he began. These model names are, of course, based on the names of the apostles; they were used by Christian legal authors to replace the pagan model names (Lucius Titius, Numerius Nigidius, etc.) used in Roman legal texts (e.g., Gaius, Institutiones 2.216, 3.167, 4.40–41).

Then, on the other hand, if Nicholas, the defendant, must swear against Peter, who sues him as plaintiff, he should swear in this manner, saying: So help me God that in all these things which Peter cited against me at law I am faultless, or I owe him no amount of money, or owe only so much money, or such and such an item.

Subsequently anyone from among his oath-helpers should say: So help me God that in all these things which Paul cited against him at law, Nicholas is faultless, or he owes him no amount of money, or nothing, or owes only so much money.

Let it be explicitly stated that if anyone who takes an oath or any of his oath-helpers is hindered in his speech and is not able to say even the aforesaid reduced form of the deposition of the oath by uttering the selfsame words but has fulfilled the same meaning by other words, he is to be held to have sworn the oath, or if the first time anyone swearing or his oath-helper was not able to take the oath in the aforesaid manner, he should have leave to repeat his oath a second and a third time, but not more.

Concerning that other matter about which these nobles also complained to us, namely, that their tenant peasants⁵ were being summoned to our presence or to that of the palatine or of the ispán of the county or of the noble magistrates, we have decided to establish that all those having tenant peasants should themselves be allowed and obligated to judge their tenants in all cases except cases of theft, robbery, assault or arson committed against anyone, and no one shall have the right to summon them before another judge.⁶ However, anyone who should be negligent in rendering justice in regard to his tenant peasants, he himself and not his peasants is to be summoned about this to the presence of his justice ordinary.⁷

For the firm and perpetual memory of which we have granted our present letter of privilege validated by the affixing of our new and authentic double seal. Given by the hand of the prudent master Andrew, provost of the church of Székesfehérvár, vice-chancellor of our court, our beloved

⁵ Jobagio, the Latinized form of Hungarian jobbágy (translated as tenant peasant) referred to peasants living on plots owned by their landlord, owing dues in kind, money and some labor, but personally free and have the right to change lords. On the jurisdiction of the lord over their peasants, see next note.

⁶ As early as the thirteenth century, all landowners had the right and duty of administering justice to their peasants, free or unfree. Seigneurial courts (sedes dominalis or forum dominale, Hung.: úriszék), consisting probably of tenant jurors, were presided over by the lord or his steward. Their jurisdiction was initially limited by royal privilege: cases involving bloodshed could be terminated only before a royal judge or county magistrate, thus criminals sentenced to death or mutilation had to be delivered to them by the seigneur. Since the early fourteenth century, however, some major lords were granted royal privilege to pronounce final judgment in all cases and set up gallows on their estates as symbols of their right to high justice, and by the mid-fifteenth century this privilege, often referred to a “free comity” (Hung.: szabadispánság) or ius gladii was exercised by all substantial landowners. In 1405 Sigismund granted the same right to royal cities (see 15 April 1405/I:5). Cf. Szoika, A földesúri bíraskodás.

⁷ Judicial practice was governed by the general principle that cases were to be prosecuted before the judge of the defendant. The term justice ordinary (iudex ordinarius) usually refers to those judges who were authorized to administer justice to free persons from the royal judges (palatine, Judge Royal, Master of the Treasury) down to the ispáns and magistrates of the counties. See: Imre Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet pp. 45–7.

and faithful subject,⁸ in the year of the Lord one thousand three hundred twenty-eight, the day before the Kalends of November, in our regnal year likewise the twenty-eighth, when the following venerable fathers in Christ and lords felicitously governed the churches of God: friar Ladislás archbishop of Kalocsa and chancellor of our court,⁹ the bishops Meskó of Nitra,¹⁰ Benedict of Cenad,¹¹ Nicholas of Győr,¹² George of Srem,¹³ Ladislás of Pécs,¹⁴ Ivánka of Oradea,¹⁵ friar Peter of Bosnia,¹⁶ Lawrence of Vác,¹⁷ Andrew of Transylvania,¹⁸ Henry of Veszprém,¹⁹ Csanád of Eger,²⁰ and Ladislás of Zagreb,²¹ and when the honorable lords John, count palatine and ispán of Somogy,²² Demetrius Master of our Treasury,²³ Thomas voivode of Transylvania,²⁴ Mikcs ban of all Slavonia,²⁵ Paul our judge royal,²⁶ Denis the steward,²⁷ Stephen Master of our Horse,²⁸ master

⁸ Andrew, provost of Székesfehérvár, vice-chancellor of the king 1325–30

⁹ Ladislás (of Kábol, d. 1344), vice-chancellor of the king 1322–23, bishop of Zagreb 1326–43, archbishop of Kalocsa 1343–44

¹⁰ Mesko, duke of Tost in Upper Silesia (Piast), bishop of Nitra 1328–35, of Veszprém and chancellor of the queen 1335–43

¹¹ Benedict, bishop of Cenad 1309–32

¹² Nicholas (d. 1336), illegitimate issue of the clan Héder of Kőszeg, bishop of Győr 1308–36

¹³ George, bishop of Szerém 1313–33.

¹⁴ Ladislás of Kórógy, (d. 1346), bishop of Pécs 1314–46.

¹⁵ Ivánka, bishop of Oradea 1318–28.

¹⁶ Peter (friar, d. 1333), bishop of Bosnia 1317–33

¹⁷ Lawrence, bishop of Vác 1318–28

¹⁸ Andrew of Szécs, (d. 1356), bishop of Transylvania 1320–56.

¹⁹ Henry (d. 1334), bishop of Veszprém, chancellor of the queen 1323–34

²⁰ Csanád of Telegd, (d. 1349) bishop of Eger 1322–30, archbishop of Esztergom 1330–49.

²¹ Ladislás of Kábol, (d. 1344), vice-chancellor of the king 1322–23, bishop of Zagreb 1326–43, archbishop of Kalocsa 1343–44.

²² John Druget (d. 1333), count palatine 1328–33.

²³ Demetrius of Nekse, (d. 1338), master of the treasury 1316–38.

²⁴ Thomas of Szécsény (1299–1354) voivode of Transylvania 1321–42, judge royal 1349–54.

²⁵ Mikcs (or Michael, d.g. Akos, d. 1343), master of the queen's treasury 1323–25, ban of Slavonia 1325–43.

²⁶ Pál of Nagymarton ((1307–49), judge royal 1328–49.

²⁷ Denis, of Szécs (fl. 1312–41), master of the stewards 1322–41, also ban of Severin 1332–41.

²⁸ Lackfi, Stephen senior (son of Lack, d. 1353), master of the horse 1326–43, master of the treasury 1343–53, voivode of Transylvania 1344–50, ban of Croatia and Slavonia 1350–53.

William ispán of Špis,²⁹ Nicholas ispán of Pressburg³⁰ and many others holding counties and honors in our kingdom.³¹

²⁹ William Druget(fl. 1327–42) ispán of Szepes and other counties, 1334–42 count palatine.

³⁰ Miklós, Tretel, (fl.1319–53) ispán of Pozsony 1323–49

³¹ The list of dignitaries, as a kind of dating clause (not as witnesses to the action), appears regularly in Hungarian charters of privilege between the mid-thirteenth and the early fifteenth century, see Imre Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan [Hungarian diplomatics] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1930), pp. 104f.

CHARTER ON THE CAMERAL CONTRACT OF KING CHARLES I OF HUNGARY 1342

While not laws, the charters on the contracts of Kings Charles I and Louis I—according to the text, approved by the royal council—with the so-called counts of the chamber regulated matters of national importance and came to be regarded laws, included into several collections of decrees. Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, and Vera Bácskai, editors of the Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445 (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978) [= DRH] printed several of them. We decided to publish one, the perhaps most detailed, even if it is not a decretum in the strict sense of the term. Modern lawyers would characterize it as a private contract, only medieval “private” matters of rulers were in no ways separated from affairs of state.

The monetary reforms of King Charles began in 1323 (see DRH pp. 76–7), but did not lead to result until a decade later. In 1327, the king confirmed the practice of sharing the income of mines (urbura) with the landowners, which enhanced the exploration and exploitation of precious metal resources, see ibid. pp. 80–1. The first surviving contract with Master Hyppolit of Kremnica was signed on 26 March 1335 (see ibid., pp. 85–9). It was followed by contracts with Master Andrew in 1336 (see ibid., pp. 90–4) and Master Fricskó in 1338 (see ibid., 95–102). The contract of 1342 reflects those financial measures of Charles I that proved to be durable. Its content was not significantly changed in the contract between Louis I and Nicholas of Szatmár of 25 March 1345 (see ibid., pp. 118–23).

On the same day as the contract below, another was signed with Master Hyppolit. The editors of DRH used it (as variant B, ibid., pp. 116–7) to emend errors in the surviving text of the one with Master Andrew.

MS: Original on parchment with remnants of the great seal on the dorso, Primatial Archives, Esztergom, Arch. Saec. Acta rad. Lad. B; MNL OL DF 248 094

EDD: Gyula Szekfü, ed. “Oklevelek I. Károly pénzverési reformjához” [Records pertaining to the minting reform of Charles I], Történelmi Tár 1911, 24–35; Nándor Knauz, ed., Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis, vol. 3 (Esztergom: Horak, 1882) pp. 412–9; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1: 150–63; DRH pp. 106–15.

LIT: Bálint Hóman, Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325] (Budapest: MTA, 1916); Idem, A magyar királyság pénzügyei és gazdaságpolitikája Károly Róbert korában [Monetary affairs and economic policies of the kingdom of Hungary in the age of Charles Robert] (Budapest: Budavári Tudományos Társaság, 1921); Oszkár Paulinyi, “The Crown Monopoly of the Refining Metallurgy of Precious Metals and the Technology of the Cameral Refineries in Hungary and Transylvania in the Period of Advanced and Late Feudalism (1325–1700), with Data on the Output,” in: Precious Metals in the Age of Expansion, Hermann Kellenbenz, ed. (Stuttgart: Klett-Cotta, 1981); Boglárka, Weisz A nemesércbányákból származó királyi jövedelmek az Árpád-korban [Royal income from precious metal in the Árpadian age] in: Középkortörténeti tanulmányok 5. Éva Révész, Miklós Halmágyi, eds. (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 2007) 247–259; Csaba Tóth, “Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation in Hungary in the Árpadian and Angevin Periods (1000–1387)” in József Laszlovszky et al. eds., The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) 279–94; Zoltán Batizi, “Mining in Medieval Hungary” in: Ibid. 166–81.; Márton Gyöngyössi, Heinz Winter, Münzen und Medaillen des ungarischen Mittelalters. 1000–1526. Michael Alram und Heinz Winter, eds., Sammlungskataloge des Kunsthistorischen Museums Band 4. / Münzkabinett. Kataloge der mittelalterlichen Münzen und Medaillen (Vienna: Kunsthistorisches Museum, 2007).; Boglárka Weisz, “Entrate reali e politica economica nell’età di Carlo I” in: L’Ungheria angioina. Enikő Csukovits ed. (Rome: Viella, 2013) 205–236; Eadem: “L’organisation financière de la Hongrie angevine : institutions et personnes” in: Périphéries financières Angevines. Institutions et pratiques de l’administration de territoires composites (XIIIe-XVe siècle). Serena Morelli, ed. (École française de Rome, 2018). (<http://books.openedition.org/efr/3547>)

Nos Karolus dei gratia rex Hungarie memorie commendantes tenore presentium quibus expedit universis significamus, quod nos prelatorum et baronum regni nostri voto unanimi et de consilio eorundem, considerata sagaci industria magistri Endre Chempeliny, comitatus camerarum nostrarum de Syrmia et de Quinqueecclesiis cum omnibus comitatibus, districtibus, civitatibus, villis et opidis, qui et que ab antiquo ad easdem cameras dinoscuntur pertinuisse, scilicet cum comitatibus Syrmienti, Bachyensi, de Wolkow et de Bodrugh, item de Baranya, Symigiensi, Tholnensi et Zaladiensi eidem magistro Endre pro mille et quingentis marcis, partim in florensis seu aureis denariis camere nostre Bude censis et cudendis, partim vero in integris camere nostre monetis annorum preteriti, tertii, quarti et presentis, per totum nostrum uniformiter discurrendis et per preteriti anni modum tam per ipsum, quam per alios regni nostri camerarios ampliandis, nobis in terminis infrascriptis persolvendis, anno domini millesimo CCC^{mo} XL^{mo} secundo a data presentium per anni circulum simulcum decimis archiepiscopalibus dedimus iterato et locavimus ad exercendum, procurandum et tenendum isto modo:

I. Quod idem magister Endre faciet fabricari integros denarios camere nostre argenteos vere combustionis tertie, ad modum et formam ac valitudinem denariorum annorum preteriti, tertii et quarti, eosdem ampliando in vera et recta combustione tertia, ex quibus de una marca fini argenti duodecim pense incidentur, et octo pense ex eisdem et non plures unam marcam ponderis Budensis in statera ponderabunt et current pro marca fini argenti in montanis.

II. Qui quidem denarii nostri integri cambientur per hunc modum: quod ipse comes camere vel sui officiales in singulis foris civitatum et liberarum villarum nostrarum regalium et reginalium ac quorumlibet aliorum presentibus hominibus archiepiscopi Strigoniensis, magistri tawarnicorum et comitis parochialis ac uno iudice nobilium, sub testimonio alicius capituli in eisdem foris ipsos denarios camere ampliandos et multiplicandos publice super tabula sua exponere debeant et tres ex eisdem denariis pro quatuor latis Wyenensibus vel aliis camere nostre monetis quinti anni iam abolitis aut etiam in aliis precedentibus annis fabricatis, combustionem Wyenensium habentibus cambientur, et sex ex eisdem tam denariis novis, quam annorum preteriti, tertii et quarti camere monetis, quia ipsos annorum preteriti, tertii et quarti camere denarios in suo esse cursu et cambio remanere volumus, pro grosso, et octo pense ac sedecim denarii pro marca pagamenti absque aliquali augmentatione ubique currant et solvantur.

III. Si qui vero iam dictas monetas nostras annorum preteriti, tertii et quarti veras et etiam hoc anno pro earundem ampliatione in eodem valore fabricandas in numero augmentantes reperti fuerint, tamquam transgressores regalium nostrorum mandatorum et statuta camere infringentes in rebus et personis per ipsum comitem camerarum nostrarum puniantur nostra auctoritate mediante.

IV. Item si leviores denarii in istis presentibus, preteriti, tertii et quarti annorum camere monetis vel peioris combustionis plures quam octo pense et tres vel quatuor denarii marcam ponderantes apud quemcunque, sive in civitatibus, sive in aliis locis, seu etiam circa suos officiales, aut numerum marcarum augmentantes ubicunque invenirentur, tamquam falsarii nostra auctoritate puniantur.

V. Propter quod volumus et committimus, ut in cunctis civitatibus et locis publicis statera cum suis ponderibus semper habeatur et servetur ad evitandum, quod mercatores vel alii forenses, aut etiam quicunque ex civibus et hospitibus iuxta abusivam eorum consuetudinem et fraudem graviores denarios ipsius monete camerarumstrarum annorum presentis, preteriti, tertii et quarti non possint eligere vel diminuire per incisiones.

VI. Istud tamen pro multiplicatione earundem monetarum camere nostre, maxime et specialissime cum ipso comite camerarumstrarum iuxta suam spontaneam obligationem et nostram omnimodam intentionem volumus et committimus, ut in cunctis locis camerarum, in quibus monete camerarum cudi solent, nunc in principio ad minus mille marcas idem camerarius fabricari faciat cambio exponendas, qui si facere neglexerit, tamquam nos seducens et regnicolas nostros decipiens remanebit.

VII. Item ordinavimus, quod abhinc unusquisque campsores denariorum, ut soliti fore dicuntur, per se servare cesset omnino et desistat. Si enim aliquos ex eisdem campsoribus in detrimentum camerarum servare et habere ipse comes camerarum sciverit et in presentia hominum dominorum archiepiscopi Strigoniensis et magistri tawarnicorum triumque aliorum predictorum et unum eisdem invenerit, nedum ipsi campsores, verum etiam ipsi domini eorum in ablatione rerum et bonorum ipsorum punientur et dehonestabuntur in personis.

VIII. Item florenus seu aureus denarius camere pro nonaginta denariis integris camere nostre ampliandis semper absque augmentatione et refutatione ubique acceptetur et cambiatur.

IX. Item una marca auri ponderis Budensis duodecim karatorum cambitur cum septem marcis ipsorum denariorum camere cum eodem pondere Budensi, levando in statera.

X. Et nullus possit cambire aurum vel argentum cum pecunia numerata, sed debeat cambire in camera regali cum eisdem denariis camere ampliandis levando in statera. Si qui autem secus fecisse vel facere reperti fuerint, pena condecienti tamquam transgressores regalis mandati et statuta camerarum infringentes puniantur.

XI. Ceterum statuimus, ut nullus omnino hominum cum aliquibus antiquis monetis aut auro vel argento, in specie et specialiter cum parvis et etiam mediocribus Wyenensibus, quorum omnimodam extirpationem volumus et committimus, preterquam cum ipsis monetis camerarumstrarum mercandi habeat facultatem, alioquin emptores et venditores suas res et bona perdent et dehonestabuntur in personis.

XII. Preterea nullus mercator extraneus vel huius regni superveniens palam vel occulte in domibus aut camera suas res et bona, tam in pannis, quam in alii generis et speciei rebus, pro aliis monetis antiquis, cuiuslibet forme, auro vel argento, vendere aut commutare presummat, sed pro monetis camere predictis; de noticia tamen et ad scitum comitis camerarum aut predictorum hominum domini archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum ac aliorum dum ad locum depositionis ad vendendum vel commutandum devenerit, vendendi habeat facultatem. Si qui autem secus facientes et exercentes per ipsum comitem camerarum vel suos officiales reperti seu per eosdem deprehensi fuerint, res venditioni tam in pannis, quam in aliis rebus expositas et pro venditis rebus receptas perdant et puniantur in personis. Et nedum illi, qui per se et sua propria ;auctoritate contra ordinationem camerarum nostrarum et nostram voluntatem aurum vel argentum in specie, preterquam in aureis vel argenteis novis denariis exportantes inventi fuerint, ablatione eorundem et dehonestatione personarum suarum puniantur. Verum etiam et si sub sigillis vel signis camerariorum huiusmodi aurum vel argentum quoquam extra regnum deferendum fuerit inventum, et si camerarii alios, ad exportandum aurum vel argentum admiserint, iidem comites camerarum, quorum signa vel sigilla in ipso auro vel argento apposita invenientur, tamquam falsarii et transgressores regalium mandatorum puniuntur.

XIII. Hoc tamen in presenti articulo specialiter expresso, quod comites camerarum nostrarum, sub quorum iurisdictione montana habentur et existunt, pro comparando plumbo et aliis evidentibus necessariis camerarum et montanarum, sine suorum copia minere auri et argenti minime videntur posse procurari, ad notitiam eorundem hominum domini archiepiscopi et aliorum, si tamen evidens necessitas id requirit, de auro vel argento tantum a.d comparisonem premissorum habebunt transmittendi facultatem.

XIV. Item sub cuiuscunque comitis camerarum comitatu vel provinciis presens nostra moneta ex mala procuracione falsificata fuerit, et discurrere ac habundare ceperit, ipseque comes camerarum eandem falsam monetam captivare et anichilare non procuraverit, ipsi comiti camerarum sic imputabitur, ac si in locis camerarum suarum ipsa falsa moneta fuisset fabricata. Si autem ipse comes camerarum ad compessendum eosdem falsarios de eorum malitiosis operibus propriam alicubi non habuerit facultatem, extunc idem camerarius sub testimoniis , predictorum quinque hominum, veritate de eorundem falsariorum maleficiis indagata et recepta, eosdem falsarios nobis et nostris baronibus ac regno nominatim deberit declarare et nos pro extirpatione eorundem solliciti tenebitur incitare.

XV. Item quia volumus, ut presens moneta nostra tertie combustionis amplianda per totum regnum nostrum immutabiliter possit perpetuari et habundari, et ipsi denarii camere nostre annorum preteriti, tertii et quarti unacum eisdem novis pariter debeant discurrere et acceptari, statuentes ordinavimus et committimus, ut :in quolibet comitatu de singulis portis, per quas currus cum feno vel frugibus honeratus intrare potest et exire, sive sub eadem porta seu curia portam habente tres vel quatuor, aut etiam plures existant homines residentes, sive solum unus commoretur in eadem, nisi in tantum sit egens et pauper, ut solvendi non habeat facultatem, quos videlicet prememorati quinque homines archiepiscopi et aliorum iuxta ipsorum conscientiam solvere posse cognoverint et commiserint, ac domini terre sibi solutionem facere posse vel non posse iuramento suo dixerint, exceptis servis et conditionariis nostrorum regalium et reginalium, ecclesiarum ac aliorum quorumlibet, necnon exercituantibus servientibus dominorum terre, quos ipsi iuramento eorum exceperint et iidem quinque homines, scilicet domini archiepiscopi et aliorum fore exercituantes investigando sciverint, et eciam exceptis ecclesiis, civitatibus vel aliis evidenti privilegiata libertate fultis, facta dicatione infra quintumdecimum diem decem et octo denarius predictae camere nostre pro lucro camere ipsi comiti camerarum dare et solvere teneantur. Tali tamen expressione mediante, quod ubi et in quibus comitatibus aut regni nostri partibus porte tum ex consuetudine non habentur, tum etiam propter defectum lignorum fieri non potuerint, inibi et ipsi tales predictum lucrum camere, secundum quod in aliis temporibus, iuxta tamen dispositionem et conscientiosam ordinationem predictorum quinque hominum infra idem tempus solvere tenebuntur.

XVI. Civitates autem et alii regnicole nostri predictam evidentem libertatem habentes a solutione lucri camere taliter sint exempti, si tamen ipsas monetas camere nostre in tenetis ipsorum et inter eos ac iobagiones eorundem acceptari faciendo continuum cursum et cambium earundem voluerint facere et exercere; sin autem, non per nos, sed per se ipsos libertates eorum infringentur et sic ad solutionem eiusdem lucri camere sicut alii regnicole nostri, sic et ipsi, dummodo hoc, ut ipsa moneta nostra per eos non fuerit acceptata, nec inter ipsos et ad eos pertinentes cambiari curata fuerit, ad relationem quinque hominum predictorum, videlicet dornini archyepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum ac comitis parochialis, unius iudicis nobilium et alicuius capituli nobis pateat evidenter, tenebuntur.

XVII. Ita tamen, quod quivis camerariorum ad singulos comitatus sue camere sufficientes denarios camere nostre pro multiplicatione dictorum modernorum denariorum nostrorum ad scitum et notitiam eorundem quinque hominum in tanta habundantia, quod ipse comitatus de ipsis contentetur, dare debeat cambio exponendos, qui si non faceret, aut ipsos nostros denarios in tam larga copia cambio exponere non curaret, illic et in illis comitatibus iura sua perdendo nec dicam faciendi, nec lucrum camere exigendi habeat facultatem.

XVIII. Solventibus autem in quolibet comitatu unus locus communis et conveniens pro dicta solutione deputetur, et si qui presentes pre multitudine solventium aut aliquo impedimento alio prepediti die assignato solvere non possent, absque aliquo gravamine quatuor diebus continuis expectentur, nec infra ipsos quatuor dies integros, si solutionem fecerint, possint aggravari.

XIX. Hoc expresso, quod iidem comites camere ipsum lucrum camere ratione cambii signater impositum non aliter, videlicet cum Wyenensibus aut aliquibus antiquis denariis vel grossis per formam compositionis aut alicuius alterius coloris cautela, nisi cum ipsis integris denariis camere nostre ampliandis exigere tenebuntur; et quod universos denarios antiquos aut Wyenenses grossos, tam Bohemicales, quam Racenses et alios, cuiuscunque forme existant, exceptis solummodo presentibus integris denariis camere nostre perpetuo currere statutis comburrere et infundere ac in formam modernorum denariorum nostrorum redigi facere pro multiplicatione eorundem teneantur, conditione tali, quod si qui facta dicatione in termino assignato lucrum camere non persolverent, tunc iidem quinque homines ad possessionem, de qua ipsum lucrum camere non est persolutum, accedant, et tamdiu moram ibi faciant absque destructione et spoliatione possessionaria, in expensa moderata eiusdem possessionis, donec ipsum lucrum camere cum iudicio trium marcarum persolvatur.

XXII. Si vero populi vel domini villarum non solventium lucrum camere prenotate preterito termino solutionis dictis hominibus in officio camere procedentibus cum pecunia debita et iudicio ordinato extra villam obviarent placaturi, extunc ipsi executores negotiorum camere in talibus villis descensum facere non valeant aliqualem.

XXI. Comites autem parochiales et iudices nobilium favore vel pretio corruptos iustitiam camere celantes et homines de dicta solutione deferendentes vel quoquo modo contra nostram ordinationem procedentes, dummodo contra ipsos hoc evidenter possit comprobari, penis non solventium decrevimus puniendos.

XXII. Et quia promissimus seriem omnium premissorum inviolabiliter observare, volumus, ut iidem comites camerarumstrarum immutabiliter in premissis perseverent, E converso nec remedio aliquarum litterarum post emanationem presentium confectarum aut acquisita aliqua astutia quicquam immutare queant de singulis premissorum. Quia si qui contra hoc facere ex ipsis comitibus camerarum attemptarent, dictos quinque homines, sine quorum iuvamine lucrum camere exigendi nolumus eos habere facultatem, a societate ipsorum auctoritate presentium iubemus separari. Nam hanc dicam non pro exactione antiquarum monetarum aut Wyenensium, sed pro ampliacione monetarum camere nostre perpetuo discurrere in toto regno nostro ordinarum duximus disponendam.

XXIII. Item volumus, quod dicti comites camere nostre absque predictis quinque hominibus in negotiis camere exterioribus seu extraneis, videlicet in comitatibus fiendis et peragendis, utpote in dicationibus et exactionibus lucri camere nichil possint exercere. Si vero ausu temerario contra hoc procederent et in hoc malum aliquid paterentur, merito patientur et sustinebunt.

XXIV. Item si comitibus camere et suis sequacibus aut cum eo procedentibus violentiam quipiam inferrent manifeste, tales secundum qualitatem et quantitatem delicti puniantur.

XXV. Civitatenses vero sub comitatu et iurisdictione eorundem comitatum camere existentes iuxta presentem taxationem nostram et baronum nostrorum certam sumpmam pecunie de predictis monetis camere ampliandis similiter infra pretacti temporis spatium pro argento cambire vel finationem eiusdem monete camere in eisdem denariis camere ampliandis dare et solvere teneantur, videlicet Zalankemen ducentas et quadraginta marcas, item Zemlyn quindecim, item Zenthdemeter quinquaginta, item Engh sexaginta, item Noghaloz viginti quinque, item Eztyen triginta, item Segusd, Aranyas, Labaad et Chehy cum suis pertinentiis centum, item Peech quadraginta marcas modo predicto cambire teneatur; ita videlicet, quod aut ipsi civitatenses receptis ipsis quantitibus pecunie nove monete camere pro qualibet marca octo pensas in statera ponderanti unam marcam fini argenti, vel saltim nichil recipiendo combustionem seu finationem singularum marcarum ipsius monete, videlicet de singulis marcis super ipsos impositis singulas quatuor pensas predictarum monetarum, quarum octo pense marcam ponderant, dare debeant. Si qua autem civitatum negligens fuerit in solvendo, predicti executores negotiorum camere in medio talis civitatis tamdiu permanebunt, quosque cum gravamine duodecim marcarum solutionem faciet prenotatam, in expensa tamen eiusdem civitatis moderata cum adiutorio iudicis et iuratorum eiusdem civitatis.

XXVI. Hoc declarato, quod quilibet nobilis super solutione lucri camere litteras expeditorias a comite camerarum pro uno grosso redimere, licet plures habeat possessiones, teneatur.

XXVII. Item statuimus, quod in quibuslibet solitis locis camere in civitatibus debeat fieri domus regalis, ad quam omnes homines aurum et argentum ad vendendum, comburrendum et cambiendum defferre teneantur, et si palam vel occulte alias comburrere, vendere vel commutare presumpserint et in hoc reperti fuerint, per eundem comitem camerarum omnia bona sua presentibus supradictis testimoniis auferantur et insuper ut infideles puniantur.

XXVIII. Volumus etiam, ut nullus alias preterquam in domo regia aurum, quot karatorum fiat, probare debeat, sed camerarius debeat examinare in domo regia et ponere karatos et signo nostro regio inprimi faciat et consignari. Contra hoc autem presumptentes per eundem comitem camerarum predicta pena iussimus puniendos.

XXIX. Ceterum statuimus, ut nullus mercator aut quilibet alter ultra duas marcas denariorum ad montana secum defferre presummat pro expensis. Si autem ipse comes camerarum vel sui officiales apud tales ultra duas marcas reperient in denariis, auferant bona sua universa et puniant eum in persona presentibus testimoniis supradictis.

XXX. Et ut camerariorum nostrorum iustitia appareat in denariis fabricandis, statuimus, ut quilibet eorum in ipsorum monetis signum habeat, per quod moneta per ipsum fabricata cognoscatur.

XXXI. Ceterum volumus, ut ipse comes camerarum monetarios vel cutores denariorum ubique in civitatibus aut in villis invenire poterit et eosdem captivare voluerit, tunc iudex, iurati et universitas civitatis vel ville, in qua reperti fuerint, ad requisitionem ipsius comitis camere vel eius officialium ipsos monetarios captivare et ad manus comitis camerarum teneantur assignare. Si qui autem secus fecerint, eadem pena, qua monetarii contumaces sunt plectendi, puniantur.

XXXII. Item ipse comes camerarum nostrarum in civitatibus nostris, ubi monete nostre fabricantur, debet habere duo scrinia, in quorum uno ferramenta formalia sub sigillis hominum dominorum archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum conserventur, in altero vero virgule pro monetis fuse, absque monetis novis, sub sigillis tribus et clavibus tribus eorundem trium hominum, videlicet archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum ac eiusdem camerarii debent conservari et semper in presentia hominum ipsorum archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum apperiantur, nec possint aliquo ipsorum absente aperiri vel opera monetarum exerceri. Ita, quod si idem comes camerarum nostrarum ipsis duobus testibus absentibus vel aliquo ipsorum absente fractis clavibus et sigillis monetas faceret fabricari, per ipsum magistrum tawarnicorum tamquam falsarius puniatur, dummodo hoc iidem homines domini archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum fateantur.

XXXIII. Specialiter dum funditur argentum, omnes personaliter interesse debeant et singulis septimanis ipsos novos denarios nostros ipsi homines domini archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum in combustionem quadraginta eorundem denariorum novorum debeant examinare, et sic iidem novi denarii cambio exponantur.

XXXIV. Item cutores denariorum et fabricatores in eisdem nostris civitatibus commorantes, ne ipse comes camerarum nostrarum pro falsis monetis inculpetur, sub potestate et iurisdictione eiusdem remanebunt. Ceterum antiqua libertate camerarum nostrarum requirente statuimus, ut omnes servientes et officiales ac monetarios ipse comes camere nostre et non alter debeat iudicare; et si ipse ex parte quorum iustitiam dare neglexerit, magister tawarnicorum nostrorum predictus iustitiam facere teneatur quibuscunque querulantibus de eisdem.

XXXV. Item pro ampliatione earundem monetarum camerarum nostrarum statuimus, ut universi ecclesiarum prelati decimas et debita ac quosvis redditus ac etiam cuncti regni nostri barones et nobiles alique cuiusvis status homines ipsorum proventus universos, scilicet tributa, terragia et quasvis collectas a quibuscunque ipsorum debitoribus et jobagionibus, tributariis et officialibus cum ipsis monetis camere nostre aut florenis recipere et exigere facere teneantur, dummodo ipsi denarii camere nostre in tanta copia cudantur, ut omnes debitores sua debita cum ipsis denariis camere persolvendi habeant facultatem. Nos autem promittentes assumptimus universas nostras collectas regales et reginales per totum regnum nostrum, specialiter tributa nostra et tricesimas nostras exigere facere et recipere cum eisdem.

XXXVI. Item si qui contra ipsum comitem camerarum nostrarum ratione iniuriarum seu dampnorum aut nocumentorum personis camerariorum nostrorum in officio procedentibus illorum ad nostram vel magistri tawarnicorum presentiam citati fuerint, in primo termino, absque ulteriori dilatione, dante iustitia ipsa causa finaliter debeat terminari. Quicunque autem comitem camere nostre predictum ordine iudiciario in causam attraxerit, prelibatus magister tawarnicorum nostrorum ex parte eiusdem iustitiam faciet nostra auctoritate mediante.

XXXVII. Hoc etiam ordinavimus, ut de quibuslibet rebus et bonis ipsarum camerarum nostrarum ubicunque in terra et in aquis per earundem officiales deferendis nullum tributum exigatur.

XXXVIII. Preterea de qualibet marca unum pondus ad rationem denariorum ratione conservationis ferramentorum homini eiusdem archiepiscopi omni die operis, et dimidius ferto homini ipsius magistri tawarnicorum preter sumpmam conventionis nostre regalis persolvatur. 'Si vero ipse comes camere nostre quolibet die operis de singulis marcis cusi singula pondera denariorum et dictos dimidios fertones premissa modo persolvere recusaverit vel dilationem facere homines ipsius domini archiepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum ferramenta formalia includendi habeant facultatem.

XXXIX. Item aule nostre vicecancellario idem comes camere nostre proventus ab antiquo consuetos, videlicet triginta marcas in terminis solutionum subscriptarum, salvis proventibus notariorum remanentibus, plene dare et solvere teneatur.

XL. Hoc etiam adiecto, quod iniurias et dampna officialibus camerarum per quoscunque irrogata prefatus magister tawarnicorum prosequatur et emendet. De falsariis autem et eorum fautoribus antiquam regni nostri consuetudinem volumus observari.

XLI. Item statuimus, ut comites parochiales quorumlibet comitatuum non plus, quam tres marcas octo pensarum nove monete nostre a comitibus camerarum nostrarum petere vel recipere ratione fororum presumptant. Nobiles autem vel cuiusvis alterius status homines fora habentes pretextu fororum ipsorum ab eisdem camerariis quicquam petere vel recipere non presumptant.

XLII. Volumus etiam quod tam magister tawarnicorum suos dimidios fertones, quam dominus archyepiscopus sua pondera quibuscumque vendere non possint et locare; quod si fecerint, hiis iuribus ipsorum priventur.

XLIII. Preterea iidem archyepiscopus et magister tawarnicorum tales homines in prosequendis negotiorum camerarum transmittant, qui possessiones habeant, et si demerita eorum requirerent, perdere habeant.

XLIV. Item comites camerarum nostrarum, qui anno sequenti cameras nostras conducere voluerint, in die Strennarum venturo de predictis suis debitis rationem nobis personaliter reddendo conducant.

XLV. Item quia superius tetigimus, ut prefati quinque homines executores negotiorum camere super civitates huic nostre ordinationi rebellantes lucrum camere in expensa moderata commorando, cum subsidio iudicum et iuratorum earundem civitatum plene exigere cum gravamine iudicii duodecim marcarum et eisdem comitibus camerarum nostrarum plenarie persolvi facere teneantur, ideo volumus, ut si ipsi iudices et iurati presenti nostro mandato obedire recusarent, extunc ipsum lucrum camere non solum plene et dictum iudicium duodecim marcarum cum dupplo persolvere teneantur.

XLVI. Exprimentes etiam, quod quecumque res et bona ratione non observationis aliquorum articulorum premissorum et transgressionis mandati nostri regalis seu violationis statuti camere a quibuscumque personis hominum et quibuscumque locis auferentur, in tres partes debeant dividi coequales, quarum due partes ipsi comiti camerarum, tertia vero pars in manus predictorum hominum domini archyepiscopi et magistri tawarnicorum debeant provenire.

XLVII. Item de quibuscumque marcis pro lucro camere in quibuscumque comitatibus dicatis et exactis unum grossum seu unum pondus homini domini archyepiscopi, alium vero grossum seu pondus homini magistri tawarnicorum dare et solvere tenebitur comes camerarum predictarum.

XLVIII. Istud tamen expresse volumus, quod si ipse comes camerarum nostrarum ipsam monetam camere nostre in locis solitis camere cudendo habundanter fabricari non fecerit, et ipse solum ad dicam et exactionem lucri eiusdem camere se dissimulando commiserit, extunc ipse talis, tamquam nos seducens et regni nostri deceptor seu mendax contra nostram maiestatem convincatur,

XLIX. Ut autem idem comes camerarum memoratam sumpnam pecunie mille et quingentarum marcarum nobis facilius solvere possit, ordinantes decrevimus, ut in octavis festi Nativitatis beati Johannis Baptiste trecentas et septuaginta quinque marcas, item in octavis Nativitatis beate virginis similiter trecentas et septuaginta quinque marcas et modo simili trecentas et septuaginta quinque marcas in octavis festi beati Martini, residuas vero trecentas et septuaginta quinque marcas in octavis diei Strennarum nunc venturis ultimam solutionem faciendo, in terminis sese invicem subsequentibus nunc venturis, hic in Wysegrad cum monetis prenotatis modo premissis solvere nobis tenebitur. Penam duppli incurrat, si aliquem terminorum premissorum obmiserit insolutum. Datum in Wysegrad in festo Purificationis beate virginis, anno domini supradicto.

2 FEBRUARY 1342

We, Charles, by the grace of God king of Hungary, make known to all to whom it may concern by entrusting it to memory through the contents of these presents that having carefully considered the keen diligence of master Andrew of Csempelény¹ with the unanimous agreement and counsel of the prelates and barons of our realm, we have granted and farmed to the same master Andrew the office of count of ers² of Srem and of Pécs, with all the counties, districts, cities, villages, and towns which are knoour chambwn to have belonged to these same chambers from ancient times, that is, with the counties Srem, Becs, Valkó, Bodrog, as well as Baranya, Somogy, Tolna, and Zala, together with the archiepiscopal tithes³ to handle, manage, and hold in the one thousand, three hundred and forty-second year of our Lord from the date of the present time for a whole year for one thousand and five hundred marks⁴ to be paid out to us at the following terms, partly in florins, namely, gold pennies of our chamber, minted or to be minted in our mint at Buda,⁵ partly in full-weight money⁶ of the past four years⁷ and of the present year that are to be circulated in our entire (realm) just as they were circulated by him, as well as by other cameral counts of our realm in the past year, in the following way:

¹ Andrew of Csempelény was one of the few ethnic Hungarians among the so-called counts of the chamber; see W. von Stromer, "Die ausländischen Kammergrafen der Stefanskronen," Hamburger Beiträge zur Numismatik 16 (1973/5) pp. 85-106.

² The count of the chamber (comes camerae) was an officer in charge of the mint, the customs, and the administration of the royal salt mines from the early thirteenth century onward. These positions were in the thirteenth century frequently farmed out to Jewish and Muslim merchants and moneylenders, in the fourteenth and later to German and Italian merchants and bankers. On them, see Stromer, "Kammergrafen," as above.

³ According to ancient custom, ten per cent of the income of the royal chambers went to the archbishop of Esztergom, primate of Hungary, who also held other rights connected to minting; see below, Art. 2 and passim.

⁴ The value of the farm seems to have varied considerably; in 1345, the same chambers were farmed out for 3300 marks; see DRH p. 119.

⁵ Gold florins began to be minted under Charles I around 1325. They followed the model of the Florentine fiorino d'oro, their gold content was also the same (3.52 g), but they were slightly heavier (3.56 g) because the alloy was less fine.; see Arthur Pohl, Ungarische Goldgulden des Mittelalters 1325–1540 (Graz: Akademische Verlagsgesellschaft, 1974) esp. pp. 3–18.; Boglárka Weisz, "Entrate reali e politica economica nell'età di Carlo I" in: L'Ungheria angioina. A cura di Enikő Csukovits. Roma 2013.

210. Toth, Csaba: Contributions to the study of the alloy standards of the Hungarian gold coins struck during the Angevin period. Cercetări numismatice 9–11 (2003–2005) 199–207.; Lengyel, András: Gold Book. 1325–1340. Budapest, 2013.

⁶ Integros denario refers to the details of minting as in art. 1, below..

⁷ The text consistently has "the money of the past, third and fourth past year," but for simplicity's sake we translate it as the "past four years." Since 1338 the royal penny has been issued in the same weight and alloy.

1. That the said Andrew will cause to be made at our chamber full-weight silver pennies of exactly a third firing in the manner, form, and validity of pennies of the past four years, issuing them in a just and right third firing, so that twelve *pensae*⁸ must be cut from one mark of fine silver eight pensae of them and not more will weigh on the scale one mark of the weight of Buda⁹ and should circulate in the value of a mark of fine silver at the mining towns,¹⁰

2, These full-weight pennies shall be issued for exchange in the following manner: the count of the chamber himself or his officials in the various market places of the cities and free villages of our domains and the queen's domains and those of any others, in the presence of the men of the archbishop of Esztergom,¹¹ of the Master of the Treasury,¹² and of the ispán of the county, as well as one noble magistrate and the witness of a chapter,¹³ must set out publicly, on their own

⁸ The pensa was a money of account, equal to forty denarii, (pennies). Thus 12 x 40 = 480 pennies were to contain a (Buda) mark of pure silver. "Third firing" meant two-third (0. 666) fineness, that is, 320 pennies (=eight pensae) were to be minted from one Buda mark of this fineness.

⁹ The Buda mark was equal to the Troy weight of ca. 245,5 g. Thus a new penny weighed ca. 0.77 g and contained 0.51 g of silver. This coin should be the type of H497. (Huszár, Lajos: Münzkatalog Ungarn von 1000 bis heute. Budapest–München, 1979.)

¹⁰ The mining towns (montanae) enjoyed immunity from the county courts and were administered by the counts of the chambers. The most important ones were Körmöcbánya (Kremnitz/Kremnica), as the center of gold mining; Selmečbánya/Schemnitz/Banská Štiavnica; Besztercebánya/Nesohlk/Banská Bystrica in the northwest, Gölnicbánya/Gölnitz/Gelnica and Szomolnok/Schmölnitz/Smolnik in the northeast and Nagybánya/Neustadt/Baia Mare in the east; See Boglárka Weisz, Mining Town Privileges in Angevin Hungary. The Hungarian Historical Review 2. (2013) 288–312. There were also less important silver and gold mines in Transylvania; see Arthur Pohl, "Die Münzkammer Siebenbürgen 1325–1526," Südost-Forschungen 13 (1970) 24–43. By virtue of the royal monopoly on metals, they were purchased by the chambers in montanis on an imposed low price. For one mark pure silver, only 320 pennies were paid, which had the value of two thirds of a mark. The remaining one third was the traditional rate of the chamber's profit (see below, n. 30).

¹¹ See n. 3, above.

¹² The magister tavernicarum was a royal officer, originally responsible for the royal court's provisioning, derived from the Hungarian name for the guards of royal magazines (tavernici); from the end of the fourteenth century onwards, the master of the treasury was no longer associated with the treasury, but was rather the presiding judge of the appeal court of certain royal cities (sedes tavernicalis). See Boglárka Weisz, "The magister tavarnicorum and the towns in the Hungarian Kingdom in the Angevin era" Mesto a Dejiny 5. (2016) 6–17; Eadem, "L'organisation financière."

¹³ Cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances.), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to legal transactions. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Martyn, Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003), pp. 25–35.

table in these same marketplaces, the coins of our chamber to be circulated and exchanged, and three of these same pennies shall be exchanged for four broad Viennese pennies or for other monies of our chamber of four years ago now recalled, or for money made in other preceding years similar to the Viennese firing.¹⁴ And because we wish that these pennies of the past four years retain their value and circulation, six of these new pennies, just like those of our chamber from the past four years, should count for a groat,¹⁵ while eight pensae and sixteen pennies are to be circulated everywhere and accepted as tender without surcharge for a mark of payment.¹⁶

3. If anyone is discovered increasing the amount of our true money minted in the past four years and even of this year made and issued in the same value, namely, by increasing the number of coins minted from a mark, such a transgressor of mix royal mandate and the statute of the chamber is to be punished by our authority in his goods and in his person by the count of our chambers.

4. Then, if, among the present money of our chamber or that of the past four years, lighter pennies or such pennies of less valuable firing of which more than eight pensae and three or four pennies weigh a mark are found in anyone's possession, whether in the cities or in any other place, or even among the chamberlains or their officials, or among those minting more money from a mark, then these are to be punished by our authority as counterfeiters.¹⁷

5. Therefore, we command and enjoin that a scale with weights be always kept and maintained in all cities and public places to prevent merchants or other traders, or anyone from among the citizens and burghers, from being able—following their abusive custom and fraud—to pick out the heavier pennies from the money of our chambers of the present year and each of the past four years or to reduce them by clipping.¹⁸

¹⁴ The “broad” Vienna pennies had about the same silver content as the Hungarian denarii of 1338 to 1342. Thus, by the exchange, the chamber’s profit was ca. 37 per cent, slightly above the usual rate of 33 per cent.

¹⁵ The grossus, German Groschen, Hungarian garas, was a silver currency of good quality with a fineness of “sixteenth firing” (0. 9375) minted in Hungary from 1329 to 1338 during the reign of Charles I. Eighty groats equaled one Buda mark of pure silver. Even after the minting stopped, the term survived as a money of account.

¹⁶ The mark of payment (or of account) traditionally amounted to 10 pensae (400 pennies). Here, the value of the mark of payment is fixed at the value of 336 pennies (or 56 groats), equaling 0.7 Buda mark of pure silver.

¹⁷ Counterfeiting money was regarded one of the major felonies, called charge of infidelity, and was punishable by capital punishment, see Frigyes: Kahler, “A magyarországi középkori pénzhamisítás (I. rész) [Medieval counterfeiting in Hungary, Pt. 1] Numizmatikai Közlöny 76–77 (1977–1978) 57–65.

¹⁸ “Clipping” of coins meant the systematic selection of heavier pieces and cutting off their rim so that only lighter coins are circulated and illegal profit is obtained from the remaining silver. This practice,

6. Moreover, particularly and expressly for the increase of these monies of our chamber we wish and mandate that in all the places of the chambers in which money is customarily minted, the count of the chamber, according to his voluntary obligation and our intended purpose, should as a start cause to be minted and distributed not less than a thousand marks.¹⁹ If he neglects to do this, he will be condemned as deceiving us and cheating our subjects.

7. Then, we have ordered that, henceforth, everyone should cease and desist completely from keeping a private money changer as some are said to be accustomed to do. Indeed, if the count of the chamber finds out that someone keeps a minter to the detriment of our mint and establishes this in the presence of the men of the lord archbishop of Esztergom, of the Master of the Treasury, and the three aforesaid others, not only these minters but also their lords will be punished by the loss of their goods and chattels, as well as being personally dishonored.²⁰

8. Then, the florin or golden penny of the chamber is to be always accepted and exchanged everywhere without surcharge or refusal for ninety full-weight pennies to be issued by our chamber.²¹

9. Then, one mark of gold of the Buda weight of twelve carats is to be exchanged for seven marks of pennies of the chamber with the same Buda weight weighed on the scale.²² usually done by money-changers, was widespread in medieval Europe and regarded everywhere as counterfeiting.

¹⁹ The setting of a minimum of new money to be minted was an innovation in 1342, not included in earlier cameral contracts, see e.g. DRH pp. 85-105.

²⁰ This formulation seems to refer to proscription.

²¹ This measure can be interpreted in two different ways. Either the legal course of the golden florin was fixed thereby in 90 pennies, or this price was prescribed for official money-changers only who sold the new currency to the towns and other communities with the legal reduction of 33 per cent. In terms of actual silver the florin was worth around 108 to 110 pennies, depending on how one calculated the exchange rate (then fluctuating between 1: 15. 5– 16). Thus the official price invested the pennies with a nominal value, exceeding the intrinsic value by 25 to 23 per cent. (This means a corresponding devaluation of the florin.) In the other sense, the legal price would have been 72 to 74 pennies, that is, two-thirds of the market price, with one third for the chamber's profit. By the new regulation the course of the florin would have been fixed well above the market value (by 21–25 per cent), a measure encouraging the towns and others to pay their taxes in florins rather than in silver. The stipulation in the text that the florin "must be accepted" by the officials of the chamber and should not be "refused," speaks for the second interpretation. See Engel 1990, 47–55.

²² In view of the market exchange rate of precious metals (as noted above) the imposed price for unminted gold was highly profitable for the chamber, at least 60 per cent.

10. And no one may exchange gold and silver for counted money, but must exchange them for pennies issued by the royal chamber weighed on the scale.²³ If, however, anyone will be found to do or to have done otherwise, he is to be punished by a suitable penalty as transgressor of the royal mandate and infringer of the statute of the chamber.

11. We have decreed besides that no one at all should have the right to trade in any old money or unminted gold or silver, and particularly in the small or even medium Viennese ones which we wish and command to eradicate completely, but only in the money of our chamber; otherwise, buyers and sellers will lose their goods and chattels and will be personally dishonored.

12. Henceforth, no foreign merchant or trader coming to this country should dare to sell overtly or covertly or to exchange his wares or goods, be it cloth or any other type and kind of merchandise, publicly or secretly, in houses or at the chamber, for old money of any form, or for gold and silver, but only for the said money of the chamber. Nevertheless, he should be allowed to sell when he comes to a place of staple,²⁴ for selling or trading with the knowledge and the advisement of the count of the chamber or the aforesaid men of the lord archbishop and of the Master of the Treasury and the others. However, if the count of the chamber or his officials find or apprehend any of the people acting or proceeding differently, these should lose the things set out for sale, cloth as well as other goods, and the price received for the goods sold, and they should be punished in person as well. And even more, not only those who are found exporting non-minted gold or silver, other than the new gold and silver pennies, by their own authority against the ordinance of our chamber and our will, shall be punished by its confiscation and the dishonoring of their persons, but also, if gold or silver to be sent out of our kingdom is found with the seals or signs of the chamberlains,²⁵ and if the chamberlains allow gold or silver to be exported, the counts of the chamber whose seals or signs are found on this gold or silver must also be punished as counterfeiters and transgressors of the royal mandates.

13. Moreover, this is particularly emphasized in the present charter that the counts of our chamber under whose jurisdiction the mines lie, for the sake of procuring lead and other evident necessities of the chamber and the mines (without an abundance of which no gold and silver could be procured),²⁶ should have the power of transferring an amount of gold or silver with the knowledge of the men of the lord archbishop and the others, but only if it is obviously necessary.

²³ The prohibition of exchange by count (numerando) and not by weight (ponderando) is recurrent in the cameral contracts and was aimed at eliminating the sorting out of heavier pieces or of “clipping” (see above, art. 5).

²⁴ At this time, Buda, Győr, Zágráb, Lőcse/Levoča and Sopron enjoyed staple right. See Boglárka Weisz, “Entrate reali e politica economica nell’età di Carlo I,” 231.

²⁵ See below, art. 30.

14. Then, if in the county or province of any count of the chamber our present money is by evil management forged and distributed and becomes abundant, and the count of the chamber has not taken care of confiscating and destroying this same money, it will be deemed as though the false money had been made on the minting premises of this count of the chamber. However, if this same count of the chamber has not had sufficient force in any place to curb the forgers in their wicked works, then that chamberlain with the witness of the aforesaid five men, having investigated and learned the truth about the evil deeds of the counterfeiters, must denounce these very forgers by name to us, our barons, and our council, and urge us to root them out.

15. Then, since we wish that our present money of third firing issued in increased amount should remain unchangeably in circulation and be made abundant throughout our whole realm and that the pennies of our chamber of the last three years should be equally distributed and accepted with the new pennies, we have ordered and decreed by mandate that in every county from every gate through which a wagon loaded with hay or grain can enter or leave, whether behind this same gate or on a plot having a gate, three or four or even more men live, or if only one lives there,²⁷ eighteen pennies of our said chamber as the chamber's profit are to be rendered and paid on the fifteenth day after the assessment to the count of the chamber,²⁸ with the following exceptions: those who are so needy or poor that they cannot pay, what the aforementioned five men of the archbishop and the others on their conscience define and command to be able to pay, and the lords of the land swore on their oath whether they are able to pay or not; servants and conditionarii of the king, the queen, the churches or others;²⁹ the military servitors of the lords, whom they exempted on their oath, and the five men (namely the men of the lord archbishop and the others³⁰) found by investigation to be such soldiers; and also churches, cities, or others with explicit privileged liberty. Nevertheless, noting that such payment is to be halved there and in such counties or parts of our realm where gates are not customary, or where they cannot be built because of lack of wood; there and then such people are liable to pay the said chamber's profit just as in other times, at the same term according to the circumspect decision of the said five men.

²⁶ Lead was needed for the parting of silver during the first stage of silver ore metallurgy, the so-called cupellation. See: Agricola, De re metallica, trans. H. C. and L. H. Hoover, ed. 2. (New York: Dover, 1950) Book X, pp. 476–93; Cf. Paulinyi, “Crown monopoly,” p. 35.

²⁷ This mention of the “gate” (porta) is one of the earliest references to this unit of taxation. It referred to a tenant peasant’s plot consisting of house, garden, arable land and pasture rights. The sentence suggests that by this time already more than one family lived on a plot. In fact, some plots were, in the course of time divided down to a “quarter virgate.” See: István Szabó, “Magyarország népessége az 1330. és 1526. évek között” [The population of Hungary between the years 1330 and 1526] in; Magyarország történeti demográfiája, J. Kovacsics, ed. (Budapest: KSH, 1963) p. 63–7. It is noteworthy that the statute recognizes that the typical wide gate of the farmyard, still widespread in rural Hungary, was not the only arrangement in settlements.

²⁸ The chamber’s profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king’s income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins (renovatio monetarum); in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. The usual exchange rate was 66.6 per cent, the remaining one third being the chamber’s profit. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber’s profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. By 1336 the peasant plots were taxed by one fifth of a gold florin, the cities had to pay it in the old way, see art. 25, below. Still basic: See Boglárka Weisz, “Entrate reali e politica economica nell’età di Carlo I,” 215–219.

16. However, citizens and other subjects of ours having the aforesaid patent liberty shall remain exempt from the payment of the chamber's profit if they ensure the continuous circulation and exchange of these monies among them and the tenant peasants³¹ on their estates. Otherwise, their liberties are infringed upon not by us, but by themselves, and then they are just as liable as our other subjects for the payment of this chamber's profit, and so these people, provided that it be clearly evident to us from the report of the said five men, namely, the men of the lord archbishop, of the Master of the Treasury, of the ispán of the county, one noble magistrate³² and a man of a chapter, that our money was not accepted by them, nor was it arranged to be exchanged among them or by those belonging to them.³³

17. Moreover, every chamberlain should dispatch for exchange in every county of his chamber sufficient pennies produced by our chamber for the multiplication of our said new pennies with the knowledge and acknowledgement of the five men in such abundance that the county is supplied by them to satisfaction. If he has not done this or does not take care to set out for

²⁹ Conditionarii were peasants on royal estates (elsewhere called udvornici) who, because of their unfree origin were traditionally exempt from royal taxation.

³⁰ On the five men, see art. 16, below.

³¹ Jobagio (Latinized from Hungarian jobbágy) was the status of most of the rural population in medieval Hungary. They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and some labor to their lords, but free to move, once dues paid, to another seigneur's estate. We translate the term as "tenant peasant." See: János M. Bak, "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary (A Sketchy Outline)" in Paul Freedman and Monique Bourin, eds. Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion. Turnholt: Brepols, 2005. (Medieval Texts and Cultures of Northern Europe 9), pp. 387–400.

³² The ispáns (comites) were the royal officials heading the counties ever since the foundation of the kingdom. In Angevin times, this office was often combined with positions at court, the co-called honors, and the actual administration of the counties were in the hands of their deputies, the vice-comites, alispáns, see Pál Engel "Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom." Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996) 91–100. Noble magistrates were elected officials, known from the late thirteenth century onwards, assistants of the ispán and at the same time representatives of the county nobility. There were usually four or more such magistrates in every county.

³³ For the special arrangements for cities and burghers, see art. 25, below.

exchange our new pennies in such an abundant amount, then in those counties he should lose his rights and shall not be able to demand the chamber's profit nor any other tax.³⁴

18. In every county one common and convenient place is to be designated for those paying the said payment, and if those present are not able to pay on the day assigned because of the great number of taxpayers or some other impediment, they are to be awaited without penalty for four continuous days; nor may they be penalized if they make the payment within these four days.

19. It should also be noted that these same counts of the chamber are not allowed to collect the chamber's profit imposed exclusively for the purpose of exchange in any other way, that is, in Viennese or other old or large pennies by any kind of agreement or under any pretext, but only in the full-weight pennies of our chamber now issued, and that they are required to melt down and cast all old pennies or large Viennese, Bohemian, as well as Serbian ones, and others of any form,³⁵ save only the current whole pennies of our chamber which we have decreed to remain permanently in currency, and mint them into our new pennies for their increase; on such a condition that if anyone was not paying the chamber's profit after the assessment at the assigned term, then the same five men should move onto the property from which this chamber's profit was not paid and stay there without destruction or spoliation, at a moderate cost to the property, until the chamber's profit is paid together with a fine of three marks.³⁶

20. However, if the people or the lords of the villages are remiss in paying the profit of the said chamber at the term of payment meet the said men acting in the business of the chamber outside the village with the money owed and the assessed fine ordered to be paid, then these agents of the business of the chamber should not have the right to move onto any property in such villages.

21. Ispáns of counties and noble magistrates who for favor or for a payment conceal and release men from the said payment in any way against our ordinance should be punished with the penalty of those who do not pay if there is clear proof against them.

22. Since we have promised to observe inviolably all of the foregoing, we wish that these same counts of our chamber should also strictly adhere to these matters. And, conversely, neither by means of any charter issued after the present one, nor by some clever cunning should anyone dare to change anything of the foregoing. Thus if any one from among the counts of the chamber should attempt to act against this order, we command that the said five men, without whose assistance we do not wish the chamber's profit to be collected, should exclude him by the force of this letter from their midst, for we have commanded this tax to be collected not for levying old or Viennese monies but for the increase of the monies of our chamber with coins which we intend to keep permanently circulating throughout the whole realm.

³⁴ See above, art. 6. Here the forfeiture of the rights to collect the tax is added.

³⁵ One of the purposes of the monetary reform was to suppress the circulation of foreign money what was widespread in Hungary due to the poor quality of the coinage; see Hóman, Pénztörténet, pp. 104–7.

³⁶ The standard penalty for not paying the chamber's profit was established in 1335 (see DRH, p. 88) and remained valid throughout the Middle Ages.

23. Then, we wish that the said counts of our chamber should not be able, without the said five men, to enter into foreign or outside business of the chamber, namely such matters that should be conducted and transacted in the counties, particularly in the assessment and levying of the chamber's profit. If they rashly attempt to proceed contrariwise and hence something evil occurs to them, they will deserve to endure and suffer it.

24. Then, anyone who attacks the count of the chamber, his company, or those traveling with him with manifest violence shall be punished according to the quality and quantity of the delict.

25. Burghers living in the cities located in counties of the counts of the chamber and under their jurisdiction are required, according to our and our barons' present assessment, to exchange a certain sum of money from the said money of the chamber issued for their increase within the said space of time for silver or to pay for the refining of this same money of the chamber issued for their increase in the pennies of the chamber. The following have to exchange in the aforesaid manner: Zalánkemény/Slankamen 240 marks, Zimony/Zemun 15, [Száva]Szentdemeter/ Sremska Mitrovica 50, Eng/Divoš 60, Nagyolasz/Mandjelos 25, Esztyén/Ustine 30, Segesd, Aranyos, Lábod, and [Kálmán]Csehi/Kálmánca with their appurtenances 100, and Pécs 40 marks³⁷ in such a way that these citizens either render one mark of fine silver after having received these quantities in the new money of the chamber for any mark weighing eight pensae by weight or, without accepting anything, pay for the refining or firing of that money, for every mark assessment four pensae of the said monies, of which eight pensae weigh a mark.³⁸ If, however, a city is negligent in paying, the said agents of the business of the chamber shall remain in such a city at the moderate expense of the city with the help of the judge and jurors of the same until the said payment with a fine of twelve marks is paid.

26. It is also stated that every noble is required to procure a letter of quittance for one large penny from the count of the chamber on payment of the chamber's profit even if he has several possessions.³⁹

³⁷ These cities were most important urban settlements of southern Hungary in the mid-fourteenth century. With the exception of Pécs, they lost their importance in the subsequent centuries. In the consequence of Ottoman occupation and the Turkish wars, most of them were destroyed to the point that they cannot now be unequivocally located. György Györffy in Az Árpád-kori Magyarország történeti földrajza vol. 1 [Historical geography of Árpád-age Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1987) p. 301 identified Esztyén as Ustine, now in Croatia.

³⁸ Cities paid their part of the chamber's profit according to their size and wealth.

³⁹ Nobles were generally exempt from taxes, except, apparently, from the chamber's profit. But at least, they had to pay it only once, even if they owned several properties, which was typical.

27. Then, we have ordered that in the usual cameral locations in the cities a royal house should be established to which everyone must bring gold and silver for sale, refining, and exchange.⁴⁰ If any one dares publicly or privately to refine, sell, or exchange elsewhere and is discovered in this, all his goods are to be confiscated by the count of the chamber in the presence of the aforementioned witnesses, and he is also to be punished as a traitor.

28. We command that no one should test gold (for how many carats it contains) in any place except in a royal building, but the chamberlain should examine it in the royal house, and he should have the carats engraved and marked with our royal mark. We have ordered that those daring to act contrariwise are to be punished by the aforesaid penalty by the same count of the chamber.

29. Furthermore, we order that no merchant or any other person should dare to take with him to the mining areas more than two marks of pennies for expenses. If the count of the chamber or his officials should find on such a person more than two marks in pennies they should confiscate all his goods and punish him in person in the presence of the said witnesses.

30. In order that the justness of our chamberlains in the minting of the pennies should be apparent, we have ordered that each of them should have a sign in his mint by which money made by him can be recognized.⁴¹

31. Furthermore, we wish that, should the count of the chamber find counterfeiters or makers of pennies in any city or village and attempt to capture them, the judge, jurors, and all the people of the city or village in which they were found be obligated, at the request of the count of the chamber or his official, to capture these minters and to surrender them into the hands of the count of the chamber. If, however, anyone does otherwise, he should be punished by the penalty for contumacious counterfeiting.

32. Then, in our cities where our money is made, the count of our chamber should have two chests. In one chest the iron tools for minting should be kept under the seal of the men of the lord archbishop and the Master of the Treasury,⁴² in the other chest no new coins, but the cast rods for minting money should be kept under three seals and three keys of the same three men, namely the men of the archbishop, the Master of the Treasury, and the officer of the chamber, and they should always be opened in the presence of the men of the archbishop and of the Master of the Treasury; when any of them is absent the chest must not be opened nor money minted. If the count of our chamber, when these two witnesses are absent or when even one is absent, should break the seals and the lock and cause money to be minted, he should be punished as a counterfeiter by the Master of the Treasury if the men of the lord archbishop and the Master of the Treasury so testify.

⁴⁰ This means the implementation of the royal monopoly of precious metals, introduced by Charles I in 1335 Weisz, "Entrate reali e politica economica nell'età di Carlo I" 223–224.

⁴¹ Quite some time before this official regulation in 1338, the counts of the chamber, or earlier the minters, usually put their mark on the gold and silver coins issued by them. As a rule, the mint was marked by a letter, such as B for Buda, K for Kremnica and the moneyer by a symbol, letter or coat of arms. For example, the Paduan bankers Giacomo and Giovanni Saraceno, in charge of finances in the 1360s and 1370s marked his coins with a "Saracen" head, a face with pronounced African features. In general, see Artur Pohl, Münzzeichen und Meisterzeichen auf ungarischen Münzen des Mittelalters (1300–1540) (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó–Graz: Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt, 1982). Lengyel, András: Gold Book. Budapest, 2013.

33. Particularly, when silver is cast, all these people must be present in person, and every single week the men of the lord archbishop and of the Master of the Treasury should examine our new pennies by melting down forty of them before they are put out for exchange in the described way.⁴³

34. Then, in order to avoid that the count of the chamber be accused because of counterfeit money, the minters and makers of pennies living in our said cities shall remain under his power and jurisdiction. Furthermore, as the ancient liberty of our chamberlains demands, only the count of the chamber and no other ought to judge all servants, officials, and minters, and if he should neglect to render justice in regard to his men, our said Master of the Treasury is to give justice to any complainant.

35. Then, for the increase of the monies of our chamber we order that all prelates of churches be obligated to receive and to collect the tithes, debts, and any other payments, just as all barons and nobles of our realm and others of whatever estate, all revenues, namely tolls, rents, and whatever other taxes from their debtors, tenant peasants, toll collectors, and officials, in the money of our chamber or florins, as soon as pennies of our chamber are struck in such abundance that all debtors will be able to pay their debts with pennies of the chamber. In turn we promise and agree to receive and to collect all our royal taxes and those of the queen throughout our entire realm, particularly our tolls and our thirtieth,⁴⁴ in these same pennies.

36. Then, if anyone will be summoned to our presence or to that of the Master of the Treasury in any offense against the count of our chamber by reason of injury or damage or harm inflicted to the men of our chamber acting on business, the suit should be terminated without further delay at the first term, as justice demands.⁴⁵ If, however, the said count of our chamber should be sued at law by anyone, the said Master of the Treasury, by our authority, shall ensure justice on behalf of that person.

⁴² On such tools, see A. Luschim von Ebengreuth, Allgemeine Münzkunde und Geldgeschichte des Mittelalters und der neueren Zeit ed. 2 (Munich–Berlin: Oldebourg, 1926) pp. 82–93.

⁴³ The cameral contract of 1338 specifies that forty pennies both of the new minting and of the Viennese type are to be melted down, obviously for comparison of their fineness; see DRH p. 99.

⁴⁴ The thirtieth came to be a customs duty, developed from various market tolls. Weisz, “Entrate reali e politica economica nell’età di Carlo I” 227–230.

37. We have ordered also that no tolls are to be demanded for any goods or chattels of our chambers shipped anywhere by land or by water by the officials of the chamber.

38. Furthermore, one *pondus*⁴⁶ reckoned in pennies is to be paid for every mark to the man of the archbishop at every day of work for the safeguarding of the minting tools,⁴⁷ and half a *ferto*⁴⁸ to the man of the Master of the Treasury, above the amount established in our royal contract. If the said count of our chamber should refuse to pay in the aforesaid manner or should wish to delay payment on any day of work the pondera of pennies or the said half fertones for every mark minted, the men of the said lord archbishop and of the Master of the Treasury shall have the right to lock up the minting tools.

39. Then, the same count of our chamber must pay in full the vice-chancellor of our court the long-established customary revenue, namely, thirty marks at the dates of the payments written below,⁴⁹ besides the fee due to the notaries.

40. We also wish to add that the aforementioned Master of the Treasury should prosecute and amend injuries and losses inflicted by anyone on the officials of the chamber. Concerning counterfeiters and their protectors, we wish that the ancient custom of our kingdom be observed.⁵⁰

41. Then, we have ordered that no ispán of any county shall presume to demand or to collect from the counts of our chamber as market fee more than three marks of eight pensae each from

⁴⁵ The attempt at avoiding that justice be delayed characterized legislation throughout the Middle Ages, with little success (see e.g. 1351:25). “First term” refers to one of the sessions of the royal courts, referred to as octava of which there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George’s (23 April), St. James’s (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days.

⁴⁶ The pondus (1/48th of a mark in weight) was often made equal to the groat (1/56th of a mark as money of account), see above notes 15–16.

⁴⁷ The forty-eighth part due to the archbishop from minted silver and gold (not to be confused with the tenth part of the revenue, see art. 4, above) was called pisetum and was collected by the primate until the nineteenth century; see Frigyes Kahler, “Das pizetum-Recht,” Debreceni Déry Múzeum Évkönyve 1986 (Debrecen: Déry Múzeum, 1987) 181–91.

⁴⁸ A ferto, from the German Viertel, was one fourth of a mark, hence c. 2 oz.

⁴⁹ See art. 48.

⁵⁰ Ancient custom may refer to 1298:15 or customary law in general. A more precise codification against counterfeiting is in Sigismund’s urban decree 1405: 18.

our new money.⁵¹ Nobles or other men of any estate holding market rights should not dare to demand or collect anything from these chamberlains.

42. We also command that neither the Master of the Treasury should be able to sell or to lease his half fertones to anyone, nor the lord archbishop his pondera; should they do so, they are to be deprived of their rights.⁵²

43. Moreover, to attend to the business of the chamber the same archbishop and: Master of the Treasury must send men who have possessions, so that if their trespasses may warrant it, they could lose these.

44. Then, the counts of the chamber who wish to farm our chambers in the following year should farm them on New Year's Day,⁵³ having given account of their debts to us personally.

45. Then, if—as we have touched on this above⁵⁴—the said five men, agents of the chamber's business, who are required to stay at a moderate expense and collect with the help of the judge and the jurors the chamber's profit and twelve marks fine in cities that are reluctant to hand it over completely to the count of the said chamber, find that the judge and jurors refuse to obey this ordinance of ours, we command that they are held to render the chamber's profit in its entirety together with double the amount of the twelve marks fine.

46. We state also that all goods and chattels confiscated from anyone anywhere because of contempt for any of the said articles, for transgression of our royal mandate or violation of the statute of the chamber, ought to be divided into three equal parts, two of which should go to the same count of the chamber, the third to the hands of the said men of the lord archbishop and the Master of the Treasury.

47. The count of the said chamber will be required to render and pay from every mark collected as the chamber's profit in any county one large penny or one pondus to the man of the lord archbishop and another large penny or pondus to the man of the Master of the Treasury.

48. However, we command expressly that if the count of our chamber does not cause money of our chamber to be made in the accustomed places of the chamber in abundance, and, by dissimulation, merely declares his intent to collect the chamber's profit, then such a man is to be punished as leading us astray, as a deceiver of our kingdom and a liar against our majesty.

⁵¹ The precise meaning of ratione fororum (“by reason of markets”) is not quite clear. Apparently the ispáns had a claim to any market revenue in their county and the sum specified here was set as a maximum of such payments.

⁵² There is no evidence that such sub-leasing may have happened.

⁵³ This date would have been an innovation, for the traditional beginning of the fiscal year was in February-March (usually at Purification of the Virgin, February 2). It did not become accepted.

⁵⁴ See art. 25.

49. In order that the count of the said chamber should be able to pay us more easily the sum of fifteen hundred marks, we have ordered and decreed that he should pay us at the octave of the feast of the nativity of the blessed John the Baptist three hundred and seventy-five marks and similarly three hundred and seventy-five marks on the octave of the feast of the Blessed Virgin, and in a similar manner three hundred and seventy-five marks in the octave of the feast of the Blessed Martin, making the last payment of the remaining three hundred and seventy-five marks at the octave of the New Year's Day at subsequent dates,⁵⁵ here in Visegrád⁵⁶ in the said money and the said manner. If he omits any payment of the said terms he should incur a double penalty.

Given at Visegrád on the feast of the Purification of the Virgin in the above-mentioned year.

⁵⁵ The dates of payments varied in the course of time. They were different, for example, in 1335 (DRH, p. 89). The present contract stipulated terms for 1 July, 15 September, 18 November, and 8 January.

⁵⁶ Visegrád at the bend of the Danube was the royal residence during most of the Angevin age; see József Laszlovszky, ed., Medieval Visegrád (Royal Castle, Palace, Town and Franciscan Friary), Dissertationes Pannonicae Ser. III., Vol. 4. (Budapest: ELTE, 1995). About the coinage in Visegrád see Tóth, Csaba: Mints of Medieval Visegrád. In: "Quasi liber et pictura" Tanulmányok Kubinyi András hatvanadik születésnapjára Gyöngyi Kovács, ed. (Budapest: ELTE Régészeti Int., 2004) 571–3.

Louis I “the Great” in the Illuminated Chronicle (c. 1386)

DECRETUM UNICUM OF KING LOUIS I OF HUNGARY
11 December 1351

This decree is the only piece of legislation issued from a diet under King Louis I. As contained in the proem, the king felt obliged to reward the great monetary and personal sacrifices of his nobles in the Sicilian wars with the confirmation of “their rights.” The decretum contains in its first part the verbatim transcript of the Golden Bull of Andrew II of 1222 (from the 1318 transcript of the archbishop of Esztergom) with a significant change concerning noble inheritance, where it restores the older tradition of unlimited claim by the clan. However, by re-issuing the privileges granted to the magnates of the thirteenth century (who were then alone called nobiles) and explicitly expanding them to the free soldiering elements in Transylvania, Slavonia, and Croatia, Louis in fact gave the entire Hungarian nobility a charter of liberty. The document was seen as such by contemporaries, and its renewal became an accepted tradition of later kings of Hungary.

The decree was passed in a diet of the nobility (clergy are not mentioned in the proem) that seems to have lasted several weeks: in a charter of 12 December 1351 the palatine speaks of a delay in a legal case “because of a royal meeting of the entire realm here in Buda for twenty-four days” (MNL OL Dl. 4149). At least for the following year, the traditional judicial gathering on St. Stephen’s Day, based on the renewed Golden Bull, was also reintroduced (cf. a charter of the same Palatine Nicholas Gilétfi of 24 August 1352, Imre Nagy, and Gyula Tasnádi Nagy, eds. Anjoukori Okmánytár. Codex diplomaticus Hungariae Andegavensis (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1879–1920; 5: 604). The importance of this charter of privilege for the lesser and moyenne nobility is suggested also by the fact that several original copies are known which were sent to the counties as a form of promulgation (see below, MSS).

MSS.: Seven originals are known:

- for an unknown county (Co. Csanád?), Library of the Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 165:121, parchment, seal pedant lost;
 - for Co. Bereg, MNL OL Dl. 4239/1, parchment with damaged double seal pedant; for
 - Co. Bihar, MNL OL Dl. 41174, parchment with fragment of double pendant seal; for
 - Co. Körös MNL OL Dl. 4239/4, parchment with damaged double pendant seal;
 - from the family archives of the Perényi (hereditary ispáns of Abaújvár, hence probably the copy for that county) MNL OL Dl. 70630, parchment with double pendant seal;
 - from the Archivum regnicolare, MNL OL Dl. 4239/3, parchment with double pendant seal, water-damaged;
 - for Co. Sáros (later, as dorsal notes suggest, in Co. Szepes and Turóc) MNL OL Dl. 4239/2, parchment, without seal.
- Additionally, there are several transcripts: four copies of the transcript by Queen Mary in her decree of 22 June 1384 (see 1384); three copies of the transcript by King Matthias I in his coronation decree of 6 April 1464; a transcript in privilegial form for Co. Pozsony, in the Slovak State Archives, Bratislava, Slovakia; a transcript in privilegial form for the city of Trencsén, in the City Archives Trenčín, Slovakia. (For detailed information on the manuscripts, see DRH, pp. 126–27.)

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

- EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Codex Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., vol. 1, Budapest.: Franklin, 1896, pp. 170–81; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66, 9/2: 37–47; Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901, pp. 216–23; Tade Smičiklas, Codex diplomaticus regni Croatiae, Dalmatiae et Slavoniae (Zagreb: Academia, 1904–) 12: 539;
- cf. also Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Lectiones variantes decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae (Pest: Trattner, 1816), pp. 47–55, 537–42; Döry, Ferenc, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai., eds. Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301– 1445. (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH] pp. 127–40
- LIT.: Pál Engel, Realm of St. Stephen. A history of medieval Hungary 895–1526. London–New York: I.B. Tauris, 2001 pp. 174–81; Stephen Béla Vardy, G. Goldschmidt, Leslie S. Domonkos, eds. Louis the Great, King of Hungary and Poland (Boulder, Co.: East European Monographs, 1986); György Bónis, Hűbériség és rendiség a középkori magyar jogban [Feudalism and corporatism in medieval Hungarian law] (Kolozsvár: Erdélyi Tud. Intézet, s.d. [1947], repr. Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó 2001) pp. 178–80.

Lodouicus dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex, princeps Salernitanus et honoris montis Sancti Angeli dominus, omnibus Christi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris presentium notitiam habituris salutem in eo, qui regibus dat feliciter regnare et victoriose triumphare. Tronus et potentia regalis dignitatis tunc dinoscitur roborari, cum subditorum quieti et tranquillitati provida circumspectione providetur, ipsisque digno remunerationis bravio in libertatibus largiendis, ymo etiam per alios reges pia consideratione institutis confovendis necnon confirmandis liberaliter respondetur. Nam observantia fidei, sui trahens originem, debitum rationis native Iegibus, stabilis perseverat, cum benivolentia principis in suos ostensa regnicolas sic semper coalescit in subditos, ut nisi vite suffocetur igniculus in corpore, vigor fidei non lentescit. Eapropter ad universorum notitiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod baronum necnon procerum et nobilium regni nostri cetus et universitatis ydemptitas nostrum regium conspectum adeundo, fidelitatibus suis et fidelium servitiorum preclaris meritis in cunctis nostris et regni nostri negotiis prosperis et adversis cum sumpme fidelitatis studio et votiva diligentia nostre maiestati exhibitis et inpensis declaratis et nostram in memoriam revocatis, exhibuerunt nobis quasdam litteras privilegiales illustrissimi principis domini Andree, tertii Bele regis filii, olym incliti regis Hungarie, avi et predecessoris nostri pie recordationis aurea bulla sua roboratas, libertates ipsorum per sanctissimum Stephanum Hungarice gentis regem et apostolum, ut predictae littere declarabant, ipsis institutas innovantes et confirmantes tenoris subsequentis, supplicantes unanimiter et conformiter nostre humiliter maiestati, ut ipsas acceptantes, ratificantes et approbantes presentibus de verbo ad verbum transsumptni faciendo simul cum omnibus libertatibus eorum in eisdem expressis, excepto solummodo uno articulo in subsequentibus declarando, confirmare et easdem libertates in dictis litteris expressas ex regie benignitatis clementia auctoritate regia innovando ipsos in eisdem perempnaliter fruituros et gavisuros litteris nostris privilegialibus mediantibus stabilire dignaremur. Quarum tenor talis est:

(Decretum a. 1222, Aurea Bulla nominatum.)

Nos igitur petitioni dictorum haronum, procerum et nobilium regni nostri aures exaudibiles regio cum favore inclinantes, consideratis et in memoriam revocatis fidelibus obsequiis et sincerissimis complacentiis eorundem, quibus in cunctis nostris et regni nostri negotiis prosperis pariter et adversis, specialiter vero in sumpmenda vindicta innoxii sanguinis olym domini Andree, Jerusalem et Sycilie regis, fratris nostri karissimi beate recordationis, cuius dire necis acerbitas fere totius orbis fines seu plagas propulsavit, ad dictum regnum Sycilie nobiscum proficiscendo, inopinatis fortune casibus et variis personarum periculis sumpma fidelitate fulti intrepide se submittendo nostre maiestati studuerunt complacere et se reddere utique gratiosos et acceptos, volentes voto ipsorum gratiose occurrere et eorum beneplacitum adimplere, ut ipsos ad similia fidelitatis opera exercenda devota mente incitemus, predictas litteras ipsius domini Andree regis, avi et predecessoris nostri karissimi aurea bulla sua roboratas, omni penitus suspicione carentes de verbo ad verbum presentibus insertas acceptantes, ratificantes et approbantes, simul cum omnibus libertatibus in eisdem expressis, excepto solummodo uno articulo modo prenotato de eodem privilegio excluso, eo videlicet, quod nobiles homines sine herede decedentes possint et queant ecclesiis vel aliis, quibus volunt, in vita et in morte dare vel legare, possessiones eorum vendere vel alienare, ymo ad ista facienda nullam penitus habeant facultatem, sed in fratres, proximos et generationes ipsorum possessiones eorundem de iure et legitime, pure et simpliciter absque contradictione aliquali devolvantur, ut tenor continet privilegii bullati domini Andree regis supradicti, confirmantes et easdem libertates de beneplacita voluntate serenissime principisse domine Elyzabeth, eadem gratia regine Hungarie, genitricis nostre karissime ac de consilio eorundem baronum nostrorum ex regie benignitatis clementia innovando ipsos in eisdem perempnialiter commisimus fruituros et gavisuros. In super pro tranquilliori statu et pacifico comodo eorundem regnicolarum nostrorum, de voluntate eiusdem genitricis nostre et consilio eorundem baronum nostrorum, ipsis ex solita liberalitate huiusmodi libertates infrascriptas superaddendo duximus concedendas:

I. Quod si prelati vel aliqui viri ecclesiastici contra nobiles regni nostri in aliqua causa in presentia alicuius iudicis regni nostri processerint et litem habuerint, tunc pro causa, pro qua agitur, lite pendente interdictum in eos ponere vel contra ipsos sententiam excommunicationis non possint promulgare, sicut hactenus usi sunt et consueti, absque scitu et notitia regie maiestatis. Et si iidem viri ecclesiastici seu prelati tramite iuris observato in alicuius regii iudicis presentia de iure convicti fuerint, tunc in eiusdem gravaminis penam, quo eorum adversarios intendebant honorare seu aggravare, incidant eo facto.

II. Nec pro funere hominum per aliquem vel aliquos interemptorum archydiaconi mala consuetudine, sicut usi sunt, unam marcam exigere valeant atque possint.

III. Minuti etiam conventus ab emanatione litterarum suarum super perpetuatione possessionum conficiendarum cessent et eorum sigilla omni careant firmitate.

IV. Lucrum vero camere, prout tempore incliti principis domini Karoli olim regis Hungarie, genitoris nostri Karissimi pie memorie de quolibet integro fundo curie tres grossi solvebantur, sic et nunc cum tribus grossis in nostra camera cudendis, quorum grossorum unus sex denarios camere nostri, in valore et quantitate sex latorum Wyennensium valeat, et ipsorum grossorum quatuordecim unum fertonem faciant, persolvatur. Superfluos autem denarios, vldelicet dicarum redemptionem et victualia recipere non valeant.

V. Villicos et servientes in propriis eorum possessionibus commorantes ac servos ipsius lucri camere dicatores dicare et super ipsos lucrum camere exigere non possint, et generaliter dicendo nichil plus quam tres grossos recipere valeant et extorquere.

VI. Preterea ab omnibus jobagionibus nostris aratoribus et vineas habentibus in quibuslibet villis liberis ac etiam vduarnicalibus villis quocunque nomine vocitatis ac reginalibus constitutis, exceptis civitatibus muratis, nonam partem omnium frugum suarum et vinorum ipsorum exigimus et domina regina exigere faciet; ac predicti barones et nobiles similiter ab omnibus aratoribus jobagionibus et vineas habentibus in quibuslibet possessionibus ipsorum existentibus nonam partem omnium frugum suarum et vinorum suorum eorum usibus exigant et recipiant. Prelati quoque et viri ecclesiastici jobagiones habentes primo decimas et posthec similiter nonam partem omnium frugum suarum et vinorum ipsorum exigant. Et si qui in exactione predicta secus fecerint, nos in talium rebellium et presentem nostram statutionem alternantium possessionibus pro usu nostro ipsam nonam partem ipsarum frugum et vini exigere faciemus sine diminutione et relaxatione aliquali, ut per hoc honor noster augeatur et ipsi regnicole nostri nobis fidelius possint famulari.

VII. De possessionibus etiam a nobis et nostris successoribus inveniendis iuxta earum quantitatem, videlicet de possessione proventus decem marcarum facienti vicecancellarius noster unam marcam et scriptor unum fertonem, et de maioribus possessionibus proventus viginti marcarum facientibus duas marcas et scriptor similiter unum fertonem recipere possint et habere, et sic consequenter iuxta excresscentiam possessionum de novo inveniendarum.

VIII. Tributa etiam iniusta super terris siccis et fluviis ab infra descendentibus et supra euntibus non exigantur, nisi in pontibus et navigiis ab ultra transeuntibus persolvantur, cum in eisdem nobiles et ignobiles regni nostri multo et nimium perceperimus aggravari,

IX. Ceterum si quis nobilis ordine iudiciario in facto potenciali succubitus in pena calumpnie, astationis falsi termini et exhibitionis falsarum litterarum ac sententie capitalis pro quocunque facto²⁴ in presentia palatini et iudicis curie nostre aut alterius cuiuscunque iudicis presentia convictus fuerit, iudex illius cause talem convictum recaptivet et tribus diebus causa reformationis pacis inter partes fiende et ordinande detineat, et si concordare nequirent, tunc in manus sui adversarii ad infligendam sibi penam iuxta regni consuetudinem et de iure debitam assignet. Et si tali convicto pars adversa mortem vel aliam penam consuetudinis regni de iure debendam infligerit vel fecerit, tunc a iudice et parte adversa sine receptione alicuius pecunie vel gravarninis possessionis sue erit expeditus.

X. Filiique, fratres, proximi, sorores et uxores pro excessu talis pereuntis hominis non debeant aggravari, sed in possessionibus, domibus et bonis ipsorum quieti et pacifici permaneant. Si autem cum parte adversa homo premissis modo convictus posset concordare, iudex non ultra, nisi quinquaginta marcas, dando sibi terminum debitum ad easdem persolvendas, recipere possit; et si dato sibi termino solvere non curaret, de possessione sua, expirato ipso termino, recepto homine regio et testimonio alicuius capituli vel credibilis conventus portionem vel portiones ipsas quinquaginta marcas valentem vel valentes possit occupare tamdiu possidendam vel possidendas, donec per hos, quorum redemptioni eadem vel eedem magis convenire dinoscuntur, pro ipsis quinquaginta marcis redimantur.

XI. Ad eorundem etiam nobilium petitionem annuimus, ut universi veri nobiles intra terminos regni nostri constituti, etiam in tenutis ducalibus sub inclusione terminorum ipsius regni nostri existentes sub una et eadem libertate gratulentur.

XII. Lucrum etiam camere nostre nobiles inter fluvios Draue et Zaue ac de Posoga, necnon de Walko cum aliis veris nobilibus regni nostri unanimiter solvere teneantur, nec ratione collecte marturinarum Banzolosmaia vocatarum amodo et in posterum molestentur, sed ab omni exactione aliarum quarumlibet collectarum hactenus persolvi consuetarum exempti penitus, tamquam ceteri regni nostri nobiles aliarum partium, immunes habeantur.

XIII. Si vero aliquae minere auri vel argenti, cupri, ferri vel alie fodine in possessionibus nobilium invenirentur, absque competenti concambio non auferantur, sed pro talibus possessionibus mineras auri in se germantibus, si regie placuerit voluntati, equales possessiones conferat nobilibus prenotatis. Alioquin, si ipsas possessiones minerosas regia maiestas pro concambio habere nolle, extunc ius regale seu urburas iuri regio pertinentes percipi suo nomine faciat, easdem possessiones ipsis nobilibus cum ceteris quibuscumque suis utilitatibus, proventibus et iuribus relinquendo, prout etiam idem dominus Karolus rex, genitor noster karissimus ipsis regnicolis annuerat litterarum suarum per vigorem.

XIV Si autem alicui possessionem vel possessiones contulerimus, ille possessionem vel possessiones eidem collatas pro se recipiat et non nomine nostro, sed nomine ipsorum proprio cum contradictoribus in statutione dicte possessionis apparentibus trahat litem, ita, quod nomen nostrum ipsi litigionarie questioni non immissceant, nec procuratorias litteras ad executionem talium causarum a nobis recipere possint seu inpetrare.

XV. Nobiles etiam ad loca tributorum ire non compellantur, sed per portus, quos voluerint, libero transitu absque aliquo impedimento potiantur.

XVI. Nec etiam jobagiones aliquorum regnicolarum nostrorum, ad regiam vel reginalem celsitudinem pertinentes, vel ad ecclesiarum prelatos aut potentes regni nostri attinentes, absque voluntaria permissione dominorum eorundem jobagionum potenter abducantur.

XVII. Denique istam consuetudinem, quod dum nobiles regni nostri ad conducendum uxores eorum accedunt et more solito cum eorum uxoribus ad propria redeunt, in pontibus et tributis una marca exigitur, duximus cassandam et anichilandam.

XVIII. Nichilominus etiam in civitatibus et liberis villis regalibus et reginalibus, prelatorum et baronum ac aliorum nobilium tenutis et possessionibus jobagiones regnicolarum nostrorum pro pristinis factis non possint inpediri, prohiberi seu arestari in rebus et personis, sed si iidem vulnera, lesiones, mortem, incendia et alia consimilia enormia perpetrarent manifeste, extunc ex parte eorundem iudicium et iustitia inpendatur, et quilibet querelantes in propriorum dominorum suorum presentia iudicium et iustitiam prosequantur congruentem.

XIX. Porro pro excessibus patris filius nec in persona, nec in possessionibus, nec in rebus condempnetur.

XX. Episcopi quoque, capitula, abbates, conventus, prepositi et ceteri possessionate ecclesiastice persone cum tribus litteris inquisitoriis, nisi regia maiestas destinatis probis viris, quos maluerit, experiatur et informetur inter nobiles et ecclesias super possessionibus acquirendis, possessionem nec requirere nec retinere possint, nisi cum litteris privilegialibus regiis vel reginalibus, aut iudicum vices gerentium regie maiestatis.

XXI. Homines autem capitulorum seu conventuum, qui ex mandato regio pro testimonio ducuntur, non possint esse alii, nisi hii, qui dignitates habent in eadem ecclesia. Et si ipsius capituli vel conventus testimonium in equo suo proprio ductus fuerit, tunc per diem duos grossos, si vero in equo ipsius nobilis ducetur, tunc per diem unum grossum ipsi idem nobilis dare teneatur.

XXII. Homo autem regius, qui ducitur ad citandum vel ad inquisitionem faciendam, non possit esse aliunde, nisi de eodem comitatu vel districtu, in quo est ille, qui citatur vel contra quem fit inquisitio; et capitulorum testimonium de propinquiore capitulis adducatur ad citandum aut ad inquirendum.

XXIII. Et inquisitiones non possint fieri per alium modum, nisi mediantibus litteris regalibus vel palatini aut iudicis curie regie, et congregentur nobiles illius comitatus vel districtus in unum et ab eis inquiretur manifeste.

XXIV, Causantes etiam in quacunque maxima et ardua causa concordare voluerint, iudex prohibere non possit, et de iudicio pacis ab ipsis non plus, quam tres marcas exigere valeat quoquomodo.

XXV. Universe etiam cause in facto possessionum mote et movende in tertio termino absque dilatione et prorogatione aliquali terminentur.

Et ut presentis nostre confirmationis, innovationis, constitutionis et libertatum largitionis ac concessionis series robur optineat perpetue firmitatis, nec ullo unquam tempore per nos et nostros successores in aliqua sui parte quomodolibet valeat in irritum revocari, presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales pendentis et autentici sigilli nostri dupplicis munimine roboratas.

Datum per manus venerabilis in Christo patris domini Nicolai, eadem et apostolice sedis gratia episcopi Zagradiensis, aule nostre vicecancellarii, dilecti et fidelis nostri, anno domini M^{mo} CCCmo quinquagesimo primo, tertio ydus Decembris, regni autem nostri anno decimo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus et dominis Nicolao Strigoniensi locique eiusdem comite perpetuo et Dominico Spalatensi archiepiscopis, fratre Dyonisio archielecto Colocensi, Nicolao Agriensi, Demetrio Waradiensi, Andrea Transiluano, Colomano Jauriensi, Nicolao Quinqueecclesiensi, Mychaele Waciensi, Johanne Wesprimiensi, Thoma Chanadiensi, fratribus Thoma Syrimiensi, Peregrino Boznensi, Stephano Nitriensi et Blasio Tyniniensi episcopis, ecclesias dei feliciter gubernantibus. Magnificis baronibus Nicolao palatino et iudice Comanorum, Nicolao filio Laurentii woyuoda Transiluano, Olyuerio magistro tauarnicorum nostrorum et iudice curie domine regine genitricis nostre karissime, comite Thoma iudice curie nostre, Stephano totius Sclauonie et Croatie, Dominico de Machou et Nicolao de Zeurino banis, Paulo magistro tauarnicorum reginalium, Bartholomeo pincernarum et Leukus dapiferorum, Dyonisio agazonum ac Theuteus ianitorum nostrorum, necnon Johanne filio eiusdem Olyuerii dapiferorum reginalium magistris, Symone filio Mauricii comite Posoniensi et aliis quampluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

DECEMBER 11, 1351

Louis, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, prince of Salerno and lord of the honor of Monte Sant'Angelo,¹ to all of Christ's faithful, both present and future, to whose notice these presents may come, greetings in Him who grants to kings a felicitous reign, and triumphant victory. The throne and power of the royal majesty are recognized as strong when the royal majesty maintains by provident foresight the peace and tranquility of its subjects and when those subjects are granted, as a deserved reward, expanded liberties, as well as the acknowledgment and confirmation of privileges given them with dutiful consideration by previous kings. For the preservation of loyalty, drawing on its own origin as something arising from the innate laws of reason, remains steadfast and thus always becomes firmly established among subjects when the prince exhibits benevolence toward his own gentlemen of the realm, with the result that the strength of loyalty does not weaken unless the flame of life is extinguished in the body.² Therefore, we wish to bring to the notice of all by these presents that the community and total university of the barons, nobles, and lords of our kingdom³

¹ The full royal style was used in those charters which were issued in the form of a privilege and corroborated with great seal of majesty. The "kingdoms" listed here were part of the royal style of the Árpáadian rulers from c. 1270; with the exception of the first three they constituted claims of Hungarian rulers to lands south of the Sava and the lower Danube or east of the Carpathian Mountains. On these, see, János M. Bak, "Lists in the Service of Legitimation in Central European Sources." In: L. Doležalova ed. The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing. (Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), pp. 34–45. To these Charles I added in 1323 those of "Prince of Salerno" and "Lord of the Honor of Monte Sant'Angelo" which his successors continued to use until 1386. Both domains formed part of the kingdom of Sicily and the Hungarian branch of the Angevin dynasty claimed them as their paternal inheritance. All the time, however, the honor (i.e., the barony) of Monte Sant'Angelo, situated on the Adriatic coast on the promontory of Gargano (some 175 km east–northeast of Naples), remained in the possession of the Durazzo line of the Angevins. (See Emile G. Léonard, Les Angevins de Naples [Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1954], pp. 322, 376.) For Louis' interest in the vassal territories, see Alfons Huber, "Ludwig I. von Ungarn und die ungarischen Vasallenländer," Archiv für Österreichische Geschichte 66 (1885): 1–44; G. McDaniel, "The House of Anjou and Serbia" in Vardy, et al., Louis, pp. 191–201.

² The text as printed in DRH has been followed for the edition and translation. Editors have proposed a number of emendations (some of which were anticipated by medieval copyists): e.g., debitam for debitum, naturae for nativae. This translation follows one of the suggestions of Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Lectiones variantes decretorum comitalium inclyti regni Hungariae (Pest: Trattner, 1816), p. 538) in understanding debitum as a substantive in apposition to originem. The contorted and curious word order of this sentence may well be, as has been suggested, is due to the scribe's misunderstanding of what was dictated. In addition, no little confusion is owed to the author's patent attempt to compress several concepts, expressed (as throughout this preamble) in unusual terms, within one sentence; cf. the comments in DRH, p. 128, n. I–1.

³ Most frequently the term cetus (coetus) was used in the vague sense of "collectivity." It can be, and has been indeed, pointed out that the prelates are not explicitly mentioned in the text which seems to indicate that they did not take part in the assembly. Nevertheless, they are listed in the eschatocol of the document in the way usual for charters of privilege.

appeared in our royal presence, where they demonstrated and recalled to our memory their loyalty, the burdens they had undertaken, and the outstanding merits of their steadfast services carried out with consummate zeal, loyalty, and devoted attention to our royal majesty in all our affairs and in those of the kingdom, in good times and bad. They showed us a certain charter of privilege from the most illustrious prince Andrew, son of king Béla III, once renowned king of Hungary, our ancestor and predecessor of revered memory. This charter, containing the matters set out below, is validated by his golden bull and renews and confirms the liberties granted to them, according to the said charter, by St. Stephen, king and apostle of the Hungarian people.⁴ They humbly, with one voice and one wish, besought our majesty that we deign to affirm the charter by accepting, ratifying, and approving it, and causing it to be transcribed word for word together with all their liberties contained therein (with the exception of only one article, as stated below); and by renewing those same liberties contained in the said charter, we confirm in accordance with the clemency of royal benevolence and through our royal authority, by means of our own charter of privilege, their right to hold and enjoy those liberties in the future in perpetuity. The content of that charter is this:

(Decree of 1222, the Golden Bull of Andrew II)

We, therefore, having listened with royal favor to the petition of the said barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom, having considered and recalled to our memory their faithful obedience and most sincere good will with which they were eager to please our majesty and endear, and in general recommend themselves to us in all our affairs and those of the kingdom, in good times and bad, particularly in avenging the innocent blood of the late lord Andrew, king of Jerusalem and Sicily, our dearest brother of blessed memory, the bitterness of whose savage murder filled the lands and territories of almost the entire world, by setting out with us to the said kingdom of Sicily and facing intrepidly the unforeseen circumstances of fate and all kinds of personal danger.⁵ We wish to concur favorably with their request and to fulfill their wishes, in order to encourage them to engage with dedicated mind in similar works of faithful service. We accept, approve, and confirm the above-mentioned letter of the lord king Andrew II, our dearest ancestor and predecessor, validated with his golden bull, untouched by any doubt and, transcribed word for word, inserted in this charter with all the liberties contained in it, with the sole exception of the above-mentioned one paragraph to be excluded from this privilege, namely, that contrary to the clause according to which "noble men, dying without heirs should be able and allowed in life and death to give, grant, sell, or alienate their estates to churches or to others whom they wish," they should in fact have no right at all to do so, but the property of these same nobles should descend to brothers, collateral relatives, and clansmen by right and according to law, pure and simple, without anyone's objection;⁶ with the gracious consent of the most serene princess, the lady Elizabeth, by the same grace, queen of Hungary, our dear mother,⁷ and in accordance with the counsel of our barons, we confirm the same liberties in the words of the above-mentioned bull of privilege issued by lord king Andrew, and we renew them out of our royal benevolence and order that they shall be held and enjoyed by them in perpetuity for the future. Furthermore, on behalf of a more serene condition and peaceful situation for these same men, our gentlemen of the realm, and in accordance with the wish of our mother and the counsel of these same men, our barons, we, following our usual generosity, have thought it best to concede liberties of the following sort, by adding what is written below:

⁴The ascription of “ancient liberties” to the founder of the Christian kingdom was commonplace; the reference here is to the Golden Bull (1222), which also contains this claim.

⁵ Andrew (b. 1327) was the second son of King Charles I of Hungary and a younger brother of Louis I. His father had married him to Joan, the granddaughter and heiress of King Robert of Naples; in the obvious hope that Andrew would inherit the “Kingdoms of Jerusalem and Sicily” (that was the official name of the Kingdom of Naples). When in 1343 Joan I alone succeeded her grandfather and Andrew was merely given the simple title of Duke of Calabria, Louis was bitterly disappointed. In 1345, he managed to gain the consent of Pope Clement VI (as suzerain of Naples) to his brother’s coronation, but before it could be performed, Andrew was murdered. Louis then declared himself heir of “King” Andrew and took revenge by conquering Naples in two major campaigns (1347–48, 1350). Having realized, however, that he would not be able to keep his conquest against both Joan and the papal court, he made a truce in 1352 and withdrew his armies, without ever formally renouncing his rights.

1 That if prelates or any clergy proceed against nobles of our kingdom in any suit and litigate in the court of any judge of our kingdom, then, in the matter of the lawsuit, while the case is pending, they are not allowed to impose an interdict upon the laymen or pronounce a sentence of excommunication against them, as has been the usage and custom until now, without the royal

⁶ The inalienable status of most noble estates as defined here came to be called later aviticity (aviticitas, in Hungarian ősiség) and remained the law until 1848. It was based on the principle that the estate was the common inheritance of all those who descended, in the male line, from the ancestor (avus) who had acquired it: the kindred. The kindred (generatio, genus; Hung. nemzetség) was an extended kinship group, comprising several patrilineal families, which was the basic unit of both the conquering Hungarians and other nomads (e.g., the Cumans). From the thirteenth century, noble clans claiming common descent from a known warrior or other royal grantee (de genere) were the prime possessors of inherited and acquired landed property, often holding them jointly. In order to distinguish the Hungarian kinship system from other, slightly similar ones, Erik Fügedi introduced the term klán, which is translated here as "kindred." Historians, nonetheless, cannot agree whether the kindreds that emerged to light in the documentary record in the thirteenth century have any relation to the leading groups amongst the Hungarians of the time of the ninth-century conquest. In the older literature, this article was seen as the "law of aviticity" and was held to have been "introduced" by Louis I. Today, actually ever since the seminal study of A. Murarik, Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origins of the basic institutions of entail] (Budapest: Sárkány, 1938), this passage is seen rather as a reestablishment of an old custom rooted in the tribal traditions of pre-Christian times which had never disappeared. Even though suspended by Andrew II, this inheritance pattern became again the general rule under King Charles I, and Louis only sanctioned it. See Erik Fügedi, "The avus in the Medieval Conceptual Framework of Kinship in Hungary," in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986) ch. 4, pp. 137–42; János

M. Bak, "King Louis I and the Lesser Nobility," in Vardy, et al., Louis pp. 67–80; Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 22–8.

⁷ The dowager queen, Elizabeth, daughter of King Wladislas the Short of Poland and fourth wife of Charles I of Hungary, was considered co-regent of his son in an informal way and exerted a great influence on his policies until her death in 1380.

majesty's knowledge and notice.⁸ And if the same clergy or prelates should be lawfully, with full process of law, condemned by any judge, then they should fall immediately under the penalty for the same trespass as that which they intended to impose and inflict upon their opponents.

2 Archdeacons cannot and must not exact, as they used to by evil custom, one mark for the funeral of men murdered by one person or by many.⁹

3 Small convents must cease from issuing letters of confirmation on inheritance of property, and their seals shall be without any authority.¹⁰

4 The chamber's profit is now to be paid with three groats¹¹ to be minted in our Chamber,

⁸ Similarly to other European laws of the fourteenth century, the article intends to limit the rights of ecclesiastics in secular courts. In the fourteenth century, secular authorities increasingly viewed the imposition of ecclesiastical penalties, especially excommunication, by clerical litigants against their lay adversaries in a proceeding pending before a secular judge as an abuse of spiritual jurisdiction. For a discussion of these circumstances in France and England, particularly the development of the English writ of prohibition, see Elizabeth Vodola, Excommunication in the Middle Ages (Berkeley: Univ. of California Press, 1986) pp. 159–90. The Editors are pleased to thank Kenneth Pennington, Syracuse University, for this reference. Although this provision is the first to be included in a decretum of national validity, the measure was anticipated in a royal document applicable to Transylvania and pertaining exclusively to property disputes issued on 28 July 1344. This article has been, among others, adduced to impugn an “anti-clerical” bias to the diet of 1351. We know that King Louis had already issued a mandate of this content, but that was meant only for Transylvania and only in matters of property; see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Pest/Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 9/1: 194.

⁹ This practice had already been prohibited in a papal letter by Pope Benedict XII, on the request of King Charles I, see Augustinus Theiner, Vetera monumenta historica Hungariam sacram illustrantia, I, (Rome: Typis Vaticanis, 1859; repr. Osnabrück: Zeller, 1968), p. 607, but, judging from several later transcripts of the same (e.g., Nándor Knauz, Lajos C. Dedek, eds., Monumenta ecclesiae Strigoniensis. 3 vols. Esztergom: Horak-Buzarovics, 1874–1924., 3: 274; MNL OL DI. 5022), repeated even in the fifteenth century, without avail. Bónis assumed that the abuse goes back to some pre-Christian custom of composition, transferred in a “baptized” form to the archdeacon.

¹⁰ In the fourteenth century the reliability of minor convents as places of authentication (loca credibilia, cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents, substitutes for the notaries public of other countries) came to be doubted, because it was assumed that they were easily influenced by outside parties. To limit their activity, this article cancelled one of their most important rights, the authentication of property transactions in perpetuum. This did not, apparently, solve the problem, for in 1353 King Louis ordered all convents and chapters to present their seals in Buda, perhaps for the purpose of granting full rights only to the major ones; see Ferenc Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter,” MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558 here pp. 420–22; Rady Nobility, Land and Service, pp. 66–73; Lajos Bernát Kumorovitz, “Az autentikus pecsét” [The Authentic Seal], Turul 50 (1936): 62.

¹¹ The “chamber’s profit” is mentioned here for the first time in a royal decree. It was originally the king’s income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber’s profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages, see: Boglárka Weisz, “Royal Revenues

just as in the time of the famous lord prince Charles, late king of Hungary, our dearest father of sacred memory, when three groats were paid for a whole plot; and of these groats one must be worth six pennies of our Chamber in the value and quantity of six broad Viennese ones, and fourteen of them count for one ferto.¹² However, no additional pennies or victuals viz. as fee for the taxation,¹³ are to be exacted.

5 Tax-collectors should not assess reeves and servitors living on their own property or their bondsmen, nor exact the chamber's profit from them;¹⁴ and generally speaking, they shall not receive and exact more than three groats.

6 Furthermore, we and the lady queen will cause the ninth part of all their crops and vines to be exacted from all our tenant peasants holding plow lands and vineyards in any free village of ours of whatever kind,¹⁵ and also in the udvarnok villages by whatever name they are known,¹⁶ in the Árpáadian Age” in József Laszlovszky. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64 and Csaba Tóth, “Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation in Hungary in the Árpáadian and Angevin Periods (1000–1387)” Ibid., pp. 279–94. It was regulated in the cameral contracts of the 1330s and 1340s; see 1342. The groat (grossus, Groschen) of Charles and Louis had the value of 1/21 florin, so the chamber’s profit (lucrum camerae, a direct tax, that, at least since 1231, replaced the royal income from minting gradually less valuable coins) on one peasant holding amounted to 1/7 florin. Compared to other taxes it was not a heavy burden. In the early fifteenth century, 1/5 florin per plot was regarded the customary due. This direct tax is already mentioned in the same amount in the cameral contracts.

¹² The ferto, (“quarter”, from the Germ. Viertel), a quarter of a mark of silver, according to different types of mark c. 56–60 gr., was a weight and a money of account.

¹³ The word redemptio, usually meaning a fee for issuing documents, suggests that this measure referred to unlawfully demanded payments for letters of quittance.

¹⁴ The reeve (villicus) was the head of the village administration, probably of personally free, small cultivators, in charge of minor jurisdiction and enforcement of royal laws; the tenant peasants (see n. 16, below) seem to have had elected villici and other officials (sworn men, judges). — The propertied servientes here referred to, were, of course not those predecessors of the lesser nobility who were called servientes regis in the thirteenth century, but most likely freeholders obliged to do perpetual military service under the banner of a secular or, more often, of an ecclesiastical lord. They were also subject to his jurisdiction but unlike unfree tenants, they had their own court of justice. Their subordination was not of feudal character, for they possessed their estate (predium) by the same hereditary right as nobles did. On this account, they were considered nobles themselves, but their status as nobiles prediales was lower than that of “true” nobles. Communities of prediales survived into the mid–nineteenth century see Rady Nobility, Land and Service pp. 79–84. The interpretation of this passage was for a long time pivotal in the debate about the taxation of medieval nobility, see e.g., József Illés, Az Anjou–kori társadalom és az adózás [Society and taxation in the Angevin era] (Budapest: Politzer, 1900), esp. pp. 51–5.

¹⁵ The payment called ninth is attested here for the first time. In fact it was the tenth part of the crop, namely, the ninth of what remained after rendering the tithe. (Hence, it was sometimes called “the second tithe”.) Originally the ninth seems to have been the common tax on wine, later called nona vinorum or tributum montis (tax “of the hill,” i.e., of the vineyards).

¹⁶ Jobagiones (Latined from Hung. jobbágy) were peasants living on plots owned by their landlords (including the king and queen), owing dues in kind, labor and ever more in money, but personally free and allowed to change lords. We translate the term as “tenant peasant.” The udvarnok (from Hung. udvar, from Slavic dvor, “court”) were peasants on settlements attached to the royal household, supplying it with and the villages of the queen, with the exception of walled cities; and similarly the said barons and nobles should exact and take for their own use the ninth part of all their crops and vines from all tenant, peasants holding plow lands and vineyards on any of their estates.¹⁷ And also prelates and clergy having tenant peasants should exact first the tithes and after that similarly the ninth part of all their own crops and vines.¹⁸ And if anyone should act differently as to the above exactions, we shall cause that on the estates of such a recalcitrant person who violates our present order, the ninth part of his fruits and vines be exacted for our own use without any allowance and dispensation, so that, in this way, our honor might be increased and our gentlemen of the realm might serve us more loyally.

7 Our vice-chancellor should receive and have his fee from properties that can be donated by us and our successors, according to their size, namely from a property bringing a revenue of ten marks, one mark, and the scribe should receive one ferto; from larger properties bringing a revenue of twenty marks, two marks, and likewise one ferto for the scribe, and so on, according to the increase of revenue from properties found to be free for donation in the future.¹⁹

8 No unlawful tolls, moreover, must be levied on dry land²⁰ and on rivers on those ascending or descending; only those who cross by bridge or in ferries must pay, for we have realized that nobles and non-nobles of our kingdom are greatly, indeed, too much oppressed by these tolls.

agricultural produce grown on their plots (hence occasionally called panisdator, i.e., bread giver). The villages inhabited by them (ville udvornicales) preserved their particular organization within the royal demesne until about 1400.

¹⁷ The purpose of this obligation on all landowners to exact uniform dues has been long debated. Present consensus holds that it was passed in defense of lesser landowners, who suffered from the labor shortage caused partly by the plague that had hit Hungary in the preceding years. They frequently lost their tenants to better-off nobles, who could afford to demand lower dues from those moving to their estates; see Imre Bard “Louis I and the Serfs,” in Vardy et al., Louis, pp. 81–90, briefly summarizing some of the relevant Hungarian literature; now also János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005.) In a mandate of 1 August 1370 King Louis repeated his threat to collect the ninth for the fisc if not all landowners in Co. Győr exact the same dues; see Iván Nagy. et al., eds. Hazai Okmánytár. Codex diplomaticus patrius, 8 vols. (Győr– Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1865–1891) 3: 189–90.

¹⁸ In spite of this decision, only a year later, in 1352, on the intervention of the pope the king ordered the tithe to be paid again in money. Even though only the edict to the estates of Transylvania has survived (see Franz Zimmermann–Carl Werner, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenbürgen. vol. 3 [Hermannstadt: Michaelis, 1882], pp. 88–90), one may presume that the regulation was general.

¹⁹ Cf. the later regulation in Comp. ante 1440 and 1435/I: 8.

²⁰ The “dry tolls” seem to have been based on old custom, and the king saw himself forced to relent on this point; only a year later he granted the right to the nuns of Óbuda to levy such a toll, explicitly rescinding his law of 1351 (MNL OL DI. 4230 of 27 November 1352). On road tolls in general, see Magdolna Szilágyi, On the Road: The History and Archaeology of Communication Networks in East-Central Europe (Budapest: Archaeolingua 2014) esp. pp. 91–106 and Eadem, “Mobility, Roads, and Bridges in Medieval

9 Furthermore, if any noble is condemned in a process of law by the palatine or the judge royal or any other judge, for defeat in judicial combat in cases of act of might,²¹ frivolous prosecution,²² false court appearance,²³ or proffering forged documents, or for any other capital offense,²⁴ the judge of such a case must seize such a condemned man and hold him for three days to allow peace to be restored and ordered between the parties; and if they do not reach agreement, then he must hand over the condemned man into the hands of his adversary who may inflict on him the penalty according to the custom of the realm and as required by law.²⁵ And if the plaintiff causes the death of the condemned party or inflicts any other penalty customary in the kingdom and required by law, then the latter shall be released without any payment or attachment of his property by the judge and the plaintiff.

10 Sons and brothers, relatives, sisters and wives should not be made liable for the crime of such an executed man, but should remain safe and undisturbed in their estates, houses, and

Hungary,” in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

²¹ Succubitum duelli meant the same penalty as would have been enacted had one of the parties, or their champions, been defeated in a judicial combat that, like an ordeal, was practiced throughout the Middle Ages in spite of ecclesiastical opposition.

²² Frivolous prosecution (calumnia): unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price. The term might include astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney (q.v.), or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice.

²³ For the delict of “false court appearance” see above and Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899). p. 441.

²⁴ Capital sentence, (sententia capitalis) implied loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary). This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment. The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

²⁵ A capital sentence could be passed also in a civil process and the convicted was handed over to the winning party. This was usually followed by a contract allowing the convicted to redeem his head by paying his composition, but up to the sixteenth century the execution of the sentenced was also permitted. The composition (compositio), or man price (homagium): was a sum of money, which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system, widespread among Germanic peoples of the post-migration age, aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge but continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid (the wergeld) was based on the victim’s or the culprit’s social and legal status and the nature of the crime. The man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to a lesser extent the fine of the tongue.

property. Moreover, if a man condemned in the above manner is able to come to an agreement with his opposing party, the judge may take no more than fifty marks,²⁶ and has to grant him a reasonable date for completing payment; and if he does not pay up by the date given to him, the judge may on the expiration of that date, with the assistance of a royal bailiff and the witness of any authenticating chapter or convent, take possession of a portion or portions worth fifty marks from his property,²⁷ until it is or they are redeemed for that fifty marks by those who are known to be most entitled to redemption.²⁸

11 We grant the petition of these same nobles, that all true nobles established within the borders of our kingdom, including also those living on ducal territory within the borders of our kingdom, should enjoy one and the same liberty.²⁹

12. Nobles between the Drava and Sava Rivers and of the counties Pozsega as well as Valkó are required to pay our chamber's profit in the same way as other true nobles of our kingdom; they should not henceforth be disturbed by reason of the collection of the mardurina, called bánzsolozsmája; rather they should be held exempt from every exaction of any other tax customarily paid until now, just as the other nobles of our kingdom from other parts.³⁰

²⁶ Fifty Marks was the customary composition of a nobleman.

²⁷ On this procedure of garnisheeing property, see 1320, and also Comp. ante 1400: 3 and 9.

²⁸ The redemption of estates mortgaged or garnisheed pertained always to the next collaterals on the male line.

²⁹ This sentence did not in 1351 have the far-reaching implications which later centuries, above all, Werbőczy (Tripartitum I,3) attached to it, namely that in Hungary all noblemen, from; the owner of a single plot to the mightiest aristocrat, were equal (see Bak, in Vardy et al., Louis, pp. 71–2). Although in fact no legal division existed among “true” nobles, poor or rich, this article intended only to grant “true noble” status all the freemen in the “ducal” territories, i.e., Croatia, Slavonia, Dalmatia and perhaps also Transylvania (for at that time all these were governed by the king’s younger brother, Prince Stephen) and, apparently, also to the dependent nobles (prediales), see above, n. 14. On some of the implications of this decision, see below art. 12.

³⁰ The mardurina was originally a tax of one marten pelt annually from each inhabitant of Croatia and Slavonia (see V. Klaić, “Marturina, Slavonska daca u srednjem vijeku” [The Mardurina: A Slavonian Tax of the Middle Ages], Rad Jugoslavenske akademije znanosti i umjetnosti, 157 [1904], 114–123; M. Kostrenčić et al., Lexicon latinitatis medii aevi Jugoslaviae (Zagreb: Concilium academicarum scient. et art. SFR Jugoslaviae, 1961–78], fasc. 4, pp. 701–702). There is no contemporary evidence among known charters or extant legislation about King Coloman having instituted this payment. Andrew II, however, in a charter of c. 1224–1228 specified that the inhabitants of the banatus were to pay twelve Friesach pennies per household (mansio) “sicut tempore regis Colomanni consuetum fuerat” [as was usual in the times of King Coloman]; see T. Smičiklas, Codex diplomaticus regni Croatiae, Dalmatiae et Slavoniae (Zagreb: Academia Scientiarum, 1904). III, 140, No. 214. The mardurina was explicitly commuted into a money payment in 1231: 33. The portion of the ban was called in Hungarian zsolozsma (“service,” from the Slavonic služba) or bánzsolozsmája (“service to the ban”) and was paid in kind, mostly in food and fodder (victualia bani) similar to the royal descensus in Hungary proper. Even though abolished by the decree of 1351, the mardurina survived. It was so called as late as the fifteenth century and the peasants of Slavonia had to pay half the amount of what was exacted as the chamber’s profit in the rest of the kingdom. The article is formulated rather equivocally, because it is believed that noble households were exempt from any

13 If deposits of gold, silver, copper, iron, or any other metal should be found on the estates of nobles, the deposits must not be confiscated without proper exchange; however, if it pleases the king, property of equal value should be conferred on the said nobles for those properties yielding gold. Otherwise, if the royal majesty does not wish to acquire the estates rich in minerals by exchange, then he should cause the royal dues or the royal portions of the urbura to be collected in his name, but leave the estates with all their other easements, revenues, and rights in the hands of the same nobles, just as the lord king Charles, our most dear father, approved for his gentlemen of the realm by force of his charter.³¹

14 He, on whom we have conferred any estate or estates, must occupy the estate or estates conferred on him in his own name and conduct litigation in his own name and not in ours against anyone disputing his right to the said possession, so that our name will not be mixed in any legally contested matter, nor may they acquire or receive letters of advocacy from us to conduct such cases.³²

15 Nobles cannot be compelled to pass by places of toll-collection, but they may cross at any ford they wish free from hindrance.

16 Tenant peasants of any of our gentlemen of the realm or belonging to the king's or queen's majesty or to prelates of churches or magnates of our kingdom may not be removed by force without the voluntary permission of the lords of these same tenant peasants.³³ taxation. It probably intended to stress that in collecting and paying the taxes from their estates the nobles of Slavonia were henceforth to enjoy the same standing as those living in Hungary proper (see art. 11, with n. 29, above).

³¹ Up to the early fourteenth century, all mines were in royal hands. If mineral deposits were found on private estates, the king had the prerogative to acquire it by exchange of property. In order to make private landowners interested in opening up new deposits, Charles I allowed them in 1327 (see DRH p. 80) to keep their property and to retain also one-third of the royal dues, the urbura. The latter was a due on mined metals, 1/10 of gold and 1/8 of other metals. It is believed that the expansion of precious metal mining in fourteenth-century Hungary was to a great extent due to this new arrangement; see Bálint Hóman, “La circolazione delle monete d’oro in Ungheria dal X al XIV secolo e la crisi europea dell’oro nel secolo XIV,” Rivista Italiana di Numismatica 35 (1922): 109–56, here pp. 135 ff.; now also Tóth, “Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation” (as n. 11, above).

³² This article aims at eliminating the advantage of those grantees of royal favor who were permitted to entrust litigation, for example, in matters of “objection to institution,” to the king’s advocate, who, of course, enjoyed considerable influence in the courts.

³³ The traditional text is unclear and, according to István Szabó (Századok 88 [1954]: 525–6) an additional etiam (“also”) is missing before the reference to the royal tenants. Bónis decided not to add a word but rather to solve the problem by punctuation, making the sentence an enumeration of different tenants, from those of the nobles through those of the royal couple to those of the prelates and magnates. Szabó may, however, be right in assuming that the words prelati aut potentes were added later to the decree and that is when the textual corruption crept in.

17 Finally, we wish to declare null and void that custom by which one mark is exacted at bridges and tolls from nobles on their way to marry their wives and returning home with their wives.

18 Tenant peasants of our gentlemen of the realm cannot in any way be taken, seized, or arrested in their goods or persons in cities and free villages of the king or the queen, on holdings and estates of prelates, barons, or other nobles for previous misdeeds,³⁴ but if they have manifestly committed assault, injury, murder, arson, and other similar crimes, then justice and judgment should be meted out on their account, and any plaintiffs should seek justice and appropriate sentence from their lords.³⁵

19 Furthermore, a son should not be condemned in person, property, or chattels for the crimes of his father.³⁶

20 Bishops, chapters, abbots, convents, provosts, and other propertied ecclesiastics with three letters of inquiry may not acquire or hold property unless the royal majesty receives, concerning the properties to be acquired, proof on inquiry by trusted men selected by the royal majesty from the nobles and clergy, and unless letters of privilege from the king, or queen or judges acting on behalf of the royal majesty are granted.³⁷

³⁴ The prohibition of the violent removal of peasants from other landowners' estates may have become widespread because of the shortage of labor mentioned above (see n. 17, above, with the relevant literature).

³⁵ This is not only a confirmation of the seigneurial jurisdiction of the nobility (see 31 October 1328) but — according to the detailed analysis by István Szabó (“Az 1351. évi 18. tc.” [Article 1351:18], in Szentpétery Emlékkönyv [Sz. Festschrift] (Budapest: Dunántúli Nyomda, 1938), pp. 419–39; and “Az 1351. évi jobbágytörvények” [The laws of 1351 concerning tenant peasants], Századok 88 [1954]: 497–527; French resume on pp. 743–4)—an explicit extension of it for the lesser nobility. The delicts listed in the article belong to those causae criminales which usually were not included in the jurisdiction of nobles without the right to “high justice.” Neither were the lesser nobles, in contrast to the crown, the magnates and free cities, permitted to prosecute pro pristinis factis (“for ancient delicts”). Thus, the inclusion of these crimes into this article meant a widening of the juridical powers of the lesser nobility.

³⁶ Cf. art. 10, above; while the notion of “collective guilt” was generally eschewed by the Christian Middle Ages, Louis referred to his decision of punishing only the guilty person in a charter of 1353 as a “privilege granted in grace” to the nobles (quoted by József Holub, in his review of Bálint Hóman, Gyula Szekfű, Magyar történet [Hungarian history] vols. 1–3, Századok 69 [1935]: 194). One may consider this issue in the light of the “collective property” of the Hungarian kindreds and see it as contrasting legal prosecution to rights of possession. Some historians have suggested that this passage was included expressly to bar the repetition of the horrible punishment of several dozen members of an entire clan, as was done in 1330 after the attempt by Felician Záh on the life of the royal family, probably provoked (perhaps) by the seduction of his daughter serving at the royal court; see Henrik Marczali, “Le procès de Félicien Záh,” Revue historique 107 (1911): 4358.

³⁷ Neither the wording nor the impact of the article is clear. Although the recovery of estates was to be done “in three attempts” this article speaks about acquisition; the document issued by places of authentication in such “threefold attempts” was called a letter of institution (littere statutorie, the record by a place of authentication that the institution of an owner into his property had been performed) and not a letter of inquest ((littere inquisitorie, a mandate ordering an inquest and also specifying whether the witnesses’

21 .The men of chapters or convents who are called upon as witnesses by royal order may not be other than those who hold offices in that same church. If a witness goes forth from his chapter or convent on his own horse, then he should be given two groats per day; if he is taken on the horse of a noble, then he should receive from that noble one groat per day.³⁸

22 The royal bailiff, who is called to summon or to make an inquest, cannot be from anywhere other than the same county or district where that man lives who is summoned or against whom the inquest is conducted; evidence from chapters must be sought from the nearest chapter for a summons or to an inquest.³⁹

23 And inquests cannot be conducted in any other way except by means of a letter of the king or of the palatine or of the judge royal, and the nobles of that county or district must be gathered together and the inquest must be publicly conducted among them.

24 When litigants in any major and difficult case wish to settle, the judge cannot prevent them, and he may in no way exact from them more than three marks as the fine of peace.⁴⁰

25 All suits that have been brought and will be brought in matters of property must be completed at the third term without any delay or prorogation.⁴¹

And in order that the contents of our present confirmation, renewal, ordinance, and magnanimous grant and permission of these liberties should acquire the force of everlasting validity and that no names and status should be recorded). Furthermore, it is not clear who is to be asked in the prescribed inquest “among nobles and churches.” Bónis reads the last clause as referring to charters of privilege issued by the judges ordinary in the king’s high courts.

³⁸ This measure also aims at the control of the legal activity of the chapters as art. 3, above; cf. Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen,” p. 493. The amount of per diem was later stipulated at twenty-four pennies, see: Comp. ante 1440: 19.

³⁹ Inquest as a means of producing evidence could be held in different ways. The “simple” inquest could be ordered by many authorities on the initiative of a plaintiff who needed a letter of evidence on his being injured so that he could enter an action. See Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet p. 287, who is probably wrong in making reference there to this article. Here probably not the “simple” but the “common” inquest (inquisitio communis) is meant. The latter was a procedure for obtaining material proof in which abutters, neighbors, and other nobles from the county (comprovinciales) swore an oath on their faith and “fidelity to the Holy Crown” regarding the truth of their testimony, usually in matters of property rights. The inquest, as ordered by a higher court, was usually held where the disputed estate was located or the criminal act perpetrated. See Erik Fügedi, “Verba volant...” in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. János M. Bak. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986), ch. VI; and Rady Nobility, Land and Service, pp. 70–3.

⁴⁰ If the party was convicted before a compromise could be reached, the 3 Mark fine no longer sufficed; the judge had the right to collect 50 Marks, i.e., a nobleman’s composition (cf. above, art. 10).

⁴¹ Attempts at limiting the delay in suits are characteristic for the entire medieval legislation in Hungary. See, for example: Martyn Rady, “Justice Delayed? Litigation and Dispute Settlement in Fifteenth-Century Hungary.” Central Europe, 2 (2004): 3–14.

part of it should ever be rescinded by us or our successors, we have issued this charter of privilege of ours validated by our authentic, pendant double seal.

Given by the hand of the reverend father in Christ, lord Nicholas, by His grace and that of the apostolic see bishop of Zagreb, vice-chancellor of our court, our beloved and faithful subject, in the year of the Lord one thousand three hundred and fifty-one, three days before the Ides of December, the tenth year of our reign, when the reverend fathers in Christ and lords Nicholas, archbishop of Esztergom and perpetual ispán of the same place,⁴² Dominic, archbishop of Split,⁴³ friar Dennis, archbishop-elect of Kalocsa,⁴⁴ the bishops Nicholas of Zagreb,⁴⁵ Demetrius of Oradea,⁴⁶ Andrew of Transylvania,⁴⁷ Coloman of Győr,⁴⁸ Nicholas of Pécs,⁴⁹ Michael of Vác⁵⁰, John of Veszprém,⁵¹ Thomas of Cenad,⁵² friar Thomas of Srem⁵³, friar Peregrinus of Bosnia,⁵⁴ friar Stephen of Nitra,⁵⁵ and Blaise of Knin⁵⁶ were felicitously governing the churches of God, and when the honorable barons Nicholas, palatine and judge of the Cumans,⁵⁷ Nicholas, son of Lawrence, voivode of Transylvania,⁵⁸ Oliver, our master of the Treasury and judge of the court ⁴² Nicholas (of Vásári, d. 1358), bishop of Nitra 1347–49, of Zagreb 1349, archbishop of Kalocsa 1349–50, of Esztergom 1350–58.

⁴³ Dominic, archbishop of Split, 1328–56.

⁴⁴ Denis (friar, son of ispán Lack, d. 1355), archbishop of Kalocsa 1350–55.

⁴⁵ Nicholas (erroneously called Keszei or Frankói, d. 1366), bishop of Nitra 1349, of Zagreb 1350–56, archbishop of Kalocsa 1356–58, of Esztergom 1358–66, vice-chancellor of the king 1351–56, chancellor 1356–66.

⁴⁶ Demetrius (of Futak, d. 1372), bishop of Oradea 1345–7.

⁴⁷ Andrew (of Szécs, d. 1356), bishop of Transylvania 1320–5.

⁴⁸ Coloman (illegitimate son of Charles I, d. 1375), bishop of Győr 1337–75.

⁴⁹ Nicholas (of Neszmély, d. 1360), bishop of Pécs 1346–60.

⁵⁰ Michael (son of the voivode Thomas of Szécsény, d. 1377), bishop of Vác 1342–62, of Eger 1362–77.

⁵¹ John (of Gara, son of ban Paul, d. 1357), bishop of Veszprém 1346–57.

⁵² Thomas (of Telegd, bishop of Cenad 1350–58, archbishop of Kalocsa 1358–67, 1367–75.

⁵³ Thomas (son of Benedict, friar), bishop of Srem 1349–64

⁵⁴ Peregrinus (of Saxony, friar, d. 1356), bishop of Bosnia 1349–56

⁵⁵ Stephen (friar, erroneously called Szigeti or Frankói), bishop of Nitra 1349–67, archbishop of Kalocsa 1367–82, titular patriarch of Jerusalem.

⁵⁶ Blaise, bishop of Knin 1351–58

⁵⁷ Nicholas of Zsámbok, count palatine 1342–56.

⁵⁸ Nicholas, called Kont (d. 1367, son of Lawrence Tót), lord butler 1345–51, voivode of Transylvania 1351–56, count palatine 1356–67, founder of the magnate family of Újlak/Ilok.

of our beloved mother the lady queen,⁵⁹ count Thomas, the judge royal,⁶⁰ Stephen, ban of all Slavonia and Croatia,⁶¹ Dominic, ban of Mačva,⁶² Nicholas, ban of Severin,⁶³ Paul, master of the queen's treasury,⁶⁴ Bartholomew, master of our butlers,⁶⁵ Lőkös master of our stewards,⁶⁶ Dennis our master of the horse,⁶⁷ Töttös, master of our doorkeepers,⁶⁸ John, son of the said Oliver, master of the stewards of the queen,⁶⁹ Simon, son of Maurice, ispán of Pressburg,⁷⁰ and many others held counties and other offices in our realm.⁷¹

⁵⁹ Oliver of Paks (d. 1360), judge of the queen 1336–57, master of the treasury 1347–52, 1359–60

⁶⁰ Thomas of Szécsény (fl. 1299–1354) voyovode of Transylvania 1321–42, judge royal 1349–54

⁶¹ Stephen Lackfi, senior (son of Lack, d. 1353), master of the horse 1326–43, master of the treasury 1343–53, voivode of Transylvania 1344–50, ban of Croatia and Slavonia 1350–53

⁶² Dominic Ostfi, (son of Osl, of Asszonyfalva, d. 1353), ban of Mačva 1340–53

⁶³ Nicolas of Szécs (d. 1387), steward 1342–6, ban of Croatia and Slavonia 1346–59 and later, ban of Severin 1350–55, Judge Royal 1381–4, count palatine 1385–6.

⁶⁴ Paul „Kazal” of Gara, (fl. 1310–53) master of the queen’s treasury 1334–53, ⁶⁵ Bartholomew, called Tót (d. 1352, brother of Nicholas Kont), lord butler 1351–52.

⁶⁶ Lőkös called Tót (brother of Count Palatine Nicholas Kont, d. 1359), master of the stewards 1351–59, lord butler 1352–59.

⁶⁷ Dennis Lackfi, (d. 1367) master of the horse 1343–59, voivode of Transylvania 1369–72.

⁶⁸ Töttös (or Stephen, of Becse, d. 1353), master of the doorkeepers 1342–53, master of the queen's treasury 1353

⁶⁹ John of Paks (son of Oliver), 1346 the queen's master of the stewards, 1351–55, ispán of Somogy.

⁷⁰ Simon of Meggyes (d. 1375, alias of Móríchida or Zdenc, son of Maurice), ispán of Pozsony Co. 1351–60, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1369–71.

⁷¹ The list of spiritual and secular lords was appended to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant as witnesses, merely indicating the time of the issue by reference to the persons in office.

LAW OF QUEEN MARY OF HUNGARY

22 June 1384

This decree was passed in a diet called by the government of the twelve-year old Queen Mary, which was in fact dominated by her mother, Queen Elizabeth, and Palatine Nicholas of Gara (Garai), in order to satisfy general dissatisfaction of the nobility with the new rulers. It was apparently hoped that by having the young queen confirm her father's 1351 decree, incorporating the Golden Bull of 1222—by this time already regarded as the “cornerstone of noble liberty”—the opposition could be quelled. The proem does not include the prelates among those present, even though their names feature in the eschatocol, as was usual with charters of privilege.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives [colleccio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS.: four contemporary originals, three in Hungary (MNL OL DL. 42297, 7052/2 and 7052/1) and one in Zagreb (Državni Archiv, Doc. Med. Var. 101); all on parchment with pendant seals lost or broken. (For details, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai., eds. Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445. (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 142.)

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Codex Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., Budapest: Franklin, 1896 1: 184–9 (cf. Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Lectiones variantes decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae (Pest: Trattner, 1816), pp. 55–9, 54257); Georgius Pray, Annales regum Hungariae ab anno Christi CMXCVII ad annum MDLXIV deducti. 5 vols. (Vienna: Schulz–Trattner–Bernard, 1763–70), 2: 167–8; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 10/1: 148–51; DRH, pp. 142–5.

LIT.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790) pp. 191–92; JánosM. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.–15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), p. 25.

Maria dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque regina, princeps Salernitana et honoris montis sancti Angeli domina omnibus Christi fidelibus, tam presentibus, quam futuris, presentium notitiam habituris salutem in omnium salvatore. Ea, que rei publice seu communis boni grata comoda respiciunt, tenemur aspicere consideratione gratiosa, quia tronus excellentie regalis culminis tanto solidatur felicius, quanto potestas principantis suos subiectos optate pacis presidio duxerit confovendos. Proinde ad universorum notitiarn harum serie volumus pervenire, quod serenissimo principe domino Lodouico, eadem dei gratia inclito rege Hungarie, Polonie, Dalmatie etc. genitore nostro carissimo laudande recordationis volente domino celi, cuius nutu omnia reguntur et disponuntur, absque prole masculina de medio sublato, nobisque iure successorio et ordine geniture solium et coronam dicti regni Hungarie ac scepra regiminis ipsius genitoris nostri feliciter adeptis, baronum necnon procerum et nobilium regni nostri cetus et universitatis idemptitas missis ad nos et inclitam principem dominam Elizabeth, eadem dei gratia reginam Hungarie, Polonie, Dalmatie etc. genitricem nostram carissimam eorum nuntiis, nobilibus scilicet viris Paulo litterato de Poduersya et Dyonisio filio Dominici de Oztopan, exhibuerunt nobis quasdam litteras privilegiales memorati genitoris nostri priori suo sigillo autentico in partibus Vzure casualiter deperdito consignatas, litteras privilegiales illustrissimi principis domini Andree, tertii Bele regis filii, olim incliti regis Hungarie, avi et predecessoris nostri pie recordationis aurea bulla sua roboratas super libertatibus ipsorum baronum, necnon procerum et nobilium regni nostri confectas in se confirmative continentes, tenoris et continentie per omnia infrascripte, supplicantes nostre serenitati precibus humilimis et devotis, ut memoratas litteras privilegiales ipsius genitoris nostri de verbo ad verbum inseri et transscribi faciendo simulcum libertatum articulis, tam per ipsum dominum Andream regem, quam etiam genitorem nostrum ipsis datis et concessis, et in tenoribus earundem expressis acceptare, approbare, ratificare et innovative nostro dignaremur privilegio perpetuo confirmare. Quarum tenor talis est:

(Decretum 11 Decembris 1351)

Nos itaque premissis supplicationibus memoratorum haronum, procerum et nobilium regni per dictos eorum nuntios nobis porrectis favorabiliter exauditis, memoratas litteras privilegiales paternas presentibus de verbo ad verbum insertas quoad omnes earum continentias et clausulas acceptamus, approbamus, ratificamus et nostro pro predictis baronibus, proceribus et nobilibus regni nostri privilegio innovantes perpetuo confirmamus.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales pendentis et autentici sigilli nostri dupplicis munimine roboratas.

Datum per manus reverendissimi in Christo patris et domini, domini Demetrii, divina miseratione tituli Sanctorum Quatuor Coronatorum sacrosancte Romane ecclesie presbyteri cardinalis ac sancte Strigoniensis Ecclesie gubernatoris perpetui locique eiusdem comitis similiter perpetui et aule nostre fidelis cancelarii, anno domini M^oCCC^{mo} LXXX^{mo} quarto, decimo kalendas mensis Iulii, regni autem nostri anno tertio. Reverendis et venerabilibus in Christo patribus eodem domino Demetrio dicte sancte Strigoniensis ecclesie gubernatore perpetuo, Lodouico Colocensi, Petro Jadrensi, Vgolino Spalatensi et Petro Ragusiensi archiepiscopis, Emerico Agriensis, Paulo Zagrabienis, Goblino Transsiluanensis, Valentino Quinqueecclesiensis decretorum doctore, Johanne Waradiensis, Guiliermo Jauriensis, Benedicto Wesprimiensis, Johanne Chanadiensis, Georgio Boznensis, Petro Wacyensis, Johanne Syrimiensis, fratre Dominico Nitriensis, Paulo Tininiensis, Demetrio Nonensis, Grisogono Traguriensis, Matheo Sibiricensis, Benevenuto Pharensis, Jacobo Makarensis, Michaelae Scardonensis et Thoma Seniensis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus, Corbauienti sede vacante. Magnificis viris Nicolao da Gara, regni nostri palatino et iudicie Comanorum, Ladisiao woyuoda Transsiluano et comite de Zolnuk, comite Nicolao de Zeech iudice curie nostre, Stephano de Lindua totius regni Sclauonie, Stephano filio Philpus de Machow, Templino de Sancto Georgio Dalmatie et Croatie banis, Nicolao dicto Zambo tauarnicorum, Blasio dicto Forgach pincernarum, Nicolao filio Nicolai de Telegd ianitorum, Ladislao filio Nicolai de Wesen dapiferorum, Stephano filio condam domini Dyonisii woyuode agazonum nostrorum magistris, predicto Nicolao dicto Zambo comite Posoniensi aliisque quampluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

JUNE 22, 1384

Mary, by the grace of God queen¹ of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania and Bulgaria, princess of Salerno, and lady of the Honor of Monte Sant'Angelo,² to all Christ's faithful, present and future, to whose notice these presents may come, greetings in the Savior of all.

We are obligated to look with favorable consideration on those aspects of the common good or commonwealth which are regarded as pleasing and suitable, since the throne, which is the pinnacle of royal excellence, is more happily strengthened the more the power of the ruler with the bulwark of desired peace will have considered that her subjects should be duly favored. Therefore, by these presents we wish to bring to everyone's attention that when the most serene prince, the lord Louis, by the same grace of God renowned king of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, etc., our dearest father of praiseworthy memory, was carried off from among us without male issue through the will of the Lord of heaven by whose decision all things are ruled and arranged,³ and we, by hereditary right and by order of birth, happily acquired the throne and crown of the said kingdom of Hungary and

¹ Based on some contemporary unofficial comments, such as those in the Memoriale by the Zadar patrician Paulus de Paolo (in: Joannes Georgius Schwandtnerus, ed. Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum veteres ac genuini ... : ex mss. codicibus et rarissimis editionibus bibliothecae Augustae Vindobonensis ... vindicati ... : cum amplissima praefatione Matthiae Belii, 3 vols. [Vienna: Trattner, 1766–8] 3: 724), who, aware of the unusual case of female succession, speaks of Mary as “king,” the Hungarian chronicler Thuróczy coined the term rex foemineus, and this anomaly came to be noted in historical scholarship even to our day. (Cf. Ernst H. Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies [Princeton: Princeton Univ. Press, 1956], p. 80, n. 93.) In fact no official, contemporary source refers to her except as regina, and this was demonstrated as early as in 1745 by Mathias Bél ; cf. Bak, Königtum, p. 25, with notes 100–04 on p. 93

² The full royal style was used in those charters which were issued in the form of a privilege and corroborated with great seal of majesty. The “kingdoms” listed here were part of the royal style of the Árpáadian rulers from c. 1270; with the exception of the first three they constituted claims of Hungarian rulers to lands south of the Sava and the lower Danube or east of the Carpathian Mountains. On these, see, János M. Bak, “Lists in the Service of Legitimation in Central European Sources.” In: L. Doležalová ed. The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing. (Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), pp. 34–45. To these Charles I added in 1323 those of “Prince of Salerno” and “Lord of the Honor of Monte Sant'Angelo” which his successors continued to use until 1386. Both domains formed part of the kingdom of Sicily and the Hungarian branch of the Angevin dynasty claimed them as their paternal inheritance. All the time, however, the honor (i.e., the barony) of Monte Sant'Angelo, situated on the Adriatic coast on the promontory of Gargano (some 175 km east–northeast of Naples), remained in the possession of the Durazzo line of the Angevins. (See Emile G. Léonard, Les Angevins de Naples [Paris: Presses Universitaires de France, 1954], pp. 322, 376.)

³ Louis I died 10 September 1382 and was buried in Székesfehérvár on 16 September. Mary was crowned on the following day.

the scepter of governance from our said father,⁴ then the assemblage and unified community⁵ of barons as well as lords and nobles of our realm sent to us and to the renowned princess, the lady Elizabeth, by the same grace queen of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, etc., our dearest mother, their envoys,⁶ namely the noble men, the learned Paul of Podversia and Denis, son of Dominic of Osztopán,⁷ and showed us a certain charter of privilege of our said parent, signed with his first authentic seal (accidentally lost in the province of Usura)⁸ and containing in a manner of confirmation letters of privilege validated with his golden bull by the most illustrious prince lord Andrew, son of King Béla III, renowned former king of Hungary, our ancestor and predecessor of blessed memory, about the liberties of the same barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom, in the words and contents written below. (These envoys) begged our serenity with most humble and devout requests that we should cause the said charter of privilege of our father to be inserted and transcribed word for word together with the articles of liberty granted and conceded them both by lord Andrew and our father and that we should through our own action, deign to accept, approve, ratify, and confirm by renewing the exact contents of that charter in a perpetual privilege. The contents of which is this:

(Decree of 11 December 1351)

And thus, having listened with favor to the supplications of the said barons, lords, and nobles of the realm which were presented to us by their said envoys, we accept, approve, and ratify the said paternal letter of privilege with all its contents and clauses, inserting it word for word into the present charter, and we, in accordance with our right, renew and confirm it in perpetuity for the said barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom.

In memory of this deed and for the sake of its perpetual legal force, we have granted in person our charter of privilege validated by our pendant and authentic double seal. Given by the hand of the

⁴ Louis made elaborate arrangements for the succession of “one of his daughters” in his Polish kingdom, including the grant in 1379 of the famous first charter of liberty for the lesser nobility, the “privilege of Košice” (in Polish sources: Koszyce)—see J. Dąbrowski, Ostatnie lata Ludwika Wielkiego 1370–1382 [The last years of Louis the Great] (Crakow: Akad. Umiejętności, 1918), pp. 351 f.—but there is no reliable evidence about any similar steps in Hungary, where he must have trusted in the loyalty of the new aristocracy to assure the succession of Mary, the only reigning queen in the medieval history of Hungary. That Mary does not refer even in passing, as Louis did in 1342, to any kind of “election,” merely to her hereditary right, suggests that her party wanted to emphasize her legitimacy; cf. Bak, Königtum, pp. 24–5.

⁵ The Latin cetus et uniuersitatis idemptitas, though awkward, became a standing formula in chancery documents; on the former see n. 3 to 1351.

⁶ As far as we know, it occurs here for the first time and was not to become usual until the sixteenth century that the estates presented their wishes by delegates (nuncii) to the ruler; cf. also 1385.

⁷ Paul of Podversia and Denis, son of Dominic of Osztopán (fl. 1372–1412) were probably the delegates of the counties Somogy and Pozsega, respectively; Bónis (DRH, p. 142) saw it as significant that the two envoys came from that southwest corner of the country where the opposition to Mary’s reign was soon to erupt in violent confrontation.

⁸ King Louis’ first great seal was lost in 1363 during a campaign against Bosnia; Ozora (in the text Uzura, today: Osora) is a region in northern Bosnia, between the Drina and Bosna Rivers.

most reverend lord and father in Christ, lord Demetrius, by divine mercy cardinal priest of the Holy Roman Church of the title of SS Quattro Coronati, and perpetual governor of the church of Esztergom, likewise perpetual ispán of that place and faithful chancellor of our court,⁹ in the year of the lord one thousand three hundred and eighty-four, the tenth day before the Kalends of the month of July, in the third year of our reign, when the following reverend and venerable fathers in Christ governed the churches of God felicitously; the same lord Demetrius, perpetual governor of the said holy church of Esztergom, and when archbishops Louis of Kalocsa,¹⁰ Peter of Zadar,¹¹ Ugolino of Split,¹² and Peter of Dubrovnik,¹³ bishops Emeric of Eger,¹⁴ Paul of Zagreb,¹⁵ Gobelinus of Transylvania,¹⁶ doctor of canon law Valentine of Pécs,¹⁷ John of Oradea,¹⁸ Guillaume of Győr,¹⁹ Benedict of Veszprém,²⁰ John of Cenad,²¹ George of Bosnia,²² Peter of Vác,²³ John of Srem,²⁴ Friar Dominic of Nitra,²⁵ Paul of Knin,²⁶ Demetrius of Nin,²⁷ Chrysogonus of Traia,²⁸

⁹ Demetrius (son of Peter, d. 1387), bishop of Srem 1364–68, of Transylvania 1368–76, of Zagreb 1376–78, archbishop of Esztergom 1378–87, chancellor 1377–87, cardinal priest of the Holy Roman Church of the title of SS Quattro Coronati from 1381.

¹⁰ Louis (count of Helfenstein), archbishop of Kalocsa 1383–91.

¹¹ Peter (de Matafaris of Zadar), archbishop of Zadar 1376–1400.

¹² Ugolino (of Malabranca), archbishop of Split 1356–90.

¹³ Peter, archbishop of Dubrovnik 1384–85.

¹⁴ Emerich (Cudar of Ónod, d. 1389), bishop of Oradea 1375–77, of Eger 1384–87, of Transylvania 1387–89.

¹⁵ Paul (brother of ban John of Horváti), bishop of Cenad 1377–78, of Zagreb 1378–86.

¹⁶ Gobelinus (d. 1386), bishop of Transylvania 1376–86.

¹⁷ Valentine (of Alsán, d. 1408), vice-chancellor of the king 1373–76, bishop of Pécs 1374–1408, chancellor of the queen 1384–86, cardinal 1384.

¹⁸ John, bishop of Oradea 1382–95.

¹⁹ William (Guillaume), bishop of Győr 1377–86.

²⁰ Benedict (of Himháza, d. 1387), bishop of Veszprém 1379–87.

²¹ John, bishop of Cenad 1380–95.

²² George (d. 1423?), bishop of Bosnia 1382–87.

²³ Peter (son of William), bishop of Vác 1376–1400.

²⁴ John, bishop of Srem 1376–92.

²⁵ Dominic (friar), bishop of Nitra 1372–87.

²⁶ Paul, bishop of Knin 1373–96.

²⁷ Demetrius (de Matafaris of Zadar), bishop of Nin 1354–87.

²⁸ Chrysogonus de Dominis, bishop of Rab 1363–1372, bishop of Trogir/Traù 1372–1403, archbishop–elect of Kalocsa (1403–8?)

Matthew of Šibenik,²⁹ Benvenuto of Hvar,³⁰ James of Makarska,³¹ Michael of Skradin,³² and Thomas of Zenj³³ governed the churches of God felicitously, the see of Korbava being vacant; and when the honorable lords Nicholas of Gara was palatine of our realm and judge of the Cumans,³⁴ Ladislav voivode of Transylvania and ispán of Szolnok,³⁵ count³⁶ Nicholas of Szécs judge royal,³⁷ Stephen of Lindva ban of all Slavonia,³⁸ Stephen son of Phillip ban of Mačva,³⁹ Templinus of Szentgyörgy ban of Croatia and Dalrnatia,⁴⁰ Nicholas called Zámbo⁴¹ master of the treasury,⁴² Blaise Forgács, lord butler,⁴³ Nicholas son of Nicholas of Telegd, master of the doorkeepers,⁴⁴ Ladislav, son of Nicholas of Verseny, the lord steward,⁴⁵ Stephen son of the late lord voivode

²⁹ Matthew, bishop of Šibenik 1357–92.

³⁰ Benvenuto, bishop of Hvar/Fara 1384–98.

³¹ James, bishop of Makarska 1370–86.

³² Michael, friar, bishop of Skradin 1356–88.

³³ Thomas (I), friar, bishop of Zenj 1381–86.

³⁴ Gara, Nicholas senior of (nephew of ban Paul, d. 1386), ban of Mačva 1359–75, count palatine 1375–85, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1385–86.

³⁵ Ladislav of Losonc (d. 1392) voivode of, Transylvania 1376–85 and 1386–92

³⁶ The term comes was occasionally used as an honorable title, not referring to the office of county ispán, even though there were (with some exceptions) no titled nobles in Hungary.

³⁷ Szécs, Nicholas of (d. 1387), master of the stewards 1342–46, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1346–49, 1359–68, 1372–80, of Szörény 1350–55, judge royal 1355–58, 1369–72, 1381–84, count palatine 1385–86

³⁸ Stephen Bánfi of Alsólendva (d. 1385) ban of Slavonia 1381–5.

³⁹ Stephen of Kórogy (d. 1397) ban of Mačva 1382–5 and 1394–7.

⁴⁰ Thomas (Temlinus) of Szentgyörgy, (called Count, fl. 1363–1403), master of the treasury 1378–82, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1384–85, judge royal 1385.

⁴¹ Names like those of Nicholas and Blaise (below) in the form Nicolaus dictus (=“called”) Zambo, which has been rendered in translation as simply a Christian name and a “family name,” indicate an early stage of the development of constant family names that were not always derived, as usual with the nobility, from their estate (which seems to have remained “official” as late as 1435, see e.g., 8 March 1435:4).

⁴², Nicholas Zámbo (of Mezölak, d. 1395), chief treasurer 1377–82, master of the treasury and ispán of Pozsony 1382–88.

⁴³ Blaise Forgács, (d. 1386), knight, lord butler 1383–86.

⁴⁴ Nicholas of Telegd, (d. 1391), ispán of Bihar Co., master of the doorkeepers 1383–84.

⁴⁵ Ladislav of Verseny, (son of Nicholas, fl. 1380–1406), master of the stewards 1383–86

Denis, master of our horse,⁴⁶ the aforementioned Nicholas Zárbó, ispán of Pressburg, and many others holding counties and honors in our kingdom.

Matthew of Sibenik,²⁹ Benvenuto of Hvar,³⁰ James of Makarska,³¹ Michael of Skradin,³² and Thomas of Zenj³³ governed the churches of God felicitously, the see of Korbava being vacant; and when the honorable lords Nicholas of Gara was palatine of our realm and judge of the Cumans,³⁴ Ladislav voivode of Transylvania and ispán of Szolnok,³⁵ count³⁶ Nicholas of Szécs judge royal,³⁷ Stephen of Lindva ban of all Slavonia,³⁸ Stephen son of Phillip ban of Mačva,³⁹ Templinus of Szentgyörgy ban of Croatia and Dalrnatia,⁴⁰ Nicholas called Zábó⁴¹ master of the treasury,⁴² Blaise Forgács, lord butler,⁴³ Nicholas son of Nicholas of Telegd, master of the doorkeepers,⁴⁴ Ladislav, son of Nicholas of Verseny, the lord steward,⁴⁵ Stephen son of the late lord voivode, Denis, master of our horse,⁴⁶ the aforementioned Nicholas Zárbó, ispán of Pressburg, and many others holding counties and honors in our kingdom.⁴⁷

²⁹ Matthew, bishop of Šibenik 1357–92.

³⁰ Benvenuto, bishop of Hvar/Fara 1384–98.

³¹ James, bishop of Makarska 1370–86.

³² Michael, friar, bishop of Skradin 1356–88.

³³ Thomas (I), friar, bishop of Zenj 1381–86.

³⁴ Gara, Nicholas senior of (nephew of ban Paul, d. 1386), ban of Mačva 1359–75, count palatine 1375–85, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1385–86.

³⁵ Ladislav of Losonc (d. 1392) voivode of, Transylvania 1376–85 and 1386–92

³⁶ The term comes was occasionally used as an honorable title, not referring to the office of county ispán, even though there were (with some exceptions) no titled nobles in Hungary.

³⁷ Szécs, Nicholas of (d. 1387), master of the stewards 1342–46, ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1346–49, 1359–68, 1372–80, of Szörény 1350–55, judge royal 1355–58, 1369–72, 1381–84, count palatine 1385–86

³⁸ Stephen Bánfi of Alsólendva (d. 1385) ban of Slavonia 1381–5.

³⁹ Stephen of Kórogy (d. 1397) ban of Mačva 1382–5 and 1394–7.

⁴⁰ Thomas (Temlinus) of Szentgyörgy, (called Count, fl. 1363–1403), master of the treasury 1378–82, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1384–85, judge royal 1385.

⁴¹ Names like those of Nicholas and Blaise (below) in the form Nicolaus dictus (=“called”) Zambo, which has been rendered in translation as simply a Christian name and a “family name,” indicate an early stage of the development of constant family names that were not always derived, as usual with the nobility, from their estate (which seems to have remained “official” as late as 1435, see e.g., 8 March 1435:4).

⁴², Nicholas Zábó (of Mezölak, d. 1395), chief treasurer 1377–82, master of the treasury and ispán of Pozsony 1382–88.

⁴³ Blaise Forgács, (d. 1386), knight, lord butler 1383–86.

⁴⁴ Nicholas of Telegd, (d. 1391), ispán of Bihar Co., master of the doorkeepers 1383–84.

⁴⁵ Ladislav of Verseny, (son of Nicholas, fl. 1380–1406), master of the stewards 1383–86

⁴⁶ Stephen Lackfi of Simontornya, son of Denis, Master of the Horse 1367–82.

⁴⁷ These kinds of lists of dignitaries (not witnesses) were appended to privilegial charters from the late thirteenth to the fifteenth century as a kind of authentication.

LAW OF QUEEN MARY OF HUNGARY

14 November 1385

The dissatisfaction with the regimen of Queen Elizabeth, the queen mother, led to virtual civil war by 1384 despite the affirmations of peace in the decree of that year. Several barons supported Mary's fiancée, Sigismund of Luxemburg, margrave of Brandenburg, but the queen mother secretly engaged her to Louis of Orléans, brother of King Charles VI of France. A third party, apparently mainly of lesser nobles, opposed Mary's succession and supported the claims of Charles of Durazzo, her second cousin. In the summer of 1385, the two court parties came to an agreement and Mary was wed to Sigismund, but the margrave had to flee Buda to escape the advancing Charles. In these circumstances the diet convened; it is unclear, however, whether it was called by the queens to placate the opposition or in response to the insistence of the counties. While the decree contains merely a repetition of previously confirmed liberties, the diet was a historical one, for this was the first time that the presence of "four richer nobles" from each county, already referred to in the decretum of 1267, is explicitly documented. That the privileges of liberty were not transcribed and the law promulgated (at least in both surviving originals) in the form of simple letters patent without the list of dignitaries, with the great seal en placard, may have been the consequence of the troubled situation.

MSS.: Two authentic originals: a copy for District Rábaköz in Co. Sopron, MNL OL DL. 61249, and a copy for the "Ten lances" noble community in Co. Szepes, now MNL OL DL. 38885.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. LIX–LXII; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt (Pest: Trattner, 1818), pp. 53–6; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 10/1: 216–8; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai., eds. Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445. (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 146–8.

LIT.: Imre N. Bard, "Aristocratic Revolts and the Late Medieval Hungarian State A.D. 1382–1408," Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of Washington, 1978; Pál Engel, The Realm of Stephen: A History of Medieval Hungary 895–1526 (London: I.B. Tauris, 2001) pp. 195–9.

14 NOVEMBRIS 1385

Nos Maria dei gratia regina Hungariae, Dalmatiae, Croatiae, etc. notum facimus universis, quibus incumbit, per presentes, quod cum nos sana et matura unacum prelati et baronibus ac regni nostri proceribus deliberatione prehabita pro bono communi utilitateque eiusdem regni nostri, presertim pro reformandis deformatis remeliorandisque et discutiendis ac rectificandis universis et singulis ipsius regni nostri factis, cuiusvismodi existant, et generaliter sedandis et extirpandis omnibus maleficiorum generibus post felicem obitum olim excelsi principis domini Ludouici regis Hungariae, genitoris nostri carissimi, cuius memoria in benedictione est, hincinde inter ipsos nobiles et nostros regnicolas cuiusvis preeminentie existant, qualitercumque, quandocumque et quomodocumque subortis et alternatim pullulatis, annuente divine maiestatis clementia congregationem generalem Bude, octavo die festi Omnium sanctorum iam preteriti celebrassemus, sic videlicet, ut de singulis ipsius regni nostri comitatibus singuli quatuor potiores nobiles ad diem et locum predictos convenire debuissent, demum ipso termino feliciter adveniente ipsisque nobilibus universaliter in locum predictum iuxta nostre celsitudinis decretum convenientibus ceteris et universitas eorundem per certos et fidedignos ambasiatores ipsorum maiestati nostre patefecerunt querulose, quomodo ipsi in illis omnibus libertatibus, immunitatibus libertatumque prerogativis, quas eisdem sancti et alii reges Hungarie beatarum recordationum ex bonarum et efficacissimarum ipsorum litterarum vigoribus limitando concessissent, et quas idem olim genitor noster tandemque nos roborasse, approbasse at confirmasse perhibemur, prorsus et in toto non haberentur, et in eisdem ipsi imminenti tempore non conservarentur, supplicantes iidem ambasiatores suis et dictorum universorum fidelium dicti regni nostri Hungarie nobilium in personis maiestati nostre subiective, ut ipsos in omnibus illarum libertatum prerogativis, quas eisdem dicti olim sancti et alii reges Hungarie concessisse dinoscuntur, et que per eundem olim patrem nostrum demumque per nos roborate et, confirmate esse perhibentur, omni novitate exclusa dignaremur invariabiliter conservare. Nos igitur illam inviolabilem fidelitatis constantiam in acie nostre mentis revolventes, qua iidem fideles dicti regni nostri nobiles a temporibus dictorum sanctorum et aliorum regum usque modo in tuitione et protectione huius nostri regni Hungarie, omniumque iuri sacre corone nostre regie subiectorum, specialiter autem in tuta conservatione confiniorum, limitum et terminorum eiusdem regni nostri Hungarie promptos se intrepide reddere studuerunt fideles et exhibuerunt, per que huius regni gubernacula feliciter possidemus, eorundem nobilium regni nostri fidelium supplicationem veram, ymmo toti regno nostro proficuum fore agnoscences, premisseque libertati ipsorum in toto vel in parte derogari nolentes, eisdem nobilibus regni nostri et cuilibet eorum harum serie firma et bona nostra fide mediante promittimus, spondemus et ex certa nostre maiestatis scientia pollicemur, ut ipsos amodo in antea in omnibus illis libertatibus, immunitatibus et libertatum prerogativis, que eisdem per ipsos sanctos et alios Hungarie regni reges, nostros videlicet divos predecessores donate et concesse per nosque roborate existunt et confirmate, ut iidem ad tuitionem ipsius regni nostri Hungarie ipsamque eorum fidelitatem diuturnam inviolabiliter observandam ferventius animentur, tenebimus et conservabimus perpetuo et irrevocabiliter permansuros, fruituros et gavisuros; et in huius rei evidens testimonium ipsis fidelibus nobilibus regni nostri presentes duximus concedendas. Datum Bude, septimo die congregationis nostre predictae, anno domini millesimo trecentesimo octuagesimo quinto.

14 NOVEMBER, 1385

We, Mary, by the grace of God, queen of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., make known to all to whom it may concern by these presents that when after sound and mature deliberation with the prelates, barons, and lords of our realm, for the common good and welfare of the same kingdom, for reforming in particular what was deformed and for improving, repairing, and rectifying all matters, of whatever sort they might be, of that very kingdom of ours and generally to pacify and to eradicate all kinds of crimes which have arisen or otherwise flourished in any way, time, or manner, among these same nobles and our subjects of whatever privilege, following the untroubled death of the late eminent prince, the lord Louis, king of Hungary, our dearest father of blessed memory, we, with the help of the gentle favor of the divine majesty, held a general assembly in Buda on the eighth day of the recent feast of All Saints,¹ in such a way that from each and every county of our kingdom four of the richer nobles were obliged to come for the said day to the said place, and when finally the appointed date happily arrived and all the nobles were all together in the said place in accord with the decree of our eminence, the entire assembly and community disclosed through selected and trustworthy envoys² in a complaint to our majesty how they were nowadays deprived of the full enjoyment of all the liberties, immunities, and privileges of freedom, which the holy and other kings of Hungary of blessed memory³ had granted them by defining these in their good and most efficacious charters, which earlier our father and, recently, we ourselves have validated, approved, and confirmed,⁴ but which in the present time are not being completely observed; these same envoys and the loyal nobles of our kingdom of Hungary humbly requested our majesty in person that we deign to preserve them in the enjoyment of all the privileges of liberty which the said holy and other kings of Hungary are acknowledged to have granted them and which are proven to have been validated and confirmed by our father and finally by us, as well, unchanged, without any innovations whatsoever. We, therefore, keeping steadfastly in mind that unsullied constancy of loyalty⁵ with which these same loyal nobles of our said kingdom from the times of the holy and other kings up to the present have fearlessly taken care to render and

¹ 8 November 1385.

² As the diet took place in Buda, where the queens were also staying, it is unclear why communication by envoys was necessary, but may have been customary in those years. As far as we know, it started in 1384 but was not to become usual until the sixteenth century that the estates presented their wishes by delegates (nuncii) to the ruler. In view of the turbulent political situation, one may assume that Mary and her mother remained behind the walls of the castle, while the nobles assembled in the city.

³ References to the “holy kings,” meaning above all St. Stephen, as founders of the noble privilege were common since the thirteenth century (see 1222: Preamble). The Angevin rulers were particularly eager to underscore their continuity with the royal saints of the Árpád dynasty; see Gábor Klaniczay, Holy Rulers and Blessed Princesses: Dynastic Cults in Medieval Central Europe, transl. Éva Pálmai (Cambridge: CUP, 2002) pp. 295-394.

⁴ The decretum of 11 December 1351, and its transcript of 22 June 1384 are meant.

⁵ The scribe tried to use some classical allusions (probably) from Vergil (Aeneid 4.643) and, at first or second hand, from Cicero (de nature deorum 2.57.142, cf. Catullus 63. 56) which led to a rather complicated clause.

show themselves faithful in the preservation and protection of this, our kingdom of Hungary and of all those subject to the jurisdiction of our royal Holy Crown, particularly in the safe preservation of the borders, frontiers, and boundaries of that kingdom of Hungary of ours,⁶ on account of which we happily hold the governance of the realm, recognize that the requests of these faithful nobles of our kingdom are genuine and, moreover, beneficial our whole realm, and, not wanting them to lack the aforementioned liberties in whole or even in part, promise, vow, and pledge in accordance with our specific understanding of our royal majesty⁷ to these nobles of the kingdom, each one of them, in good and firm faith by the words of these presents that we will hold and preserve them henceforth as formerly, in perpetuity, and irrevocably, in all the liberties, immunities, and privileges of freedom which were granted and conceded to them by the saintly and other kings of Hungary, namely our holy predecessors, and which are now validated and confirmed by us, to abide in, use, and enjoy these, so that these same nobles might be most fervently moved to observe their long held faith for the defense of our Hungarian kingdom; in manifest testimony of which we have caused the present charter to be granted to the same faithful nobles of our kingdom. Given at Buda on the seventh day of our said assembly, in year of the Lord one thousand three hundred and eighty-five.⁸

⁶ This might be an allusion to the Moravian border, which was threatened at that time by an invasion of Sigismund's troops.

⁷ Ex certa nostre maiestatis scientia is a recurrent phrase of royal charters, but its exact meaning is not clear. The translation we chose is probable, not certain, but renders the traditional sense of the words, which is something like "according to our understanding of our authority..." Zsuzsanna Teke's interpretation in: Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai., eds. Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1991), p. xix, according to which this clause was to refer to the king's special jurisdiction (absoluta potestas) does not explain its use here.

⁸ The diet opened on 7 November.

DECRETUM OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY IN 1386 (AFTER 27 AUGUST)

It is difficult to define the exact legal character of this document. In essence, it is a peace treaty between the “court party,” supported by a number of nobles, on the one hand, and the rebellious “Horváti-party” of southern Hungary and Croatia, who held Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth captive, on the other. Contemporary sources are too contradictory to allow us to decide whether the peace was in fact concluded or remained a plan. The document was issued from a festive gathering of prelates and nobles, called by Palatine Nicholas of Szécs (Széchi) and dramatized by an oath sworn on the head reliquary of the kingdom’s founder. Some time around 1387 the palatine and the barons did constitute a “council of the realm” which had its own seal with the inscription SIGILLUM REGNICOLARUM REGNI HUNGARIAE in order to bridge the gap of the interregnum. If this decree was issued under that seal, it would certainly qualify as a “decree of the interim sovereign power.” However, the sole surviving copy is fragmentary, incomplete, and unsealed. Hence, formally it cannot be classified as a decretum. Nevertheless, the highly significant statements about the conceptual separation of ruler and realm, expressed for the first time in such poignant words, make it constitutionally an important document for the development of political and legal thought. Therefore, we followed the editors, Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, of the Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Bp.: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH] and included this text among the decreta.

The date of this decision is also open to conjecture. John Nicholas Kovachich, who discovered the only copy, dated it as emanating from a diet that opened on 27 August 1386, but Imre Hajnik, who later edited it, dated it to 1387. István R. Kiss devoted a study to the diets of 1386 and accepted the date proposed by Kovachich, arguing that it is impossible that the murder of Queen Elizabeth in January 1387 would not have been known eight months later, when Queen Mary was already released, while the text speaks of her as still alive. This dating remains still problematic because of the equivocal formulation in art. 4, where “royal” and “reginal” majesties are separately referred to: as far as we know, Sigismund’s acceptance as ruler of Hungary was not yet decided by summer 1386, hence the “king” implied here would have to be Mary (see below, note 9). A solution might be that the wording was meant in generic (“constitutional”) terms: regia serenitas meaning any ruler, in general. Lacking more precise information on the turbulent events of the age, we accepted the dating of both Kovachich and R. Kiss.

MS.: Fragmentary copy on paper, from the Kállay Family Archives; MNL OL Dl. 52575.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer
@ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD: Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Notitiae praeliminares ad Syllogem decretorum (Pest:

Trattner, 1820), pp. 417–22; Imre Hajnik, “Az 1387. évi székesfehérvári “országgyűlés” cikkelyei” [The articles of the Székesfehérvár “diet” of 1387], Történelmi Tár (1878): 173–6; DRH, pp. 149–53.

LI.: István R. Kiss “Az 1386. évi országgyűlések” [The Diets of the Year 1386], Századok 47 (1913): 721–35; Ferenc Eckhart, A szentkorona-eszme története [History of the idea of the Holy Crown] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1941), pp. 67–8; János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 27–8; Imre Szentpétery, Magyar oklevéltan [Hungarian diplomatics] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1930), p. 211 (on the seal of the council).

Ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Noverit presens etas et futura posteritas, quod nos prelati, barones, proceres et universi regni nobiles pacis comoda provide attendentes et contentionum discrimina, que in ipso regno, proch dolor, acciderunt seu emeruerunt, cogitantes et nostros animos ad concordie semitas convertentes, ut in pacis tranquillitate coli possit congruentius et salubrius actio pacis, in Albam Regalem, in qua iuxta privilegiatam libertatem regni a sanctis regibus et eorum successoribus concessam in arduis negotiis tractandis et ordinandis solitum est regnicolis convenire, facta generali proclamatione per omnes comitatus regni Hungarie die octavo festi beati regis Stephani universaliter congregati prestito iuramento capite eiusdem sancti regis altari superposito cum sumpma reverentia manualiter tacto, super eo, quod commodum rei publice et utilitatem regni ac sacre corone communem contra quoslibet vovebimus, etiamsi regia maiestas contra id facere vellet, sibi contradicemus ac prohibebimus eandem cum effectu, contraque extraneam potentiam nos omnimode resistendo oponemus pro defensione regni et suarum tenutarum et confiniorum, necnon etiam contra quemlibet potentem internos insultantem et actus potentiarios exercentem et contra presentis pacis ordinationem rumpentem totis viribus insurgemus, pro reformatione et bono statu regni fecimus, ordinavimus et promulgavimus unionem et, pacis reformationem, prout in capitulis et articulis infrascriptis lucide continentur, perpetue et inviolabiliter duraturam.

I. Item primo, si alique novitates vel motiones difficiles in regno emergi contingerint, tunc regia maiestas prelati et baronibus regni ad tractandum et consiliandum de potioribus nobilibus regni adiungat et assummat ad ea recuperanda.

II. Item duos honores baronatus una persona obtinere seu tenere non possit, et quod ecclesiastice persone seculares honores nullo modo obtinere possint, et e converso seculares persone ecclesiasticos honores quacunque occasione pretensa tenere vel usurpare non possint, maxime sedibus et dignitatibus vacantibus.

III. Item prelati et barones pro consiliariis deputati iurabunt, quod in consiliis exhibendis et dandis non solum regie maiestatis aut eorum vel suorum propriam querent utilitatem, sed communem utilitatem regni et sacre corone regie, et e converso ipsa regia celsitudo promittet huiusmodi consiliariis regie serenitati falsum et communi bono contrarium suaserint consilium, extunc rescita huius veritate de medio huiusmodi consiliariorum tamquam falsi turpiter eiciantur nunquam ad eadem prebenda admittendi.

IV. Item regia serenitas promittet suo iuramento, quod omnem rancorem, invidiam, contemptum et iniuriam, [que] contra quoscunque et cuiusvis conditionis homines ex quibuscunque actenus habuisset causis, ex cordibus suis prorsus evellendo relaxabit, nec ipsis seu alicui eorundem palam vel latenter per se vel alios ratione previa quovis tempore quidquam inputabit, similiter et reginalis maiestas.

V. Item quod thesaurum domus regie tam in reliquiis, quam in omnibus aliis tempore proxime rixe et pugne per Johannem banum Machouiensem et fratres suos ac Johannem priorem Auranie et ad eosdem pertinentes contra condam Nicolaum de Gara palatinum et suos fratres, fautores et adherentes receptum idem Johannes banus et prior ac eorum fratres mediante ipsorum iuramento, prout plenius possunt, recuperare procurent et domui regie restituere.

VI. Item omnes captivos, quos idem banus et prior Auranie ac fratres eorum et ad eosdem pertinentes pro nunc in ipsorum captivate habent et conservant, libere abire permittant, et nec ipsos vel ad eosdem pertinentes in possessionibus vel aliis bonis ipsorum inpediant et occupata eisdem remittant.

VII. Item idem banus et prior et eorum fratres omnia castra, civitates et fortalitia, opida, villas et possessiones et quevis iura regalia vel reginalia necnon ceterorum nobilium, que pro nunc occupata tenent, libere illis, ad quos pertinent, remittant sine mora.

VIII. Item quia premissa rixa non in contemptum vel iniuriam reginalis maiestatis, sed propter antiquas inimicitias inter predictas partes ortas et habitas commissa et facta extitit, ideo ipse domine regine predictis Johanni bano, Johanni priori Aurane ac suis proximis adherentibus, familiaribus et sequacibus eorundem, quod si forte contra honorem regalem seu reginalem commissum extitisset, ut status regni in melius reformetur, radicitus de ipsarum cordibus evellendo, literis etiam ipsarum et aliis ad hec necessarie occurrentibus remediis confirmando, ipsos in curiam reginalem benigne recipiant ipsosque secundum decentiam status et conditionis eorum regalibus honoribus honorando et sublimando, prout et ceteros nobiles ac barones regni regalis maiestas consuevit, condecenter in consiliis et aliis honorare atque sublimare dignentur.

IX. Et ut omnino radicitus et expressa denotatione via odiis malitiis, partialitatibus ac scandalis precludatur et in regno pacis commoda reform[entur, si] predictae domine regine et earum heredes vel soboles ab eisdem procreate aliquam vindictam, afflictionem vel perturbationem aut quomodocunque animi motionem super facto pugne superius expresse facerent vel fieri permittent, vel ad hoc consensum prebebunt ad suggestionem quorumcunque, ita quod si contingerit ipsarum maiestatem aliquorum suggestionibus et inductionibus incitari vel aliqua occasione commoveri, tunc omnes prelati, barones ac universi regni nobiles talem partem nullo modo fovere, ymo expresse contradicere et se retrahere tenebuntur. Nullus etiam omnino hominum super eodem facto ac interfectionibus hominum quorumcunque in ipsa pugna illatis et quibuscunque eventibus ibi accidentibus signanter autem heredes, consanguinei, affines, amici et quilibet attinentes illarum personarum, que ibi occubuerunt vel quomodocunque offense vel dampnificate extiterunt, verbo vel [facto] –

1386 (AFTER AUGUST 27)

For the perpetual memory of this matter: let the present age and future posterity know that we, the prelates, barons, lords, and all the nobles of the kingdom, properly and carefully contemplating the advantages of peace, and the causes of the strife, which, alas, has occurred or arisen in this kingdom, considered and turned our minds to paths of agreement, so that the works of peace may be more appropriately and more profitably cultivated in the calm of peace.¹ We, after a general proclamation was made in all the counties of the kingdom of Hungary, have assembled together on the eighth day of the feast of the holy king Stephen,² in Székesfehérvár—where according to the privileged liberty of the kingdom granted by the holy kings and their successors, it is customary for the gentlemen of the realm to assemble to treat and arrange urgent affairs³—and swore an oath on the head of the same holy king⁴ that had been placed on the altar and touched with our hands in the greatest reverence, that we shall undertake to protect, the welfare of the commonwealth and the common good of the kingdom and the Holy Crown against anyone. We shall oppose and actively prohibit even if the royal majesty wishes to act in opposition⁵ and shall also oppose any outside power with utmost resistance for the defense of the realm, its boundaries, and dependencies. Furthermore, we shall rise in all our strength against any powerful man committing attacks and acts of might, and disturbing the ordinance of the present peace; and acting in support of the restoration and good order of the kingdom, we have established and proclaimed a union and the restoration of peace to last perpetually and inviolably, as is clearly contained in the chapters

¹ For the preceding events, see Imre N. Bard, “Aristocratic Revolts and the Late Medieval Hungarian State A.D. 1382–1408,” Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of Washington, 1978; Pál Engel, The Realm of St. Stephen: A history of medieval Hungary, 895–1526, transl. Tamás Pálosfalvi, ed. Andrew Ayton (London: Tauris, 2001) pp. 195–208. After the forced abdication of Mary, the coronation of Charles of Durazzo on 31 December 1385, and his murder by the queens’ men in February 1386 (see Lorenzo di Monaci, “Carmen de Carolo parvo” in F. Cornelius, ed., Chronicon de rebus Venetis [Venice, 1758], pp. 325–81), civil war broke out once more, this time between the supporters of Mary and of Charles’s son, King Ladislas of Naples (1386–1414). See also: Pál Engel, “Charles II de Duras, roi de Hongrie et son parti,” in: La dédition de Nice à la Savoie 1388 &c. (Paris, 1990) pp. 199–205.

² In Hungary, 20 August is observed as St. Stephen’s Day.

³ On the tradition of judicial and political assembly in Székesfehérvár, since at least the early thirteenth century, see 1222:1, 1231:1.

⁴ The head-reliquary of St. Stephen, which, together with the crown adorning it, also played a role in 1440, was kept in the treasury of the collegiate chapter of Székesfehérvár and disappeared probably during the Ottoman siege of the city in 1543. It is not known even from a picture. However, in the eighteenth century a similar reliquary, maybe the same, was in the custody of the Dominicans in Dubrovnik and recovered from them by Maria Theresa in 1769.

⁵ It is not entirely clear whether the term “royal majesty” here and in the following refers to Queen Mary who was taken prisoner by the rebels on 25 July 1386, or rather to any ruler, perhaps to one (Sigismund of Luxemburg?) who was to be elected by the lords who took on themselves the protection of the “Holy Crown’s” interest (see also below, notes 9). At any rate, the concept of a government that would resist even the actions of the ruler in the name of the “kingdom,” is an important step towards the development of a transpersonal concept of the “state”; see Bak, Königtum, pp. 27–8, summarizing the research of Ferenc Eckhart and others as well.

and articles written below.

1 Then, first, if any novelties⁶ or troublesome events chance to arise in the kingdom, then the royal majesty should augment the prelates and barons of the kingdom by having some of the more powerful nobles join them in discussing and taking counsel about restoring order.⁷

2 Then, one person may not obtain or hold two baronial offices,⁸ and ecclesiastical persons may in no way receive secular offices, and, in turn, secular persons may not hold or usurp ecclesiastical prebends, especially vacant sees and dignities, on any pretense.

3 Then, prelates and barons chosen as counsellors will swear that in offering and giving advice they will seek not only what is advantageous for the royal majesty, themselves, and others, but rather the common advantage of the kingdom and the royal Holy Crown, and, conversely, the royal eminence will promise to follow and to observe inviolably the same advice in good faith; and if anyone from among these counsellors should give the royal serenity false advice contrary to the common good, then when the truth of this has been found out, he should be dishonorably expelled from their midst as a false counsellor, never to be admitted to these offices again.

4 Then, the royal serenity shall promise on oath to discard all rancor, envy, contempt, and harm which up to this point she might have held against any men of any estate for whatever reason by directly erasing it from her heart, nor will we bring any charges against them or against their people, publicly or privately, by herself or by others, at any time or for whatever previous reason; and the same shall hold true for her majesty the queen mother.⁹

5 Then, John, ban of Mačva¹⁰ and John, the prior of Vrana and their brothers¹¹ should make sure to return and restore to the royal palace, under their own oath,¹² as fully as they are able, the

⁶ Nouitas implied in medieval understanding some evil innovation, it was often used for heresy; cf. Du Cange, Glossarium 4:657, where reference is made to the French legal term nouvelleté, meaning usurpation of rights or property.

⁷ "Prelates and barons" stands for the informal royal council. This program of adding lesser nobles to the council, formulated as early as 1298 (see 1298:7), did not become a reality until the late fifteenth century.

⁸ Cf. 1222:30.

⁹ The meaning of the expressions regia serenitas and reginalis maiestas has been often debated: while the context here suggests that Queen Mary and her mother, Elizabeth, are meant; this usage would confirm the incorrect assumption that Mary was in fact addressed as "king" (cf. n. 1, to 1384). If, however, this decree already implied the impending election of Sigismund, the regia may refer to him, and the reginalis to Mary or to both she and her mother.

¹⁰ John of Horvát (Horváti) (d. 1394), was ban of Mačva 1375-81, 1385-86, rebel from 1386. He and his three brothers, one of whom was Paul (bishop of of Cenad 1377-78, of Zagreb 1378-86) were, as main supporters of Charles and Ladislas of Naples, the leaders of the rebellion in the south.

¹¹ John of Palisna, (d. 1391), ally of John Horváti, was prior of Aurana/Vrana, Castle Vrana, near Zara in Dalmatia, the seat of the prior of the Knights Hospitallers in Hungary and Croatia.

¹² Apparently, the booty was already distributed among the rebels and they were to recover it under the threat of oaths.

treasures of the royal palace, both the relics and all the other things, taken away during the time of the recent strife and struggle of ban John, prior John of Vrana, their brothers and dependents with the late Nicholas of Gara, count palatine,¹³ and his brothers, followers, and adherents.

6 Then, this same ban and the prior of Vrana, their brothers and dependents should permit all captives whom they now hold and keep in their custody to leave freely, and neither should they hold back possessions or other goods of the captives and their dependents, but should return to them all things they had seized.

7 Then, the same ban and the prior and their brothers should return freely without delay to those to whom they belong all the castles, cities and fortifications, towns, villages and estates, and the usurped royal rights of whatever sort, and those of the queen or other nobles, which they currently occupy.

8 Then, since the aforementioned strife arose not for the contempt or injury of the queen's majesty, but was induced and carried on because of ancient enmities among the aforementioned parties,¹⁴ the same ladies, the queens, in order that the state of the kingdom may be restored for the better, should entirely root out from their hearts anything that the aforementioned ban John and prior John of Vrana, their close relatives, retainers, and followers, may have by chance committed against the royal honor or that of the queen; and they should confirm this by their letters and other necessary and pertinent remedies,¹⁵ and they should kindly receive these men at the queen's court and should deign to honor and promote them appropriately in council and otherwise by honoring and promoting them to royal honors, which are in accordance with the preeminence of their station and birth, just as the royal majesty is wont to do with other barons and nobles of the kingdom.

9 And in order that the road to hatred, ill will, partiality, and scandal be completely and expressly barred, and the advantages of peace in the kingdom be restored, then if the aforesaid ladies, the queens, and their heirs, and the offspring born to them should cause or permit any revenge, trouble, or disorder, or let a climate of enmity emerge because of the above-mentioned struggle, or consent to any suggestion by anyone so that the suggestions and intentions would incite or move their majesties to some incident, all the prelates, barons, and all noblemen of the kingdom will be bound in no way to support such a posture, but rather to speak up strongly against it and take no part in it. None of the people involved in this action, or the killing of any man in the said struggles and the events connected with them, particularly the heirs, relatives, kinsmen, friends, and others of their adherents who lost their lives there or suffered injury by word or action ¹⁶ ¹⁶The surviving text ends in mid-sentence.

¹³ Nicholas senior of Gara/Garai (d. 1386), ban of Mačva 1359-75, count palatine 1375-85, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1385-86; was the chief supporter of the dowager queen and was killed in a skirmish near Gara (today: Gorjani, Croatia) when the queens were taken prisoner. See Biographisches Lexikon zur Geschichte Südosteuropas. Matthias Bernath et al., eds. Munich: Oldenbourg, 1974-81, 4 vols., 2:7-9.

¹⁴ This was partly true, for the competition between the two factions went back to the time of Louis I, and the rebellion of the Horváti began against the hegemony at court of their opponent, Palatine Garai. Thus, the revolt against the queens could reasonably be presented as a factional feud.

¹⁵ The punishment of rebellion implied the immediate loss of all property that was then usually distributed among the faithful. Therefore, the sentence for charge of infidel only be annulled, but the grants of confiscated estates had also to be revoked. These measures may be implied in the clause aliis ad hec necessarie occurrentibus.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY (October 1397)

This decree is the first piece of legislation that can be styled “dualist” in that it reflects a compromise between king and noble estates. It was also the first of many laws which attempted to strengthen the country’s position against the growing threat of Ottoman advance from the south. After the disaster at Nicopolis (28 September 1396)—whence Sigismund returned to Hungary only with great difficulties, many months later—the king’s position was anything but stable. During his absence the party of Ladislas of Naples gained new strength and the powerful Lackfi family was attempting a coup (see Imre N. Bard, “Aristocratic Revolts and the Late Medieval Hungarian State A.D. 1382–1408,” Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of Washington, 1978, pp. 40-50). However, the king managed to rally support and put down the rebellion swiftly. When he called a diet to the center of the southern defense, Timișoara, his aims were to stabilize central authority with the help of faithful aristocrats and the county nobility, on the one hand, and to reform the defense of the country, on the other.

The decree contains, without explicitly referring to their original issue, most of the articles of the Golden Bull of 1222, and almost all of those added to it in 1351 by Louis I. In addition to these re-issued privileges, the edict contains another 25 articles. These are mixed in terms of cui prodest: some strengthen the hand of the king, e.g., in recovering royal property, others enhance the power of the counties, the seat of the lesser nobility’s power, and a few have an anti-clerical character. The reform of the army — had it been fully implemented — could have helped the entire nation in its fight against the Ottoman Empire.

The diet was called for 29 September 1397 and lasted less than a month. On 26 October Sigismund issued charters already quoting passages from the decree passed at the meeting (Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Vol. 1 (Budapest: Akadémiai K.), 1954 [=ZsO] no. 5037) and the deputies of Trogir, who arrived on that day, were too late to participate. No dated and formally-issued original of this decree has survived; the only text we have was discovered in the nineteenth century in a simple transcript probably prepared for some landowner. Reference is, however, made to a copy which the nobles of Co. Zagreb presented to the ban in 1398, regarding their rights (see below, art. 41); hence, we may assume that the county delegates received originals in Timișoara or were sent copies later, as was usual.

MS.: Parchment with octagonal privy seal en placard; seriously damaged. State Archives, Bratislava (Slovakia), County archives, Diaetalia 1/30.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search

- EDD.: Nándor Knauz, “Az 1397-ki országgyűlés végzése” [Decree of the diet of 1397], Magyar Történelmi Tár 3 (1857): 213–38; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai., eds. Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445. (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 157–74.
- LIT.: Knauz, op. cit.; József Deér, “Zsigmond király honvédelmi politikája” [Defense policies of King Sigismund], Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 37 (1936): 1–57, 169–202; Joseph Held, “Military Reform in Early Fifteenth Century Hungary,” East European Quarterly, 11,2 (1977): 129–39; András Borosy, “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in János M Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary pp. 63–80 (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982). pp. 63–80; Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386–1437. Trans. A. Szmodits. (Budapest: Akadémiai., 1990), p. 175 f.; Idem, “Die Zentralisationsbestrebungen König Sigismunds in Ungarn,” in Etudes historiques (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1960) 1: 317–58 (also: Studia Historica Acad. Sc. Hung. 50, ibid., 1960.) On the seal, see: Lajos Bernát Kumorovicz, “A magyar királyi egyszerű és titkos pecsét hasznalatának alakulása a középkorban” [Development of the use of the Hungarian royal simple and privy seal in the Middle Ages]. A Bécsi Magyar Történetkutató Intézet Évkönyve, 7 (1937): 69–112.

(1397 OCTOBRIS)

Nos Sigismundus dei gratia rex Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. marchyoque Brandenburgensis etc. memorie commendante te[nore pre]sentium significamus quibus expedit universis, quod cum per insultus et potentiam Turcorum et aliorum scismaticorum hominum in quibusdam annorum curriculis iam retrolapsis usque presens tempus in confiniis regni nostri Hungarie pridem plurime devastationes, spoliationes et concremationes possessionum, hominum utriusque sexus, virorum scilicet et mulierum. [su]bductiones, alia etiam enormia intollerabilia, per que facta nostra et omnium regnicolarum nostrorum potentia dimi[nuta es]se videbatur, creberrime commissa fuissent et, committerentur de presenti, eapropter de bono et tranquillo statu ac restauratione confinium dicti regni nostri volentes con.templari, tam pretextu premissorum, quam etiam pro aliis factis et arduis negotiis ipsius regni nostri et sacre regie nostre corone universos prelatos et viros ecclesiasticos e[minent]i dignitate prefulgentes ac barones nostros, item de quibusvis comitatibus regni nostri singulos quatuor probos et nobiles viros plena potestate ceterorum consociorum ipsorum fungentes ad festum presens beati Mychaelis archangeli pro congregatione et consilio generali in premissis facienda huc in Temeswar litteris nostris mediantibus [convenir]e mandassemus, demum eisdem in locum et terminum prenotatos pariter accersitis et convenientibus annotati barones et nobiles regni nostri super omnibus premissis diligenti tractatu, sano consilio et matura deliberatione inter se prehabitis taliter inter se duxerunt disponendum et ordinandum;

I. Ut annuatim in festo sancti regis Stepha[ni], nisi arduo negotio ingruente vel infirmitate fuerimus prohibiti, Albe teneamur solempnizare.. Et si nos interesse non poterimus, palatinus procul dubio ibi erit pro nobis, ut vice nostra causas audiat et quemlibet presentibus partibus iudicet, et omnes servientes, qui voluerint, libere illuc convenient.

II. Et quod nec nos, nec posteriores nostri in aliquo tempore servientes capiamus vel destruant favore alicuius potentis, nisi primo citati fuerint et ordine iudiciario convicti.

III. Super predia servientum, nec domos nec villas descendimus, nisi vocati. Super populos etiam ecclesiarum ipsorum nullam penitus collectam faciemus.

IV. Comites parochiani predia servientum non discutiant, nisi causa monetarum. Comites curie parochiani nullum penitus discutiant, nisi populos sui castri. Fures et latrones bylokii regales discutiant, ad pedes tamen ipsius comitis.

V.=1222: VI.

VI. Si autem rex extra regnum exercitum ducere voluerit, servientes cum ipso ire non teneantur, nisi pro pecunia ipsius, et post reversionem iudicium exercitus super eos non recipiet. Item si extra regnum cum exercitu ierimus, omnes, qui comitatus habent vel pecuniam nostram, nobiscum ire teneantur. Tempore autem maxime necessitatis huius regni Hungarie, dum scilicet extranea potentia paganorum scilicet et aliarum nationum metas et confinia eiusdem regni hostiliter subintrare conaretur, baro etiam in metis et confiniis dicti regni nostri honorem a nobis tenens huiusmodi potentie resistere nequiret, tunc universi regnicole una nobiscum adversus iam dictorum potentiam more exercituantium, specialiter autem barones honorem a nostra maiestate possidentes personaliter et quolibet tempore unanimiter insurgere, aut si nos in dicto regno nostro aliis negotiis regni nostri occupati non essemus, tunc cum domino palatino regni nostri ad metas et confinia eiusdem regni nostri taliter exercituare, ut nobiles, quotquot fuerint fratres in numero absque ulla divisione simul coniuncti et in una curia residentes, unum ex ipsis mittere, ceteri vero divisionaliter ab invicem sequestrati, singuli singulariter exercituare teneantur. Si autem quispiam ipsorum possessionatorum hominum infirmitate inhibitus exercituare nequiret, tunc homines suos more exercituantium disponendo faciat exercituare. Minores autem nobiles jobagionibus orbat et privati, si evidenter eorum egritudinis causam declarare valebunt, expediti habeantur. Si vero quemquam possessionatorum hominum ab ipso exercitu abesse contingeret vel quispiam ipsorum in ipsum proficisci recusaret, tunc prout numerus et quantitas jobagionum ipsorum affuerit, videlicet in tantis florenis auri per centum denarios novos computatis, quantos jobagiones habuerint, cetera autem nobiles persone jobagionibus carentes in singulis tribus marcis denariorum convincantur eo facto. Hoc non pretermisso, ut quivis baronum et nobilium regni nostri possessionatus secundum exigentiam status et possibilitatem virium ipsorum, scilicet de quibus vis viginti jobagionibus unum pharetrarium more exercituancium promptuare et in ipsum exercitum durante duntaxat presenti guerra paganorum secum ducere et exercituare facere teneatur. Preteritis autem guerris presentibus [ge]neratio exercituantium regnicolarum universorum pristinam libertatem temporibus aliorum regum, nostrorum scilicet predecessorum assuetam viceversa optinebit. Nichilominus exercituantes in itinere ipsius exercitus tam in eundo, quam etiam in redeundo in expensis ipsorum propriis procedendo ab omnibus spoliis, rapinis et receptionibus victualium inhibiti sint et prohibiti, si vero quemquam exercituantium secus in hiis facere contingeret, extunc idem absque prorogatione aliquali in facto potentie convincatur eo facto.

VII. Palatinus omnes homines regni nostri indifferenter discutiat. Iudices vicarios non habeant, nisi unum in curia sua.

VIII. = 1222: IX

IX.=1222:X.

X.= 1222:XII.

XI.=1222:XIII.

XII. Palatinus autem, iudex curie, bani et comites regios honores [ossidentes, si se] iuxta honoris eorum qualitatem non habuerint vel distruxerint populos castri eorum, etiam et [al]terius cuiusvis homines, convicti super hoc coram omni regno dignitate sua turpiter spolientur cum restitutione ablatorum.

XIII.= 1222:XV.

XIV. =1222:XVI.

XV.=1222:XVII.

XVI.=1222:XVIII.

XVII.=1222:XIX.

XVIII.=1222:XXI.

XIX.=1222:XXI.

XX.=1222:XXIII.

XXI.=1222:XXIV.

XXII.=1222:XXV.

XXIII.=1222:XXVI.

XXIV.=1222:XXIX.

XXV.=1222:XXX.

XXVI.=1351:I.

XXVII.= 1351:II.

XXVIII=1351:III.

XXIX.=1351;IV.

XXX.= 1351:V.

XXXI.= 1351:VI.

XXXII. Item tam nos vel -----[quam] etiam prelati, barones et nobiles et possessionati homines aquas piscinosas habentes tertiam partem omnium piscium ipsorum piscandorum in aquis fluentibus, in lacubus autem vulgo mo[char] seu morotua vocitatis mediam partem quorumlibet piscium annuis piscationibus faciemus et iidem [domini] prenotati recipere debeant, ut hoc honor noster augeatur et ipsi regnicole nobis fidelius possint famulari.

XXXIII.=1351:VII.

XXXIV.= 1351:IX.

XXXV.=1351:X.

XXXVI. Item supplicatum extitit nostre serenitati per regnicolas regni nostri universos, ut cunctos nobiles et quosvis possessionatos nostri Sclauonie, necnon comitatum de Posega et de Valko in solutionibus lucri camere nostre seu mardurinarum nostrarum eisdem libertatibus, in quibus iidem regnicole nostri forent constituti, relinquere dignaremur.

XXXVII.=1351:XIII.

XXVIII.= 1351:XIV.

XXXIX.=1351:XVII.

XL.=1351:XVIII.

XLI.=1351:XIX.

XLII.= 1351:XX.

XLIII.=1351:XXI.

XLIV.=1351:X11.

XLV.=1351:XXIII.

XLVI.=1351:XXIV.

XLVII.=1351:XXV.

XLVIII. Preterea eisdem regnicolis necnon ad eorundem instantiam annuimus, ut omnes et quoslibet homines nostros alienigenas et advenas de dicto regno nostro emittimus et emitti faciemus preter hos, videlicet magnificum virum dominum Stiborium wayuodam ac venerabiles patres dominos Eberhardum Zagrabiensis et Maternum Transsilvanensis ecclesiarum episcopos, et quod nos ac prenotati episcopi et wayuoda nostri nostros et eorundem familiares alienigenas et advenas de cunctis nostris et eorundem castris, tenutis et possessionibus usque ad octavas festi Nativitatis domini nunc venturi excipiemus, transmittemus et transmitti faciemus per dominos episcopos et w[ayuo]dam prenotatos. Nec amodo et deinceps plures homines advenas, seculares videlicet et ecclesiasticos ad honores seculares et beneficia ecclesiastica promovebimus nec predictis auctoritatem promovendi committimus, in cunctis etiam castris, tenutis et possessionibus infra ambitum dicti regni nostri habitis homines Vngaric[e nati]onis locabimus et deputari faciemus per iam dictos.

XLIX. Ceterum ordinatum etiam extitit et dispositum per antefatos barones et regnicolas universos, ut omnia castra, tenute, civitates et possessiones, que vel quas quibusdam eo tempore, quo iidem adversus nos animo indurato et manu poten[ti insur]rexissent, pre timore insurrectionis eorundem tradidissemus et donassemus, simul cum talibus donationibus, quas hiis, qui inter nostram serenitatem et predictos rebellizantes in nos pro pace facienda tunc laborassent aut pacem fecissent, contulissemus et tradidissemus pre timore prenotato, [merito] et iusto modo auferre v[aleamus] ab eisdem. Donationes autem universas, quas hiis, qui nostre serenitati fideles famulatus inpendissent, et qui in nostris servitiis neci traditi et dimembrati fuissent aut suorum filiorum et proximorum ipsorum necem ac sanguinis eorundem effusionem passi essent, fecissemus, ratificabimus et confirm[abimus litter]arum nostrarum per vigorem, et quod cuncta castra, tenutas ac possessiones quaslibet, quas et que vendidissemus aut inpignorassemus, ab hiis, quibus ipsas et eadem vendidissemus aut inpignorassemus, sine omni pecuniaria solutione ecipere et in ius ac proprietatem sacre corone nostre regie [ad manus nostras] applicandi habeamus auctoritatem.

L. Item si qui ex prelatiis seu viris ecclesiasticis, baronibus et eorundem baronum filiis ac magnatibus contra quoscunque in quibusvis factis et causis, in facto potentie, delationis falsarum litterarum, calumpnie et astationis falsi termini annotatis gravaminibus in presentia q[uorundam iu]dicum convincerentur, hos non protegemus, sed ad satisfaciendum eorum adversariis eosdem per dominum palatinum astringi faciemus.

LI. Nichilominus si quipiam terminos eorum iuramenti, duelli, communis inquisitionis et proprie obligationis deputatos obmiserint, eisdem amplius alter terminus pro exse[cutione----- m]inime debeat deputari, sed secundum dignitatem talis cause iudex ordinarius procedere debeat. LII. Nobiles etiam regni nostri et aliorum quorumvis jobagiones pro nullis factis regni nostri amplius dicari faciemus, sed eosdem in eisdem libertatibus, quibus iidem temporibus regum predecessorum [nostrorum sunt gavis], frui et gratulari commitemus.

LIII. Hoc declarato etiam, quod si aliquis aliquas novitates, scilicet facta potentiaria, spoliaciones, derobaciones et illegitimas possessionum occupationes ac alia consimilia cuiuspiam fecerit aut irrogasset, tunc vicecomes et iudices nobilium rescita prius de hiis omnimoda v[eritate, non obst]antibus litteris nostris regalibus gratiosis quibuscunque, ex parte talls sine omni dilatione satisfactionis complementum parti lese impendant. Et si qua partium in huiusmodi inpendione iudicil non contentaretur, tunc dlscussio eiusdem iudicli inpendionis in nostram ac prelatorum et regni nostri baronum [presentiam tran]smitti debeat, ubi nos et iidem prelati ac barones partibus ambabus, non obstantibus quibusvis litteris nostris prorogatoriis absque omni dilatione iudicium exhibere teneantur.

LIV. Hoc etiam non pretermisso, quod filias quorumvis regnicolarum nostrorum in possessionibus et hereditatibus patris sui infra quintam lineam generationis eiusdem in heredes masculos non procreabimus.

LV. Item si aliquis in gravaminibus aliorum iudiciorum in processu alicuius cause in presentia cuiusvis iudicis convictus fuerit, tunc iudex ipsius cause ante decislonem elusdem pro ipsis iudiciis neminem captivare vel in rebus dampnificare presumpmat, demptis talibus personis, que ibidem in ipsius iudicis presentia in factis potentie, calumpnie, delationis falsarum litterarum et astationis falsi termini convincerentur.

LVI. Item si aliquis quempiam nota infidelitatis denigraverit, talem una cum baronibus et regnl nostri nobilibus iudicabimus et simul sententiabimus.

LVII. Preterea beneficia ecclesiastica bullati acceptare non valeant, nisi illi, quibus per patronos ipsarum ecclesiarum ipse ecclesie conferuntur.

LVIII. Nobiles etiam ad loca tributorum ire non compellantur, sed per portus, quos voluerint, libero transitu absque aliquali impedimento potiantur. Littere autem nostre quibusvis mercatoribus in eo, iidem in locis tributorum regnicolarum nostrorum tributa non , date per amplius non dentur, et quod si aliquis tributum in sua sine consensu nostro institueret, tunc talis possessio cum ipso tributo devolvatur et applicetur iuri nostro regio ipso . Universi autem prelati, barones, nobiles et alterius cuiusvis homines tributa habentes litteralia eorum instrumenta vel alia , quibus ipsa tributa instituta aut donata sunt, in octavls festi beati martiris nunc venturicoram nostra maiestate ac prelatis et baronibus nostris exhibere et declarare teneantur. Qui vero nulla iura eorum tributis nec per attestationem hominum suorum conproac aliam declarationem assignare et declarare possunt, inibi tributum non exigatur.

LIX. Item victualia, munera et alia consimilia quorumvis possessionatorum hominum de u[na posse]ssione ipsorum ad aliam aut alia loca deferenda sine tributaria solutione dimittantur.

LX. Ceterum fratrum aut parentum et consanguineorum interficientium possessiones non extraneis et aliis, nisi lesis per regiam maiestatem perpetuo conferantur.

LXI. Comes etiam Crisiensis et Zagrabiensis comitatuum sigillum suurn, quo [ipse ln suo offi]cio fungitur, ipsemet servare non possit, nisi talis notarius, cui nobiles eorundem comitatuum ipsum assignabunt, neque idem comes absque interessentia iudicum nobilium in aliqua causa iudicium et deliberationem faciendi habeat auctoritatem.

LXII. Item pro causis regnicolarum nostrorum universis a[udiendis, discutiendis] et iudicandis ad octavas maiores, in quibus ipse cause vertuntur, tres vel quatuor ex prelatis et baronibus nostris transmittere teneamur. Evocatorias autem litteras, quas cancellarii nostri sub hac forma verborum, videlicet ubi tunc deo duce fuerimus constituti novis modis inv[entis---am]plius minime dare teneantur. Illi autem, qui nostram specialem in presentiam super quibusvis causis evocabuntur, easdem causas per neminem alium preterquam prelatos et barones nostros iudicari faciemus et super tali adiudicatione littere nostre sub nostro sigillo regio conficiantur[r. --- citation]es, evocationes et proclamationes quelibet non ad quindenas alicuius termini, sed ad octavas fieri procurentur.

LXIII. Exstitit etiam per barones et nobiles regni nostri antedictos ordinatum, ut universi viri ecclesiastici mediam partem omnium proventuum ipsorum pro tuitione confiniorum dicti [regni nostri durante] dumtaxat guerra presenti paganorum prescriptorum dare deberent et administrare teneantur, et quod nullus regnicolarum nostrorum mediam partem decimarum quarumvis a jobagionibus eorum provenientium ipsis viris ecclesiasticis, sed talibus, quos pro ipsis mediis fructibus et prov[entibus colligendis ac] administrandis nos una cum baronibus et nobilibus regni nostri eligemus, dare teneatur, sic videlicet, quod tales proventus non ad alia aliqua facta, nisi pro tuitione regni nostri prenotata exponantur, nec etiam tales deputatos homines ad id astringemus, ut iidem ad ali[qua alia facta dictos provent]us darent vel administrarent.

LXIV. Item pretexto premissorum antedicti viri ecclesiastici cuipiam regnicolarum nostrorum interdictum aut excommunicationem iniungere vel domino apostolico querulari non audeant modo aliquali, si vero quispiam ipsorum secus in hiis facere attemptaret, extunc idem v[igore ----- - al]iarum litterarum nostrarum patentium sub nostro ac baronum nostrorum sigillis sigillatarum convincatur ipso facto.

LXV. Preterea quia in litteris privilegialibus condam dicti domini Lodouici regis felicitis recordationis confirmationis inter alia in eisdem expressa id, ut decime argento non re[dimantur, sed si]cut terra profert et germinaret, persolverentur, cernebatur haberi, ideo per barones et nobiles regni nostri prenotatos propter facta paganorum prescriptorum unanimi voluntate sancitum extitit pariter et ordinatum, ut usque tempus prefixum universi proventus ecclesiasticarum personarum, qui acten[us cum frugibus re]cipi consueverunt, cum denariis recipi et administrari possint, preteritaque ipsa guerra administratio proventuum iam dictarum ecclesiasticarum personarum secundum pristinam libertatem in ipsis litteris dicti domini Lodouici regis confirmationis conscriptam fieri procuretur.

LXVI. Item decimatores virorum ecclesiasticorum ad dica[ndos homine]s non ipsimet, sed cum uno iudice nobilium accedendo quosvis homines decimandos, prout iidem quantitatem rerum eorum dicandarum fide eorum mediante astrinxerint, dicare teneantur, et quod iidem decimatores nobiles pauperes jobagionibus carentes, famulos ignobiles et jobagi[ones quosli]bet bladis et vinis deficientes dicare non presumant.

LXVII. Item iidem viri ecclesiastici tam super regales et reginales, quam etiam baronum et nobilium sacerdotes preter consuetas collectas taxare non audeant; et quod quivis archidiaconorum ad singulos sacerdotes et ecclesiarum rectores solum cum quat[uor equ]is semel in anno descendere possit.

LXVIII. Interea homines ignobiles habita licentia et iusto terragio ipsorum persoluto usque quindecim dies omnibus debitoribus suis satisfaciendo et transactis ipsis quindecim diebus seque de omnibus expurgati, quo maluerint, transseundi liberam habeant [auct]oritatem:et si per quempiam non dimitterentur, tunc dominus talium hominum ad quem scilicet illi transsire voluerint, assumpto secum uno ex iudicibus nobilium tales vel eundem hominem ignobilem ad se et suarn possessionem modo premissis absolutam deducendi et asportandi habeat facultat[em.]

LXIX. Universique notarii, tam nostri, quam etiam domini palatini et iudicis curie nostre, necnon banorum et wayuode nostrorum in redemptionibus litterarum quarumvis earum redemptiones non aliter, nisi prout tempore dicti condam domini Lodouici regis fuit constitutum, habere possint, de litteris scilicet sententialibus quib[usvi]s octo florenos auri per centum denarios novos numerando recipere valeant.

LXX. Postremo vero dicatores florenorum et viginti unius denariorum novorum per nos ac prelatos et barones nostros pridem intra ambitum regni nostri constituti in octavis festi Epiphaniarum domini similiter nunc affuturi, coram nobis comparere teneantur rationem expositionis ipsius taxe assignaturi efficacem.

(OCTOBER 1397)

We, Sigismund, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., and margrave of Brandenburg, etc., wishing that it be remembered, make known by these presents to all to whom it may concern that during the past few years to this very day the Turks and other wicked²⁵⁸ schismatics by their attacks and violent actions have destroyed, looted, and burnt down many estates and have carried away people of both sexes, males and females, and have frequently perpetrated and are still committing terrible and intolerable deeds in the border regions of our kingdom of Hungary, by which our strength and that of all of our gentlemen of the realm appear to have declined; therefore, willing to provide for the proper and peaceful condition and restoration of the border regions of our said kingdom, we have – both for reasons already stated and also for other actions and urgent matters concerning our kingdom and our royal Holy Crown – bid by our letters all the prelates and others holding major ecclesiastical dignities, the barons, and four honest noblemen from each county of our kingdom with full powers from their fellow noblemen to assemble²⁵⁹ on the present feast of St. Michael the Archangel,²⁶⁰ at a diet and general discussion about the said matters to be held here in Timișoara; and the said barons and nobles of our kingdom, after being called to the said place and at the said time, and having here assembled, have decided after diligent discussion and mature deliberation of the above-mentioned matters, to issue the following orders:²⁶¹

1 That we are bound to celebrate the feast of Saint Stephen annually in Székesfehérvár unless we should be beset by some urgent matter or prevented by illness. And if we cannot be present, the palatine will definitely be there for us, and shall hear and judge cases in our place, if all parties are present, and all the servientes who wish shall freely assemble there.²⁶²

2 And that neither we nor our successors should at any time seize or cause the ruin of any serviens for the benefit of some magnate, unless they first be summoned and duly sentenced by judicial process.²⁶³

²⁵⁸ The missing word in the Latin can be assumed to have been iniquorum or impiorum from a very similar clause in charters from 1397, 1398, cf. ZsO nos. 5101, 5598.

²⁵⁹ The word convenire is a conjecture of Nándor Knauz. The reference to full powers from the county nobles signals another step towards the diet's development to a representative institution; see György Bónis, "The Hungarian Feudal Diet (13th to 18th centuries)," Receuil de la Société Jean Bodin pour l'histoire comparative des institutions, 25 (1965): 207–307

²⁶⁰ 29 September 1379

²⁶¹ The preamble of the decretum is in essence repeated in the charter mentioned above, which suggests that a copy of the original was retained in the royal chancellery.

²⁶² Cf. 1222:1. Articles of the Golden Bull—even if the original formulation did not make sense in 1397, as in the references to servientes, who had long ago become nobiles—and of 1351 are mostly repeated verbatim. We merely refer to the articles by number, unless major changes were made vis-à-vis the earlier texts.

²⁶³ With the exception of capiant for capiamus, identical with 1222:4

3 We shall not exact hospitality in the houses or villages of the servientes, unless we have been called (there). We shall not collect any taxes at all from people attached to their churches.²⁶⁴

4 The ispáns of counties shall not render judicial sentences concerning the estates of the servientes except in cases pertaining to coinage. The ispáns of castles shall render judicial sentences on no one except those attached to their castles. Thieves and robbers shall be judged by royal judges, but only in the presence of the ispán.²⁶⁵

5 = 1222:6.

6 If the king, however, wishes to lead an army outside the kingdom, the servientes shall not be obligated to accompany him unless it be at his expense, and, after his return, he shall not permit judgment against them concerning the campaign. If we lead an army beyond the realm, all those who hold counties or receive money from us are bound to accompany us.²⁶⁶ However, in time of great need of this kingdom of Hungary, namely when foreign forces, such as those of the pagans or other nations, are planning to attack the borders and frontiers of this same kingdom, and the baron who holds an *honor*²⁶⁷ from us at the border and frontier fortresses of this our aforementioned kingdom cannot withstand such a force, then all the gentlemen of the realm must rise together with us in soldierly fashion against the aforesaid force, particularly all those barons in person who at that time hold honors from us; or if we are engaged in other matters of our realm, then they must go to war together with the count palatine of our kingdom²⁶⁸ to the borders and frontiers of the same kingdom in such a way that those noble families in which however many brothers live together in one residence in an undivided household,²⁶⁹ should send one, while those others, who have already divided their estates, are all obligated to go to war in person. And if any one of the landowning men is stricken by illness and cannot go to war, then he must send his people

²⁶⁴ Identical with 1222:5 but the last sentence is omitted

²⁶⁵ Identical with 5:1222, only cases related to tithes are left out from those pertaining to comital jurisdiction.

²⁶⁶ So far identical with 1222:7; the last sentence of the article in the Golden Bull is replaced by the following elaborate arrangements.

²⁶⁷ Honores were introduced by the Angevins combining courtly, baronial positions with comital offices of one more counties the income of which (to an unknown part) went to the office-holder; see Pál Engel, "Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom." Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

²⁶⁸ This clause was to override explicitly the traditional privilege of the nobility, for "true nobles" of the realm had to serve only under the king's personal command (1222:7)

²⁶⁹ As all sons were entitled to an equal portion of an inherited estate, with the paternal house usually going to the youngest, division was often postponed for another generation or more. From a legal point of view, brothers or cousins who lived on still undivided estates were considered to form one family. In general, see Pál Engel, "Erbteilung und Familienbildung," in ...The man of many Devices, Who Wandered Full many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, ed. Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők, Budapest: CEU Press, 1999, 411–421. On dividing the land, see Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 45–8.

equipped as soldiers to fight. If lesser noblemen, lacking or having no tenant peasants,²⁷⁰ can unequivocally prove their illness, they may be excused. But if any of the landowning men should fail to join the levy, then he who is reluctant to go to war is to be convicted to pay in accordance with the number and quantity of his tenant peasants, namely, as many golden florins, counted in 100 new pennies,²⁷¹ as he has tenant peasants; other noblemen, lacking tenant peasants, are to be convicted to three marks of pennies each.²⁷² In addition to this, we order that all landowners among the barons and noblemen of our realm must equip and lead to war in accordance with the requirements of their station and the ability of their power from every twenty peasant tenants one archer in soldierly fashion and to make them fight during the present war with the heathen.²⁷³ However, once the present war is over, the entire cohort of the gentlemen of the realm who have ²⁷⁰ The status of the majority of the peasants in high medieval Hungary were that of jobbágy (Latinized: jobagio), a term earlier used for higher officials. We translated it as “tenant peasants.” They were personally free, their plots in fact heritable, owed dues in kind and money—and ever more in labor—to their lords. They were subject to their lord’s jurisdiction but with the right to appeal to the county court. Their freedom to move from one lord to another was decreed by Sigismund (see below Art. 68). See: János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

²⁷¹ In the 1390s, pennies of different value were in circulation. A “new penny” (nova moneta) was first issued by Sigismund in 1392 and was to be worth three old pennies which also remained in circulation. 100 new pennies (or 300 old ones) were in fact exchanged for one gold florin at least until 1403, when the government began a new financial policy leading also to the debasement of the new pennies. For this and the followings, see Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in József Laszlovszky et al. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

²⁷² Three Marks was the usual amount of different types of fines; in what pennies is it meant here is not clear. It would have been equal to 400 new ones. The mark was a measure of silver (and sometimes of gold), often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century the Buda mark (~245.54 gr.), belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary. See Bálint Hóman. Magyar pénztörténet 1000–1325 [Hungarian monetary history 1000–1325]. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1916).

²⁷³ The exact meaning of this article, in particular of the words de quibusvis viginti iobagionibus, has been much debated by historians. According to some it aimed at arming every twentieth tenant farmer and thus setting up a peasant militia, while others interpret it to mean that landowners had to hire and equip as many (professional?) soldiers as they held estates divided in 20 portae (a porta being the taxation unit, based on the peasant plot). There is evidence for both; the closest in time is a mandate of Sigismund from 13 November 1398 to the nobles of Co. Pozsony commanding them to appear in camp cum vicesima parte universorum iobagionum (“with the twentieth part of all their tenants”), see ZsO 1, no. 5582. Several royal mandates, originally probably circulars, survived from the last years of the century in which Sigismund repeated the essence of this new military organization and specified its implementation, cf. ZsO 1, nos. 5583, 5683; these orders define procedures of registering the landowners, their obligations in the militia portalis, and the mode of punishing those reluctant to fulfill their duty. See: András Borosy, “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and society in late medieval and early modern Hungary (East European Monographs, 104, Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80. One may, of course, also assume that the contemporaries were not aware of the problem and all they had in mind was to mount nobles and peasants invariably, depending on local conditions.

been to war will regain their ancient liberties which were customary in the reign of our predecessors.²⁷⁴ Those on their way to the army and back are obligated to live on their own expenses; any kind of looting, robbery, and seizing of foodstuff is prohibited; if someone acts otherwise, he will be forthwith convicted of act of might²⁷⁵ in accordance with what he has done.

7 The count palatine shall judge without differentiation all the men of our realm. He shall have no deputy judge except one at his own court.²⁷⁶

8 = 1222:9.

9 = 1222:10.

10 = 1222:12.

11 = 1222:13.

12 If the count palatine, the judge royal, the bans, or any ispán holding royal honors does not honorably conduct himself according to the character of his office or brings ruin to those attached to his castle or to nobles or others of any estate, and if this is proven, he shall make good the damage and be dishonorably deprived of his office in front of the whole kingdom.²⁷⁷

13 = 1222:15.

14 = 1222:16.

15 = 1222:17.

16 = 1222:18.²⁷⁸

17 = 1222:19.

²⁷⁴ Namely, to serve only in person, under the king's command, as stipulated in 1222:7.

²⁷⁵ Act of might (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. A distinction was made between "major" and "minor" acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (incl. rape).

²⁷⁶ Identical with the first part of 1222:8; the textual corruption of habeant in the plural instead of habeat, which survived in all versions of the Corpus Iuris Hungarici, was the source of total misinterpretation of the article, assuming that it prohibited all judges—not only the palatine—from having deputies.

²⁷⁷ By reformulating 1222:14 this article extended the circle of defendants to all major officeholders, and that of plaintiffs to a wide circle of the population.

²⁷⁸ Here the reference in 1222:18 to the king's son is again out of place, for Sigismund had no son. Similarly in art. 17=1222:19 the term iobagiones castri is entirely anachronistic as this stratum of semi-free warriors ceased to exist in the mid-fourteenth century; see Attila Zsoldos, A szent király szabadjai. Fejezetek a várjobbágyság történetéből. [The freemen of the king: Chapters from the history of the iobagiones castri] (Budapest: MTA Történettudományi Intézet, 1999 [Társadalom- és művelődéstörténeti tanulmányok 26]).

18 = 1222:21.

19 = 1222:22.

20 = 1222:23.

21 = 1222:24.

22 = 1222:25.

23 = 1222:26.

24 = 1222:29.

25 = 1222:30.

26 = 1351:1.

27 = 1351:2.

28 = 1351:3.

29 = 1351:4.

30 = 1351:5.

31 = 1351:6.

32 Then, we [...] as well as the prelates, barons, nobles and other landowners who own fishing waters shall ensure that we receive, and the same (lords) are entitled to receive, at the annual fishing one third of any kind of fish caught from running waters and half of the fish from lakes commonly called mocsár or morotva²⁷⁹ so that our honor be increased and our gentlemen of the realm be able to serve us more faithfully.²⁸⁰

33 = 1351:7.

34 = 1351:9.

35 = 1351:10.

36 Then, all gentlemen of the our realm asked our majesty to deign to preserve all the noblemen and other landowners of Slavonia and of the counties of Pozsega and Valkó in the same ²⁷⁹ The two words given in the vernacular mean rather marshes or backwaters, at any rate in modern Hungarian. Actually, such a high seigneurial impost would have totally ruined the entire fishery; evidence suggests, however, that this measure was not implemented and rents for fishing were rendered according to customary practice; Alajos Degré Magyar halászati jog a középkorban [Hungarian fishing laws in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: Jogi szeminárium, 1939), pp. 106, 109.

²⁸⁰ Identical with the closing sentence of 1351:6 and to many a charter of donation.

privileges concerning the payment of the chamber's profit and of the mardurina which were granted the gentlemen of the realm of our Hungary.²⁸¹

37 = 1351:13.

38 = 1351:14.

39 = 1351:17.

40 = 1351:18.

41 = 1351:19.

42 = 1351:20.

43 = 1351:21.

44 = 1351:22.²⁸²

45 = 1351:23.

46 = 1351:24.

47 = 1351:25.

48 Furthermore, on the request of our gentlemen of the realm, we agree to dismiss and cause to be dismissed all foreigners and newcomers from our kingdom,²⁸³ except the following ones: the honorable voivode Stibor²⁸⁴ and the reverend lords Eberhard, bishop of Zagreb,²⁸⁵ and Maternus, ²⁸¹ Repeating the measures of 1351: 11–12 in a slightly different formulation.

²⁸² The content is identical with 1351:22. In the early fifteenth century this article was understood to mean that the chapter or convent of authentication had to be in the same county as the estate in which the introduction is being carried out.; Sigismund, however, frequently granted dispensation from this arrangement, see ZsO 2, nos. 1960, 5988, 7730; see Ferenc Eckhart, “Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter,” MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558, here p. 457

²⁸³ This promise of the king responded to the repeated protest of the nobles against his “foreign” counsellors; Sigismund had agreed to dismiss these in the agreement with his electors in Hungary in 1387 (before 31 March); see Monumenta Hungariae Historica, Acta Extera (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1876) 3: 620–2; repr. in János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14–16. Jahrhundert (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973) pp. 132–3. While a certain element of proto-nationalism or rather xenophobia did play a role in these demands, the main issue was that the king’s confidants were above all loyal to him and, not embedded in the network of clan, family, and party in Hungary. Hence, they threatened the access of the Hungarian aristocracy to power. However, as soon as they, too, were connected by marriage and custom to the “native” Hungarians, they became part of the local aristocracy. The editors of DRH (p. 167, n. XLVII, 1) pointed to the example of the Bohemian cleric John of Usk, who in fact lost his Transylvanian prebend, granted him by Sigismund in 1392 iuxta statuta regni Ungarie, but received the rich Buda parish in 1398, see ZsO 1, nos. 5505, 5527.

²⁸⁴ Stibor, senior (of Sciborze and of Bolondóc, 1348–1414), was a knight of Polish origin, ispán of Pozsony 1389–1401, voivode of Transylvania 1395–1401, 1409–14.

²⁸⁵ Eberhard (d. 1419), was bishop of Zagreb 1397–1406, 1409–19^l, of Oradea 1406–09, chancellor 1404– bishop of Transylvania;²⁸⁶ and we promise that we and the above-mentioned bishops and the voivode will expel and send away, and that we shall cause the aforesaid bishops and the voivode to send away all of our and their retainers who are foreigners or newcomers from our and from their castles, holdings, and estates by the eighth day of the coming feast of Christmas;²⁸⁷ and henceforth we shall appoint no foreigners, be they laymen or clergy, to secular offices or ecclesiastical benefices, and we shall not grant liberty to do so to the above-mentioned officeholders either. We shall place only Hungarians in all castles, holdings, and estates on the territory of our kingdom and shall cause the aforesaid officeholders do the same.

49 In addition, the above-mentioned barons and gentlemen of the realm, all together have decided and ordered that we shall be able to re-vindicate justly all those castles, holdings, towns, and estates which we have given and granted to certain persons out of fear of their rebellion in the time when they obstinately had risen against us with mighty force, as well as the grants which we made because of the said fear to those who at that time exerted themselves to make peace or arranged the peace between our majesty and the rebels.²⁸⁸ All other grants, however, which we have given those who had served our majesty faithfully and who were killed or maimed in our service or who suffered the shedding of blood of their sons or kinsmen, we shall uphold and confirm with the authority of our charter. Also, we shall have the authority to recover all castles, holdings, and other estates which we have sold or mortgaged, without paying any compensation to those whom we have sold or pledged them and to return them to the right and possession of the Holy Crown.²⁸⁹

19.

²⁸⁶ Maternus (d. 1399) was the tutor of young Sigismund in Brandenburg. In order to retain him as a trusted counselor, the king procured him the bishopric of Veszprém 1392–95, and then of Transylvania in 1395.

²⁸⁷ That, is by New Year's Day; the term set for such an extensive measure was very short and obviously aimed more at demonstrating the diet's mood than actually achieving the expulsion of foreigners.

²⁸⁸ Apart from the conflicts with the pro-Neapolitan (Horváti) faction during 1386–94, which cannot possibly be meant here, no armed rebellion against Sigismund before 1397 is known. The passage may refer to an obscure plot of unnamed “mighty prelates, barons and lords” some time in early 1388; according to a royal charter (Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 10/1: 420 of 7 May 1388) the arch-chancellor, Archbishop John Kanizsai of Esztergom, succeeded in “reconciling the troubled hearts” by calling on the rebels “in their own homes.” Simultaneously with the present decree Sigismund issued charters for Stibor, the Kanizsai brothers and the Treutels in which the present article is expressly referred to and these barons are excepted from the measure, constitutionibus in Themeswar ... editis ... non obstantibus. (DRH, p. 168 n. XLIX, 1 with ref. to Fejér, op. cit. 10/2: 438–55, 10/3:204–10). This makes Mályusz (Kaiser Sigismund, p. 47 f.) assume that the Kanizsai-Stibor faction was behind the move and that it was to veil the confiscation of the estates of the former palatine, Leusták of Ilsva, who fell at Nicopolis. It is also possible that the opaque formulation came in handy for the king, who in these years tried to recover as much of royal property lost during the struggle for the throne as possible.

²⁸⁹ Sigismund made good use of this decision for the recovery of some of the losses in the royal domain. Several charters cite this article justifying the revocation of grants and mortgages (Zs. O. 1, no. 5037; 2, nos. 812, 4373). However, most of these charters were issued when the recovered estate was granted to some other landowner, hence, the over-all gain for the royal domain was limited. Also, Sigismund continued

50 Then, if any prelate or other ecclesiastic, baron, baron's son, or any magnate is convicted of act of might, proffering false documents, frivolous prosecution, or false court appearance²⁹⁰ against anyone in any case by any judge, we will not protect him but will force him through the count palatine to give satisfaction to his adversaries.

51 Nevertheless, if anyone misses the date set for taking an oath,²⁹¹ for a judicial combat, for a common inquest²⁹² or for paying a debt,²⁹³ he ought not be granted another date for settlement of the matter, [...] ²⁹⁴ but the judge ordinary of the case²⁹⁵ shall proceed according to the merit of the case.

52 We shall not impose taxes for any matter of this kingdom on the nobles of the kingdom and on the tenant peasants of others, but shall let them enjoy the same liberty which they had during the reign of our predecessors.²⁹⁶ to grant royal property to his supporters in the subsequent decades as well, although usually only as mortgages, reserving the proprietary rights of the crown; cf. DRH p. 169, n. XLIX, 2. On the decline and partial recovery of royal domain, in particular of castles, see Erik Fügedi, Castle and Society in Medieval Hungary (1000-1437) transl. J. M. Bak (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1986), pp. 125–28, where the results of Pál Engel's and his own monographic studies are summarized.

²⁹⁰ Frivolous prosecution (calumnia) included unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price. False court appearance (astatio falsi termini) meant that a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney, or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice.

²⁹¹ Oath (iuramentum) as a mode of proof survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers. There were also special oaths, such as the oath sworn on the soil (iuramentum super terram, see 1435/II:10) or the capital oath (iuramentum ad caput, see e.g., 1435/II:4,6 Tripartitum II 32) that the defendant was not allowed to counter by his own oath. Those summoned to give evidence at an inquest were also expected to give evidence under oath. Oath taking was regulated first in 1324.

²⁹² Inquest was a procedure for obtaining material proof in which abutters, neighbors, and other nobles from the county (comprovinciales) swore an oath on their faith and “fidelity to the Holy Crown” regarding the truth of their testimony, usually in matters of property rights. The inquest, as ordered by a higher court, was usually held where the disputed estate was located or the criminal act perpetrated. See Erik Fügedi, “Verba volant... Oral Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility.” in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary, ch. VI. (London: Variorum, 1986)..

²⁹³ Obligatio usually meant something like a promissory note in medieval Hungarian legal usage; see Antal Bartal, Glossarium mediae et infimae latinitatis Regni Hungariae, Bp.: MTA, 1901 (rept ibid., 1981) p. 148.

²⁹⁴ Lacuna of about 14 letters.

²⁹⁵ The expression “judge ordinary of the case” is intended to underline that the decision be made by the court where the case was opened and not elsewhere

²⁹⁶ Even though the text is not specific, for it has the general term dicare (“assess for taxes”), the king's

53 We also proclaim that if someone should commit any novelties,²⁹⁷ that is, act of might, looting, robbery, illegal seizure of estates, or other similar acts against anyone, then the alispán and the noble magistrate, after having established the truth of the matter, should give adequate satisfaction to the aggrieved party without delay,²⁹⁸ regardless of any kind of royal letter of pardon. Should one of the parties not be satisfied with the judgment, then the suit ought to be transferred to us and to the prelates and barons,²⁹⁹ where we and the same prelates and barons shall be obligated to do justice for both parties without any delay, regardless of any letter of prorogation issued by us.

54 It should also be mentioned that we will not grant sons' rights in the estates or in the heritage of their fathers the daughters of any gentleman of the realm within the fifth degree of the same kindred.³⁰⁰ promise obviously referred to those extraordinary taxes, mostly called subsidium, which the Angevins began frequently to raise and Sigismund continued to do so. Article 70, below, proves that he did not intend to stop this practice and the taxation of estates, of both lay and ecclesiastical landowners continued; in general see also János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter" in R. Schneider, ed. Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347-87, here p. 355.

²⁹⁷*Nouitas* implied in medieval understanding some evil innovation, it was often used for heresy; cf. Du Cange, Glossarium 4:657, where reference is made to the French legal term nouvelleté, meaning usurpation of rights or property.

²⁹⁸The alispán (vicecomes), was usually a noble retainer (familiaris) of the ispán and the actual administrator of the county. During the fourteenth century, when several counties were granted as honors, the alispán, joined by the elected noble magistrates, handled the financial and military matters of the county and chaired the county court. In the late Middle Ages the laws usually refer to ispán and/or alispán together. From the early sixteenth century, the alispán was usually elected by the noble community of the county. See József Holub, "A főispán és alispán viszonyának jogi természeté." [Legal character of the relationship between ispán and alispán. Contributions to the county administration in the Middle Ages], in Fejérpataky Emlékkönyv [F. Festschrift] (Budapest: Franklin, 1917), pp. 186–211 and Martyn Rady (2000), 114–115. The intention of the article is to empower the noble county to act against violent disturbers of the peace. While Elemér Mályusz in "Die Zentralisationsbestrebungen König Sigismunds in Ungarn" in Études historiques (Budapest : Akadémiai Kiadó., 1960), 1, pp. 317-58, maintained that the counties were not strong enough to make use of this increased jurisdiction before the 1410s, there is evidence that as early as 1400 the palatine ordered the officers of Co. Szatmár, referring to the present decree, to proceed against a violent offender, see ZsO 2, no. 279. See also 1405/II: 4.

²⁹⁹This clause establishes the appellate jurisdiction of what was called the court of the personalis presentia regia, see also n. 55, below.

³⁰⁰Prefection (prefectio in filium, in heredem masculinum, Hung. fiúsítás) was a royal privilege by which the king "promoted" the daughter (or daughters) of a nobleman without male heirs to a son, i.e., authorized her to inherit the paternal fortune just as if she were a man, starting a new kindred. At the beginning, the privilege was granted even in cases where male heirs in the fourth, third or even second degree were alive, thus infringing on the rights of the collateral branches (see above note 12). This provoked wide dissension among the nobility which induced Louis I to declare void, some time before his death, all previous prefectiones if relatives up to the fourth degree could be found. He also promised to limit his future grants in this sense. Although Louis' decree on this matter has not survived, his widow, Queen Elizabeth, in a

55 Then, if in any trial before any judge someone will have been condemned to pay a fine, the judge of the case should not dare to take into custody that person or have his goods harmed in order to obtain the fines before the end of the trial, except those who have been convicted in the same court by the same judge of an act of might, frivolous prosecution, proffering false documents, or false court appearance.³⁰¹

56 If anyone will be denounced by someone for infidelity, we shall judge him and pass sentence only together with the barons and nobles of our kingdom.³⁰²

57 Moreover, bullati should not be allowed to receive ecclesiastical benefices³⁰³ except those which are granted by the patrons of the churches themselves.

58 Nobles cannot be compelled to pass by places of toll-collection, but they may cross at any ford they wish free from hindrance.³⁰⁴ We shall no longer issue letters of permission, which we used to give certain merchants exempting them from tolls of our gentlemen of the realm.³⁰⁵ And if someone sets up a toll on his own estate without our approval, the toll and the estate will escheat to the royal right and into the possession of our royal majesty. All prelates, barons, nobles, and others of any estate and condition, moreover, who own tolls are obligated to show and to produce to our majesty, our prelates and barons the letters and titles by which their tolls were established and granted by the eighth day of the coming feast of St. George the Martyr.³⁰⁶ Those who are not able to produce a title to their toll, by either the testimony of the people from their county or other evidence, will no longer be allowed to collect that toll.

charter from 1385 refers to such a decision; the text of that charter was included in a letter of judgment by the count palatine dated 1399 which came down to us in a transcript of 1414; see DRH, p. 141. It was King Louis' promise that was decreed here by King Sigismund.

³⁰¹ On these delicts see Art. 50, above.

³⁰² That cases of nota infidelitatis (charge of infidelity) were to be judged at the diet came to be a practice only some hundred years after this decree. What is meant here is to assure a fair and open trial, with the participation of lay barons and lords (for clergy were not allowed by canon law to hear criminal cases) in cases that seemed to be so frequent in court intrigues that a special term, denigratio, was coined for them, meaning in fact an accusation of infidelity.

³⁰³ Bullati were clergy claiming an ecclesiastical benefice on the basis of a papal grant (a "bull"). See also 6 April 1404/I. Earlier, Sigismund had promised in the agreement at his election to restrict the papal designation of clergy to Hungarian prebends and repeated this prohibition in a charter for the chapter of Pressburg in 1394; see Elemér Mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil und das königliche Patronatsrecht in Ungarn (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1959), pp. 65–67

³⁰⁴ Cf. 1351:15.

³⁰⁵ Exempting merchants from paying duties at royal tolls and customs was, of course, a general and basic right of every ruler; however, the Angevin kings often granted exemptions from every toll in the kingdom or in a certain region, which was seen as infringement of seigneurial rights. That is what the king here promises to stop doing; nevertheless, we know of such grants by Sigismund in favor of the citizens of Bártfa/Bardejov in 1402 (ZsO 2, no. 1471), and of Szeged in 1405 (Ibid. 3972).

³⁰⁶ 1 May 1398.

59 Then, any landowner who carries his foodstuff, presents, or other similar things from one of his estates to another should be allowed to pass without paying toll.³⁰⁷

60 Further, the royal majesty should not grant the estates of those who kill their brothers, parents, or kinsmen to strangers or to others, but only to the aggrieved persons in perpetuity.

61 The seals used in official acts of the ispáns of Körös and Zagreb counties should not be kept by the ispáns themselves but by the notary to whom the nobles of those counties entrust it; and without the presence of the noble magistrate, the ispáns are not allowed to pass judgment or to pronounce sentence in any case.³⁰⁸

62 Then, we commit ourselves to delegate three or four of our barons and prelates for hearing, trying, and settling³⁰⁹ the various cases of our gentlemen of the realm to the major octaves³¹⁰ at which these cases are treated.³¹¹ Letters of summons, moreover, issued by our chancellors with the clause "wherever we will stay by God's will" should henceforth never be issued.³¹² Those who in

³⁰⁷ On roads and tolls in general, see Magdolna Szilágyi, Mobility, Roads, and Bridges in Medieval Hungary, in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

³⁰⁸ The article aims at strengthening the position of the nobles of Slavonia. From the 1380s onward the judicial records of the ban of Slavonia were sealed, with the clause absentibus sigillis, with the seal of the vice-ban, who was also ex-officio ispán of the counties of Zagreb and Körös. This practice implied the transfer of considerable jurisdiction to this official, in analogy to the specialis presentia at the royal court. Allegedly under Louis I the nobles of the region acquired the right to elect the keeper of the seal, the protonotary or notary of the ban's court; they had now this right included in a decretum. In the next year the nobles made the ban, Nicholas of Gara, confirm this right; see Georgius Fejér, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis. 11 volumes in 43 parts. (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 10/2:622–24; ZsO 1, no. 5220). A generation later, in 1438, the nobles even obtained the right to depose the protonotary; cf. Fejér, loc. cit., 192–4.

³⁰⁹ The conjecture of Knauz, inquirendis, is legally impossible, for inquest was not held before the judges, but out of court; hence, the editors of DRH inserted the procedurally appropriate words into the lacuna.

³¹⁰ Octave court (octava): was the term for the sessions of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times.

³¹¹ The nobles seem to have demanded, and the king agreed, to send magnates to the sessions because the increasingly professional administration of justice by learned jurists instead of the great men of the realm appeared unacceptable to the conservative nobility.

³¹² The quoted formula was used to cite parties before the king who would then judge the case with the barons of his retinue, while travelling through his several countries; this was called the court of the personalis presentia regis. According to Kumorowitz this section was not aimed at abolishing that court (which is referred to below in art. 53 and 56), but to reduce its jurisdiction to cases of charge of infidelity and appeals in cases of acts of might. In fact, as Knauz (p. 233 n. 3) already noted, the court of "personal presence" did not cease to operate, and summons with ubi tunc... were issued even during the session of this very diet.

specific cases are to be summoned to our special presence should be judged by no one else but our prelates and barons, and the letters of judgment should be issued under our own seal.³¹³ (...) summons and proclamations must not be issued for the fifteenth day of a certain date but only to an octave.³¹⁴

63 The above-mentioned barons and nobles of our kingdom have also ordered that all clergy give and render half of their income for the defense of the frontiers, but only during the above-mentioned war against the pagans; and our gentlemen of the realm should give half of the tithe from their tenant peasants not to the clergy but should deliver it to those who will be selected by our majesty, together with the barons and nobles of our kingdom, to collect and deliver the half of the ecclesiastical revenues and incomes, and these revenues should not be used for any other purpose but for the defense of our kingdom, and we should not force those appointed men to give or to use the said incomes for any other purpose.³¹⁵

64 Then, none of those said clergy may dare to punish any gentleman of the realm for acting in accord with the aforementioned measure by interdict or by excommunication, or to lodge any complaint against them with the Apostolic Father; and if someone dares to act otherwise, that person should stand immediately convicted by the authority of our (...) letters patent sealed by our and by our barons' seals.³¹⁶

65 Moreover, although the confirming letter of privilege issued by the late King Louis of blessed memory states among other matters that the tithe should not be commuted to money but ³¹³ In the late fourteenth century the court of the specialis presentia went “out of court,” with the arch-chancellor presiding and sealing its sentences with his judicial seal, propter absentiam sigillorum. In fact this court, too, was on its way to professionalization: it was usually held not by the (clerical) arch-chancellor himself but by a legally trained vicegerens or diffinitor. The article (apparently once again bowing to the wishes of the nobility) aims at restoring the royal supervision through the use of the seal of majesty and the presence of magnates on the bench; see Lajos Bernát Kumorovitz, “A specialis presentia regis pecséthasználata Zsigmond korában” [The Sealing practice of the specialis presentia regis under Sigismund], in Domanovszky Emlékkönyv [D. Festschrift] (Budapest: Egyetemi Nyomda, 1937), pp. 422–23; György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the laws in pre-Mohács Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), pp. 120–31; briefly also in his “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary,” East Central Europe/L’Europe de centre-est 4:1 (1977): 186–7.

³¹⁴ This fragmentary sentence suggests that the specialis presentia was attempting another modernization by citing parties within a short term, a fortnight, and not only for the quarter-annually held octaves. The nobility apparently objected to this move.

³¹⁵ The collectors empowered by this act did in fact exact considerable contributions from ecclesiastical bodies in the subsequent years; however, Sigismund continued to tax the clergy throughout his reign, not only for the imminent war; see Deér, p. 78. Several mandates are known from the years 1398 and 1401 in which half the income of prebends was ordered to be submitted for defense (ZsO 1, nos. 5559, 5617; 2, no. 1005).

³¹⁶ Knausz (p. 234, n. 5) assumed that there was another decree, now lost, but it is possible that the reference was to a charter to be issued, perhaps in the court of the personal presence.

should be rendered as the earth brings it forth,³¹⁷ the barons and nobles of our kingdom, pressed by the attacks of the above-mentioned heathens have unanimously decided and ordered that until the above date all the dues to the clergy which at present are usually collected in kind should be collected and delivered in money, but after the end of the present war the dues to the aforesaid ecclesiastics should be rendered according to the ancient privileges contained in King Louis' letter of confirmation.

66 Then, the tithing-men of the clergy should not go alone to assess the tithe but with the noble magistrate and should assess the tithe according to the tithe-payers' sworn declaration regarding their titheable goods; and the tithing-men should not dare to tithe poor nobles without tenant peasants, non-noble servants,³¹⁸ and such tenant peasants as have no wine and grain.

67 Then, these same clergy should not levy more taxes than the usual ones on the priests of the king, the queen, or of barons and nobles;³¹⁹ and the archdeacon is allowed to visit each priest and head of parish church only once a year accompanied by only four horses.³²⁰

68 Non-noblemen, once they have received leave, paid their just rent, and have satisfied all their creditors within fifteen days, are to be allowed to go freely wherever they wish after the fifteenth day when they have absolutely cleared themselves. And if someone is not allowed to go, then his noble master, namely to whom he wants to go, shall have unconditional right to lead and take him to his own estate with the assistance of a noble magistrate.³²¹

³¹⁷ This matter does not seem to have been settled for centuries. See See: Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed monograph on the issue is still missing.

³¹⁸ This principle was expressed as early as in 1351:6. It is to be noted that nobles in general were at this time not exempt from the tithe; this seems to have been granted to them some time in 1405, see DRH, p. 216.

³¹⁹ Apart from a privileged minority in royal and Saxon cities, most Hungarian parish priests were subject to diocesan jurisdiction and taxation. Their annual tax, called cathedraticum, was to be paid to the archdeacon, but its amount was not fixed before the late fifteenth century. The general recommendation that "the rich [priest] should pay more and the poor less" could not cut short abuses, of course; see Elemér Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon [Ecclesiastical society in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), p. 124. Actually, this article was not initiated by the lower clergy which in Hungary did not play any role in politics, but by the lords and nobles who as patrons of churches were interested in the finances of their parishes.

³²⁰ The provision apparently brought no results. As late as 1450 the synod of Esztergom had to face the common abuse that archdeacons made their annual visitations to the parishes with a huge escort of twenty or more persons. It declared that the number should be limited to eight. We are also told that, besides chaplains, the escort used to consist of stable-grooms, huntsmen and other man-servants as well, see Ignatius Batthyány, Leges ecclesiasticae regni Hungariae et provinciarum adiacentium, vol. 3 (Alba Carolinae; Typ. episcopalibus, 1825), p. 481.

³²¹ This important liberty of the tenant peasants, was spelled out in a decision of the royal council of 3 August 1397 (DRH, pp. 154–56). The full text of it came to be a point of reference for a long time (virtually into the sixteenth century) and was included in later decreta as well (see 31 August 1405/II:14–16). Clearly, 69 All notaries, ours or those of the count palatine, the judge royal, the bans, and the voivode should receive no other fees for the redemption of charters than those which were established in the reign of the late King Louis,³²² namely, eight golden florins counted in one hundred new pennies for any kind of letter of judgment.

70 Finally, the assessors of the one florin and twenty-one new pennies, whom we, our prelates, and our barons appointed some time ago for the territory of our kingdom, are obligated to present themselves and to give an account of the collected taxes on the eighth day of the coming feast of Epiphany.³²³ many a landowner tried to retain his tenants, especially when land-labor ratios were favorable for the peasants. See n.13, above.

³²² The reference to Louis I's regulation of fees cannot be to 1351:7, where fees for charters of donations are specified, but rather to some unknown order of the king or merely to the general practice of the fourteenth century.

³²³ It is remarkable that the diet did not object to the tax of 121d, merely ordered the assessors to render accounts by 13 January 1398. The origin of this tax is not clear, On 12 April 1394 the royal council levied a tax of 1/2 florin on every porta (ZsO 1, no. 3366); and on 25 January 1399 the king ordered another accounting of the "half florins and 21 pennies" (ibid. no. 5683); see also Deér, p. 77.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY,
6 APRIL 1404
(PLACETUM REGIUM)

Following the unsuccessful bid of Ladislas of Naples for the Hungarian throne, in which he was supported by Pope Boniface IX against Sigismund, the king and his lords confiscated ecclesiastical income in Bohemia and Hungary. This decree (or rather decision of the royal council, for it does not seem to have been passed by a diet) aims at codifying these advances and, based on art. 57 of 1397, curtails significantly papal rights over Hungarian churches. It was intended to be a lasting arrangement, as the words about its validity “until expressly revoked,” a notion borrowed from Roman legal jurisprudence, testify. Although motivated by political conflict, it should also be viewed in a broader European context. In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries European monarchies attempted increasingly to place restrictions upon appeals to Rome, upon collection of papal revenues, and upon the collation of benefices. This decree, customarily cited as the placetum regium, should, thus, be seen as part of this larger movement which includes several English statutes of Provisors and Praemunire from the later fourteenth century, the French Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges of 1438, the German Acceptatio of Mainz of 1439, and others.

MS.: Original on paper with privy seal en placard, Archives of the Primate of Esztergom, Arch. Saec., Acta rad. fasc. 29, n. 44.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search

- EDD.: Ignatius Batthyány, Leges ecclesiasticae regni Hungariae et provinciarum adiacentium (Alba Carolinae-Claudiopoli: Typis episcopalibus, 1785–1827), 1: 471–74; Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 199–203; Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779–1817), 11: 614–18; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts. (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 10/4: 303–6; Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901, pp. 235–7; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [=DRH], pp. 180–2 (cf. also Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954– [=ZsO]. 2, no. 3094)
- LIT.: Vilmos Fraknói, A magyar királyi kegyúri jog Szent Istvántól Mária Teréziáig [The royal right of patronage from St. Stephen to Maria Theresa] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1895); Elemér Mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil und das königliche

Patronatsrecht in Ungarn (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1959); Imre N. Bard, "Aristocratic Revolts and the Late Medieval Hungarian State A.D. 1382–1408," Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of Washington, 1978 pp. 94–113; for the European background, cf. Francis Oakley, The Western Church in the Later Middle Ages (Ithaca-London: Cornell Univ. Press, 1979), pp. 53, 73–75.

6 APRILI 1404

Deliberatio domini regis et baronum.

Nos Sigismundus dei gr[atia] rex Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. marchioque Brandenburgensis, sacri Romani imperii vicarius generalis et regni Bohemie gubernator universis et singulis presentes inspectu[ris] et presertim, presentium serie volumus fieri manifestum, quomodo nonnulli, ymmo quamplures regnicole nostri, ecclesiastici videlicet et seculares creberrimis vicibus tribulationes, vexationes, dampna, nocumenta, iurium et iurisdictionum ipsorum altercationes ac violationes ipsis per bullatos hactenus irrogatas et illata fuisse ac irrogari de presenti lamentabilibus vocibus et turbatis animis nobis propalarunt, adeo insuper se per censuras ecclesiasticas, utputa citationes extra regnum, excommunicationes, interdicta, monitiones, pecuniarum, rer[um et b]onorum exinde exactiones, extusiones et pactationes gravatos, impeditos et molestatos acclamarunt, quod, nisi superinde eis remedium relevationis et liberationis a[d]hiberetur oportunum, ad ingentem exinanitionem rerum et bonorum, necnon status, libertatis et iurisdictionis eorundem exterminium eos oporteret devenire, supplicantes nostro culmini humiliter et devote, ut eis et eorum statui totiusque regni nostri utilitati et comodo regali presidio et defensionis auxilio succurrere dignaremur. Nos itaque, qui cunctorum et precipue nobis subiectorum incomodis subvenire et calamitates, quibus gravantur, reprimere tenemur, eisque toto nostro posse et voluntate ob[vi]are, auditis premissis lamentabilibus querelis et experientia nonnullis temporibus super eis recepta, oppressiones nichilominus et huiusmodi tribulationes, hucusque presertim hiis proximis disturbiorum et regni nostri motionum temporibus per bullatos ac alios auctoritate sedis apostolice, quam ad nostri honoris, status et gradus deiectionem, regni nostri et corone in alium translationem, ac alias ad nostri totalem depositionem laborasse et adhuc sentimus indefesse laborare, nobis et regnicolis nostris illatas et irrogatas animo iam ulterius tolerare non v[a]lentes patienti, attendentes potissime nefarium illi obedientie debitum debere reddere, qui subditorum utilitati et paci repugnans eos dolosis machinationibus et latentibus insidiis afficere et publicis nocumentis non desinit lacessere, omnium prelatorum, baronum, procerum, militum, nobilium et universitatum ditionis sacre corone regie Hungarie atque nostro consilio et matura deliberatione diutius prehabitis eorumque utilitate, intentione, ymmo petitione ad hoc circa nos laborantibus, presentium serie auctoritate eiusdem sacre corone et de plenitudine regie potestatis volumus, pronuntiamus, sancimus, decernimus et declaramus, quemadmodum pridem factum et dispositum fuisse recalimus, ut nullus bullatus auctoritate videlicet apostolica vel alia quavis preterquam nostra, sine nostro speciali consensu et assensu beneficia ecclesiastica. curata vel non curata, cuiuscunque valoris existant, olim, uti percepimus, vigore litterarum apostolicarum vel legatorum eius seu aliorum quorumcunque prelatorum acceptari et assequi solita acceptare, assequi et etiam tempore disturbiorum proxime preteritorum regni nostri assecuta et obtenta possidere, retinere et habere, durantibus instantibus dissensionum regni nostri temporibus et presenti decreto nostro immutato vel ir[re]vocato per expres[su]m, nec aliquis prelato•um eorundem et virorum ecclesiasticorum, cuiuscunque s[i]atus, ordinis, gradus, conditionis vel preeminentie existat, preter nobiles seculares ius patronatus eligendi et presentandi habentes, beneficia qualiacunque vel quomodocunque vacantia vel vacatura cuiquam providere et de eis disponere in toto vel in parte preter nostram maiestatem, cuius dispositioni, collationi et provisioni ea pleno iure reservamus, nullas quoque litteras apostolicas et rescripta, cuiuscunque tenoris seu legatorum, cardinalium, auditorum ac iudicum, officialium et executorum quorumcunque, sive in Romana curia, sive extra eandem, cuiuscunque tenoris, roboris, firmitatis et comminationis existant, tam in causis beneficialibus, quam in aliis quibuscunque causis litigiosis, criminalibus vel prophanis emanatas vel obtenta valeat atque possit, auctoritate regia supradicta irritum decernentes et inane, si contra hec per quempiam scienter vel ignoranter contigerit attemptari, contradictores denique et huic decreto repugnare attemptantes crimen lese maiestatis incurrere et irremissibiliter volumus condigna ultione puniri. Quocirca vobis universis et singulis prelati, abbatibus, prepositis, prioribus, guardianis, capitulis, ecclesiarum parochialium et capellarum rectoribus, aliis etiam cunctis viris ecclesiasticis, cuiuscunque status, conditionis et dignitatis existant, firmo regio sub edicto necnon sub pena capitis et, privationis beneficiorum et rerum singulorum precipiendo mandamus, quatenus amodo deinceps nullas huiusmodi litteras apostolicas, legatorum, cardinalium, auditorum et, aliorum quorumvis iudicum et officiatum curie Romane, necnon cit[at]iones, inhibitiones, rescripta, executiones et processus, cuiuscunque tenoris existant, tam in causis beneficialibus,, quam in foro contentioso, sive in dicta Romana curia, sive extra per quoscunque iudices principales et executores emanatas et obtentat recipere, publicare et executioni demandare quovismodo presumatis sine nostro consensu et licentia speciali, et aliud sub pena premissa facere non ausuri. Presentes etiam volumus in locis et ad id aptis publice facere proclamari. Datum Posonii, dominico die in octava Pasche, anno domini millesimo quadringentesima quarto.

6 APRIL 1404

Decision of the lord king and the barons.

We, Sigismund, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., margrave of Brandenburg, vicar general of the Holy Roman Empire, and regent of Bohemia, wish that each and every person who will see these presents be informed by these words that some or indeed many of our gentlemen of the realm, both clerical and lay, have revealed to us with lamenting words and perturbed souls that on many occasions they have suffered persecutions, insults and damages, challenges, and infringements to their rights and jurisdiction from papal collectors;¹ furthermore, they have complained of ecclesiastic punishments, notably of being summoned abroad, of excommunications, prohibitions, warnings, as well as of exaction, extortion, and forced sale of their money, goods, and chattels, which burden, obstruct, and worry them to such an extent that without timely help to protect and to relieve them they could not avoid the considerable destruction of their goods and chattels and the annihilation of their station, liberty, and rights; therefore, they have respectfully and with reverence requested our eminence that, with the bulwark and protection of the crown, we deign to come to their aid, their station, and the best interests and advantage of our entire kingdom. Hence, we, who are obligated to assist everyone, above all our aggrieved subjects, to confront and obviate the annoyances by which they are beleaguered with all our might and ability, having heard these sorrowful complaints, and having, in addition, personal experience on several occasions, no longer intend to tolerate these injuries and insults which befell us and our gentlemen of the realm, particularly during the recent disturbances and commotions in the kingdom,² when clerics with papal letters³ and others empowered by the Apostolic See—which, as we know, has been assiduously attempting to destroy our honor, estate, and status, and to transfer our kingdom and crown to someone else, and also otherwise totally to depose us—for we regard it as particularly nefarious to show obedience to him who, attacking the welfare and peace of subjects, never ceases to mislead them with sly practices and hidden stratagems and to trouble them with open injuries. Therefore, we with our council and as a consequence of extensive and mature deliberation with all the prelates, barons, magnates, knights, nobles, and communities subject to the Holy Crown of Hungary, and considering their welfare, intention, and even explicit petition in this matter, do by the authority of the aforementioned Holy Crown and by the plenitude of our royal power, will pronounce, establish, decide, and decree—through these presents, what we remember having recently enacted⁴ and decided—that no clergy with apostolic authority or any other authority except our own be allowed to accept or to obtain ecclesiastical benefices, with or without the cure of souls, of whatever value they may be, which—as we understand—have been accepted and obtained through apostolic letters or those of papal legates or of other prelates, or to hold, retain, and keep those received during the recent disturbances in the kingdom, without our specific consent and permission, until the explicit modification or withdrawal of the present decree; nor is any one of the said prelates and clergy of whatever station, order, rank, condition, or standing, except for the lay nobles who have by reason of patronage⁵ the right of selection and presentation, allowed to appoint someone to any kind of benefice, in whatever way vacant now or in the future, or to dispose of a benefice in whole or in part, except our majesty for whom we reserve these with the full right of disposal, collation, and provision. No one is allowed and enabled to receive, promulgate, and act upon apostolic letters and rescripts of whatever content, whether those of legates or cardinals, auditors, and judges, officials, and agents of anyone with whatever purport, force, validity, or sanction, issued or received from the Roman Curia or outside of it, regarding benefices is well as other lawsuits of any sort, criminal or profane,⁶ which we waive null and void by our aforesaid royal authority; and if anyone attempts deliberately or through ignorance to act against these commands, he who contravenes them or dares to contest them, commits the crime of lèse majesté, and we will punish him with deserved revenge.⁷

¹ Bullati were usually referring to clerks who claimed a benefice on the basis of a papal bull. In the present context, however, it is clear that the reference is to collectors of papal revenues empowered to punish the recalcitrant with ecclesiastical sanctions including summons abroad (i.e., to Rome). Papal collectors were normally commissioned in Rome by the Camerarius (papal chamberlain) and once resident in a specific region they in turn would commission local clerics to serve as deputy collectors; see William Edward Lunt, Papal Revenues in the Middle Ages, 2 vols. (New York: Columbia Univ. Press, 1934, repr. Hamden, Conn.: Octagon Books, 1965) 1: 42–51, and the specimen letter of commission of a collector of annates from Pope Clement VI to Archbishop Cenadinus of Esztergom from 13 September 1343, ibid., 2: 358–61. An excellent study of the work of the papal Camera and the collection of one particular form of income, papal spoil, is Daniel Williman, The Right of Spoil of the Popes of Avignon, 1316–1415 (Philadelphia: Amer. Philos. Soc., 1988), esp. pp. 19–22, where the solitary Hungarian (as opposed to Dalmatian) reference is to the commission to the collector of Poland and Hungary following the death of Bishop John of Veszprém dated 1357

² On 1 June 1403, Pope Boniface IX recognized Ladislas, king of Naples (1386–1414), son of the hapless Charles of Durazzo—murdered in Hungary in 1386—as king of Naples and Hungary, who claimed the crown of Hungary by hereditary right. He was supported by a group of Hungarian and Croatian nobles, but the rebels were defeated by Sigismund’s adherents and Ladislas, who had landed in Dalmatia, had to return to Naples. See: Bard, “Aristocratic Revolts;” and Pál Engel, The Realm of St. Stephen: A history of medieval Hungary, 895–1526, transl. Tamás Pálosfalvi, ed. Andrew Ayton (London: Tauris, 2001) pp. 195–208.

³ The term bullati here appears to convey the more general meaning.

⁴ The reference is obviously to 1397:57 (cf. also 1397:64)

⁵ On the royal right of patronage (advowson), see Fraknói, passim, and Mályusz, pp. 65 ff.

⁶ The term prophanis is apparently used here in opposition to criminalibus as synonym for ‘secular’ to refer to those cases brought before ecclesiastical courts in which a layman was one of the litigants and where criminal behavior was not at issue. For a discussion of the theoretical underpinning of canonical criminal jurisprudence, see R. M. Freher, “Preventing Crime in the High Middle Ages: The Medieval Lawyers’ Search for Deterrence,” in James Ross Sweeney and Stephen Chodorow, eds., Popes, Teachers, and Canon Law in the Middle Ages (Festschrift for Brian Tierney) (Ithaca, NY: Cornell Univ. Press, 1989), pp. 212–33, esp. 219–21

⁷ Mályusz (pp. 14–18) lists a whole series of cases which prove the implementation of this decree. Most characteristic is a mandate of the voivode of Transylvania of 1405, in which he seized the tithe of a parish priest, because he called upon the Roman curia in a legal matter “in contempt of the decree of the royal majesty” see: ZsO 2, no. 4132.

Therefore, we order each and every the of you, prelates, abbots, provosts, priors, wardens, chapters, rectors of parish churches and chapels, and all other clergy of whatever station, rank, and dignity, by our strict royal edict and under capital penalty and the loss of benefice and goods, that henceforth in the future you must not receive, promulgate, and act upon any kind of letter from the Apostolic See, from legates, cardinals, auditors, and magistrates or any other judge or official of the Roman Curia, nor any citation, prohibition, rescript, order, and legal writ of whatever purport they may have both in cases concerning benefices or other lawsuits, issued by or received from the said Roman Curia or outside of it, by any higher judge or agent without our specific consent and permission, and you will not dare to act otherwise subject to the above mentioned penalty We want these presents to be proclaimed publicly in places suitable for that purpose.

Given at Pressburg⁸ on the eighth day of Easter in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and four.

⁸ Pozsony, presently Bratislava, Slovakia

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY OF 21 DECEMBER 1404

This royal ordinance, just as its procedural predecessor and legal cause, Sigismund's letter of pardon for the rebels of 8 October 1403 (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [=DRH], pp. 175–79), could be classed as a regulation of particular and not general purport; hence, it might not qualify as a decretum proper. Also, it was issued as letters patent without the list of officeholders usual for charters of privilege. However, the text itself refers to “articles,” which is usually a name for laws; the king called it in contemporary charters a statutum; and tradition also included it among the decreta. It is a regulation of elaborate procedures of institution and of verification of claims to royal grants, following the widespread confiscations after the last major rebellion against Sigismund in 1402–3.

All earlier editions printed the text from a transcript, issued in all likelihood in February 1405 but erroneously dated to February 1404 which came to be the date of the “First Decree of Sigismund” in the Corpus Iuris Hungarici and other editions. The king's itinerary tallies well with the date of the original printed here (which is textually identical with the earlier editions, save for a few minor scribal errors) and so does the fact that Sigismund referred to this statutum a day before its issue on 20 December 1404. (Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954– [=ZsO] 2, no. 3553).

The format is also quite confusing and caused earlier editors to introduce entirely misleading paragraph numberings. The preface and narratio end with a series of statements verbally numbered as “first,” “second,” and “third” but then the statutory parts and the final “articles” are again divided (as usual, without formal numbering) into articles. Whereas the introduction to this series of statements suggests that these are the complaints (querelae), this decree is in fact a summary of both the complaints and the specific remedies provided. The present numbering was introduced by Döry and hence by the editors of DRH whom we follow (see Concordance).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer //archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search

MS.: Original on parchment with the privy seal en placard, MNL OL DL. 8997.

EDD.: Georgius Pray, Annales regum Hungariae ab anno Christi CMXCVII ad annum MDLXIV deducti. . . 5 vols. (Vienna: Schulz-Trattner-Bernard, 1763–70), 2: 212–14; Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779–1817), 11: 597–605; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 10/4: 276–83; Magyar Törvénytár: Codex Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1: 203–09 (all dated Buda, 19 February 1404); DRH, pp. 183–8.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386–1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), pp. 66–9.

21 DECEMBRIS 1404

Nos Sigismundus dei gratia rex Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. marchioque Brandenburgensis etc. sacri Romani imperii vicarius generalis et regni Bohemie gubernator memorie commendamus per presentes, quod quemadmodum nobis alias extra regnum nostrum in partibus Bohemie pro sacri Romani imperii honore et iure nostri patrimonii pro posse insudantibus et laborantibus, quidam prelati, magnates proceresque et nobiles regni nostri malo freti consilio, ymmo rebellionis calcaneo ducti et in reprobum sensum dati, ingrati et immemores beneficiorum a celsitudine nostra receptorum in crimine lese nostre maiestatis simul conspirantes nos verum regem et dominum Hungarie dyademate et solio ipsius regni nostri, cui iam deo propitio fere sedecim annis feliciter regnavimus, privare et destituere, aliumque eis ignotum regem, utputa Ladislaum filium condam Karuli de Duracio eligendo in dictum regnum nostrum introducere satagebant, tandemque asistente nobis divini remedii adiutorio, nonnullorumque fidelium baronum et procerum nostrorum interveniente subsidio gubernacula dicti regni nostri votive readipiscuntibus plerosque ex dictis infidelibus nostris iuxta demeritorum suorum exigentiam digna correctionis linea feriri alios quoque castris, tenutis, districtibus, civitatibus, oppidis, possessionibus et cunctorum bonorum materiebus privari disponentes et destitui, huiusmodi castra, tenutas, districtus, civitates, oppida, possessiones et cunctorum bonorum maneries, tamquam per notam infidelitatis huiusmodi rebellionis ad manus nostras regias devoluta et redactas de dictisque manibus nostris regiis nonnullis predictis fidelibus baronibus, proceribus et nobilibus nostris partem nostram animo constanti et fidelitate firma tenentibus, foveantibus et magnificentibus iuxta laudabilium servitorum ipsorum merita vigore certarum litterarum nostrarum exinde confectarum iure perennali dedisse, donasse, contulisse et distribuisse perhibemur et recordamur; ita nunc nonnulli forent incole regni nostri, quorum, ut premittitur, possessiones et iura possessionaria per maiestatem modo premissa pretactis nostris fidelibus donate et distributa existunt, qui hiis tribus modis infrascriptis lamentabilibus querelis nostram infestant maiestatem:

Primo, qualiter nonnulli essent ex ipsis, quorum licet iura possessionaria propter notam infidelitatis ipsorum dictis nostris fidelibus in evum contulerimus, tamen tandem moti regia pietate, qua delinquentibus veniam solemus impertiri, ipsis capitibusque, possessionibus ac rebus et bonis ipsorum universis gratiam fecissemus specialem.

Secundo autem quibusdam ex ipsis, licet iura ipsorum possessionaria per eandem notam infidelitatis aliis fidelibus nostris donaverimus, tamen ipsi iuxta gratiam per nos ac domino Johanni archyepiscopo Strigoniensi, necnon utrique Nicolao alias vayuodis nostris Transsilvanensibus factam a quibusvis malorum generibus, necnon actibus potentiariis et iniuriis cuiuspiam inferendis supersedisserit prorsus et cessassent, nec unquam post predictam gratiam nobis aut cuiuspiam regnicolarum nostrorum, adherendo nostris rebellibus et emulis, aliquam iniuriam, dampna, nocumenta insolentiasque et obprobria intulissent,

Tertio autem essent tales, quorum similiter iura possessionaria pro premissa nota infidelitatis aliis nostris fidelibus certarum litterarum nostrarum donationalium vigore contulissemus, qui nunquam et maxime in hiis proxime elapsis disturbiorum temporibus aliquid noxii criminis infidelitatis aut alicuius contagionis infidelitatis notam in se continentis contra nostram maiestatem et sacrum nostrum regium dyadema aut alios quosunque fideles nostros palam vel oculte perpetrassent et commisissent, propter que ipsi huiusmodi eorum possessionibus et iuribus possessionariis non essent digne et merito privandi et destituendi, supplicantes nostro culmini vocibus gemebundis, ut ipsis circa premissa de remedio providere dignaremur opportuno.

Nos itaque, qui ex suscepti regii regiminis officio causas quorumlibet oppressorum et querulantium animo metiri. debemus iustitia requirente, auditis et sane intellectis propositionibus premissis, unacum fidelibus prelati, baronibus et proceribus nostris maturo exinde prehabito et digesto consilio circa premissos articulos, obiectiones et querelas per memoratos querulantes modo superius specificato coram nobis ac ipsis prelati et baronibus nostris propositos et declaratas, unacum eisdem sanximus, decrevimus et instituimus super hiisque statutum fecimus:

I. Ut hii omnes et singuli regnicole nostri, quorum, uti superius expressatum est, iura possessionaria aliis fidelibus nostris pretextu premissae note infidelitatis contulisse dinoscimur, hos nostros fideles, apud quos dicta iura possessionaria existunt, in domibus eorum propriis, aut alias, ubi reperiri poterint, mediantibus hominibus nostris regiis et testimoniis aliquorum credibilium capitulorum vel conventuum contra se ipsos personaliter vel per procuratorem nostre maiestatis personalem, ubi pro tunc deo duce unacum eisdem prelati, baronibus et proceribus nostris fuerimus constituti evocent in presentiam, merum, plenum et condignum iudicium finemque decisivum recepturos causa in premissa.

II. Adveniente autem ipso termino ipsis partibus coram nobis pro habendo in eorum causa. moderativo iudicio comparentibus, si et, in quantum ipse partes unanimi et concordi voluntate se ipsas in eorum causa attestationi seu testimonio aliquorum fidedignorum proborum et nobilium virorum, qui fideles fuerunt a principio et sunt nostre maiestati, sponte submiserint aut compromiserint, extunc ibidem ipsa compromissio ipsis partibus per nos ac ipsos barones nostros admittatur et consentiatur; inter ipsasque partes iuxta formam huiusmodi compromissionis aut attestationis iudicium et iustitia exhibeatur indilate, prout conveniens fuerit et iuri videbitur expedire.

III. In casu vero, quo partes pretacte in huiusmodi testium electione discordes fuerint, tunc nos prelatos, barones aut tales nobiles illius comitatus, in quo ipse possessiones donate et collate existunt, qui nobis fideles fuere, vel si in ipso comitatu tot et tanti nobis fideles in numero pro tunc non fuissent, quorum testimonium super hiis sufficiens esset et acceptandum, tunc alios nostros fideles alterius comitatus ipsis possessionibus collatis propinquiores de fidelitate vel infidelitate partis, que inculpat, per certas nostras litteras requirere et ab ipsis exinde meram certitudinem recipere et experiri tenemur, ut recepta rei veritate inter ipsas partes finem facere valeamus indilatam.

Ad conclusionem autem horum articulorum:

IV. Primo quicumque regnicolarum nostrorum, quorum iura possessionaria modo antelato cuiquam fidelium nostrorum sunt collata, se annotatam gratiam per nos ipsis domino archiepiscopo et wayvodis factam per evidens documentum aut alia credibilia testimonia veraciter observasse com. probare poterunt, tales rursus in plenum dominium universorum iurium ipsorum possessionariorum debent esse in continenti restituendi. Illis vero nostris fidelibus, apud quos ipsa iura possessionaria extiterint, loco eorundem alias possessiones dare non tenebimur. Illi autem fideles nostri, qui possessiones aliquorum infidelium nostrorum notiorum a nobis impetrarunt, et se ipsos ipsi infideles ab ipsa nota infidelitatis expurgare non valerent, allegantes solum sibi ipsis capitibus, possessionibus et bonis eorum post ipsam donationem nostram per nostram maiestatem gratiam fore factam, in pleno dominio ipsarum possessionum ipsis donatarum in evum debeant remanere, nec unquam ipsas possessiones ab eisdem nostris fidelibus modo qualicumque absque bona eorum annuentia et voluntate auferre valeamus, nec ipsis infidelibus nostris ipsa gratia nostra, quoad rehabilitationem ipsarum possessionum eorum possit in aliquo suffragari, quoniam volumus huiusmodi donationem nostram semper et ubique in sui roboris firmitate inviolabiliter permanere.

V. Item quicumque fidelium nostrorum alias possessiones nostrorum infidelium a culmine nostro modo qualicumque obtinuerit vel impetraverit, se ipsumque in dominium huiusmodi possessionum per nos sibi donatarum tepiditate aut aliqua alia inertia ductus infra tempus legitimum, utputa infra anni revolutionem per nostrum et capituli aut conventus homines, prout moris est, statui non fecerit, talis vigores litterarum suarum donationalium perdiderit, ipseque possessiones rursus ad manus nostras regias sunt devolvende eo facto, aut hiis regnicolis nostris, quibus capitibus et possessionibus gratiam fecissemus, in eo casu debent esse utique restituende. Illorum autem infidelium possessiones, quorum solum capitibus et non possessionibus gratiam fecisse perhibemur, nobis remaneant, aut si cuicumque ipsas maluerimus donare, id in nostra constat et constare poterit voluntate. Qui vero modo et consuetudine observatis se vigore donationis nostre regie in dominium possessionum sibi datarum infra tempus legitimum per nostrum et capituli aut conventus homines introduci ac per ipsos homines fassionem debitam coram dicto capitulo aut conventu, prout moris est, fieri procuravit, occurrentibusque interim et imminentibus sibi aliquibus impedimentis aut obstaculis eorundem capituli et conventus, vel ipsi capitulum et conventus ipsas litteras statutorias ob contradictionem, inhibitionem aut aliam potentiariam resistentiam aut amore seu formidine dictorum nostrorum infidelium vel fratrum eorundem, aut aliis causis ex premissis extradare et emanari facere recusassent, tunc ex eo non debet perdere vigores littere sue donationalis dummodo de re legitime doceat et super hiis perhibeat testimonium veritatis.

VI. Preterea quicumque fidelium nostrorum in dominium possessionum ob notam infidelitatis alicuius per nos sibi donatarum infra anni revolutionem aut hucusque ob metum et potentiam sui adversarii vel de nostra commissione seu mandato aut prorogatione se statui facere nequivisset et in dominium earundem legitime introire, et id rite et legitime cum sufficienti testimonio posset comprobare, similiter nolumus, ut ex eo perdat vigores suarum litterarum donationalium.

VII. Volumus etiam et presentis scripti nostri patrocinio stabilimus, ut hii omnes et, singuli nostri fideles, qui de possessionibus eorum per nostram maiestatem eis pretextu aliquorum infidelitatis donatis vigore gratie nostre per nos ipsis infidelibus facte aut per ipsos infideles aut alios quosunque potentialiter exclusi essent, vel qui, ut premisimus, ob metum dictorum adversariorum eorum hucusque dictas possessiones intrare nequivissent, rursus in dominium plenum earundem per comites parochiales illorum comitatum, in quibus ipse possessiones existunt, modis omnibus restituantur et introducantur.

VIII. Volumus etiam, ut numerus eorundem fidelium nostrorum augeatur et via recludatur delinquentium, sanximus, ut quicumque regnicolarum nostrorum quibusvis nostris infidelibus facto, consilio aut subsidio expensaruntque largitione subvenisse aut ipsis hospitalitatem prebuisse comprobari poterunt, hii omnes similiter perdant iura ipsorum possessionaria universa, harum nostrarum vigore et testimonio litterarum.

Datum in Zolyo, in festo beati Thome apostoli, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quarto.

21 DECEMBER, 1404

We Sigismund, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, and Croatia, margrave of Brandenburg, etc., vicar general of the Holy Roman Empire, and regent of the kingdom of Bohemia, wish to be remembered by the words of these presents that during the time when we were exerting ourselves and working to the best of our ability for the honor of the Holy Roman Empire and our hereditary rights outside the kingdom in the regions of Bohemia,¹ certain prelates, magnates, lords, and nobles of our kingdom, relying on evil counsel or even led by rebellious intent and imbued with ill will, ungrateful to us, and unmindful of the benefits they have received from our majesty, conspired to commit high treason by attempting to deprive us and eject us, true king and lord of Hungary, from the crown and throne of the same kingdom, over which we had been, by God's permission, reigning for almost sixteen years now, by electing another person, not known to them personally, namely Ladislav, son of the late Charles of Durazzo, as king,² and bringing him into the said kingdom of ours. Finally, when with the help of divine assistance and the aid of some faithful barons and lords of ours we regained, according to our wishes, the governance of our said kingdom, we caused suitable punishments to be meted out according to their misdeeds to several of the said traitors against us and ordered that others be deprived of and expelled from their castles, tenancies, districts, cities, towns, estates, and all kinds of possessions. We have been reminded and remember that we gave, granted, transferred, and distributed in perpetuity these castles, tenancies, districts, cities, towns, estates, and other kinds of possessions, as having fallen and devolved to our royal hands by the deed of high treason of the said rebels, by our royal hands through certain charters of ours written in this matter to several of our said faithful barons, lords, and nobles, according to the merit of their praiseworthy service, who stood by us with steady heart and firm fidelity, supported us, and augmented our honor. Now then, there are several such people in our kingdom, whose estates and property rights, as mentioned before, have been distributed by our majesty among our said followers in the aforesaid manner, who now besiege our majesty with sorrowful complaints on the three following counts:

First, that there are among them such persons whose property rights, owing to their infidelity we have granted in eternity to our said followers, but to whose heads, estates, and all goods and chattels we have later granted the same special pardon moved by royal grace we are accustomed to grant delinquents.

¹ Sigismund of Luxemburg was elected king in 1387 by a league of barons and had to accept their control. Soon he began to build up his own party and follow his own policies which provoked growing discontent among the magnates (see notes to 1397). In 1401 he was temporarily arrested by the royal council. In early 1403, while Sigismund was fighting in Bohemia, an open revolt of the barons followed, led by Chancellor John of Kanizsa and Count Palatine Detric Bebek of Pelsőc in support of King Ladislav of Naples (see Imre N. Bard, "Aristocratic Revolts and the Late Medieval Hungarian State A.D. 1382–1408," Ph. D. dissertation, Univ. of Washington, 1978 pp. 41–61). Sigismund spent most of the year 1402 (February– September, November–December) in Bohemia, where he had been named vicar by his brother Wenceslas (4 February 1402). However, two months later Sigismund captured Wenceslas and entrusted him to the Habsburg dukes of Austria with whom he made an alliance. In 1403 the king spent the first half of the year in Moravia, fighting against Margrave Jodok for his hereditary claims and in the last resort for his succession in the Holy Roman Empire.

² On the events in general, see Pál Engel, The Realm of St. Stephen: A history of medieval Hungary, 895–1526, transl. Tamás Pálosfalvi, ed. Andrew Ayton (London: Tauris, 2001) pp. 195–208.

Second, some of them, although we have granted their property rights, because of the same charge of infidelity,³ to other followers of ours, had—according to the pardon granted by us to the lord John, archbishop of Esztergom, as well as the two Nicholases, our former voivodes of Transylvania⁴—completely avoided and ceased to commit any kind of misdeed, act of might,⁵ and harmful action against anybody, nor caused after that pardon any injury, damage, harmful insolence, or abuse against us or any of our gentlemen of the realm by joining our enemies or rivals.

Third, there are also those whose property rights we have granted by the force of specific charters, similarly for the said charge of infidelity, to other followers of ours, but who had never, particularly not in these recently past times of troubles, committed or perpetrated anything punishable by the charge of infidelity or were involved in any other criminal complicity, publicly or secretly against our majesty, the Holy Crown, or any of our followers; hence, it would be neither right nor proper to deprive them of their estates and property rights and to expel them; they beseeched our eminence with lamentations that we deign to provide suitable remedy for the matters said before.

We, therefore, who by our received office of governance ought to weigh at all times the case of any oppressed and complaining person, having, as justice demands, heard and sufficiently pondered the aforesaid matters, have, after having taken and accepted due counsel with our faithful prelates, barons, and lords, together with them decided, decreed, and ruled regarding the above listed articles, objections, and complaints of the aforementioned complainants which were presented and enunciated in our presence together with the same prelates and barons, in the way described above have issued the following statutes:

³ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property defined in detail in Tripartitum I, 14), usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis):

⁴ John of Kanizsa (d. 1418) was bishop of Eger 1384–87, archbishop of Esztergom 1387–1418, chancellor 1387–1403; Nicholas of Csák (d. 1426) was ispán of Temes 1394–1402, voivode of Transylvania 1402–03 and 1415–26; Nicholas of Marcali (d. 1413) was ispán of Temes 1394–1402 and voivode of Transylvania 1402–03.

⁵ Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one

1 That those of our gentlemen of the realm,⁶ individually and collectively, whose property rights we, as described above, are known to have granted by reason of the said charge of infidelity to other followers of ours, should summon those followers of ours who now hold these said property rights, from their own houses or from wherever they can find them, through our royal bailiffs and the witness of any chapter or convent of authentication, personally or through their lawyer to the personal presence of our majesty, wherever we, with God's guidance, shall be, together with our prelates, barons, and lords,⁷ so that they might receive a true, complete, and appropriate judgment and final conclusion for the said matter.⁸

2 When, then, at the appointed time, these parties appear before us, in order to receive exemplary judgment in their case, if they will have unanimously and by common will submitted and committed themselves to the testimony and declaration of certain trustworthy and honest noblemen who have been faithful to our majesty from the beginning by their own free will, then and there, an agreement among the parties themselves shall be admitted and consented to by us and our barons. The judgment among the parties themselves, according to the wording of such an agreement or declaration shall constitute immediate justice and shall be expedited to the extent that it is convenient and congruous with law.

3. In the case, however, that the said parties will not have been able to agree in the selection of such witnesses, we are obligated to inquire through specific letters of ours and to find out the truth from the prelates, barons, or other nobles who have been our followers in that county where these estates are granted and donated, or if in that county we should not have at the time an adequate number of followers whose testimony would be sufficient and admissible in this matter, then from other followers of ours in another county closest to the transferred estates, regarding the faithfulness or unfaithfulness of the accused party; so that, having ascertained the truth in the matter, we should be able to pass final decision between the same parties.

In conclusion of these points we have decreed:

4 First, that any gentleman of our realm whose property rights have been in the above-mentioned manner transferred to any one of our followers, but who can prove by appropriate record or other trustworthy testimony that he truly observed the said pardon granted by us to the lord archbishop and the voivodes, should immediately receive again full dominion of all his property rights; and we are not held to give to those followers of ours in whose hands these property rights have been any other estate in their stead.

Those followers of ours, however, who had asked from us the estates of such traitors who could not clear themselves from the charge of infidelity, but merely maintain that our majesty had granted pardon to their lives, estates, and goods after the said donation, should be left for ever in the full

⁶ Regnicola (literally: inhabitant of the kingdom) is used in medieval Hungarian legal texts mainly for the members of the enfranchised nobility. We translate it as “gentleman of the realm.”

⁷ Such summons to the court of the king's personal presence were supposed to be discontinued, see 1397:62

⁸ Several summons, referring to this statutum are known from 1405; cf. ZsO 2, nos. 3664, 3669, 3737, 3985 dominion of the estates granted to them. We shall have no right to take away these estates from these our followers under any pretext without their free consent and will, and our pardon for those traitors should have no value whatsoever for the recovery of these estates, because we wish that these grants of ours should remain always and everywhere in full and inviolable force.

5 Then, if any of our followers who had requested or obtained from our eminence in whatever way an estate of the traitors, but because of laxity or laziness of some sort did not arrange the institution into such an estate within the statutory period, namely one year, by a bailiff of ours or of a chapter or a convent, as is usual,⁹ should lose the force of such a charter of donation, and the estates should immediately fall to our royal hands straightaway, or, in such a case, they should be restored to those of our gentlemen of the realm to whom we had granted pardon for their lives and estates. However, the estates of those traitors whom we had granted pardon for their heads only but not for their properties, we shall retain ourselves or have and shall have the liberty to grant to whomever we prefer. The donation charters of those, however, who kept the law and custom and had been introduced by a bailiff of ours and of a chapter or convent, into the dominion of the estates granted them, and made, as is usual, the proper declaration through those men before the chapter or convent, but in the meantime this chapter or convent denied them or refused to issue the letters of institution because of some obstacles or difficulties having emerged before them or the chapter or convent, or because of some problem or violent resistance, or owing to favor or fear from the said traitors or their kinsfolk or for any other specific cause, should not for this reason lose their validity, provided that the grantees legally document these things and present truthful testimony concerning them.

6 Furthermore, if any one of our followers was unable because of fear or the violence of his opponent or because of a command, mandate, or extension of ours to be introduced within a year into the dominion of the estates granted him by us owing to the infidelity of someone, and able to prove this properly and legally with sufficient witnesses, we are thus unwilling that his charter of donation should lose its force.

7 We also wish and establish by the protection of these presents that all and every one of our followers who have been violently barred by the traitors or by anyone else from their estates, granted them by our majesty on the basis of the charge of infidelity, or those, who, as said before, were not able to enter into possession of the estates owing to fear of their said adversaries, should be by all means restored to and granted full dominion of these by the ispán of those counties in which these estates are located.

⁹ Institution (introductio or statutio) was the procedure required to validate the acquisition of property. Grantees of royal donations or new owners of purchased, pledged or exchanged estates were expected to take possession of the land within a year, with the assistance of a royal bailiff (a nobleman or courtier commissioned for the task) specified in the charter, and witnessed by a specified place of authentication (a chapter or convent authorized to execute such transactions) in the presence of abutters and neighbors. Institution could be thwarted by anyone present who made contradiction or repulsio, i.e., opposed the execution. Moreover, any interested party could object to the institution by announcing his protest (prohibitio) within two weeks, thus initiating a lawsuit. For detailed regulations, see Tripartitum I, 32; II, 73-4.

8 We also wish that the number of our followers may increase and the road for the evildoers be barred; therefore, we have decreed that any of our gentlemen of the realm who can be proven to have abetted by deed, counsel, assistance, or contribution of expenses any of the traitors or to have offered them hospitality should, by the force and witness of these presents, likewise lose all their property rights.¹⁰

Given in Zvolen, on the feast day of St. Thomas, the Apostle, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and four.

CONCORDANTIA CONCORDANCE

Magyar Törvénytár	DRH /onlDRMH
I-VIII	Pr.
IX	I
X	II
XI	III
XII-XIV	IV
XV-XVII	V
XVIII-XX	VI-VIII

¹⁰ In a letter of judgment, in 1419, Count Palatine Nicholas of Gara made reference to a royal decretum which seems to have completed this one on some points. It ordered that all persons claiming an estate from a rebel should lose their claims forever unless they could bring their action to a definitive sentence before the charge of infidelity of their opponent was proclaimed (MNL OL DL. 100414, cf. DRH, p. 188, n. 1)

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY OF 15 APRIL 1405

This decree indicates King Sigismund's interest in the development of towns in Hungary, which may have had several reasons. His familiarity with the much more developed Bohemian and German urban scene was certainly one of them. His support given to the fortification of cities can also be explained by the fact that the number of royal castles had diminished drastically in the early years of his reign while royal control of the cities had been an important factor in the king's victory over the baronial revolt in 1403. Above all, however, Sigismund needed monetary income and was aware that flourishing towns were the quickest source of revenues.

The assembly in which this decree was passed met in early April; a privilege issued by Sigismund for the town of Debrecen on 2 April 1405 (Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954– [=ZsO] 2, no. 3767) already contains a number of articles from it. It was not a diet proper, because neither the aristocracy nor the counties were represented (see Mályusz, "Geschichte des Bürgertums," p. 393), although the text of the decree was sent to some counties (the copy for Co. Pest. did survive), suggesting that the king wished to inform the nobility and win their support for his urban policies.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives | (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer
@ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS.: Eleven originals survived, two deperdita were known before 1945: a copy for Debrecen, County archives, Dipl. no. 6; a copy for Prešov (Slovakia), Archives of Pannonhalma no. 715; a copy for Hibe, Archives of Liptovský Mikuláš (Slovakia), Chyba no. 5; a copy for Košice, City Archives Košice (Slovakia), Call. Schwartzbach. no. 45; a copy for Krapona, MNL OL DL. 42840; a copy for Némethlipcse, Archives of Liptovský Mikuláš (Slovakia), Partizánska Lupca, no. 51; a copy for Ružomberok/Rózsahegy, Ibid. Ružomberok, no. 9; a copy for Sárovar, MNL OL DL. 9031; a copy for Sopron, City Archives, Sopron, L, IV, 103; a copy for Szeged, MNL OL DL. 90552; a copy for Zilina, City Archives Zilina (Slovakia), Dipl. no. 11. All had pendant seals, but all of those are lost now. (For details, see DRH, p. 190.)

EDD.: Georgius Pray, Annales regum Hungariae ab anno Christi CMXCVII ad annum MDLXIV deducti. 5 vols. (Vienna: Schulz-Trattner-Bernard, 1763-70), 2:215-22; Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779-1817), 11: 636-51; Magyar Törvénytár: Codex Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1:211-29 ("II Decree of Sigismund"); DRH, pp. 189-213. (See also ZsO 2, no. 3791.)

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, "Geschichte des Bürgertums in Ungarn," Vierteljahrschrift für Sozial- und Wirtschaftsgeschichte 20 (1928): 393; Katalin Szende, "The Urban Economy in Medieval Hungary” in József Laszlovszky et al. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 335–58; András Kubinyi, “Der ungarische König und seine Städte im 14. und am Beginn des 15. Jahrhunderts,” in Wilhelm Rausch, ed., Stadt und Stadtherr im 14. Jahrhundert (Linz: Wimmer, 1972), pp. 193–220; Idem, “König Sigismund und das ungarische Städtewesen,” In Das Zeitalter König Sigmunds in Ungarn und im Deutschen Reich, eds. T. Schmidt and P. Gunst (Debrecen: Debrecen University, Institute of History 2000); Friedrich Bernward Fahlbusch, Städte und Königtum im frühen 15. Jahrhundert. Ein Beitrag zur Geschichte Sigmunds von Luxemburg (Köln-Wien: Böhlau, 1983), pp. 39–48.

15 APRILI 1405

Sigismundus dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Cornanie Bulgarieque rex, marchioque Brandenburgensis ac sacri romani imperii archicamerarius, necnon Bohemie et Lucemburgensis heres, universis Christi fidelibus tam presentibus, quam futuris, presentium notitiam habituris salutem in omnium salvatore. Sceptringera regalis dignitatis altitudo eo vigilantiori cura subditorum suorum conservationem ac tranquillitatem exquirat, quo felicitatem publicam in sui augmentum et gloriam, calamitatem vero in sui cernit detrimentum et ignominiam redundare. Neque enim princeps esse potest inglorius, qui de subiectorum pace et securitate semper cogitat, neque non ignavus, qui futuris malis et periculis non previdet, quando potest. Hinc est, quod convocatis ex omnibus regni nostri comitatibus ac districtibus civitatum, oppidorum et liberarum villarum regie iurisdictioni pertinentium nunciis et legatis, auditis et diligenter intellectis eorum et cuiuslibet ipsorum petitionibus, requisitionibus, informationibus, opinionibus et querelis, de prelatorum, baronum et potiorum regni nostri procerum, ipsorum etiam legatorum consilio, matura quoque superinde deliberatione prehabita pro bono et pacifico statu evidentique utilitate totius regni nostri quasdam civitates murorum ambitu cingendas, quasdam liberas villas seu oppida civitatis honore sublimandas, quasdam consuetudines, que potius abusiones videbantur, abolendas, quasdam moderandas, quasdam in melius reformandas, quedam etiam de novo statuenda decrevimus, sanximus et ordinavimus, prout infra.

Ad quam rem una potissimum consideratio mentem nostram induxit, quod retroactis temporibus, prout in cronicis legitur Hungarorum, hoc regnum nostrum variis sepe afflictionibus interdum per Bissenos, aliquando per Tartaros, nonnunquam per alios paganos, novissime vero per Turcos irrogatis solummodo ob muratarum civitatum seu aliarum munitionum carentiam et defectum, cum homines, ubi se et, bona sua recludere seu reducere possent, loca fortia non haberent, quin ymo cuncta exposita prediis hostium in propatulo subiacerent, miserabiles desolationes, tristissimas populorum abductiones et generaliter innumerabilia, que horror est referri, et inestimabilia pertulit detrimenta.

I. Primo namque quorundam subditorum nostrorum precibus inclinati libertates infra declarandas statuimus, quod in omnibus civitatibus, oppidis, castris et villis, et generaliter ubicunque intra regni nostri ambitum, tam in nostris, quam aliorum, quorumcunque sint, libra, statera, ulna, mensura vini, frugum et generaliter omnes res mensurabiles et ponderabiles ponderentur et mensurentur secundum mensuram civitatis nostre Budensis, demptis tantummodo mensuris decimarum et montium tributis vulgo heguam, in Teutonico pergreht, ac lucris, censibus, feudis et redditibus presbiterorum et virorum ecclesiasticorum, quos in suis statu et iustitia, quantitate et valore volumus permanere. Si quis autem contrarium facere presumpserit, incidet in penam amissionis rei ponderate vel mensurate, perdendo pro parte ponderata vel mensurata totam rem ponderandam vel mensurandam.

II. Sanximus preterea mercatoribus forensibus in civitatibus quibuslibet pannos incidere et ad ulnam vendere, ymmo nec pauciores sex staminibus simul vendere ullo tempore, etiam diebus nundinarum non licere, dummodo iidem mercatores sex pannos vel plures habere dinoscantur. Si vero pauciores sex haberent, eosdem integros vendere vel commutare valeant atque possint. Quod si secus attemptatum fuerit, perdantur quelibet stamina contra huiusmodi ordinationem nostram vendita, alienata vel commutata, necnon pecunia, si qua forte soluta fuisset pro eisdem.

III. Decrevimus insuper, quod nullus publicus notarius in causis, que inter duos laicos vertuntur, sive coram iudice ecclesiastico, sive seculari procurare audeat vel ullatenus advocare, sed nec extraneum testimonium inter cives locum habeat, nec nobiles seu viri ecclesiastici inquisitiones possint facere contra eos.

IV. Porro omnibus et singulis civibus, hospitibus et populis quarumcunque civitatum nostrarum et liberarum villarum alicui ex principalioribus civitatibus annexarum a quacunque sententia per eorum iudices et cives lata ad magistrum tavarnicorum nostrorum vel ad iudicium illius civitatis, cuius libertate talis civitas vel villa libera fungitur, liceat appellare, nec ab illorum, ad quos appellatum fuerit, iudicatu vel sententia sit ulterius in aliorum iudicum presentiam procedendum, sed ipsa causa debeat coram eisdem finaliter terminari.

V. Ad hec, quemadmodum ex antiqua regni nostri consuetudine per divos reges predecessores nostros et nos hactenus observata palatinus, comites parochiales alique honorem seu dignitatem baronatus tenentes in congregatoriis ac generalibus iudiciis quoslibet fures, latrones ac alios malefactores inibi proscriptos et extradatos iudicare, condemnare, punire seu proscribere consueverunt, et insuper veluti nobiles ex speciali gratia regia ipsis concedi consueta in eorum possessionibus etiam malefactores, quos in maleficiis et culpis deprehendunt, condemnare penaliter ac punire facultatem liberam habuerunt, ita et nos in presenti sanxione duximus statuendum, quod de cetero pro conservanda pace proque civitatum et villarum uberiori tranquillitate, pro viarum securitate, pro itinerantium comodo, et ut malefactoribus delinquendi materia subtrahatur, omnes et singule civitates ac libere ville seu iudices et iurati earundem huiusmodi malefactores, qui in eorum tenutis maleficia perpetrassent, quemadmodum et nobiles ex gratia et donatione regia facere possent, condemnandi et debitis puniendi suppliciis plenam et liberam habeant facultatem, salvo si ipsi rei et, suppliciis digni a regia maiestate obtinuissent gratiam superinde. Sin autem palatinus, comites et aliqui honorem baronatus habentes, necnon civitatum rectores huiusmodi malefactores extradatos comprehendere et punire non possent, sed nichilominus eos culpabiles iudicando proscriberent, eo casu teneantur illi, qui proscriptionem fecerint, tales malefactores proscriptos cunctis iudicibus et iustitiariis regni nostri et etiam omnibus civitatibus denunciare et per eorum litteras maleficii eorundem seriem continentes manifestare. Qui iudices et iustitarii ac etiam civitatum rectores, postquam huiusmodi littere ad manus eorum pervenerint, ipsos malefactores, si in eorum tenutis et districtibus invenerint, possint et valeant, ymno teneantur et debeant arestare, captivare, punire et iuxta eorum demerita dignis affligere suppliciis et tormentis, salvo semper, si a regia maiestate venie gratiam impetrassent. Quod si quis iudicum, iustitiariorum vel rectorum predictorum ipsos malefactores, cum in manus ipsorum inciderint, punire contempserit, sciat se procul dubio indignationem maiestatis nostre gravissimam incursum et a nostra serenitate iuxta qualitatem excessus exinde dependentis irremissibiliter puniendum. Nullus etiam omnino presummat eosdem malefactores fovere, protegere vel aliququaliter defensare sub pena superius annotata.

VI. Sanximus preterea, ut amodo in antea cives, hospites seu jobagiones nostri regales de nostris civitatibus, possessionibus, oppidis et liberis villis castrorumque nostrorum tenutis in ecclesiarum, nobilium et alterius preeminentie hominum possessiones, et e converso earundem ecclesiarum, necnon nobilium et alterius preeminentie hominum jobagiones in prefatas nostras possessiones castrorumque nostrorum tenutas et generaliter quilibet libere conditionis homines de possessionibus nobilium in ecclesiarum possessiones et de ecclesiarum possessionibus in nobilium possessiones temporibus semper successivis universis et perpetuis liberam, tutam et omnimodam manendi causa se transferendi habeant facultatem harum nostrarum litterarum per vigorem.

His moderaminum limitationibus clare presentibus expressatis, ut quicumque et quorumcunque jobagionum dominus aliqua birsagia sua, quibus jobagio suus aiiquo tempore fuisset convictus, infra unius mensis spatium non exegisset super eundem, extunc birsagia talia super eundem jobagionem suum dicto mense elapso recipere et eundem jobagionem retinere non valeat, sed idem jobagio, quo maluerit, modo prehahito indempnis moraturus acceclat. Jobagiones autem ultra Draue fluvium residentes; huius libertatis privilegio gaudere nolumus, sed potius in suis antiquis consuetudinibus decrevimus permanere .

VII. Decernimus insuper et ordinamus, quod nullus ex prelatiis, baronibus, proceribus, nobilibus aut alterius cuiuscunque dignitatis, ordinis, Status et conditionis hominibus, regnicolis et subditis nostris occasione debiti, delicti, culpe aut maleficii unius persone seu hominis, cuiuscunque status et conditionis existat, audeat vel presumat civitatem, oppidum vel villam, ubi talis debitor, delinquens, aut maleficus 'residere consuevit, seu cives, oppidanos vel villanos arestare, detinere vel modo aliquo impedire; sed si quis contra talem quidquam actionis habet vel habuerit, id in presentia iudicis sui ordinari exequatur, prout retroactis temporibus fieri in talibus secundum. regni nostri iustitiam consuevit, ita quod innoxii pro nocentibus nullo modo aggraventur.

VIII. Statuimus etiam et ordinamus, quod quemadmodum antiqua regni nostri habet consuetudo, ut si cuiquam in villa vel possessione alicuius domini terrestris, cuiuscunque status et conditionis, tam ecclesiasticus, quam secularis existat, aliqualis inferretur iniuria, dampnum vel offensa, talis lesus seu dampnum passus primo ad dominum seu iudicem illius possessionis accedendo iustitiam postulare teneatur, et si talis dominus vel iudex sibi iustitiam facere contempserit, ad comitem provincialem valeat appellare, et si comes etiam in reddenda iustitia tepidus fuerit vel remissus, ad nostram regiam maiestatem possit etiam appellare, ita nunc quoque volumus, ut si alicui persone regnicole vel extranee in aliqua civitatum, oppidorum et villarum liberarum nostrarum per aliquem, cuiusvis status existat et conditionis, aliqualis iniuria, offensa vel dampnum fuerint irrogate vel illata, tunc talis lesus seu dampnum passus primo coram iudice illius civitatis suam debeat prosecui iustitiam. Et si iudex et iurati illius civitatis iustitiam, sibi debitam facere recusaverint vel exhibere distulerint, tunc ipse lesus vel dampnum passus, ad magistrum tauarnicorum nostrorum suam causam attrahere valeat atque possit. Deinde si etiam ipse magister tavarnicorum nostrorum super huiusmodi querela iustitiam ministrare contempserit, tunc liceat annotato leso vel dampnum passo ipsius magistri tavarnicorum iudicio dimisso suam causam in nostre maiestatis presentiam attrahere, nosque, uti ex regiminis nostri regalis officio tenemur, unicuique ministrabimus iustitie complementum. Quod si quispiam lesus vel dampnum passus hoc ordine non servato auctoritate propria, se presumpserit vindicare et sibi satisfactionem recipere, talis transgressor huius nostri decreti in facto potentie convincatur, cum neminem liceat nulla postulata iustitia propria se auctoritate vindicare.

IX. Decrevimus etiam, quod ir, quibuscunque causis et processibus, de quibus iudices causarum quarumcunque nonam et decimam ;ab illa parte, que causam obtinet, recipere consueverunt, de cetero non ab ipsa parte, que causam obtinet, sed ab illa, que in ipsa causa convincetur, recipere debeant iudices illius cause et extorquere, cum non sit equum, ut qui iustus est, pro iniustis puniatur et in rebus dampnificetur.

X. Statuimus etiam, ut quilibet civis et inhabitator quarumlibet civitatum nostrarum amodo et in antea ad collectas nostras regales et contributiones pro rata, non obstantibus quibuscunque libertatibus ipsis hactenus datis et in posterum per nos et nostros successores concedendis, quas quoad premissa ipsis non volumus ullatenus suffragari, solvere et cum illis nostris civibus contribuere teneantur. Si vero per nos vel nostros successores aliquos cives nostros libertare et exemptos facere contingeret, tunc et in eo casu nos et nostri successores predicti, quicquam ipsi cives libertati ad collectas solvere deberent, id de communitatis computo defalcando ad nostram tenemur et debebunt recipere rationem.

XI. Item licet cives nostri Budenses inter ceteras eorum libertates tali libertate per nostros predecessores ipsis largita et concessa ac per nos confirmata freti et usi hucusque dinoscuntur, utputa quod omnes et singuli tam regnicole, quam extranei mercatores universas et quaslibet res mercimoniales ac bona venalia et commutabilia tam ascendendo, quam descendendo in ipsorum civium Budensium medio deponere ac depositas inibi vendere et commutare abindeque nullatenus alias abducere, neque deportati facere debuissent et fuissent assueti; tamen, quia nunc facta generali congregatione quarumlibet civitatum, oppidorum ac liberarum villarum nostrarum regalium, habito superinde consilio visum et consultum extitit, ut pro ampliori fructuositate et uberiori statu, comodo et communi bono regni et regnicolarum ac precipue civium et mercatorum nostrorum, ne propter utilitatem et augmentum unius civitatis tota regni nostri communitas dampnum et incomodum suscipiat et nocivum recipiat detrimentum, omnes et singuli mercatores nostri, videlicet regnicole de regno nostro exeuntes et in regno nostro commorantes universas et quaslibet ipsorum res mercimoniales et bona venalia seu commutabilia per totum regnum nostrum et extra ipsum regnum quocunque, quotiescunque et quandocunque voluerint, liberam, meram, plenam et securam deducendi, deferendi, pellendi, reducendi, deponendi ac depositas vendendi, commutandi ac abinde deferendi et deduci faciendi ac cum eisdem iuxta eorum voluntatis libitum disponendi habeant facultatem, non obstantibus quibuscunque libertatibus et privilegiis dictis civibus nostris Budensibus super premissa rerum depositione quomodolibet datis et concessis, quas et que quoad premissa ex certa scientia revocamus, exceptis extraneis, qui teneantur in premissis antiquam consuetudinem observare.

XII. Insuper omnes et singuli cives civitatum, quas de novo creavimus, quibuscunque aliarum civitatum constituimus libertatem, si de iudicatu et sententia iudicum et iuratorum suorum noluerint contentari, ad illam civitatem, cuius libertate funguntur, aut ad magistrum tavarnicorum nostrorum valeant appellare; ita tamen, quod postquam magistrum tavarnicorum elegerint, ad iudices et iuratos recurrere non valeant, nec e contra ad nullum ulterius, nisi si opus fuerit, ad presentiarn nostram personalem appellatio possit fieri quovis modo.

XIII. Sanximus nichilominus statuentes, ut cives et hospites nostri quarumlibet civitatum nostrarum regalium intra ambitum et climata regni nostri existentium dona seu munera ipsorum in novo quolibet anno pretextu strenuarum regie maiestati debita sic et eo motio nostre maiestati dare et solvere, quemadmodum noviter convenimus cum eisdem, et in quarumlibet civitatum, oppidorum et liberarum villarum nostrarum litteris per nos ipsis concessis, inter alias eorum libertates clare exprimuntur, debebunt et tenebuntur. Preterea magistro ianitorum nostrorum tempore in prefixo non plus, quam sex florenos dare et cum eisdem nostris muneribus annis singulis solvere teneantur. Dum autem ubi et quando nostram vel reginalem claritatem in aliquam civitatem, oppidorum et liberarum villarum regni nostri intrare contigerit, extunc cives et hospites loci illius, in quem ingressum fecerimus, nostre aut reginali maiestati victualia oportuna ad unum prandium et unam cenam, si prandium et cenam ibidem habere voluerimus, aut prandium vel cenam tantummodo, si nisi semel nos ibidem comestionem habere contigerit, habundanter dare et amministrare teneantur. Magistro vero agazonum civitates, per quas nostram seu reginalem maiestatem transire contigerit, illius scilicet civitatis artifices cuiuslibet generis, utputa omnes pellifices unum pellicium, omnes frenatores unum frenum et sic de singulis una vice dumtaxat in anno, quandocunque nos inde transire contingat, et non aliter, dare et enceniare teneantur, demptis tantummodo civitatibus, que ad premissa ex antiqua consuetudine nullatenus obligantur. Ceteris vero officialibus, tam nostris, quam reginalibus, videlicet pincernarum et dapiferorum magistris, dispensatori, hostiariis, cocis et aliis quibuscunque nichil penitus dare seu solvere teneantur.

XIV. Disposuimus etiam de modo ac consuetudine ab antiquo solitis observari, quod prelati et quipiam viri ecclesiastici causas aliquas inter regnicolas nostros motas amodoque et in antea qualitercunque, quomodocunque et ubicunque movendas et suscitatas, utputa iudicium seculare concernentes iudicare et diffinire minime valeant neque possint, et e converso barones, comites provinciarum et alii regni nostri nobiles civesque et hospites causas aliquas, lites seu questiones, forum videlicet ecclesiasticum tangentes discutere et iudicare non debeant, neque presumant. Et si inter ipsos viros ecclesiasticos ab una, parte vero ex altera iudices seculares pretaxatos super aliquibus causis in eorum presentia vertentibus circa ipsarum causarum iudicium, cuius videlicet ipsorum iudicio pertineant, discordia seu disceptatio extiterit suborta, extunc partes eedem causam seu causas huiusmodi litigiosas in specialem nostram presentiam, ubi deo duce pro tunc fuerimus constituti, cum prelati et baronibus nostris dirinnendas transmittere teneantur, ubi decernentes sanctiemus, ad cuius partis iudicium seu forum spectare debeant et pertinere cause prenotate.

XV. Insuper, quemadmodum et ab antiquo iuxta statuta regia aurum, argentum, cuprum et alia metalla de regno nostro educi prohibita existunt ita inter alias constitutiones civitatibus, oppidis et liberis villis ad presens editas sanximus et statuimus, ut in qualibet civitate, oppidum et liberarum villarum duo iurati cives ad id idonei per iudicem et cives eligantur, qui quibuscunque ligationibus et obstructionibus ballarum, vasorum et aliorum ponderum ligandorum interesse et easdem conspicere debeant, sine quibus civibus ad id deputatis nulli mercatores, institores ac alii quicunque commutatores ipsorum ballas ac alia pondera ligare aut concludere presumant, quas quidem ballas et pondera iidem duo cives eorum sigillorum appositione consignare debeant et munire; et si contrafactum fuerit, extunc ipse balle vel mercimonia non inspecte nec sigillata, ut premittitur, totaliter amittantur et fisco nostro regali penitus applicentur. Quibus fluidem ballis aut aliis quibusvis ponderibus sic ligatis et consignatis ad iocaque tricesimarum nostrarum deductis et portatis, si et in casu, quo nostri tricesimatres aut eorundem officiales talibus sigillationibus fidem nollent adhibere, sed huiusmodi ballas pretenderent disligare, extunc, si currus, in quibus balle et pondera deferuntur, magni onerati, in vulgo masa dicti extiterint, unam marcam auri vel sexaginta quatuor florenos aut monetam eiusdem valoris, si vero currus, medius, modicus seu parvus foret, tunc mediam marcam aut florenos vel monetam equivalentes ad temonem ipsius currus apponendo, easdem ballas et pondera disligare et conspiciere valeat atque possit. Et si in huiusmodi ballis seu ponderibus aurum, argentum vel alie res prohibite non reperirentur, extunc tricesimator amittat marcam seu pecuniam appositam, que domino earundem rerum seu mercatori debeant remanere. Si vero aurum, argentum vel alique res prohibite reperte fuerint in ipso curru et invente, tunc non solum eadem res prohibite, sed etiam alie universe et bona quevis in ipso curru et balla existentes et habita simul cum marca seu pecuniis huiusmodi per ipsos tricesimatores aut eorum officiales auferantur et recipiantur.

XVI. Statuimus etiam et ex deliberatione decrevimus, ut nullus omnino mercatorum, alterius etiam cuiusvis regni nostri status, conditionis et preeminentie hominum res mercimoniles ac bona quevis venalia et commutabilia forensium ac extraneorum sub nomine rerum et mercantiarum propriarum, prout in talibus astutia aliquorum hactenus facere consuevit, acceptare, recipere, tenere, conservare, vendere, commutare seu etiam modo quovis expedire, societatesque cum ipsis forensibus contrahere, facere, stabilire, ordinare et firmare ratione atque causa, ut sub colore huiusmodi societatis premissa libere exerceant dictoque nostro decreto contrafaciant, ullatenus audeat atque possit; contrarium vero facientes rerum omnium et bonorum sub huiusmodi cautelosa collusionem in nostri presentis edicti contemptum in regnum nostrum apportatarum, venditarum et vendendarum, commutatarum et commutandarum irremissibilem perditionem et fisco nostro regio applicationem personasque ipsas penam arbitrariam nostre maiestatis incurrere volumus eo facto, totiens quotiens in contrarium premissorum per quempiam contrafactum fuerit, seu etiam attemptatum.

XVII. Preterea quia noviter certis histis et rationabilibus causis moti pro rei publice utilitate totiusque regni conservatione, pro qua etiam retroactis temporibus predecessores nostri Hungarie reges multa statuta multasque consuetudines inducere curaverunt, unacum predictis prelati, baronibus ac regni nostri potioribus proceribus decrevimus, ut universi mercatores, negotiatores et alii, cuiuscunque status et conditionis homines extra regni nostri limites mercimonia seu res mercimoniales et venales deferentes et exportantes tricesimam partem, quemadmodum de illis, que introducuntur in regnum, solvere et administrare teneantur, idcirco in premissi decreti nostri noviter instituti aliqualem alleviationem et etiam recompensam sanximus et ex liberalitate regia concessimus, quod huiusmodi mercatores ac negotiatores et alii prenominati per quecunque loca tributorum seu teloniorum nostrorum regalium cum personis, equis, curribus ac quibuscunque eorum mercimoniis ac rebus et bonis universis libere et expedite, sine aliquali solutione tributaria transire valeant, totiens quotiens eis fuerit opportunum, mandantes tributariis nostris quibuslibet, tam presentibus, quam futuris, quatenus huiusmodi personas sub pena indignationis nostre gravissime contra formam premissae libertatis nullatenus impedire, neque ab eis tributum aliquod petere et exigere audeant.

XVIII. Ceterum cum in omnibus regnis reges quadam prerogativa precipua monetam tam auream, quam argenteam cudi facere liberam habeant facultatem, inhonestum satis et detestabile videretur, quod pecunia cusa per cudentis ditionem cursum et expositionem debitam non haberet, sed multo detestabilius, si circumcideretur vel eligeretur aut modo aliquo vitaretur. Cupientes igitur hiis enormibus casibus salubribus remediis obviare, requisito super eo prelatorum, baronum procerumque nostrorum, necnon universorum civium civitatum regalium presentialiter constitutorum consilio, pro utilitate totius regni pariter et augmento proque iustitie splendore conservando ordinavimus et etiam statuimus, quod nullus omnino hominum, cuiuscunque status et conditionis existat, audeat vel presumat pecuniam nostram regalem sive autream, sive argenteam, dummodo iusta et recta sit, reicere vel aliquatenus refutare, item nec circumcidere, graves a levibus secernere vel aliquo artificio seu ingenio vitare. Contrarium quidem attemptare presumentes hoc modo debeant puniri, videlicet ille vel illi, qui pecuniam eandem recipere recusaverint, cadant in penam amissionis pecunie, que sibi deberetur, vel rei, pro qua pecuniam solvere tenentur, ita quod iudex et iurati illius loci illam pecuniam vel rem habeant et debitor a creditore suo ac emptor a venditore proinde liber sit et absolutus, ac si eidem dictam pecuniam persolvisset; ille vero vel qui regiam pecuniam circumcidere, diminuire, eligere vel vitare presumpserint, ut prefertur, tamquam falsarii et malefactores non tantum in rebus, sed etiam in personis iuxta regni nostri consuetudinem antiquam puniantur; quod si facere ipsi iudices et iurati, in quorum manus tales transgressores inciderint, rennerint et eos impune abire permiserint, pro pecunia vel re relaxata in tanta quantitate pecunie vel valore ipsius rei fisco regio subiaceant condempnati; pro falsariis vero dismissis in illam penam incidant sive pecuniariam, sive personalem, quam nostra maiestas eis duxerit imponendam et etiam infligendam.

XIX. Verum ut ipsa pecunia nostra in sua rectitudine conservetur, nullusque presummat ipsam decidere vel vitare, sanximus etiam, quod in qualibet nostra civitate sit cambsor regius, qui solus cambiendi et commutandi pecuniam, videlicet pro florenis aureis monetam et pro moneta florenos aureos habeat facultatem; interdicientes universis et singulis regnicolis nostris et etiam extraneis, cuiuscunque status et conditionis existant, ut de cetero cambire seu commutationem aliquam de pecunia et florenis aureis pro pecunia facere non valeant, neque possint sub pena amissionis ipsius pecunie cambse vel cambiende, que eidem cambsori regio nomine fisci nostri debeat apportari.

XX. Demum cum predecessores nostri Hungarie reges probabili sanctione statuerint, ut intra limites regni nostri Hungarie nulli sales expeditionem seu cursum habere deberent, nisi tantummodo sales, qui in ipso regno nostro effodiuntur, nostra quoque maiestas considerans hanc sanctionem fore iustissimam et honestam, cum quodammodo pars sit magna dementie, id, quod de suo quispiam habere potest, ab alio mutuare, similiter statuit sanctiendum, habito tamen prius superinde nostrorum prelatorum, baronum ac procerum consilio nostro et deliberatione prematura, quatenus de cetero nullus omnino hominum, cuiuscunque status, dignitatis et conditionis existat, sive regnicola, sive advena, audeat vel presumat sales alicuiusmodi, preterquam solummodo sales nostros regales in regno effossos intra regnum nostrum inducere, deferre, vendere, emere, distrahere, consumere vel aliquo modo habere sub pena inferius annotata, videlicet, quod si apud quospiam, cuiusvis status et conditionis existant, reperti fuerint huiusmodi sales in regno nostro non effossi, ille vel apud quos reperti fuerint, primo perdant et amittant ipso facto protinus ipsos sales. Si vero quispiam venundaverit, antequam apud eum reperiantur, tunc ad restitutionem pecunie irremissibiliter teneatur, quos sales vel quam pecuniam camerarius regius nomine fisci regalis indilate auferat et exigat ab eisdem.

XXI. Denique pro communi bono et totius utilitate regni providere volentes, ne aurum et argentum, quod in ipso regno effoditur, extra regnum per quempiam deferatur, nisi prius conversum fuerit in monetam, hoc etiam salubri remedio duximus statuendum, videlicet ut nemo montanus cuiquam hominum, cuiusvis status et conditionis existat, aurum vel argentum publice vel secrete vendere, nemoque omnino montanus, cuiusvis etiam status et conditionis existat, a montano seu labore emere audeat vel presumat, sed omne et totum aurum, argentum, quod et quantum ubique per regni nostri climata effoditur et etiam invenitur, debeat sine aliquali diminutione camare regalis monete tam auree, quam argenteae presentari vendendum camarario regio pro pretio et pretiis hactenus limitatis. Item nec ab aliqua alia persona causa mercationis seu venditionis publice vel secrete emi aut vendi liceat aurum vel argentum, etiamsi de alienis partibus ipsum aurum et argentum ad hoc regnum portaretur, sed semper quicumque venditor illud debeat camarario regie monete presidenti vendere et nulli alteri; ipseque camararius dare sibi pretium non secundum estimationem montanorum, sed prout in loco, ubi tunc fiet venditio, teneatur. Pro usu vero proprio, videlicet pro vasis aureis et argenteis, balteis et aliis ad cultum vel ornatum spectantibus laborandis unusquisque vendendi et emendi liberam habeat facultatem. Si quis autem forte contrarium facere presumpserit, et venditor aurum vel argentum et emptor pecuniam amittat protinus ipso facto, quod aurum vel argentum, quae pecunia fisco nostro regio pro medietate et pro reliqua medietate accusanti, si quis accusator extiterit, applicetur. Ob hoc etenim nolumus, quod quispiam audeat vel presummat acum seu lapidem illum, in quo auri vel argenti qualitas dinoscitur, habere, item neque testam seu intimam pro argenti fusione et finantia tenere, exceptis dumtaxat aurifabris; insuper nec separandi cum aqua aurum ab argento artem exercere, nisi ille vel illi, quibus huiusmodi officia duxerimus specialiter committenda.

In quorum omnium et singulorum testimonium firmitatemque perpetuam presentes litteras nostras privilegiales pendentes et autentici novi sigilli nostri duplicis munimine iussimus roborari. Datum per manus reverendissimi in Christo patris et domini domini Eberhardi, premissa dei et apostolice sedis gratia episcopi Zagrabiensis, aule nostre regie summi cancellarii, dilecti nostri et fidelis, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinto, decimo septimo Kalendas mensis Maii, regni autem nostri anno decimo septimo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus et dominis Valentino tituli sancte Sabine sacrosancte Romane ecclesie presbitero cardinali et ecclesie Quinqueecclesiensis gubernatore, Johanne Strigoniensi, Colocensi sede vacante, Andrea Spalatensi et altero Andrea Ragusiensi archiepiscopis, Luca Waradiensis, Stephano Transsilvanensis, eodem domino Eberhardo Zagrabiensis, Agriensi sede vacante, Johanne Boznensis, Wesprimiensi sede vacante, Johanne Jauriensis, Nicolao Waciensis, Petro Nitriensis, fratre Dosa electo Chanadiensis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias dei feliciter gubernantibus, Syrimiensi, Traguriensi, Scardonensi, Tininiensi, Nonensi, Sibinicensi, Corbawiensi et Segniensi sedibus vacantibus; necnon magnificis viris Nicolao de Gara, regni nostri Hungarie palatino, Johanne et Jacobo wayuodis nostris Transsilvanensibus, comite Frank filio condam Konye bani, iudice curie nostre, Paulo Bisseno et altero Paulo de Pech Dalmatie et Croatia predictorum ac totius Sclavonie, Johanne de Maroth Machouiensi banis, honore banatus Zewriniensis vacante, Nicolao Treutul de Newna tavarnicorum et comite de Posega, Sirnone filio dicti condam Konye bani ianitorum, Martino Ders dapiferorum, Laurentio de Tary pincernarum, Petro Cheh agazonum nostrorum magistris, Smylone de Wethaw comite Posoniensi aliisque quampluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

15 APRIL, 1405

Sigismund, by the grace of God, king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, margrave of Brandenburg, arch-chamberlain of the Holy Roman Empire, heir of Bohemia and Luxemburg,¹ to all Christ's faithful, present and future to whose notice these presents may come, greetings in the Savior of all.

The more the scepter-bearing eminence of royal dignity perceives that happiness of the subjects serves the growth and glory of the kingdom, while their misery causes its detriment and bad reputation, the more he desires to maintain by vigilant care their sustenance and peace. For no prince can be inglorious who constantly contemplates the peace and safety of his subjects, and none worthy who does not forestall future dangers and disasters when he can. That is why, after having called together the emissaries and delegates of cities, towns, and free villages under royal jurisdiction, from every county and district of our realm,² and having listened to and understood well all their petitions, requests, presentations, views, and complaints, we have decided, ordered, and commanded for the good and peaceful state and the manifest advantage of our entire kingdom, with the counsel of the prelates, barons, and the greater lords of our kingdom as well as of the delegates, having held mature deliberations in these matters, that certain cities be surrounded by protective walls,³ certain free villages and towns be raised to the status of cities, certain customs,

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of "kingdoms" that were essentially only claims, but remained listed till the end of the monarchy in the twentieth century. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, "Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources," in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45. Sigismund added to it his inherited titles.

² Calling together burghers to a special meeting was not only an unprecedented, but in fact a unique event in the history of medieval Hungary. Actually, not all the important cities were represented, which is suggested by the fact that Cluj/Kolozsvár received its copy of the statutes only seven months later (Fahlbusch, p. 34, n. 106). The difference between cities, towns and free villages is not easy to define because the terms were not always used in a consistent way (see Erzsébet Ladányi, "Libera villa, civitas, oppidum. Terminologische Fragen in der ungarischen Städteentwicklung," Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica 18 [1977], pp. 3–43). It may be said on the whole, however, that fortified towns were called civitates, and this was the usual name also for some unfortified places like mining towns or episcopal cities. Apart from these, unfortified royal towns or privileged royal markets were generally termed liberae villae up to the late fourteenth and early fifteenth century when these words were gradually replaced by the term oppidum. This became common later for all categories of such privileged places, royal or not, which were not considered to be "free cities" (civitates). Characteristically enough, the Hungarian equivalent of oppidum was mezőváros, literally "a field town," implying any unwalled settlement with a privileged community (see Erik Fügedi, "Die Ausbreitung der städtischen Lebensform: Ungarns oppida im 14. Jahrhundert," in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak. London: Variorum Reprints, 1986, ch. 13, pp. 165–92).

³ Increasing the number of fortified royal cities seems to have been a point of particular importance to Sigismund. By temporary exemption from taxes and other means he supported the completion of unfinished which appear rather to be abuses, be abolished, others changed, others improved, and some newly established.

One major consideration led us to these decisions, namely that this kingdom in times past, as one can read in the chronicles of the Hungarians,⁴ had to endure deplorable destruction, sorrowful abduction of people, and in general innumerable and inestimable damages horrible to relate, from different and frequent attacks, once by the Pechenegs, once by the Mongols, or other pagans, and more recently by the Turks, only because, owing to the lack of walled cities and other fortifications, there were no fortified places in which people with their goods could have found refuge and shelter, but were instead completely exposed unprotected, easy prey to the enemy.

1 First, moved by the requests of some of our subjects, we establish the following liberties: that in all cities, towns, castles and villages, be they ours or others', and in general everywhere in the realm, weights, scales, ells, and the measures of wine, grain, and everything measurable and weighable shall be weighed and measured according to the measures of our city of Buda,⁵ with the exception of the measure of the tithes and of the tribute of the mountains commonly called hegyvám, in German, Pergrecht,⁶ as well as the income, rent, land, and revenue of priests and ecclesiastical persons which we wish to remain in their present state, quality, quantity, and value. Moreover, if anyone dares to act otherwise, he shall be punished by the loss of the thing so weighed or measured, losing the entire item subject to weight or measure even if only a part was weighed and measured incorrectly.

fortifications in royal cities. At the time of the 1405 assembly he granted extended liberties to a number of royal markets with the remarkable stipulation that they could enjoy them only after their walls were built up. On Sigismund's policies towards the cities, see Kubinyi, "Der ungarische König," passim and the studies cited in n 2, above.

⁴ The "chronicles of the Hungarians" obviously refers to the fourteenth-century compilation of different chronicles and gesta of the Árpadian period, see now the Chronicle of the Deeds of the Hungarians from the Fourteenth-Century Illuminated Chronicle &c., János M. Bak, László Veszprémy trans. and ed. (Budapest-New York: CEU Press, 2018); cf. also Baázs Kertész, "Afterlife of the fourteenth-century chronicle compositions," in Studies to the Illuminated Chronicle, J. M. Bak and L. Veszprémy, eds. (ibid., 2018) 181-98; and Elemér Mályusz, "La chancellerie royale et la rédaction des chroniques dans la Hongrie médiévale," Le Moyen Age 75 (1969): 51-86, 219-54, esp. p. 241. The invasions of the Pechenegs took place in the twelfth century, those of the "Tartars," i.e., of the Mongols in 1241/42 and 1285, while Ottoman raids had been a more or less usual phenomenon since 1390 or 1391. Despite the reasoning of the edict it is unlikely, however, that Sigismund's policies on this point were motivated by these invasions, for none of the cities to be fortified lay in the exposed region.

⁵ This ambitious attempt at the standardization of all measures, however favorable it might have been, had no practical consequences; see András Kubinyi, "Budapest története a későbbi középkorban Buda elestéig" [The History of Budapest in the Late Middle Ages Until the Fall of Buda], in László Gerevich, ed., Budapest története [History of Budapest], vol. 2 (Budapest: Fővárosi Tanács, 1973), p. 51, with a short summary of the Buda measures. Local measure systems, above all those of other important cities, such as Pressburg or Košice continued to prevail and were not definitely abolished before the nineteenth century.

⁶ The Hungarian word "hegyvám" is a literal translation of tributum montis; the literal meaning of the German "Bergrecht" is "right of the mountain."

2 We have also decided that foreign merchants should not be permitted in any city to cut cloth and sell it by the ell, or moreover, to sell less than six bolts at once at any time, not even during fairs,⁷ provided that these merchants are known to have six or more pieces of cloth. If they have fewer than six bolts, they should be allowed and permitted to sell or exchange these bolts individually. If there is an attempt to act otherwise, the pieces of cloth sold, transferred, or exchanged in contravention of this ordinance of ours, as well as the money that may have been paid for them, should be confiscated.

3 We have decreed, furthermore, that no notary public dare to intervene in any way or act as an advocate in cases between two laymen, either before an ecclesiastical or a lay judge;⁸ and no outside testimony shall be introduced into cases of burghers, nor should noblemen or clergy be able to institute inquisitions against them.⁹

4 Furthermore, each and every citizen, settler or inhabitant of any of our cities or free villages attached to one of the major cities¹⁰ is permitted to appeal any sentence passed by the

⁷ Restriction on foreign merchants (or merchants in general as opposed to cloth-cutters) selling cloth “en detail” was widespread in medieval Europe; see, e.g., “Charter of the Garment cutters of Stendal,” Source Book for Medieval Economic History, Roy C. Cave, and Herbert H. Coulson, eds. (Milwaukee: Bruce, 1936), pp. 246–7.

⁸ Few public notaries are known to have been working in Hungary, for their functions were fulfilled by other authorities, above all by the loca credibilia. Their competence in ecclesiastical matters was not questioned, but their activity among laymen was restricted to cases reserved for canonical jurisdiction, such as wills and marriage contracts, a practice which this law intended to codify. For other legal matters, members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia,” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Idem, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66–73

⁹ Royal cities had an unquestioned jurisdictional power over their territory, and their council functioned for the citizens as a place of authentication (locus credibilis); see Martyn C. Rady, Medieval Buda: A Study of Municipal Government and Jurisdiction in the Kingdom of Hungary (Boulder, Co.: East European Monographs, 1985), pp. 54–68. As a consequence, documents issued by other local authorities were not accepted as valid, and inquests against citizens were to be held by emissaries of the council and not, as usual, by a chapter or county magistrates. In 1435 the citizens of Zagreb refused to accept three letters of inquest not issued by urban authorities, explicitly referring to this article; whether they were successful or not is not known, for the ban sent the case to the royal court; see Ivan Kristitelj Tkalčić, Monumenta historica liberae regiae civitatis Zagrabiae (Zagreb: Albrecht, 1870) 2: 112–13.

¹⁰ The “list” of townsmen cives, hospites, populi suggests the differentiation of burghers in Hungarian cities. While hospites is frequently used for any townsman, the three categories may have indicated burgesses, judges and burghers to our Master of the Treasury or to the judges of that city in accordance with the laws of which his city or free village makes use. Nor has the case to be carried further to the bench of other judges from the judgment or sentence of those to whom the appeal was made, but is to be completed and closed before them.¹¹

5 In addition: since the palatine, the county ispáns, and others holding the honor and office of baronage, who by ancient custom of our kingdom, observed both by the holy kings, our predecessors, and ourselves, judged, sentenced, punished, or proscribed at palatinal meetings and general law-courts any thief, robber, or other criminal proscribed and extradited¹² there, and also noblemen, by special royal grace granted to them, have had the full authority to judge as criminals and punish those culprits whom they had caught in misdeeds and crimes on their estates,¹³ we have thought best to establish by the present statute that henceforth, for the keeping of the peace, the more prosperous calm of the cities and villages, the safety of the roads, and the comfort of travelers as well as for the repression of the delinquency of evildoers, each and every city and free village or their judges and jurors should also have the full and complete right to condemn and duly punish those criminals who commit crimes in their territories – just as the nobles are also allowed to do other burghers and non-privileged urban dwellers: see György Granasztói, A középkori magyar város [The Medieval Hungarian City], (Budapest: Gondolat, 1980), p. 107 f.

¹¹ The Master of the Treasury—originally in charge of supplies to the royal court—is first mentioned as judge of the cities in the urban privilege for Satu Mare in 1264. Until the end of the fourteenth century he acted as royal judge delegate with noble jurors. Urban assessors, first mentioned in 1383, were to gradually replace noble members of the court who are mentioned last in 1439. See Boglárka Weisz, “A tárnokmester jogköre az Anjou-korban,” [The jurisdiction of the magister tavernicorum in the Angevin period] In Pénz, posztó, piac. Gazdaságtörténeti tanulmányok a magyar középkorról, ed. Eadem, (Budapest: MTA Bölcsészettudományi Kutatóközpont Történettudományi Intézet, 2016) pp. 181–200. From the extensive literature (going back to G. M. Kovachich) see, Andrásd Kubinyi, “Der ungarische König” pp. 198–201, 204–6; Iván Bertényi, “Die städtischen Bürger und das Gericht der königlichen Anwesenheit im 14. Jahrhundert,” Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica 11 (1970): 10–14.

¹² “Extradition” probably refers to those criminals who were captured by landholders not invested with high justice. They had to be extradited to a person or body authorized to pass and execute the capital sentence.

¹³ As early as the thirteenth century, all landowners had the right and duty of administering justice to their peasants, free or unfree. Seignorial courts (sedes dominalis or forum dominale, Hung.: úriszék), consisting probably of tenant jurors, were presided over by the lord or his steward. Their jurisdiction was initially limited by royal privilege: cases involving bloodshed could be terminated only before a royal judge or county magistrate, thus criminals sentenced to death or mutilation had to be delivered to them by the seigneur. Since the early fourteenth century, however, some major lords were granted royal privilege to pronounce final judgment in all cases and set up gallows on their estates as symbols of their right to high justice, and by the mid-fifteenth century this privilege, often referred to a “free comity” (Hung.: szabadispánság) or ius gladii was exercised by all substantial landowners. See: Kamill Szoika, A földesúri bírászkodás az Árpád-kori Magyarországon [Seignorial jurisdiction in Árpadian Hungary] (Budapest: Faculty of Law, 1944) [German summary pp. 75–8] by special royal grace and grant – excepting when the culprits or those worthy of punishment have received in this matter pardon from the royal majesty forgiving them their deeds.

If, however, the palatine, the ispáns and others holding the honor of baronage, or the magistrates of the cities were not able to capture and punish such outlawed criminals but nevertheless judge them guilty and proscribe as such, in that case those who have issued the proscription should denounce these proscribed criminals to all judges and justices of our realm and also announce this proscription to all the cities in a letter containing a description of the crimes.

Judges and justices, as well as the magistrates of the cities, once they have received such a letter, should have the right and power, nay, the duty to arrest, capture, punish, and mete out punishment and torture to these criminals, according to their misdeeds if they find them in their territories and regions, excepting always if they have received pardon by the grace of the royal majesty.

Whoever of the said judges, justices, and magistrates may fail to punish such criminals when they fall into his hands should know that he will beyond doubt call upon himself the gravest disapproval of our majesty and that he shall be pitilessly punished by our majesty according to the nature of his trespass. Also let no one dare to support, protect, or in any way defend these criminals under threat of the punishment noted above.

6 We have decreed furthermore that just as in the past, so for all times in the future our royal burghers, settlers, and tenant peasants should have the liberty, generally and in eternity, to move freely, safely, and in any manner from our cities, estates, towns, free villages, and appurtenances of our castles to the estates of churches, nobles, and people of other eminent condition and take residence there; so too may the tenant peasants of churches and nobles as well as of people of other eminent condition move to our said estates and the appurtenances of our castles, and in general people of free condition from nobles' estates to lands of the church and from ecclesiastical lands to estates of nobles.

With the following moderating limitation expressed in these presents, that if a lord of any tenant peasant has not collected from his tenant, peasant any fine to which his tenant peasant was at any time condemned within a month, he should not, have the right to collect such a fine after the lapse of the said month, nor to restrict such a tenant peasant, but the said tenant peasant should settle where he prefers unharmed in the way described before.¹⁴ We do not grant the privilege of this kind of liberty to the tenant peasants beyond the River Drava, but rather decree that they remain in their old customs.¹⁵

¹⁴ This article expands on the brief regulation contained in 1397:68, based on the council decree of 3 August 1397 (DRH, pp. 154–56). The full text of it came to be a point of reference for a long time, virtually into the sixteenth century. Clearly, many a landowner tried to retain his tenants, especially when land-labor ratios were favorable for the peasants. On the condition of tenant peasants under Sigismund, see Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), pp. 233–35.

¹⁵ The phrase is an isolated evidence for the special status of Slavonian peasants. It can be surmised from other sources that by about 1430 they already acquired the right to move freely (see Mályusz, as above).

7 We have decreed and ordered, furthermore, that no prelate, baron, lord, noble, gentleman of the realm, or any one of whatever rank, order, station, or condition or any of our subjects may dare or attempt in any way to arrest, capture, or harass any citizen, townsman, or villager or any city, town, or village where such a debtor, delinquent, criminal, or malefactor used to reside, because of debt, delict, crime, or misdeed of a person or man of whatever station or condition, but whoever has or will have any case against such a person should sue him before his justice ordinary, as has usually been done in the past according to the laws of our kingdom, so that the innocent shall in no way suffer for the guilty.¹⁶

8 We have also established and ordered, just as ancient custom of our realm demands, that if anyone of whatever station and condition, be he clergy or layman, suffers some injury, damage, or harm in the village or estate of a landowner, that such a damaged or wronged person must first turn to the lord or judge of that estate and demand justice;¹⁷ and if such a lord or judge refuses to grant him justice, he should be able to appeal to the ispán of the county; and if the ispán is slow or negligent in granting justice, he should be allowed to appeal also to our royal majesty.

Thus we now also wish that if any person, resident¹⁸ or foreigner has suffered or incurred any injury, harm, or damage by anyone of whatever station or condition in one of our cities, towns, or free villages, then such a person wronged or suffering injury or loss should pursue his claim to justice first before the judge of that city. And if the judge and jurors of that city refuse or delay granting him due justice, then the person wronged or suffering injury or loss should be allowed and should be able to carry his case to the presence of our Master of the Treasury. If, thereafter, even the Master fails to administer justice concerning the complaint, then the said person wronged or suffering injury or loss should have leave to bring his suit, bypassing the jurisdiction of the Master of the Treasury, to the presence of our majesty, and we shall render full justice to all as we are held to do in accordance with the obligations of our royal office.¹⁹ If, however, some person wronged or suffering injury or loss not following this order, presumes to avenge himself and secure satisfaction on his own behalf, then such a transgressor of our present decree shall be convicted of act of might because no one is allowed to avenge himself on his own authority without requesting proper justice.

¹⁶ This kind of action against a member of a community another member of which was indebted to a person was quite common; it was prohibited already in 1290:10.

¹⁷ On seigneurial jurisdiction, see n. 13, above.

¹⁸ While in most legal texts the term regnicola (literally: inhabitant of the realm) refers to the enfranchised nobility and we translate it as “gentleman of the realm,” here and in several subsequent articles it is used in reference to merchants, thus, clearly, the literal meaning is implied.

¹⁹ According to this article the court of the Master of the Treasury was to be the appellate court for all towns (see n. 11, above), whence appeals were allowed to a second instance, the court of the personalis praesentia. In fact the ius tavernicale was the law of the seven (later eight) “free royal cities” while other towns appealed to the royal presence; see Martnus Georgius Kovachich, Codex authenticus iuris tavernicalis (Buda: Universitas Scient., 1803), pp. 23ff; Rady, Buda, pp. 127–60.

9 We have also decreed that in the future in all those cases and lawsuits in which the judges of the case used to receive a ninth and tenth from the winning party, the judges of the case should receive and collect not from the party that has won the case, but from the party that was convicted in that case,²⁰ for it is not equitable that the just should be punished for the unjust and be fined.

10 We have also decided that, henceforth, regardless of any privilege which had been granted them in the past or will be granted them in the future by us and by our successors, of which they are not allowed to avail themselves in these matters, all burghers and inhabitants of any of our cities are to be obligated without distinction to pay their portion of our royal dues and taxes. And if we or our successors happen to exempt and excuse one of our burghers, in that case we and our successors are obligated and will be bound to deduct that amount by which the exempted burghers would have contributed to the taxes from the accounts of the community and credit it to our account.

11 Furthermore, although it is well known that the burghers of Buda up to now have held and enjoyed among other rights that privilege which was granted them by our predecessors and had been confirmed by us, namely that customarily each and every merchant, including residents and foreigners, whether coming or going, must unload all wares to be sold or traded in the presence of the burghers of Buda, and to sell or exchange those unloaded wares there, and was not allowed to transport them anywhere else;²¹ nevertheless, in the common assembly held recently with all our cities, towns, and free villages, after deliberation on this subject, for the increase of the income of our country, its inhabitants, and especially of the burghers and merchants, for the improvement of their condition, and for the public good, lest because of the profit and growth of one city the whole community of our country suffers loss, damage, and injury, we found it right and so we decided that each and every one of our merchants, that is, the residents of our kingdom, may carry, transport, drive, bring back, and unload all and any kind of merchandise for sale or exchange when leaving the country or when staying here, wherever, whenever and as often as desired, across the country or anywhere outside of it, completely unobstructed and absolutely safely, and may sell, trade, transport, carry away, and handle freely the unloaded wares at their pleasure, regardless of the aforementioned liberties and privileges of the said burghers of Buda granted and permitted

²⁰ The “ninth and tenth” (nona et decima) (worth 10 percent each, just as with tenants’ dues) was the portion due to the judge from any monetary payment in any case brought before him. It is mentioned already in eleventh century laws, see, e.g., Lad3: 22, see Imre Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899). pp. 442–50, esp. p. 449.

²¹ The article sanctioned a royal decree issued in 1402. In the fourteenth century, staple right had been the privilege of four cities only: Buda and Győr since the thirteenth century, Levoča was granted it by Charles I in 1321 and Košice by Louis I in 1347; see Sándor Domanovszky, A szepesi városok árumegállító joga [The Right of Staple of the Cities of Spíš] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1922). Owing to the central position of Buda, its staple right was of primary importance. Sigismund granted this right to five other cities in January 1402 as a reward for their “faithfulness in the time of our necessity,” i.e., during his captivity in 1401, but he withdrew this grant in October of the same year. At the same time he restricted, however, the force of existing staple rights to foreign merchants and exempted all Hungarian citizens from it; see Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund, p. 37.

them concerning the unloading of wares, which we explicitly repeal regarding the said matter, excepting foreign merchants who are held and obligated to observe the old custom concerning this matter.²²

12 Moreover, whenever burghers of those cities which we have recently founded and provided with the privileges of other cities do not want to agree to the judgments or decisions of their judges and jurors, they can appeal to that city by the laws of which they live or to our Master of the Treasury. However, if they appeal to the Master of the Treasury, they are not allowed in any way to return to their judges and jurors or to appeal to any other authority, except to make an appeal to our personal presence, should this become necessary.²³

13 In addition we have decreed the rule that the burghers and settlers of our royal cities within the territory and boundaries of our kingdom will be obliged to grant and deliver those gifts and donations, called New Year's presents, which they owe our majesty in that form and way as we have recently agreed to with them and as it is distinctly expressed together with other privileges of theirs in the charters we gave our cities, towns, and free villages.²⁴ Moreover, they must give six florins and not more to the Master of our Doorkeepers at the fixed time annually, which they must pay together with the presents due to us. If and when their majesties the king and the queen happen to visit any of the cities, towns, and free villages of our kingdom, the burghers and settlers of that place which they visit must deliver and serve food sufficient for a midday meal and for an evening meal if they are to take the meals there or a luncheon or a supper in the case that they happen to take only one meal there.²⁵ To the Master of our Horse, those cities or rather each craftsman of the mentioned city which we or her majesty the queen might pass through, except those which by right of ancient practice are not obligated to render these duties, is bound to give and deliver one product of his craft, namely, every furrier a fur coat, every saddler a bridle-bit, and so forth, but only once a year whenever we should pass through those cities. To our other office-holders or those of the queen, namely the masters of the cupbearers and the butlers, the stewards, doorkeepers, cooks, and others, or to anyone else, they do not have to give and pay anything.

²² Sigismund confirmed or repeated the exemption from tolls for several cities in the subsequent years explicitly referring to this article (see DRH, p. 200, n. 1).

²³ See above note 10; here, however, the typical medieval custom of first appeal to the “mother-town,” i.e., the city of whose laws were granted to the new foundation (or newly privileged city) is emphasized. Hungarian cities were frequently granted the laws of Székesfehérvár (in the earlier period), of Buda or Korpona (later); see Erik Fügedi, “Középkori magyar városprivilegiumok” [Medieval Hungarian urban privileges], Tanulmányok Budapest múltjából 14 (1961): 17–108, repr. in his Kolduló barátok, polgárok, nemesek [Mendicant friars, burghers, nobles] (Budapest: Magvető, 1981), pp. 238–334; cf. Rady, Buda, pp. 141–59.

²⁴ Munera (“gifts”) were regular payments in kind, due to the landowners usually on three major feasts of the year. The New Year’s gift (donum or munus) rendered by the royal cities to the king may have been, too, of seigneurial origin. It is attested in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries and was paid most often in clothes (see Fügedi, Kolduló barátok, p. 263).

²⁵ These arrangements seem to be late successors of the early medieval descensus, originally a droit de gîte, which otherwise came to be a monetary tax before it vanished.

14 Observing the customs and practices of old, we also order that no prelate or clergy should judge or pass final sentence in suits among inhabitants of our country opened or started or to be opened or started in any way and anywhere, insofar as these pertain to secular courts; and vice versa, barons, county ispáns, and other nobles of our country, as well as burghers and settlers, should not and ought not treat and judge cases, lawsuits, and questions which belong to ecclesiastical courts. And if disagreement or argument arises between the clergy on the one hand and the aforesaid secular judges on the other concerning which court has jurisdiction in a certain case, then the parties are obliged to transfer that contested case or those contested cases to the court of our special personal presence, wherever we, by God's guidance, happen to be staying at that time, and we will decide with the prelates and barons²⁶ by judgment which of the parties has the right to hold the court and to which court the said cases belong.

15 Furthermore, since exporting gold, silver, copper, and other ores from the country had been prohibited as of old,²⁷ we order and decree among the other decisions now issued for cities, towns, and free villages that in every city, town, and free village the judges and burghers are to elect two burghers suitable for this task as jurors whose duty will be to be present at the packing and wrapping up of crates of goods, vessels, and other packaged goods, and to examine them, and no merchant, dealer, or trader may dare to pack and wrap up his crates of goods and other bales without the presence of the jurors delegated to oversee the packing; and these packs and loads must be marked and certified by the seals of those two burghers.²⁸ Anyone who may act contrariwise will lose all the bales and goods which were not searched and sealed in the aforesaid manner, and these all will go to our royal treasury. And when the packs and other kinds of loads wrapped and sealed in this way have been carried and delivered to our customs post, in the case that our customs collectors or their officials do not accept the seals, but wish to open these bales, if these bales and loads were transported on large carts, commonly known as *mázsa*²⁹, then, after ²⁶ The passage is technically unclear in its present form. The “presence,” i.e., the court of any judge was called “special” if he administered justice not through his deputy, as usual, but in his own person. The king did it occasionally at any place within his realm where “by God’s guidance” he happened to stay (on the opposition to this form of jurisdiction and summons, see 1397:62). His “special presence” can be meant here only in this sense, because in the fourteenth-fifteenth century this form of royal jurisdiction was technically called “personal presence.” The term “royal special presence” was at that time reserved for a high court which had been set up in the capital in about 1376 and functioned permanently under the presidency of the arch-chancellor until 1428. Actually, a copy of this decree, the one for Kremnica, has the correct personalem in presentiam, see Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Lectiones variantes decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae (Pest: Trattner, 1816) p. 62. As to the gist of the matter, the expansion of royal jurisdiction vis-à-vis courts spiritual was an important concern of Sigismund and does not, properly speaking, belong to the purview of this decretum.

²⁷ The export of unminted gold and silver was prohibited long before, e.g. in 1342: 12.

²⁸ This arrangement presupposes the existence and use of private seals among burghers, for which there is evidence from several towns of Hungary; see, e.g., E. Tompos, “Soproniak középkori pecsétei” [Medieval seals of Sopron burghers], Soproni Szemle 28 (1973): 289–306.

²⁹ Mázsa was a cart of large capacity, used in long-distance trade from the thirteenth to the early sixteenth century; see Sándor Domanovszky, Gazdaság és társadalom a középkorban, [Economy and society in the depositing on the pole of the cart one golden mark or sixty-four florins, or money of the same value,³⁰ or if the cart is medium or moderate-sized or a small one, then half a mark or florins or money of the same value, the officials are allowed to open and to search the packs and bales. If they find in these packs and bales neither gold nor silver or any other prohibited merchandise, the customs collector will lose the deposited mark or money, which goes to the owner of the goods or to the merchant. But if they find or detect gold or silver or any other prohibited merchandise on the cart, not only that merchandise which is under prohibition, but all the other goods and chattels on that cart along with the said mark or money must be confiscated and kept by the customs collectors or their officials.

16 We have decided and after due deliberation have decreed that no merchant or any other inhabitant of our kingdom of whatever station, rank, and condition may dare in any way to accept, receive, or keep, retain, sell, exchange, or dispose of wares or any kind of goods for sale or exchange owned by strangers or foreign merchants pretending that they were his own goods and wares, as had been cunningly done in the past, or to establish, create, set up, organize, and make partnership with foreigners in order that under the cover of this sort of partnership he may freely do these things in contravention of our said decree.³¹ We order that those who act or even attempt to act contrariwise shall each and every time pitilessly lose forthwith in favor of our royal treasury the goods and items sold or to be sold, exchanged or to be exchanged, which they have brought into our kingdom in contempt of this decree by clever collusion and shall also receive a penalty regarding their persons to be decreed at our pleasure.

17 Furthermore, having been guided by definite just and reasonable principles for the common good and the survival of the whole kingdom in favor of which our predecessors, the kings of Hungary, have taken care to decree many laws and introduce many customs, we have recently decided, together with the prelates, barons, and distinguished lords of our kingdom, that every merchant, trader, and any other person of whatever station or condition who takes and exports goods and wares or things for sale beyond the borders of our kingdom will have to pay and render the thirtieth thereof,³² just as he has to do for the things imported into the kingdom. We have ordered and by royal generosity we have allowed for the extenuation and compensation of our recently decreed and aforementioned order, that those merchants and traders and others mentioned above may cross the borders of the kingdom in person with their horses, carts, and all kinds of goods and items any of the royal tolls or tribute posts³³ without paying tolls, freely and unobstructed, as many times as they wish to. We order all our present and future toll collectors that they dare not under penalty of our most serious displeasure, by contravening the abovementioned privilege, obstruct these persons under any circumstances by demanding or collecting from them any tribute.

Middle Ages] (Budapest: Gondolat, 1979), pp. 101–35. The Hungarian word now means metric “hundredweight.”

³⁰ The gold Mark is used here as a money of account. Sixty-four florins were an enormous sum, amounting to about two year’s pay of a mercenary soldier. By the “money” (moneta) the current pennies are meant whose value fluctuated. A “new penny” (nova moneta) was first issued by Sigismund in 1392 and was to be worth three old pennies which also remained in circulation. 100 new pennies (or 300 old ones) were in fact exchanged for one gold florin at least until 1403, when the government began a new financial policy leading also to the debasement of the new pennies. In 1405, 132–3 “new” and 396–400 “small” pennies equaled one florin; see Márton Gyöngyössi, “Minting and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden- Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

³¹ Partnerships between merchants in Hungary and abroad were usually initiated in form of credits for merchandize or were arranged so that a member of a foreign trading family took out burgesses’ right in a Hungarian city; see Emma Lederer, Középkori pénzüzetek Magyarországon [Medieval Financial Transactions in Hungary] (Budapest: Kovács, 1936), pp. 89–109, who also noted that Sigismund’s prohibition had little effect on such joint ventures. About those in general, see Kriszrina Arany, “Foreign Business Interests in Hungary in the Middle Ages” in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 491–508.

18 Moreover, because the kings of all countries by the right of certain paramount privileges have the power to cause gold or silver money to be minted, it seems to be a very dishonest and accursed thing that coined money should not properly circulate and be used in the whole territory of its issuer, and it is even more accursed when it is chipped, shaved, or defaced in any way. Therefore, wishing to forestall by suitable means these enormities, after having consulted in this matter with the prelates, barons, and lords as well as with the burghers of royal cities who appeared in person, we have decided and ordered the following, for the profit and growth of our kingdom and the maintenance of the splendor of justice, that no one of any station and condition may dare or attempt to decline or to refuse in any way our gold or silver money, provided that it is legitimate and true, nor to chip the coins, separate the lighter ones from the heavier ones, or deface them through any art or cunning. Whoever would dare attempt to do anything against this order must be punished in the following way: he or those who are unwilling to accept our money will as a penalty lose the money that is owed them or those goods for which they have to pay, so that the money or goods should go to the judge and jurors of that place, and the debtor towards his creditor or the buyer towards the seller will be free and quit, as if he had paid the said money; and those who dare chip or shave or deface the royal money, will be punished as if counterfeiters and criminals, not only in their goods but also in their persons, according to long-established custom of our kingdom. Judges and jurors who hesitate to keep the aforesaid rules if these offenders fall in their hands, and let them go unpunished, will be charged for the loss of money and goods with the same amount of money or the value of the goods in favor of the royal treasury, and for the release of the forgers will suffer such personal or financial punishment as our majesty will find proper to inflict and to impose.³⁴

³² The thirtieth (in Transylvania twentieth) was a customs' duty for export and import that developed from different commercial levies, see Sándor Domanovszky, "A harminczadvám eredete" [Origins of the Thirtieth], repr. now in his Gazdaság és társadalom, pp. 49–99. See also: Zsigmond Pál Pach, A harmincadvám eredete [The origin of the thirtieth customs] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), Idem "A harmincadvám az Anjou-korban és a 14–15. század fordulóján," [The thirtieth-toll in the Angevin Period and at the turn of the 14th and 15th centuries] Történelmi Szemle 41 (1999), 231–277. Sigismund's "recent" decree to which the text refers, has not survived.

³³ Tributum or teloneum was a comprehensive term for any toll except the thirtieth. By royal grants, most tolls belonged to churches and lay lords, but a minority remained in the king's hands.

19 In order to keep the true value of our money and prevent anyone from damaging or defacing it, we have also decreed that in each of our cities there should be a royal money-changer who alone will be empowered to change and exchange money, namely, to exchange gold florins for minted coins and minted coins for gold florins, and we prohibit each and every one of our inhabitants as well as foreigners of any station or condition to be able and empowered to change and exchange money and gold florins for minted coins; otherwise, they will be punished by the loss of the money exchanged or to be exchanged which must be handed over to the royal money-changer in favor of our royal treasury.³⁵

20 Finally, since our predecessors, the kings of Hungary, ordered by proper decision that, within the borders of our kingdom, no other salts besides the ones mined in the kingdom shall be used and circulated³⁶ and this ordinance has been also seen very just and proper by our majesty, for it is surely foolish to borrow things which one can get from one's own, therefore we similarly have decreed an order, but only after consulting with our prelates, barons, and lords, and after mature deliberation, that no one of any station and condition, be he inhabitant or newcomer, may dare or attempt to bring into our kingdom to transport, carry, sell, buy, distribute, consume, or obtain in any way salts other than our royal salts, mined in the kingdom under pain of the following punishment: if such salts not mined in our kingdom are found on anyone of any station or condition, then first he or those on whom these are found shall lose these salts immediately and suffer the consequences; and if someone before being caught has already sold the salt, he shall

³⁴ After earlier attempts (e.g. 1298:15) this is the first systematic codification of royal monopoly on minting and the punishment of counterfeiters.

³⁵ On the royal money-changer, see, 1342: 12.

³⁶ Since the earliest times, both the mining and selling of salt had been royal prerogatives. Old salt mines were to be found in Transylvania (Dés/Dej, Szék/Sic, Kolozs/Cojocna, Torda/Turda, Vízakna/ Ocna Sibiului) and new ones were opened up in Co. Máramaros in the fourteenth and early fifteenth centuries. All of them were administered by the count of the royal salt chamber (comes camerarum salium regaliū) who was also in charge of the salt trade. Cut into cubes, the salt was transported by his officers to special store houses (also called camerae) throughout the kingdom. Most of the salt was to be sold at fixed price but it often occurred that debts to the king's account were acquitted by paying in salt cubes. Income from the salt monopoly was estimated to amount to 100,000 florins per year in Sigismund's age and thus it became by that time the most substantial item in the king's annual revenues. See András Kubinyi, "Königliches Salzmonopol and die Städte des Königreichs Ungarn im Mittelalter," in Wilhelm Rausch, ed., Stadt and Salz (Linz: Wimmer, 1988), pp. 227; János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter" in R. Schneider, ed. Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347-87, here pp. 359-60, 381 and now István Draskóczy, Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205-18.

have to return the money, and the salts and money are to be taken away and collected immediately by the royal chamberlain in the name of the royal treasury.

21 And then, since we wish to provide for the public good and for the profit of the entire realm and to prevent anyone from taking out of the kingdom gold or silver mined in the kingdom without first exchanging it for money, we consider it a good preventative measure to decree that none of the miners may dare or attempt to sell gold or silver openly or secretly to persons of any station and condition nor by any means may a miner of any station and condition, dare to buy gold or silver from another miner or mine worker; but all the gold and silver, as much as is found and mined anywhere within the territory of our kingdom, has to be delivered up without any lessening to the royal chamber of the gold and silver coins, to be sold to the royal chamberlain at the previously determined prices.³⁷ Likewise, gold or silver may not be bought or sold openly or secretly from or to any other person for the purpose of selling and buying, not even gold and silver brought into this kingdom from abroad, but if someone wants to sell gold or silver, he must give it to the royal chamberlain presiding over the mint and to no one else, and the same chamberlain must set the price not according to the estimation of the miners but according to the current market price. However, for personal use, such as making golden or silver vessels, strapping for sabers, or other articles of luxury or religious use, everyone is allowed to sell or buy freely. If someone dares act contrariwise, both the seller of gold or silver and the buyer will lose his money without further ado so that one half of the gold or silver and of the money concerned will go to our royal treasury and the other half to the accuser if there is one. For the very same reason, we prohibit that anyone except a goldsmith may keep in his possession an acus, or that stone by which the quality of gold or silver can be assayed, or utensils or instruments suitable for casting or alloying silver;³⁸ in addition, no one shall practice the craft of separating gold from silver by water unless entrusted by us with this task.

In witness of all this, in parts and in general and for its everlasting validity we have ordered that our present charter be confirmed with our new double authentic seal pendant. Given by the hand ³⁷Cf. 1351: 13. Up to the early fourteenth century, all mines were in royal hands. If mineral deposits were found on private estates, the king had the prerogative to acquire it by exchange of property. In order to make private landowners interested in opening up new deposits, Charles I allowed them in 1327 (see DRH p. 80) to keep their property and to retain also one-third of the royal dues, the urbura. The latter was a due on mined metals, 1/10 of gold and 1/8 of other metals. It is believed that the expansion of precious metal mining in fourteenth-century Hungary was to a great extent due to this new arrangement; see Bálint Hóman, “La circolazione delle monete d’oro in Ungheria dal X al XIV secolo e la crisi europea dell’oro nel secolo XIV,” Rivista Italiana di Numismatica 35 (1922): 109–56, here pp. 135 ff.; now also Tóth, “Minting, Financial Administration” (as n. 11, above); see also 1342: 11.

³⁸ The phrase that follows explains this term; an acus is a touchstone: basanite, a type of jasper or black siliceous mineral, see Robert James Forbes, Studies in Ancient Technology 8, 2nd ed. (Leiden: Brill, 1971), pp. 175–76. What is unusual is the use of acus, a word normally designating needles, combs and other sharp instruments. The common Latin term (early and late) for a touchstone is coticula (see esp. Pliny HN 33.43.126). But acus as a synonym for coticula also appears in a Latin dictionary dedicated to Charlemagne (Paul the Deacon, Epitome of Festus de significatu verborum, p. 23, ed. Lindsay) and this usage may go back to the late first century B.C.

of the most reverend father in Christ, lord Eberhard, by the grace of God and the apostolic see bishop of Zagreb, arch-chancellor of our court,³⁹ our beloved faithful servant, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and five, the seventeenth day before the Kalends of May, in the seventeenth year of our reign, during the time, when the following reverend fathers in Christ and lords bishops governed felicitously the churches of God: Valentinus, cardinal priest of the holy Roman church with the title of St. Sabina, governor of the church of Pécs,⁴⁰ archbishops John of Esztergom,⁴¹ the see of Kalocsa being vacant, Andrew of Split⁴² and the other Andrew of Dubrovnik⁴³, bishops Lucas of Oradea,⁴⁴ Stephen of Transylvania,⁴⁵ the same Eberhard of Zagreb, the see of Eger being vacant, John of Bosnia,⁴⁶ the see of Veszprem being vacant, John of Győr,⁴⁷ Nicholas of Vác,⁴⁸ Peter of Nitra,⁴⁹ brother Dózsa bishop-elect of Cenad⁵⁰ and the sees of Srem, Scardona, Knin, Nona, Šibenik, Krbava, and Senj being vacant; and when the honorable lords Nicholas of Gara, palatine of our kingdom of Hungary,⁵¹ John⁵² and James our voivodes of Transylvania⁵³, count Frank, son of the late ban Kónya, judge royal,⁵⁴ Paul of Bessenye⁵⁵ and the other Paul, of Pecs,⁵⁶ bans of the said Dalmatia and Croatia as well as of all of Slavonia, John of ³⁹ Eberhard (d. 1419), bishop of Zagreb 1397-1406, 1409-19¹, of Oradea 1406-09, chancellor 1404-19..

⁴⁰ Valentine (of Alsán, d. 1408), vice-chancellor of the king 1373-76, bishop of Pécs 1374-1408, chancellor of the queen 1384-86, cardinal 1384.

⁴¹ John (of Kanizsa, d. 1418), bishop of Eger 1384-87, archbishop of Esztergom 1387-1418, chancellor 1387-1403.

⁴² Andrew (Andrea Benzi de Gualdo), archbishop. of Split 1390-1412, of Kalocsa 1413-19.

⁴³ Andrew, archbishop of Dubrovnik 1389 to 1432.

⁴⁴ Lucas of Órév, bishop of Oradea 1397-1406.

⁴⁵ Stephen (of Upor, d. 1419), provost of Titel and secret chancellor 1397, bishop of Transylvania 1401-19.

⁴⁶ John (of Liszkó, d. 1408), bishop of Bosnia 1387-1408. ⁴⁷

John (of Hédervár, d. 1415), bishop of Győr 1386-1415. ⁴⁸

Nicholas, bishop of Vác 1402-5.

⁴⁹ Peter (the Pole), bishop of Nitra 1399-1405

⁵⁰ Dózsa of Marcal, bishop of Oradea 1403-23.

⁵¹ Gara, Nicholas iunior of (son of Nicholas senior, d, 1433), magnate, ban of Mačva 1387-90, 1393-94, of Dalmatia and Croatia 1394-1402, of Slavonia 1397-1402, count palatine 1402-33.

⁵² Tamási, John of (d. 1416), master of the horse 1402-03, voivode of Transylvania 1403-09, Master of the Doorkeepers 1409-16.

⁵³ Szántó, James Lack of (fl. 1370-1428), voivode of Transylvania 1403-09, Master of the Queen's Doorkeepers 1413-16.

⁵⁴ Szécsény, Frank (Francis) of (d. 1408), voivode of Transylvania 1393-95, judge royal 1397-1408.

⁵⁵ Besenyő, Paul (of Özdöge alias of Torna), fl.1400-32), ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1402-6.

⁵⁶ Pécs, Paul of (d. 1409), ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1404-6.

Marót, ban of Mačva ⁵⁷the banate of Severin being vacant; Nicholas Treutel of Nevna, Master of our Treasury and ispán of Pozsega,⁵⁸ Simon, son of the said late ban Kónya, Master of the Doorkeepers,⁵⁹ Martin Ders, Master of the Table,⁶⁰ Lawrence of Tar, Master of the Cupbearers,⁶¹ Peter Cseh, Master of the Horse, ⁶²Smile of Wettau ispán of Pozsony,⁶³ and many others held comital and other offices of our realm.⁶⁴

⁵⁷ Marót, John senior of (d. 1435), ban of Mačva 1397-1409, 1427-28.

⁵⁸ Treutel, Nicholas (of Nevna, d. 1420/21), ban of Mačva 1394-97, master of the treasury 1402-8.

⁵⁹ Szécsény, Simon of (brother of Frank, d. 1412), judge royal 1395, Master of the Doorkeepers 1402-9.

⁶⁰ Szerdahely, Martin Ders of (fl. 1385-1415), vice-ban of Slavonia, vice count palatine 1397-1402, master of the stewards 1404-6.

⁶¹ Tar, Lawrence of (fl. 1389-1426), lord butler 1405-06, the Queen's lord butler and master of the stewards 1406-14.

⁶² Léva, Peter Cseh of (alias of Nevna, d. 1440), magnate, master of the horse 1404-15, ban of Mačva 1427-31, voivode of Transylvania 1436-37.

⁶³ Wettau, Smilo of, Moravian lord in King Sigismund's service, ispán of Pozsony 1402-05.

⁶⁴ The list of spiritual and secular lords was appended to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant as witnesses, merely indicating the time of the issue by reference to the persons in office.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY OF 31 AUGUST, 1405

This formal decretum, written in full privilegial form, seems to have been issued in a regular diet, a few months after the “urban decree,” which was passed in a special meeting with urban delegates. Its date, which is crucial in defining its aim and place in Sigismund’s legislation, was long debated. Several sixteenth-century codices (see DRH, p. 218, n. 1) have different dates, from 12 March to 5 August 1405, while the cartulary of the convent of the Order of St. John (University Library, Budapest, Coll. Hevenessiana Ab 71, II: 183-87) has 31 August 1404. However the exemplar closest to the date of issue, the authentic transcript by the collegiate chapter of Székesfehérvár (see below, MS) of 23 April 1406 gives the most reliable date, and this was accepted by the editors of Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [=DRH] and us.

In the light of this, the decree is clearly an attempt at formalizing some of the more general measures of 15 April 1405, adding a number of regulations relevant to the nobility and altogether attempting to produce a law of lasting purport (see below, n. 1).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MS.: Parchment with a pinkish-green silk thread passed through four holes for the affixing of the now lost seal; from the archives of the Knights of St. John, MNL OL DI. 106238.

EDD.: Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779–1817. 11:625–7; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 10/4: 308–10, 564–65; Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), p. 209; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., Budapest: Franklin, 1896 1:230–41 (“III Decree of Sigismund”); DRH, pp. 218–25. (Cf. Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954– [=ZsO] 2, no. 3902.)

LIT.: Erzsébet Ladányi, “Zsigmond 1405. évi törvényeinek keletkezési körülményeihez” [On the origins of Sigismund’s laws of 1405 A. D.] in Mályusz Elemér Emlékkönyv [Festschrift E. M.], Éva H. Balázs, Erik Fügedi, Ferenc Maksay, eds. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1984), pp. 269–76.

31 AUGUSTI 1405

Sigismundus Dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, marchio Brandenburgensis, sacri Romani imperii archicamararius, necnon Bohemie et Lucenburgensis heres. Omnibus Christi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris presentium notitiam habituris salutem in eo, qui dat principibus feliciter gubernare et virtuose triumphare. inter ceteras animi nostri sollicitudines una est nobis cura precipua, ut quotiens gravioribus sumus ab agendis expediti ad ea etiam, que commissorum imperio nostro subditorum utilitatem commoditatemque concernunt, pia dispositione operam impendamus. Est enim subditorum tranquillitas gloria regnantis et ubi aliquid a principe modeste sancte ac prudenter pro communi utilitate decernitur, eius profectu diligentie sollicitudo magnopere collaudatur. Proinde -in archano nostri pectoris perspicaci consideratione pensantes multa incommoda multaue dampna ex diversis consuetudinibus et sepe contrariis in regno nostro vigentibus nostris regnicolis evenire, celebrato prelatorum, baronum procerumque nostrorum conventu, de ipsorum consilio, auctoritate et consensu maturaque discussione prehabita, pro totius regni bono, utilitate profectu et augmento has leges, sive constitutiones ex auctoritate regia duximus salubriter statuendas, quas ab omnibus et singulis regnicolis nostris, tam ecclesiasticis, quam secularibus nemine excluso volumus et precipimus plene, integre et inviolabiliter observari.

I. Primitus et primarie una cum eisdem prelatis, baronibus potioribusque regni nostri proceribus sancientes et stabiliantes statuimus et, statutum fecimus hoc modo et ordine isto: quod prelati, barones, nobiles et alterius status condicionis et dignitatis homines in regno nostro ad instar exercituantium procedentes aut aliquibus ipsorum negotiis seu causis versus nostram maiestatem, aut cum ea, vel alias ubicunque et in quibuscunque partibus regni nostri progredientes, fidelibus regnicolis nostris quibuscunque dampna, spolia, iniurias, lesiones, aut aliqua malorum genera contra deum et eius iustitiam absque iuris tramite facere et inferre nullatenus presumant. Et si quipiam contra huiusmodi nostra statuta quicquam genus maleficii perpetraverit exindeque nostre maiestati, aut alii iudici ordinario per quempiam querimonia porrecta extiterit et conquerens in huius modi suam querimoniam evidenti documento comprobare valuerit, extunc dictorum factorum potentiariis perpetratores in facto potentie eo facto vincantur. Lesis autem et dampnum passis nos, aut idem iudex ordinarius indilate, summarie et, de plano ac sine strepitu cit figura iudicii exhibebimus et, exhibere teneatur satisfactionem.

II. Porro nullus omnino hominum cuiuscunque preeminentie dignitatis et condicionis existant in nostris regalibus, reginalibus, seu ecclesiarum, vel nobilium possessionibus pignora, seu vadia pro quibuscunque factis aliquorum regnicolarum, seu plebicularum nostrorum, scilicet at aliorum quorumcumque eorum auctoritate mediante auferre, aut recipi facere valeant neque possint. Horum contrarium facientes in facto potentie vincantur.

III. Preterea nullus omnino iudicum et iustitiariorum, aut alii quipiam procerum regni nostri mutilationes, seu dimembrationes quibusvis plebicolis et regnicolis nostris facere presumat neque valeat, nisi hii solummodo, quibus per nos potestas nostra regia rite fuerit attributa. Contrarium facientes penam premissi facti potentie incursuri eo facto.

IV. .Decrevimus etiam, quod prelati, palatinus regni nostri, iudex curie nostre, magister tawarnicorum nostrorum et alii barones, nec non comites parochiales et generaliter quivis iudices et iustitiarum regni nostri ecclesiastici et seculares proceres et nobiles, castellani et civitatenses per climata regni nostri spolia, derobationes rerum et bonorum ablationes, sanguinis effusiones et alia actuum potentiariorum genera nostris fidelibus regnicolis, cuiusvis status et condicionis existant, facere, inferre et committere nuilatenus audeant.

V. Sanximus nihilominus, ut castellani et officiales nostri regales in nostris regiis propriis possessionibus, districtibus et tenutis iudicesque et iurati cives nostri regales in eorum medio, item prelati, barones, nobiles et alterius dignitatis homines possessiones habentes in eorum propriis possessionibus res et bona fidelium incolarum, seu plebicolarum nostrorum, quovis quesito colore, aut causa arestare vel prohiberi facere non sint, ausi modo aliquali, nisi in possessionibus aliorum, vel loco communi, prout regni nostri consuetudo id requirit. Et volumus hos omnes tales, qui in contrarium huiusmodi nostri decreti contraire, quod non credimus, presumpserint, facto potentie subiicere.

VI. Statuimus preterea, ut universe annone, nec non vina, blada, panni et aliorum bonorum, seu victualium genera et alie res venales, cuiuscunque speciei vel maneriei existant, illis et eisdem iustis, equis et veris cubulis, ponderibus, mensuris et ulnis in universis nostris, scilicet et aliorum quorumlibet regnicolarum nostrorum civitatibus, oppidis et villis mensurari, vendi, seu venditioni exponi, nec non emi, aut commutari et solvi ac administrari debeant, qui et que in civitate nostra Budensi ab antiquo inventi sunt et stabilita habentur de presenti. Contrarium facientes penam ablationum huiusmodi suarum rerum venalium patiantur ipso facto.

VII. Computationem autem, seu numerationem florenorum in regno nostro currentium hoc modo duximus limitandum, quod omnibus numeris dictorum florenorum minoribus in nonnullis regni nostri partibus, uti agnovimus, abusive adinventis, prorsus abolitis in quorumlibet rerum et bonorum emptionibus et venditionibus alter numerus ipsorum florenorum non dicatur, nec computetur, nisi florenus aureus veri, boni et iusti ponderis, vel alter florenus per centum novos denarios computatus. Huiusmodi nostri statuti transgressores honorum et rerum ipsorum venalium et emptionalium ablationes patiantur indilate.

VIII. Interea quidem non improvide, sed deliberata mente presenti nostro decreto serius duximus stabiliendum, quod nullus omnino hominum incolarum scilicet aut extraneorum, mercatorum aut commutatorum sales extraneos, seu regnorum alienorum in regnum nostrum venundationis, aut alia quadam de causa importare, aut eis uti, vel in quibusvis partibus regni nostri cum eis procedere quovis modo audeat vel presumat. Nam ubicunque et in quorumcunque possessionibus ipsi sales extranei venditi, vel vendendi, emptive aut emendi per quospiam reperiri poterunt, volumus, ut dominus terre aut possessionum illarum, in quibus dicti sales, ut premittitur, reperti fuerint, ab eorum venditoribus emptoribusve et commutatoribus auferre teneatur, vel si forsan favore, aut pretio allectus, seu circumventus dictos sales auferre renueret, extunc similiter volumus, ut huiusmodi possessiones nobilium, in quibus, uti premisimus, memorati sales reperientur, per comites nostros, tam provinciales, quam parochiales pro nostra utique occupari debeant maiestate:

IX. Insuper edicimus statuendo cunctis fidelibus regnicolis nostris, ut amodo imposterum et peramplius ac in antea nullus eorum et nullo penitus dempto quospiam infideles nostros, aut proscriptos, vel alia quavis labe, seu nota crimineque, aut contagio scrupuli offuscatos et denigratos palam, vel occulte, publice seu manifeste, directe, vel indirecte apud se retinere, conservare, aut ipsis favorem auxilium et hospitalitatem prebere, vel largiri presumat quovis temporum •in eventu. Quoniam contrarium facientes illa et eadem pena, qua huiusmodi nostri infideies proscripti, aut alia nota denigrati forent cruciandi, feriri debeant et puniri incompassibiliter ipso facto.

X. Stabilimus denique, ut si aliqui ex nostris regnicolis, cuiuscunque status et, dignitatis existant, quicquam iuris seu questionis contra et adversus villanos seu rusticos prelatorum, baronum, nobilium, aut alterius status hominum habent vel habuerint, id primitus et primarie in presentia ipsorum dominorum terrestrium legitime prosequi debeant. Et si domini ipsorum villanorum seu rusticorum iustitiam facere denegarent, aut in reddenda eadem essent remissi, extunc huiusmodi domini terrestres pretextu abnegate ipsius iustitie in presentiam comitis provincialis, vel vicecomitis eiusdem, aut iudicum nobilium illius comitatus, in quo ipsa iustitia esset abnegata, legitime evocentur. Qui quidem comes parochialis, vicecomes et iudices nobilium sub privationis honorum ipsorum et nostre indignationis penis iudicium et iustitiam ac omnis iuris complementum ex parte ipsorum indilate absque strepitu et figura iudicii surnmarie et de pla.no, favore etiam odio et amore quibusvis relegatis debebunt et tenebuntur exhibere.

XI. Sicque decrevimus, ut quicumque regnicolarum nostrorum, similiter cuiuscunque dignitatis vel ordinis existerent, adversus cives nostros regales quicquam actionis habent, vel habuerint, id ipsi in presentia iudicum et iuratorum civium nostrorum regaliū, ubi et in quo loco ipsi cives nostri inculpantur, aut officialium seu iudicum, quibus regia maiestas gubernationem, officiolum, seu iudicatum nostrarum regaliū civitatum duxisset committendum, rite et legitime prosequantur, qui ex parte ipsorum iudicium et iustitiam exhibere teneantur. Et si ipsi iudices et iurati cives nostri regales, aut alii officiales seu iudices nostri prenotati inibi deputati, in faciendis quibuspiam iudicio et iustitia extiterint remissi, extunc huiusmodi nostri iudices et iurati cives, vel alii officiales seu iudices ad exhibendam ipsam iustitiam per magistrum tavarnicorum nostrorum auctoritate nostra regia. astringantur et compellantur. In casu vero, quo ipsis querulantes de, iudicio ipsorum iudicum et iuratorum civium contentari noluerint, tunc in huiusmodi eorum agendis ad presentiam magistri tavarnicorum nostrorum secundum antiquam consuetudinem possint appellare, ipsi in eorum iudicium et iustitie complementum exhibere et ipsum suum iudicium per annotatos iudices et iuratos cives nostros efficaciter tenebitur facere observari. Et si memorati querulantes tam de ipsorum iudicis et iuratorum civium quam dicti magistri tavarnicorum nostrorum iudicio contenti non fuerint, tunc huiusmodi causas ipsorum coram nostra maiestate more alias consueto prosequi valebunt, quibus nos iudicium et iustitiam faciemus, prout expostulat ordo iuris.

XII. = Apr. 1405: .

XIII. Specificè nichilominus digna premeditatione annuentes statuimus, ut universi regnicole persone, ecclesiastice videlicet et seculares, cuiuscunque dignitatis et preeminentie existant, qui in faciebus possessionum ipsorum mineras auri vel argenti, aut alterius cuiuscunque metalli ad nos et ad camaram nostram regiam de iure et consuetudine pertinentes amodo in antea invenire et reperire possent, non obstante, si regiam gratiam in eo non haberent, ut maiestas regia huiusmodi possessiones ipsorum mineras supradictas habentes in concambium aliorum iurium regaliū ab ipsis auferre non valeret, possessiones easdem ab ipsis absque eorum spontanea et libera voluntate de plenitudine nostre regie potestatis et presenti nostra gratia speciali per nos ipsis regaliter attributa non auferemus nec ipsas ab eisdem alienabimus contra formam presentis nostre gratie supradicte. Sed tamen volumus, ut rectam et equalem medietatem urburarum mineris de eisdem provenire solitarum iidem viri ecclesiastici et nobiles nostro fisco regio assignent et aministrari faciant, aliam vero medietatem eorundem ex presenti nostro indulto pro se ipsis valeant reservare. Nec iidem viri ecclesiastici, nobiles ac laboratores minerarum predictarum aliquod aurum et argentum ex ipsis mineris provenientia extra regnum nostrum deferre, aut aliis quibusvis hominum personis venditioni exponere debeant. Sed huiusmodi aurum et argentum, sicut de aliis mineris et montanis nostris ad camaram nostram vendere est consuetum, ad vendendum in camaram nostre maiestatis teneantur apportare et exponere huiusmodi venditioni. In casu vero, quo iidem nobiles, vel viri ecclesiastici nec non laboratores predicti huiusmodi auro et argento cyphos, coclearia, aut alia clenodia, sive argenteria, neve aurea pro usu ipsorum reservando preparari facere, aut ipsum aurum et argentum in specie erga se ipsos pro usu et commodo suis retinere maluerint, in h[is eisd]em plene libertatis concessimus et harum serie concedimus facultatem. Horum autem contrarium facientes et huiusmodi nostri decreti transgressores huiusmodi gratia nostra regia per nos ipsis quoad presens circa conservationem, gubernationem, adeptionem et limitationem iam dictorum metallorum, minerarum urbararum modo, quo supra regaliter indulta et attributa destituantur illico et priventur ipso facto.

XIV.=15 . 1405: V1,

XV. Preterea quicumque, vel quorumcunque iobagionum dominus collectam, seu dationem aliquam super suum imposuerit iobagionem termino unius mensis ad hoc sibi assignato dationem eandem expirato ipso termino unius mensis infra quindecim dies super eundem recipere protelasset, extunc ipse dationem huiusmodi sic protelatam super eundem iobagionem suum ipsis quindecim diebus expiratis, extorquere et iobagionem eundem retinere non queat, neque possit. Sed idem iobagio superius limpide nominatus, quo voluerit quitus et pacificus libere moraturus discedat.

XVI. Ceterum si alicuius terre dominus suum iobagionem, aut aliquem de villa ante tempus licentie receptionis eiusdem in facto aliquo non inculepaverit et calumpniatus non extiterit, extunc ipse iobagionem talem post tempus receptionis ipsius sue licentie calumpnia quavis relegata liberum a se abire permittendo, in nullo queat dampnificare, aut disturbare presentis scripti et decreti nostri patrocínio mediante.

Et ut huiusmodi sanxionis nostre decretum salvum semper habeatur et solidum, volumus et presentibus firmissimo edicto precipimus et mandamus universis et singulis comitibus vel vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium illorum comitatum, in quibus in eventu temporis pretitulata disceptatio fuerit fortasse exorta, ut ipsi nostros regios et earundem ecclesiarum nec non baronum, nobilium et alterius status ac preeminentie homines castellanos, officiales, iudices et villicos ipsarumque ecclesiarum rectores nec non nobiles et alterius regni nostri status homines ac officiales eorundem ad premissi nostri decreti regalis observationem cum eorum dampnis et gravaminibus compellant semper et coerceant, teneant ac astringant mera nostra regia auctoritate per nos eis attributa mediante. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales pendentes et autentici novi nostri sigilli dupplicis munimine roboratas. Datum per manus reverendi in Christo patris domini Eberhardi dei et apostolice sedis gratia episcopi - Zagrabiensis, aule nostre regie supremi cancellarii, fidelis nostri dilecti anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinto secundo Kalendas Septembris, regni autem nostri anno decimo septimo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus et dominis Valentino tituli sancte Sabine sacrosancte Romane ecclesie presbytero cardinali et ecclesie Quinqueecclesiensis gubernatore, Iohanne Strigoniensi, Collocensi sede vacante, Andrea Spalatensi, et. altero Andrea Ragusyensi archiepiscopis, Luca Varadiensis, Stephano Transsilvanensis, eodem domino Eberhardo Zagrabiensis, Agriensi sede vacante, Iohanne Boznensis, Wesprimiensi sede vacante, Iohanne Iauriensis, Thoma electo Segniensis, Wacyensi sede vacante, fratribus Hykone Nitriensis et Dosa Chanadiensis electis ecclesiarum episcopis, ecclesias Dei feliciter gubernantibus, Symiensi, Macarensi, Traguriensi, Scardonensi, Iadriensi, Tynyniensi, Nonensi, Sibiricensi, Maccharensi, Farensi et Corbaviensi sedibus vacantibus, nec non magnificis viris Nicolao de Gara, dicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino, Iohanne filio Henrici et Iacobo Lachk waywodis nostris Transsilvarns, comite Frank filio condam Konye bani, iudice curie nostre, Paulo Bisseno et, altero Paulo de Peech Dalmatie et Croatie predictorum ac totius regni nostri Sclavonie, Iohanne de Maroth Machoviensi banis, honore banatus Zewriniensis vacante, Nicolao Trewtel de Neuna tavarnicorum et comite de Posega, magistratu ianitorum nostrorum vacante, Martino Ders dapiferorum, Laurentio de Taar pincernarum, Petro Cheh agazonum nostrorum magistris, Silstrang comite Posoniensi aliisque quam pluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

31 AUGUST 1405

Sigismund, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania and Bulgaria, margrave of Brandenburg, arch-chamberlain of the Holy Roman Empire, and heir of Bohemia and Luxemburg¹ to all of Christ's faithful, present as well as future, to whose notice these presents may come, greetings in Him, who grants the princes felicitous reign and triumphant victory. Among the various cares of our soul one specific concern is that, whenever we are free of more grave duties, we should also labor with dutiful regard for the profit and comfort of those committed to our governance. For the peace of his subjects is the ruler's glory, and when the prince arranges something for the common good by moderate, devoted, and wise action, success is the highest praise for his solicitous diligence. Therefore, contemplating with acute awareness in the depth of our heart that much harm and many disadvantages are caused to our gentlemen of the realm by the different and frequently conflicting customs prevailing in our kingdom, having held an assembly with our prelates, barons, and lords, with their counsel, authority, and consent, after mature deliberation, we have decided to issue by royal authority for the good, profit, advancement, and growth of the whole realm the following salubrious laws or constitutions which we wish and order to be observed wholly, totally, and unchanged² by each and every one of our gentlemen of the realm, clerical as well as secular, no one excepted.

1 To begin with and first, we have ordered and issued, by deciding and establishing together with the same prelates, barons, and major lords of our kingdom, the following statutes in this manner and order: that when prelates, barons, nobles, and other men in our kingdom of whatever station, dignity, and condition set out for a military campaign, or travel to or with our majesty on any of their business or lawsuit, or otherwise, anywhere and in any part of our kingdom, they should not act contrary to the path of right and inflict on any of our loyal gentlemen subjects harm, damages, injuries, wounds, or any other kinds of crimes against God and His justice.³ And if

¹The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45. Sigismund added to it his inherited and acquired titles.

²The attempt at replacing “diverse customs” by a decretum on major matters suggests a conscious interest in issuing systematic and long-term legislation for the realm. On this tendency in early fifteenth-century Europe, including Hungary, see Armin Wolf, “Die Gesetzgebung der entstehenden Territorialstaaten,” in Helmut Coing, ed., Handbuch der Quellen und Literatur der neueren europäischen Privatrechtsgeschichte (München: Beck, 1973), 1: 554–5. A similar attempt at overriding an old custom and establishing uniform usages was made in the “urban decree” concerning measures and weights, see 15 April 1405/I: 1.

³Members of the royal council and the household, travelling on royal affairs, seem to have required quarter and food without payment by force based on the ancient right of descensus (apparently sometimes exacted by violence, see 1279:[9]). The article was meant to stop this abuse. On a more practical level, it was probably directed against the usual acts of violence committed by people joining the royal army, and thus anyone commits any kind of crime in defiance of this statute, and someone complains in this matter to us or to one of the justices ordinary, and such a plaintiff is able to prove his complaint with manifest evidence, then the perpetrators of the stated acts of might should be for that reason convicted of an act of might. And we or these justices ordinary will without delay grant and are obligated to grant complete satisfaction to the injured and wronged party summarily and publicly, without further litigation and legal process.⁴

2 Further, absolutely no one, whatever high rank or condition he may have, should have the right and liberty to exact or to take a pledge or a security on his own authority for any deed⁵ from any of our gentleman subjects or common folk or other subject of ours⁶ on the estates of the king, the queen, the churches, or the nobles. Those acting contrariwise must be convicted of an act of might.

3 Moreover, absolutely no judge, justice, or any other lord of our kingdom may dare or presume to maim or dismember any of our gentleman subjects or common folk excepting those to whom this privilege has been legally granted by us.⁷ Those acting contrariwise will incur for that reason the penalty for act of might.

anticipated the overall measures taken in the decree of 1427A. It may be worthwhile to note that the somewhat awkward phrase abs iuris tramite... is an obvious borrowing from such late Antique or early Christian authors as Tertullian or Ammianus Marcellinus.

⁴ The formula is borrowed from the “summary procedure” of canon law. The language of this passage is borrowed from a decretal letter of Clement V of c. 1306/7, Saepe contingit quad, incorporated in that pope’s supplement to the canonical collections, the Clementines V. 11. 2 (Emilius Friedberg, Corpus Iuris Canonici 2 [Graz: Akademische Verlagsanstalt, 1959], col. 1200), which reads: de plano ac sine strepitu et figura iudicii. For the background of the decretal Saepe, see Stefan Kuttner, “The Date of the Constitution “Saepe”, the Vatican Manuscripts, and the Roman Edition of the Clementines,” now in his Medieval Councils, Decretals and Collections of Canon Law (London: Variorum Reprints, 1980), ch. 13, pp. 427–

52. At the moment we lack any full-scale discussion of the impact of Saepe on the development of summary procedure in either the canonical or secular traditions. See now: Kenneth Pennington in his The Prince and the Law, 1200–1600: Sovereignty and Rights in the Western Legal Tradition (Univ. of California Press, 1993), ch. 5. The Editors express their gratitude to Professor Pennington for his guidance and helpful advice.

⁵ Instead of initiating a lawsuit, it seems to have been an old custom to take a “security” (vadium) arbitrarily, in goods or chattels, for a minor offense, real or presumed. It was obviously thought to be an advance or a substitute for expected fine (cf. n. 15 to 1320).

⁶ The word regnicolae is used variously in the preamble and articles of this decree. Sometimes it implies a wider or different stratum than its usual meaning: “gentlemen of the realm,” that is, the enfranchised nobility. We have, therefore, translated the term in this decree, depending on the specific context as “gentlemen subjects” or “gentlemen of the realm.”

⁷ As early as the thirteenth century, all landowners had the right and duty of administering justice to their peasants, free or unfree. Seigneurial courts (sedes dominalis or forum dominale, Hung.: úriszék), consisting probably of tenant jurors, were presided over by the lord or his steward. Their jurisdiction was initially limited by royal privilege: cases involving bloodshed could be terminated only before a royal judge or county magistrate, thus criminals sentenced to death or mutilation had to be delivered to them by the seigneur. Since the early fourteenth century, however, some major lords were granted royal privilege to pronounce final judgment in all cases and set up gallows on their estates as symbols of their right to high

4 We have also decreed that the prelates, the count palatine of our kingdom, our judge royal, our Master of the Treasury, and other barons, as well as ispáns of the counties, and in general all judges and justices of our kingdom, both clerical and secular, lords and nobles, castellans and burghers, should not dare to inflict or to commit at all any damage, theft of goods, robbery of chattels, shedding of blood, or any other kind of act of might in any part of the realm against any of our loyal gentlemen of whatever station or rank they might be.⁸

5 We decree as well that our castellans and royal officials in our royal estates, districts, and holdings, as well as our royal urban judges and jurors in their jurisdictions, and likewise the prelates, barons, nobles, and propertied men of other rank in their own estates, must not presume to distrain or garnish the goods and chattels of our loyal tenants and other common folk, under any pretended reason or cause, on their own estates but only on the estates of others or at public places,⁹ as the custom of our realm demands. And we wish that all who are of the sort who would dare to act in defiance (that we do not believe) of this our decree be subject to the charge of an act of might.

6 We have decreed further that all sorts of grain, wine, cereal, cloth, other goods and victuals, or wares for sale of whatever kind and type must be measured, sold, offered for sale, bought or exchanged, paid for, and handled in all of our cities, towns, and villages as well in those of the gentlemen of the realm with the same true, just, and correct bushels, weights, rods, and ells which have been established of old in our city of Buda¹⁰ and are confirmed herewith. Those acting contrariwise should suffer for their action the penalty of confiscation of their merchandise.

justice, and by the mid-fifteenth century this privilege, often referred to a “free comity” (Hung.: szabadispánság) or ius gladii was exercised by all substantial landowners. See: Kamill Szoika, A földesúri bíraskodás az Árpád kori Magyarországon [Seigneurial jurisdiction in Árpadian Hungary] (Budapest: Faculty of Law, 1944) [German summary pp. 75–8]

⁸ This article was seen as a general confirmation of older measures against acts of might (e.g., 1397: 53), and frequently cited by the king and other judicial organs in the subsequent years, see DRH, p. 220, n. 1. Act of might (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one. Until the enactment of detailed regulations in 8 March 1435/I: 3, 4, and 6 the courts acted on the basis of this article against perpetrators of “new acts of might.”

⁹ By “public place” (locus communis) probably a place is meant where fairs used to be held.

¹⁰ The attempt at establishing uniform measures was typical for medieval legislation all across Europe, with limited success until modernity. Cf. 15 April 1405/I: 1. We have here translated cubulus, a Hungarian measure for grains and wine, mentioned here with the other general terms for measures, for simplicity’s sake as “bushel,” without wanting to imply that it was identical with the measure of that name used in pre-modern England (where it, actually, did not have a uniform size either).

7 We intend to regulate the counting or calculating of the florins current in our kingdom in the following manner: that by entirely abolishing the counting of the said florins for lesser value, which, we have heard, has become an abuse in several regions of our kingdom, (we order that) when buying and selling of any goods or wares the florin must not be assessed or counted in any other way but as one gold florin of true, good, and just weight, or as the other florin, which is counted for 100 new pennies.¹¹ Trespassers against this ordinance of ours will suffer immediately the confiscation of their goods to be bought or sold.

8 Moreover, we deem it to be established by the present decree, not heedlessly but by considered forethought, that absolutely no one, resident or foreigner, merchant or trader, should dare to import for sale or for any other reason or use or to transport in any part of the realm foreign salt, that is, salt of another country. If anyone finds such foreign salt anywhere, on anyone's estates, sold or for sale, bought or about to be bought, the lord of that land or estate on which the said salt, as mentioned above, is found, is obligated to take it away from its seller, buyer, or trader; and if perhaps, as a favor or having been bribed or deceived, he fails to confiscate the said salt, we order that the estates of such a noble on the estates of whom, as mentioned above, the said salt was found, be seized for our majesty everywhere by our ispáns, of counties as well as of districts.¹²

9 Furthermore, we decree by ordering all of our loyal gentlemen of the realm that henceforth and in the future, just as before, none of them, without exception, should dare any time to keep with him, protect, grant, or bestow aid and hospitality overtly or covertly, publicly or secretly, directly or indirectly, any traitor against us, or any proscribed criminal or other men tainted or soiled by the taint of infamy, crime, or suspicion.¹³ Those acting contrariwise will be for their action punished and penalized without pity with that selfsame penalty which such proscribed traitors and others blemished by crime would have to suffer.

10 Further, we declare that if any of our gentlemen subjects, of whatever station or dignity he may be, has or will have a case or a lawsuit against villagers or peasants of the prelates, barons, nobles, or men of any other estate, he ought first and foremost to prosecute them before the court of their lords.¹⁴ And if the lords of these villagers or peasants should refuse to administer justice or are lax in doing so, then that lord for having failed to do justice should be legally summoned to the court of the ispán, or alispán, or noble magistrates of that county where justice was refused. These ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates of the county are in turn obligated under the penalty of losing their office and our pleasure to pass summary sentence, justice, and all matters related to judgment in regard to these plaintiffs, immediately and publicly, without any further legal procedure,¹⁵ and without favor or hatred or preference towards anyone.

¹¹ This article successfully suppressed the anarchy of local systems of account prevalent in the fourteenth century, see Pál Engel, "A 14. századi magyar pénztörténet néhány kérdése" [Some questions of fourteenth-century Hungarian monetary history], Századok 124 (1990) pp. 25–93. After 1405, payments were to be—and came to be, indeed—defined either in effective florins or in "florins percent" (a money of account comprising one-hundred current pennies). See now also Csaba Tóth, Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation in Hungary in the Árpadian and Angevin Periods, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 279–94; and Márton Gyöngyössy, Minting and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526), Ibid., pp. 295–308.

¹² See 15 April 1405/I: 11.

¹³ According to ancient custom, a ban was proclaimed by the community against all the "thieves and malefactors" (fures et latrones), i.e., all public criminals of a province convicted of a felony, such as robbery, arson, rape or counterfeiting money. In the fourteenth century, the procedure took the form of general assemblies held by the count palatine (or by a royal commissioner) for a county where a list of the proscribed criminals was drawn up and solemnly proclaimed. The proscriptus, that is, the person outlawed in this way, could not receive pardon but was to be captured by anyone and handed over to the authorities for execution. Those protecting the proscribed, called hospites furum, fell under the same punishment.

11 We have likewise decided that if any of our gentlemen subjects, similarly of whatever dignity or station, has or will have a legal case against our royal burghers, then he should sue them legally and properly before our royal burgher judges and jurors, where and in which place these burghers of ours are accused, or before those officials or judges to whom the royal majesty deemed right to entrust the governance and jurisdiction of our royal cities, who, in turn, are obligated to render justice and judgment in their regard. And if those royal burgher judges, and jurors of ours or the said officials and judges in charge of the place are remiss in rendering justice and judgment, then these burgher judges and jurors, or royal officials and judges, should be forced and compelled to administer justice through the Master of the Treasury by our royal authority. In cases where the plaintiffs are unwilling to acquiesce in the judgment of these burgher judges and jurors, that in such cases they are free, according to ancient custom, to appeal to the court of the Master of our Treasury, who is obligated to pass judgment and to do justice in their case and to assure that that judgment be properly observed by the said burgher justices and jurors of ours. And if the aforesaid plaintiffs are not content with the judgment of either their burgher judges or citizen jurors or of our said Master of the Treasury, then they should have leave to bring such a case before our majesty in the usual way, and we shall do justice as the order of law demands.¹⁶

12 = 15 April 1405: 14.

13 We specifically decree, moreover, after suitable deliberation, that if any gentleman of the realm, clerical or lay person of whatever dignity or eminence, who anywhere on his estate may in the future find and discover ores of gold or silver, or of any other metal, belonging by right and custom to us and our royal chamber, we shall not take away those estates from them, according to the present special grace royally given them by the fullness of our royal power, and not remove these from them against this aforementioned grant of ours without their free and spontaneous agreement, regardless of the lack of such a royal grant which would imply that the royal majesty has no right to take away by exchange for other royal rights these estates containing the aforesaid minerals. We order, rather, that these ecclesiastics and nobles transfer and render to our royal fisc the true and equal half of the mining dues (urbura) that usually accrue from these mines.¹⁷ And ¹⁴ Cf. 1351: 18 (repeated in 1397: 40).

¹⁵ Cf. above n. 7.

¹⁶ The article summarizes and specifies the articles 15 April 1405/I: 4, 8, and 9.

¹⁷ Cf. 1351: 13. Up to the early fourteenth century, all mines were in royal hands. If mineral deposits were found on these ecclesiastics, nobles, and the miners of the said mines are not permitted to export from the realm or to offer for sale to any person any of the gold and silver from these mines. But they ought to offer for sale and present to the chamber of our majesty such gold and silver, just as such minerals are customarily sold from our mines to our chamber.¹⁸ If, however, these nobles, ecclesiastics, or the said miners prefer to have cups, spoons, other jewels, or silverware made for their own use from such gold and silver, or to keep the same gold and silver for their own use and comfort, we herewith grant them leave and liberty to do so. From those, in turn, who act contrariwise and transgress this decree of ours, this royal grant given and permitted to them regally, regarding the keeping, administering, acquiring, and handling of the aforesaid metals and mining revenues (urbura), as described above, should be right away revoked for such an action.

14 = 15 April 1405: 6.¹⁹

15 Furthermore; any lord of any tenant peasant who has imposed any fines or dues on his tenant peasant with the term of one month assigned to this for him and has delayed collecting his dues from them within fifteen days after the elapse of the said term of one month cannot nor will be able in any way to exact the due delayed in this way from his tenant peasant after the expiration of fifteen days. But the said tenant peasant, in the way clearly noted above, may depart, as he wishes, freely in peace.

16 Furthermore, if the lord of any land has not accused or charged his tenant peasant or any villager with any trespass before the time of granting his leave, then after the time of receiving leave, he must permit such a tenant peasant to leave by abandoning any charges and in no way harm or impede him under the protection of the present charter and decree.

And so that the decree of our sanction should always be held safe and strong, we wish and we command, enjoining by the firmest possible royal edict and order, each and every ispán, alispán, and noble magistrate in those counties, in which at any future time disagreement may arise on the above, that they always compel, force, coerce, and obligate our royal castellans, officials, judges, and reeves, as well as those of churches, nobles, and men of other status or rank, and also the private estates, the king had the prerogative to acquire it by exchange of property. In order to make private landowners interested in opening up new deposits, Charles I allowed them in 1327 (see DRH p. 80) to keep their property and to retain also one-third of the royal dues, the urbura. The latter was a due on mined metals, 1/10 of gold and 1/8 of other metals. It is believed that the expansion of precious metal mining in fourteenth-century Hungary was to a great extent due to this new arrangement; see Bálint Hóman, "La circolazione delle monete d'oro in Ungheria dal X al XIV secolo e la crisi europea dell'oro nel secolo XIV," Rivista Italiana di Numismatica 35 (1922): 109–56, here pp. 135 ff.; now also Tóth, "Minting, Financial Administration" (as n. 11, above))

¹⁸ Cf. 15 April 1405/I: 15.

¹⁹ Art. 14 is the verbatim repetition of 15 April 1405/I: 6 without the clause concerning the tenants beyond the Drava River. The two following articles repeat a charter of Sigismund of 3 August 1397 (see DRH, p. 155) concerning the free movement of the peasant tenants. These passages were frequently referred to in royal charters of the subsequent years (see the references in DRH, p. 224, n. XIV/1). An almost identical text was also issued as a royal mandate to the collegiate chapter of Pressburg, 20 January 1407, and as an order in council of 26 July 1409 (see ibid., pp. 226–29.)

rectors of those churches, nobles, and men or officials of our kingdom of any other status to observe our preceding royal decree under fines and penalties issued against them, by the means of our royal authority granted them by the present writing.²⁰

In the remembrance and perpetual force of this matter we have granted our charter of privilege validated by affixing our new authentic double seal pendant. Given by the hand of the most reverend father in Christ, lord Eberhard, by the grace of God and the apostolic see bishop of Zagreb, arch-chancellor of our court,²¹ our beloved faithful servant, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and five, two days before the Kalends of September, in the seventeenth year of our reign, during the time, when the following reverend fathers in Christ and lords bishops governed felicitously the churches of God: Valentinus, cardinal priest of the holy Roman church with the title of St. Sabina, governor of the church of Pécs,²² archbishops John of Esztergom,²³ the see of Kalocsa being vacant, Andrew of Split²⁴ and the other Andrew of Dubrovnik²⁵, bishops Lucas of Oradea,²⁶ Stephen of Transylvania,²⁷ the same Eberhard of Zagreb, the see of Eger being vacant, John of Bosnia,²⁸ the see of Veszprém being vacant, John of Győr,²⁹ Thomas bishop-elect of Senj,³⁰ the see of Vác being vacant, Peter of Nitra,³¹ brother Hinkó³² and Dózsa bishop-elect of Cenad³³ and the sees of Srem, Skradin, Zadar, Knin, Nin, Šibenik, Makarska, Hvar and Krbava being vacant; and when the honorable lords Nicholas of Gara, palatine of our kingdom of ²⁰ This measure, like many others in Sigismund's reign, was intended to enhance the competence of the county magistrates as possible supporters of the royal power, see Elér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Trans. A. Szmodits. (Budapest: Akadémiai., 1990), pp. 183–6.

²¹ Eberhard (d. 1419), bishop of Zagreb 1397–1406, 1409–19¹, of Oradea 1406–09, chancellor 1404–19.

²² Valentine (of Alsán, d. 1408), vice-chancellor of the king 1373–76, bishop of Pécs 1374–1408, chancellor of the queen 1384–86, cardinal 1384.

²³ John (of Kanizsa, d. 1418), bishop of Eger 1384–87, archbishop of Esztergom 1387–1418, chancellor 1387–1403.

²⁴ Andrew (Andrea Benzi de Gualdo), archbishop of Split 1390–1412, of Kalocsa 1413–19.

²⁵ Andrew, archbishop of Dubrovnik 1389 to 1432.

²⁶ Lucas of Órév, bishop of Oradea 1397–1407.

²⁷ Stephen (of Upor, d. 1419), provost of Titel and secret chancellor 1397, bishop of Transylvania 1401–19.

²⁸ John (of Liszkó, d. 1408), bishop of Bosnia 1387–1408.²⁹

John (of Hédervár, d. 1415), bishop of Győr 1386–1415.³⁰

Thomas (II), friar, bishop of Senj 1405–30.

³¹ Peter (the Pole), bishop of Nitra 1399–1405.

³² Benedict Hinko (friar, d. 1428), bishop of Nitra 1405–28.

³³ Dózsa of Marcall, bishop of Cenad 1403–23.

Hungary,³⁴ John son of Henry³⁵ and James Lack our voivodes of Transylvania³⁶, count Frank, son of the late ban Kónya, judge royal,³⁷ Paul of Bessenye³⁸ and the other Paul, of Pecs,³⁹ bans of the said Dalmatia and Croatia as well as of all of Slavonia, John of Marót, ban of Mačva⁴⁰ the banate of Severin being vacant; Nicholas Treutel of Nevna, Master of our Treasury and ispán of Pozsega,⁴¹ the Master of the Doorkeepers being vacant, Martin Ders, Master of the Table,⁴² Lawrence of Tar, Master of the Cupbearers,⁴³ Peter Cseh, Master of the Horse,⁴⁴ Silstrang ispán of Pozsony,⁴⁵ and many others held comital and other offices of our realm.⁴⁶

³⁴ Gara, Nicholas iunior of (d. 1433, son of Nicholas senior,), magnate, ban of Mačva 1387–90, 1393–94, of Dalmatia and Croatia 1394–1402, of Slavonia 1397–1402, count palatine 1402–33

³⁵ Tamási, John of (d. 1416), master of the horse 14023, voivode of Transylvania 1403–9, Master of the Doorkeepers 1409–16.

³⁶ Szántó, James Lack of (fl. 1370–1428), voivode of Transylvania 1403–9, Master of the Queen's Doorkeepers 1413–6.

³⁷ Szécsény, Frank (Francis) of (d. 1408), voivode of Transylvania 1393–5, judge royal 1397–1408.

³⁸ Besenyő, Paul (of Özdöge alias of Torna), fl.1400–32), ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1402–6.

³⁹ Pécs, Paul of (d. 1409), ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1404–6.

⁴⁰ Marót, John senior of (d. 1435), ban of Mačva 1397–1409, 1427–8.

⁴¹ Treutel, Nicholas (of Nevna, d. 1420/21), ban of Mačva 1394–7, master of the treasury 1402–8.

⁴² Szerdahely, Martin Ders of (fl. 1385–1415), vice-ban of Slavonia, vice count palatine 1397–1402, master of the stewards 1404–6.

⁴³ Tar, Lawrence of (fl. 1389–1426), lord butler 1405–6, the Queen's lord butler and master of the stewards 1406–14.

⁴⁴ Léva, Peter Cseh of (alias of Nevna, d. 1440), magnate, master of the horse 1404–15, ban of Mačva 1427–31, voivode of Transylvania 1436–37.

⁴⁵ Silstrang, Erich or Erhard (fl. 1405/17), Bohemian lord in Sigismund's service, ispán of Pozsony 1405–9, of Komárom 1409, of Győr 1413–7.

⁴⁶ The list of spiritual and secular lords was appended to privilegial charters ever since the late thirteenth century. They are not meant as witnesses, merely indicating the time of the issue by reference to the persons in office.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY
1411 (BEFORE 18 MARCH)

This decree did not survive in the original form, only in several essentially identical mandates the earliest of which is dated 18 March 1411. This fact warrants a dating of this decree as “before 18 March.” Several sixteenth-century collections contain it as a decree and the text itself refers to it as a decretum generale. Considering that the mode of collecting the chamber’s profit and the tithe was relevant for the entire country, we accepted the decision of the editors of Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301– 1457, Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978 [= DRH] to include it in the series of laws.

MSS.: [contemporary copy] Letters patent inserted in a transcript of 30 May 1412 issued by the Premonstratensian convent of Jászó, sealed en placard, in Státni archiv Levoča, Archives of the chapter of Spíšska Kapituló, scr. 10, fast. 2, no. 26. For other copies, see DRH 1301– 1457, p. 232.

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., Budapest: Franklin, 1896 1:214–45 (from a 4 November 1411 copy); DRH, pp. 232–4 (from a 5 April 1411 copy).

LIT.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790, p. 217; Lajos Thallóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary]. (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879), p. 68; Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)” in József Laszlovszky et al. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

1411, ANTE 18 MARTII

Sigismundus dei gratia Romanorum rex semper augustus ac Hungarie etc. rex fidelibus nostris universis dictatoribus et exactoribus tam lucri camare nostre regalis, quam decimarum archiepiscopalium vel episcopalium in quibuscunque comitatibus dicti regni nostri Hungarie constitutis vel quocunque temporum in eventu constituendis, presentes inspecturis salutem et gratiam. Cum nos pridem unacum prelati et baronibus nostris ad instantiam et querimoniam nonnullorum regnicolarum nostrorum contra et adversum vos nostre maiestati porrectam super dicatione et exactione dictorum lucri camare nostre, necnon decimarum huiusmodi decretum perpetuo duraturum per vosque firmiter observandum duxerimus institutendum:

I. Quod dicatores seu exactores dicti lucri camare nostre tempore importationis et solutionis pecuniarum per eos dicatarum ab unoquoque vilico ipsas importante seu solvente nil plus, neque pintam vini vel valorem eiusdem, nec quidquam aliud quodcunque preterquam duos denarios pro tempore currentes pro redemptione dicarum, prout id solitum extitit tempore illustrissimi principis condam domini Lodouici similiter regis Hungarie, patris et soceri nostri charissimi, recipere possint atque valeant.

II. Item decrevimus, ut iidem dicatores in huiusmodi dicatione ipsorum unam portam integram, per quam currus intrare et exire potest, si etiam curia in eadem plures habitarent domestici, quam unus, in triginta denariis novis, et unam valvam seu parvam portam vulgo werecke dictam non magis, nisi in quindecim novis denariis seu pro media porta, ubi vero aliquem jobagionem seu incolam se a solutione dicti lucri camere nostre fraudulose precavere satagentem ab anteriori parte curie sue parvam portam seu hostium, retro vero magnam portam habere conspexerint, huiusmodi curiam similiter in una porta dicare teneantur.

III. Item statuimus, ut prefati dicatores antedicti lucri camare nostre regalis tempore dicationis huiusmodi villicos et operarios, necnon tales familiares, qui de curia dominorum suorum victibus et arnictibus sustentantur, et hoc domini ipsorum ad suam humanitatem dumtaxat, villici autem vel officiales eorundem dominis absentibus fide mediante dicere presumpserint, quod ita sit, dicare non presumant.

IV. Item sanximus, ut elapso termino solutionis prescripti lucri camare nostre regalis illud, quod in eo remaneret insolutum, idem comes lucri camare nostre, vel sui officiales sed exactores propria eorum auctoritate exigere et extorquere, aut pro eo pignus recipere nequaquam presumant, nisi auxilio comitis vel vicecomitis et iudicum nobilium huiusmodi comitatum, in quibus lucrum camare nostre exigitur prenotatum.

V. Item, disponimus etiam, ut dicatores decimarum capetias seu acervos frugum secundum proprias eorum considerationes et estimationes dicare non presumant, sed domesticus ille, cuius fruges dicantur, super hoc iuramento solito, tacto crucis dominice signo prestito fateri teneatur, quot et quantas illo anno capetias habuisset, et super hoc predicti dicatores contentari tenentur. De dica vero decimationum nullus denarius exigatur.

VI. Volumus nihilominus, quod decimator decimas non solutas vigore seu subsidio comitis vel vicecomitis parochialis exigere et extorquere non possit, nisi per censuram ecclesiasticam, canonica tamen ammonitione precedente. In casu vero, ipsi dicatores et exactores tam prescripti lucri camere nostre, quam etiam decimarum iam dictarum contra premissum nostrum decretum in aliquo ultra modum iam limitatum facere vel procedere attemptarent, extunc idem comes parochialis ac iudices nobilium cum nobilibus illius comitatus, in quo hoc agitur, admittere non debeant et consentire.

Et ut ipsum nostrum decretum vim perpetue firmitatis roburque perhempnale ac debitum effectum semper futuris temporibus optineat, volumus omnino et eisdem vestris fidelitatibus firmissimo nostro regio sub edicto districte precepimus et mandamus, quatenus premissum nostrum generale decretum dum ad possessiones, necnon bona et iura possessionaria honorabilis capituli ecclesie Sancti Martini in dictis comitatibus habitas et existentia dictum lucrum camere nostre, necnon decimas prenotatas dicaturi accesseritis et profecti fueritis, firmiter et in solidum inconcusseque ac inviolabiliter quoad omnes suas clausulas, continentias et articulos observantes populos et jobagiones in quibuscunque possessionibus eorum commorantes, tam ratione dicti lucri camere nostre, quam etiam decimarum predictarum iuxta modum s^{uper}ius in decreto limitatum et non ultra dicare debeatis. Aliud contra formam premissi generalis nostri decreti facere nullatenus presumptis gratie nostre sub obtentu. Presentes quoque solito sigillo nostro fecimus consignari, quam post earum lecturam semper reddi iubemus presentanti. Datum Cassouie, feria quarta proxima ante dominicam Letare, anno domini M^{mi} quadringentesimo undecimo.

1411, BEFORE 18 MARCH

Sigismund, by the grace of God, ever august king of the Romans, king of Hungary etc., to all our loyal men who have been or in the future will be appointed in any county to assess and collect both the chamber's profit,¹ as well as the archiepiscopal and episcopal tithes,² and who will read these presents, greetings and, grace. Because of the request and complaint of several gentlemen of the realm submitted to our majesty against and about you in matters of the assessment and exaction of our chamber's profit and of the tithes, we, together with our prelates and barons, have recently decided to order you to observe firmly this following everlasting edict:

1 That the officials who assess and collect the said profit of our chamber must not take more than two of the currently circulating pennies as a fee from the reeves³ for the quittance, not even a pint of wine or the value of the same, nor anything else on the occasion of the delivery and payment⁴ of the money they had imposed, just as was the custom during the reign of the most glorious prince lord Louis, likewise king of Hungary, our dearest father and father-in-law.

2 Then, we have decreed, that the officials who assess the taxes should in their assessments impose thirty new pennies⁵ for a whole gate through which a cart can leave and enter, even if more than one peasant lives on the plot, and no more than fifteen pennies for a hinged door, namely for a small gate commonly known as verőcze, just as for a half gate. But where they notice that the tenant peasant⁶ or other inhabitant who, by fraudulent stratagem, in order to avoid the chamber's

¹ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; by the late thirteenth century, it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. On its origins, see Lajos Thallóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary] (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879). Now also Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Period," in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovsky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64 and Gyöngyössi, "Coinage."

² The dicator seems to have been both assessor and collector of different levies.

³ The reeve (villicus) was the head of the village administration, in charge of minor jurisdiction and enforcement of royal laws.

⁴ The expression (already used this way in 1351:4) implies by the word redemptio—usually referring to documents—that unlawful fees were asked for the quittance. The sixteenth-century copies have litterarum.

⁵ In the late fourteenth century, pennies of different value were in circulation. A "new penny" (nova moneta) was first issued by Sigismund in 1392 and was to be worth three old pennies which also remained in circulation. 100 new pennies (or 300 old ones) were in fact exchanged for one gold florin at least until 1403, when the government began a new financial policy leading also to the debasement of the new pennies. Because of the devaluation after 1402 between 1407 and 1410, 160 new pennies were worth a florin. We have no data of the exact value of "new pennies" in 1411.

⁶ Tenant peasant (jobagio from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once profit has a small gate or door at the front of his plot and a big one at the rear, then for this plot they must impose as much as for a whole gate.⁷

3 Then, we have established that the said officials who assess the said profit of our royal chamber should not dare to impose a tax on reeves, on day laborers, and on those servants whom their lord provides with food and clothing on his demesne farm,⁸ if their lord declares on his word,⁹ or, in his absence, his reeves or officials claim under oath that this is so.

4 Then, we have decided that, after the date of payment of our aforementioned royal chamber's profit, neither the counts of the chamber's profit,¹⁰ nor their officials nor the collectors of taxes should presume under any circumstance by virtue of their office to collect, extort, or take a pledge for the payment of the outstanding amount, unless with the help of the ispán, or the alispán, and the noble magistrates¹¹ of that county where our said chamber's profit has been imposed.

5 We have also ordered that the tithing-men dare not tithe the shocks, namely, the heaps of grain, by using only their own discretion and estimation, but that the peasant to whom the grain belongs should, besides swearing the usual oath (touching the sign of the Lord's cross), testify to the number and size of his shocks in that year, and the said tithing-men must be satisfied with that.² Not a single penny shall be demanded for the tithing.

their dues were paid.. The prohibition of their doing so was mainly in the interest of the lesser nobility, whose peasants were sometimes moved (or lured) to the estates of greater landlords who were able to offer better conditions. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

⁷ Cf. 1397:29. The taxation unit—a peasant plot—was called porta (gate), but, due to partable heritance and shortage of land, by the fifteenth century, more than one family lived on one plot. Moreover, apparently, tax payers tried to evade payment by not having a "full sized" gate on their property.

⁸ Cf. 1351:5; 1397:30

⁹ That the lord has to declare merely ad humanitatem suam, i.e., on his word of honor, meant an acceptance of his higher social status, for usually legally binding declarations were made under oath (as the officials are bound to do). On the concepts of honor and humanitas in Angevin Hungary, see Ágnes Kurcz, Lovagi kultúra Magyarországon a 13-14. században [Chivalric culture in Hungary in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries] (Bp: Akadémiai K., 1988), pp. 170, 188–192

¹⁰ Most of the royal revenues were collected and administered by comites camerae, mainly foreign entrepreneurs who contracted with the king; see e.g. the one with Endre Chempeliny from 2 February 1342, DRH pp. 106–17; on these arrangements, see Gyöngyössi, "Coinage."

¹¹ Ever since the Angevin age, the ispáns (comites) held more than one county as a honor and the actual administration was entrusted to their deputy (usually their retainer) the alispán, who acted together with the (usually four in every county) elected noble magistrates (judices nobilium, szolgabíró) who were both his helpers and representatives of the county nobility.

6 We also desire that the tithing-man be not allowed to collect or to extort the unpaid tithes with the help and power of the county's ispán or alispán, but only by way of ecclesiastical punishment preceded by canonical warning. Should those who assess and collect both our said chamber's profit and the aforesaid tithe dare act and proceed in any way against our aforementioned decree exceeding the established quantities, then the county's ispán and the noble magistrates, together with the nobles of that county in which this occurs, must not let it happen or condone it.

13

And in order that henceforth the aforementioned decree should always have the validity of perpetual strength, everlasting force, and the required effect, we order and altogether command and bid your collective loyalty with our strictest royal decree, that when you go and travel to the estates or rights of the honorable lord Peter of Perény, former ispán of the Székely¹⁴ and George son of Peter of Dob, located or lying in whichever county,¹⁵ to assess our said chamber's profit and the tithe, you must keep the aforementioned general decree, each of its clauses, contents, and articles firmly, totally, unalterably, and unchanged. And you must also assess the people and the tenant peasants wherever they might live on their estates for the chamber's profit and the tithes in the amount and not more than has been laid down in this afore stated decree. Do not dare to act in any way in contravention of this general decree of ours. We have also ordered that these presents, sealed with our privy seal, should be returned to the bearer, after having been read.¹⁶ Given in Košice on Palm Sunday in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and eleven.

¹³ Here again the role of the county is enhanced; cf 1405, note 21. The last two articles were repeated by King Matthias as 1464:24, which also warrants that the decision be regarded a law.

¹⁴ Perény, Peter of (d. 1423), ispán of the Székely 1397-1401, judge royal 1415-23.

¹⁵ Dob, George of (fl. 1411-39), knight of the household.

¹⁶ This caluse is typical for letters patent.

KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY'S PROPOSITION TO THE ROYAL COUNCIL

1415

(Prop. 1415/7)

While it is likely that most decreta, agreed to at diets and then issued by the ruler, started out with proposals from the crown (or the royal council), few of those have survived. Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, published three of them in the Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445 (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978)[= DRH], two of Sigismund's, and one of Ladislas Posthumus. We decided to include the two from Sigismund as they shed light at the procedure of law-making and are frequently referred to later. (See also Proposition 1432/33)

The first, undated, proposition concerning matters of defense, justice, and coinage, sent by the king to the council from abroad can be dated on the basis of the dignitaries mentioned in it. This gives the years between 1415, when the ban and the judge royal mentioned in Artt. I-II took office, and 1417, when some of the subjects of the proposition had been regulated in the decretum of 21 July 1417.

The text survived in a truncated and poorly copied version in the family archives of the Kállay where Martin Georg Kovachich found it and published the text. We print it following the DRH, tacitly accepting Döry's textual corrections as noted there.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives | (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MS: Contemporary paper copy, MNL OL DL 56715.

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Aurea complectens subsidia literaria ad historiam legislationis et jurisprudentiae Hungaricae (Buda: Regia Universitas) 1, pp. 434-41; DRH pp. 397-404.

LIT: Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties] (Budapest: MTA, 1899) p. 32; Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990).

COPIA CONSTITUTIONUM PRELATIS ET BARONIBUS REGNI HUNGARIAE DESTINATARUM

I. Pro defensione regni Hungarie sunt dispositi infrascripti per regiam maiestatem:

Nicolaus Chak waywoda Transsilvanus	ad lanceas II ^c XXV
Michael filius Salamonis	ad lanceas C XXV
Episcopus Transsilvanus	ad lanceas C L ^{ta}
Pipo comes	ad lanceas M ^{le} II ^c
Nicolaus filius palatini	ad lanceas II ^c L ^{ta}
Sigismundus de Losonch	ad lanceas II ^c L ^{ta}
Summa lancearum duo M ^{lia} et II ^c

II. In medio autem regni sunt infrascripti pro defensione regni in subsidium prescriptorum dispositi:

Dominus Nicalaus de Gara palatinus	ad lanceas [II ^c] L ^{ta}
Comes Petrus de Peren	ad lanceas [C]
Johannes de Rozgon	ad lanceas C.

Sumpna lancearum III^c et L^{ta}.

III. Insuper vult et mandat regia maiestas quod omnes et singuli barones et nobiles regni Hungarie, qui de pecuniis regni habent, ad exercitationes secundum decretum alias per ipsum et barones factum et dispositum ad exercituandum moveantur et compellantur.

IV. Nota: pro defensione regni Hungarie a parte partium Transalpinarum, Bulgarie, Rasye sunt per regiam maiestatem dispositi, ut prehabitu est.

EFFECTUS DOMINI REGIS EST CONTINETUR IN INFRASCIPTIS, SEQUITUR

V. Serenissimus dominus rex per prelatos, barones, nobiles et ceteros possessionatos homines regni sui instanter desiderat, ut universis regni sui incolis in causis tam possessionum, quam potentiarum, quam etiam quibuscunque et qualitercunque et quomodocunque emergendis et suscitandis fiat rectum et equum iudicium cum amministrazione iustitie etc.

VI. Ut istud rectum iudicium cunctis postulantis fieri et exhiberi possit, desiderat ipse dominus rex supradictos prelatos et nobiles regni sui generalibus suis iudicibus seu iustitiariis, ut puta domino palatino et iudice curie sue, magistro thawarnicorum, summo thesaurario ac cancellario maioris sigilli sui, quo ut rex Hungarie utitur, ceteros alios sui barones, necnon de singulis regni sui comitatibus quatuor aut plures nobiles conscientiosos et magne auctoritatis viros, ac etiam de omnibus et singulis capitulis et conventibus certas personas adiungi et asociari, qui eligantur more in celebratione generalium congregationum fieri solito, per dominum nostrum regem ac per nobiles singulorum comitatum etc.

VII. Item, quod illi, qui pro huiusmodi iudicio faciendo pretactis baronibus iungentur, prestent ante omnia super hoc debitorie iuramentum, quod omnibus petentibus prece, premio, favore et odio semotis certum iudicium et iustitiam facerent.

VIII. Item, quod hii, qui pretactis iustitiariis regni iungentur, unacum eisdem in omnibus possessionibus, potentiariis ceterisque quibuscunque, quantumcunque arduis causis possint et valent procedere de plenitudine regie maiestatis usque ad finalem earundem determinationem et decisionem inclusive.

IX. Item, quod processus singuli et definitive sententie constituentur et emanentur solito more sub authenticis sigillis iudicum et iustitiarum ordinariorum pretactorum.

X. Item, quod iudices et iustitii faciant cunctorum processuum et diffinitivarum sententiarum plenas et rigidas executiones et etiam per alios, ut moris est, fieri demandent.

XI. Item quia propter pluralitatem terminorum seu octavarum antefatis prelati, baronibus et nobi[libus pro] faciendo huiusmodi iudicio ad singulas octavas accedere debentibus plures inconven[ientie] et incomoditates penurieque expensarum infallanter incumbunt, ad semovendum quevis huiusmodi impedimenta videtur prefato domino nostro regi, quod tales termini seu octave ad certas paucas notabiles octavas annuatim celebrandas reducantur, ad quas memorati pro faciendo iudicio deputandi absque eorum incomoditatibus et sine onere expensarum accedere possint.

XII. Item qui autem ex baronibus regni antefati pro faciendo huiusmodi iudicio domino nostro regi apti et iudicibus ordinariis associandi esse videntur, in sequentibus sunt subdenotati. Modum tamen electionis et quos eligere voluerint, ponit sua serenitas in arbitrium prelatorum baronum et nobilium eorundem.

SECUNTUR NOMINA IUDICUM ORDINARIORUM

XIII. Dominus Nicolaus de Gara palatinus, comes Petrus de Peren, Johannes de Perseulch magister thauarnicorum, Johannes de Rozgon sumpmus thesaurarius, cancellarius maioris signi in regno Hungarie existentis. Et isti supradictis, ut in curia regia continuam faciant residentiam, est per suam serenitatem sufficienter provisum, predictis autem iudicibus ordinariis pro faciendo iudicio in certis principalibus et notabilioribus octavis sunt adiungendi infrascripti, prout regie videtur maiestati, qui possunt de facili principalibus octavis interesse: Unus ex dominis Wylak, Stephanus de Kanissa alias ianitorum regalium magister, Emericus de Peren secretarius cancellarius, Karolus banus, Nicolaus de Zeech, Ladislaus filius Pauli de Gara, Johannes filius bani de Ezdench, David filius Martini de Albews, Johannes filius Pethew, Stephanus Kompolth.

XIV. Item pro memoria iudiciorum singularum causarum retinenda videtur prefato domino nostro regi, quod disponantur et ordinentur certi libri ad quos processus iudicarii et presertim sententie diffinitive, quos et quas in aliquibus causis emanare contingat, inscribantur, ut successivis temporibus in similibus emergendis semper iudicia uniformia fiant et dictentur.

XV. Item ad hunc etiam finem, quod regnicole, quorum fortasse instrumenta litteraria comburi, perdi aut ab ipsis alienari contigerit, ex huiusmodi libris, in quibus sententie pro ipsis regenerande et refferende scribi debuerint, nulla litteraria instrumenta habere possint.

XVI. Item decernatur tamen, quod huiusmodi libri seu registra sententiarum et processuum semper retineantur sub sigillis officialium seu instrumentorum ordinariorum registratorum et aliquorum aliorum eis iniungendorum, quos sua serenitas desiderat similiter ad hoc deputare.

XVII. Item cum maxima pars iudiciorum et iustitie ac conservationis possessionum et iuris possessionarii dicti regni Hungarie nobilium et ecclesiarum stet in iudicum ordinariorum, capitulorum, conventuum et iudicum nobilium prefati regni Hungarie hominibus; eapropter videtur prefato domino regi, quod sit statuendum et decernendum, ut dicti iudices, capitula, conventus et iudices nobilium tantum idoneos atque conscientiosos pro testimoniis et ceteris agendis destinent, de quibus nulla falsitas habeatur vel suspicio sed quod plena possit eisdem in eorum faciendis relationibus et examinationibus fides adhiberi.

XVIII. Item videtur etiam prefato domino regi, quod sit providendum, statuendum et decernendum, quod in singulis comitatibus Hungarie boni nobiles et conscientiosi viri propria armorum insignia habentes in iudices nobilium preficiantur, qui etiam personaliter, exigentibus causis et negotiis, iuxta regni consuetudinem ad singulorum requisitionem pro testimoniis et ceteris agendis exeant.

XIX. Item videtur prefato domino regi, quod sit limitandum, statuendum et decernendum, quanta debeat esse redemptio singularum litterarum sub supradictorum regni iudicum ordinariorum, capitulorum, conventuum et iudicum nobilium sigillis emanandarum.

XX. Item videtur prefato domini regi, quod sit decernenda et statuenda una pena in illos, qui predictorum regni iudicum ordinariorum sive generalium vel iudicum nobilium homines pro sententiarum, inquisitionum regalium necnon iudicum mandaturum executionibus transmissos percutere, vulnerare, interficere sive fugare aut dehonestare presumunt.

XXI. Item dispositis premissis dominus noster providebit, quod comites singulorum comitatum pro se ipsis in singulis comitatibus personaliter residendo unacum iudicibus nobilium et nobilibus comitatus illius iudicium et iustitiam omnibus faciant et amministrent.

XXII. Item etiam videtur domino regi, quod sit statuendum et decernendum, que sit pena eorum, [qui] fures, latrones, spoliatores, predones notorios aut proscriptos et alios maleficos penes se aut in eorum servitiis vel domibus conservare aut eis hospitalitatem prebere, aut eos protegere sive defensare [presumpserint], et quod declarentur pene antiquitus statute.

SEQUITUR DE FACTO CUSSIONIS MONETARUM AURI, ARGENTI, CUPRI

XXIII. Quia per falsificationem et circumscisionem monetarum regni Hungarie principaliter dominus rex et consequenter prelati barones nobiles et possessionati homines in eorum redditibus et proventibus, civitatesque et generaliter cuncti regni Hungarie regnicole in ipsorum mercimonialibus et quibusvis negotiationibus magnum dampnum ymmo intollerabile detrimentum indesinenter percipient, ad [illud] decernendum igitur et salubri remedio obviandum pro utilitate et communi bono totius regni Hungarie videtur prefato domino regi, ut debeat una moneta sub insigniis armorum regni Hungarie in quadruplici forma de purissimo et firmissimo argenti cudi, semper perpetuis futuris temporibus in regno Hungarie currenda et recipienda; sic videlicet ut decem grossi argentei maioris forme valent unum florenum puri auri Hungarie, vel medii grossi argentei XX de secunda forma valeant similiter florenum aurum puri auri, et LXXX argentei de quarta forma et minori valent unum florenum puri auri.

XXIV. Item videtur domino regi, quod floreni auri Hungarie, qui sunt boni et ubique terrarum ducatis Venetiis equiparantur, remaneant in eisdem characteribus et pondere, in quibus nunc sunt, cudantur tamen sub insigniis armorum regni Hungarie, ut supra.

XXV. Item videtur domino regi, quod pro utilitate regnicolarum debeat cudi una communis moneta de puro cupro, que moneta cuprea limitetur solum ad illum valorem argenti, quem valeret, si venderetur non laboratum.

XXVI. Item decernatur, quod propter memorias perpetuo habendas reges qui pro tempore corone regni Hungarie preerunt, ponant ex uno latere monete cudenda arma vel certa signa.

XXVII. Item his itaque prehabitis prefata regia maiestas desiderat deliberari et decerni, si huiusmodi moneta argentea vel cuprea sint modo quo supra cudende.

XXVIII. Item desiderat dominus rex decerni et statui, quod semper unus nobilis in regno Hungarie bene possessionatus, qui amissionem et perditionem suarum possessionum et suorum bonorum timeret, si non fidelitate et honore motus cautionem et diligentiores faciat custodiam et provideat, in provisionem cussionis monetarum dictarum eligatur et preficiatur, quique singulis ebdomadis de moneta cudenda probam recipiat et etiam apud se sigillatim observet, et eodem anno huiusmodi cussionis monetarum lapso earundem monetarum proba per dominum archiepiscopum Strigoniensem et officiales regios ad hoc deputandos solito more probetur et examinetur.

XXIX. Item desiderat dominus rex decerni et statui certas penas, quibus contrafacientes puniantur, quod nulli quicunque et cuiuscunque conditionis seu status predicti regni Hungarie regnicole aliquem aliam monetam argenteam vel cupream preter quam regni Hungarie monetas pretactas in dicto regno Hungarie tractent, nec in eodem currant sive per quempiam recipiantur.

XXX. Item desiderat dominus rex statui et decerni, quod nullo tempore moneta aurea et argentea possit per quempiam de dicto regno educi aut exportari.

XXXI. Item desiderat dominus rex decerni eorum penas, qui de dicto regno huiusmodi monetam auream seu argenteam educerent aut exportarent; ita videlicet ut tales dictante

COPY OF THE CONSTITUTIONS SENT TO THE PRELATES AND BARONS OF THE KINGDOM OF HUNGARY

1 For the defense of the kingdom of Hungary the following are deployed by the royal majesty:¹

Nicholas Csák, voivode of Transylvania ²	225 lances ³
Michael son of Solomon ⁴	125 lances
The bishop of Transylvania ⁵	150 lances
Ispán Pipo ⁶	1200 lances
Nicholas son of the palatine ⁷	250 lances
Sigsimund of Losonc ⁸	250 lances

Total of lances: 2200

2 In the middle of the country the following should be ready for the defense of the realm in support of the abovementioned.

Nicholas Garai count palatine ⁹	250 lances
Ispán Peter of Perény ¹⁰	100 lances
John of Rozgony ¹¹	100 lances

¹ This partial listing of troops was augmented by the detailed arrangements of the Proposition 1423-4.

² Csák, Nicholas of (d. 1426), ispán of Temes 1394–1402, voivode of Transylvania 1402–3, 1415–26

³ One lancea or gleve consisted of one armored knight (armatus) accompanied by two or three bowmen (pharetrarii or sagittarii or arcerarii sub eisdem lanceis).

⁴ Michael, son of Salamon Nádas, ispán of the Székely (1405–20).

⁵ Stephen Upori, bishop of Transylvania (1403–19).

⁶ Pipo of Ozora, (Filippo Scolari, 1369–1426), Florentine merchant, ispán of the salt chambers 1401–26, ispán of Temes 1404–26.

⁷ Nicholas, son of the former palatine Miklós Szécsi, master of the Treasury 1408–10.

⁸ Sigismund Losonci, captain of Ozora in 1417.

⁹ Gara, Nicholas junior of (son of Nicholas senior, d. 1433), magnate, ban of Mačva 1387–90, 1393–4, of Dalmatia and Croatia 1394–1402, of Slavonia 1397–1402, count palatine 1402–3.

¹⁰ Perény, Peter of (d. 1423), ispán of the Székely 1397–1401, judge royal 1415–2.

¹¹ Rozgony, John of (d. 1438), ispán of Sáros 1410–35, lord treasurer 1412–36, master of the treasury 1433–37.

Total of lances 350

3 Moreover, the royal majesty wishes and orders that all and every of the barons and nobles of the kingdom of Hungary who are paid by the country be moved and compelled to campaign according to the decree made and approved at another time by the same and the barons.¹²

4 Note that for the defense of the kingdom of Hungary from the side of Transylvania, Bulgaria and Rascia the royal majesty disposes as it previously.

PURPOSES OF THE LORD KING ARE CONTAINED BELOW AS FOLLOWS

5 The most serene lord king urgently desires through the prelates, barons, nobles and other men of property that all inhabitants of his realm obtain right and equitable judgment in the course of law in cases regarding both property and violence or indeed those emerging or arising in any way, mode, or form.

6 So that this just judgment be done and presented to all claimants, the same lord king wishes that the said prelates and nobles of his realm should be joined and associated with his judges ordinary and justiciars, namely the lord palatine, his judge royal, the master of the treasury, the supreme treasurer and the chancellor of his major seal used in the kingdom of Hungary;¹³ as should all his other barons as well as four or more conscientious and well respected men from every county of the realm, and moreover certain persons from all and every chapter and convent.¹⁴ They should be

¹² Referring probably to 1397: 6.

¹³ These barons usually presided royal courts, though the inclusion of the treasurer is an exception. The count palatine (comes palatinus) was originally the head of the king's household as his name, nádorispán (from Slavic na dvor=in court) suggest. By the mid-twelfth century he had become the king's deputy and commander of the royal host; he gradually moved out of the court and served as the king's itinerant judge administering justice to the nobles and servientes regis. The election or selection of the palatine was a contested issue between king and estates. The judge royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró) was originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country. From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda. The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. Some towns came to be briefly subject to this judge. The master of the treasury (magister tavernicorum) was a royal officer, originally responsible for the royal court's provisioning, derived from the Hungarian name for the guards of royal magazines (tavernici); from the fourteenth century onwards, the master of the treasury was no longer associated with the treasury, but was rather the presiding judge of the appeal court of certain royal cities (sedes tavernicalis). The chief chancellor was in Sigismund's time still always an ecclesiastic lord, the chancellery itself was run by the vice-chancellor. The chief chancellor presided over the court of the special personal presence.

¹⁴ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses elected in the usual way at the holding of the diets by our lord the king and the nobles of the single counties, and so on.

7 Then, that those who will join the barons to make these judgments should first of all swear a mandatory oath that they will pass definite judgment and justice to all claimants setting aside request and reward, favor or hate.

8 Then, that those who will join the said justices of the realm should be able and empowered to proceed together with them with the full power of his royal majesty to the final judgment and sentence of all cases regarding property, violence or any others no matter how arduous.

9 Then, that all single [trials] and final judgments be established and issued in the usual way under the authentic seal of the said judges and justices ordinary.

10 Then, that the judges and justices should ensure that complete and strict execution should follow the final sentences of all trials, and require the same to be done by others, as it is usual.

11 Then, because of the many terms and octavial courts, the said prelates, barons and nobles, attending the single octavial courts administering justice inevitably suffer inconvenience, discomfort and the burden of expenses, in order to remove such kind of hindrance it seems good to our said lord king that such terms or octaves be reduced to a certain few major octaves to be held annually, which the aforementioned can attend without discomfort and burden of costs, in order to pass judgment.¹⁵

12 Then, those who among the barons of the said kingdom seem to our lord to be apt for administering such justice and worthy to be joined with the justices ordinary, are listed below. The way of election and who should be elected, his serenity leaves to the judgment of the same prelates, barons and nobles.¹⁶

(called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66–73; now also T. Köfalvi, "Places of Authentication (loca credibilia)," Chronica 2 (2002), 27–38.

¹⁵ Octavial courts (octava) refer to the session of royal courts of justice; of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times. The king's attempt was to reduce the number of these sessions. It was not implemented.

¹⁶ The plan to establish such a sizeable court that surely would have been unwieldy, was never implemented. Bónis & al. (DRH p. 397) suggested that Sigismund thought of something like an "anti-diet" as a counterbalance to the noble assembly, but it does not sound convincing. Some aspects of the judicial

HERE FOLLOW THE NAMES OF THE JUSTICES ORDINARY

13 Lord Nicholas Garai, palatine, ispán Peter of Perény, John of Pelsőc, master of the treasurers,¹⁷ John of Rozgony, chief treasurer and the chief chancellor of the great seal of the kingdom of Hungary.¹⁸ And sufficient arrangements have been made by his serenity that the aforementioned could establish continuous residence in the royal court. And it pleases his royal majesty that for administering justice in certain principal and notable octaves the following, who can easily attend the major octaves, should join the said justices ordinary: one of the lords Újlaki,¹⁹ Stephen of Kanizsa, sometime master of the royal doorkeepers,²⁰ Imre of Perény secret chancellor,²¹ the ban Charles,²² Nicholas of Szécs, Ladislás, son of Paul Garai,²³ John, son of ban Zdenčzi,²⁴ David son of Martin of Abisi,²⁵ John son of Pető,²⁶ Stephen Kompolti.²⁷

14 Then, it pleases our lord king that for retaining the memory of single judgments, certain books be set up and ordered into which the judicial process and particularly the final sentences which happen to emerge in any case should be inscribed, so that in similar cases in subsequent times consistent sentences may always be passed and declared.²⁸

15 Then, also for that purpose that if gentlemen of the realm, whose written instruments might by chance have been burnt, lost or taken from them, could from these kind of books, into which the reform outlined here became part of the decretum of 8 May 1435. At any rate, the list below indicates the group of barons and nobles whom the king trusted at that moment.

¹⁷ John Pelsőci Bebek, master of the treasury (1410–9).

¹⁸ Eberhard, bishop of Zagreb, chief chancellor (1404–19.)

¹⁹ Ladislás and Emeric Újlaki, bans of Mačva (1410–8).

²⁰ Stephen Kanizsai, former master of the doorkeepers (1396–1401).

²¹ Emeric Perényi, secret chancellor (1405–18/9).

²² Charles of Korbavia, former ban of Croatia and Slavonia (1409–11).

²³ Either Desider, son of Paul Garai or Ladislás, son of Nicholas Garai, both later bans of Mačva.

²⁴ Master John, son of Ban Simon Zdenčzi, landowner in Co. Kőrös.

²⁵ David, son of Martin Albisi, ispán of Co. Zólyom.

²⁶ John, son of Pető Gersei, ispán of Zala (1404–10) of Co. Győr in 1405.

²⁷ Stephen Nánai Kompolti, later judge royal (1423–5).

²⁸ The establishment of such a register would have been a very progressive step in the administration of justice. It is not known, whether it was ever attempted. The formulation of the article suggests a proposal to formally introduce case law (based on precedence) in Hungary, which was probably informally long ago the case, above all through the formularies; see, e.g. György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei [Elements of our medieval law] (Budapest: Közgazdasági és Jogi Könyvkiadó, 1972) pp. 143–223, with extensive bibliography.

judgments have to be written, to be retrieved and consulted on their behalf, if they have no written instruments.²⁹

16 Then, let it be decided that these books or registers of sentences and trials be always retained under the seal of officials or registered ordinary instruments or of any others attached to them whom his serenity wishes to assign for that.

17 Then, since most of the judgments, sentences and the recording of the possessions and partial possessions of the nobles and churches of the said kingdom of Hungary rests with the men of the judges ordinary, the chapters and the convents as well as of the noble magistrates³⁰ of the said kingdom of Hungary, therefore, it pleased the said lord king that it be established and decreed that the said judges, chapters, convents, and noble magistrates send such suitable and conscientious [persons] as witnesses and other actions to whom no falsity or suspicion is attached, but in whose reports and inquiries full trust can be placed.

18 Then, it pleases the said king that provision be made, established, and decreed that in every county of Hungary good noblemen and conscientious gentlemen who have their own coats of arms be promoted to noble magistrates,³¹ that they may also personally go out, where cases and affairs demand, as witnesses and for other business at the request of individual persons, according to the custom of the realm.

19 Then, it pleases the said lord king that it should be limited, established and decreed how much should be the fee for letters issued under the seals of the aforementioned judges ordinary, chapters, convents, and noble magistrates.³²

20 Then, it pleases the said lord king that a fixed punishment should be established and decreed for those who dare to strike, wound, kill, chase away or dishonor the men of the judges ordinary or general or the noble magistrates serving sentences or performing inquests at the orders of the king or of the noble magistrates.³³

²⁹ The Latin is faulty at the end. The loca credibilia did preserve copies of family documents, but not systematically.

³⁰ Noble magistrates were elected noblemen, usually four in each county, as both helpers of the ispán and alispán and representatives of their fellow nobles.

³¹ In the mid-fourteenth century, the post of noble magistrate was seen as a burden and people had to be coerced to take it. There is evidence that they then hurried to obtain coats of arms and seals.

³² This was regulated in 1417 and in then in detail in 1435: 10-12.

³³ Personal protection of judges (and other officers of the court) derived ultimately from the sacrosanct rights of the tribuni plebis of the Roman Republic, rights extended to (and claimed by) the Roman emperors in their civil and judicial capacities; see Theodor Mommsen, Römisches Staatsrecht ed. 3 (Leipzig: Hirzel, 1887) 2 301-306, 782; 948ff.; Mason Hammond, The Augustan Principate (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1968) pp. 79-87.

21 Then, once the above matters are settled, our lord will make provision that the ispáns of every county, residing in person in the same county, will themselves pass judgment and administer justice to all, together with the noble magistrates and the nobles of the county.

22 Then, it pleases the lord king that it be established and decreed, what should be the punishment of those who [dare to] keep with them in their place of office or their own houses, or offer hospitality to or protect and defend notorious and proscribed thieves, brigands, plunderers, robbers and other malefactors and that the punishments established in olden time be made known.³⁴

HERE FOLLOWS ABOUT THE MINTING OF GOLD, SILVER, AND COPPER MONEY³⁵

23 Because through the forging and clipping of the coins of the kingdom of Hungary above all the lord king and consequently the prelates, barons, nobles, and men of property in regard to their income and revenue, and the cities and generally all inhabitants of the kingdom of Hungary in their commerce and other business incessantly suffer great damage, nay intolerable loss ; therefore in order to decide the matter and come up with a salutary remedy for the advantage and common good of the whole kingdom of Hungary, it pleases the lord king that one money be minted with the stamp of the arms of the kingdom of Hungary in four forms, of the purest and finest silver, to circulate within the kingdom and be received into the future everlasting: namely such that ten larger silver groats be worth one Hungarian florin of pure gold, twenty groats of medium size of the second type likewise be worth one florin of pure gold, and eighty of the fourth and smaller type be worth one florin of pure gold.

24 Then, it pleases the lord king that the gold florins of Hungary, which are good and everywhere of equal value to Venetian ducats, should remain in the same character and weight in which they are now, but be minted with the impress of the arms of the kingdom of Hungary, as above.³⁶

25 Then, it pleases the lord king that for the advantage of the inhabitants one common coin be minted of pure copper, which should be worth only as much silver as it would be if unminted.

26 Then let it be decreed that the kings who will in their time bear the crown of the kingdom of Hungary should have their arms or certain distinguishing signs struck on one side of the coins, in order to preserve their everlasting memory.

³⁴ This article, which had several parallels, may have been triggered by the earlier revolts against Sigismund.

³⁵ On the context of this monetary reform, see Márton Gyöngyössi, "Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)" in József Laszlovszky et al., eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

³⁶ From the extensive literature on this currency, see István Draskóczy, "Der ungarische Goldgulden und seine Bedeutung im ungarischen Außenhandel des 14. und 15. Jahrhunderts," In Der Tiroler Bergbau und die Depression der europäischen Montanwirtschaft im 14. und 15. Jahrhundert (Veröffentlichungen des Südtiroler Landesarchivs, 16), R. Tasser and E. Westermann, eds., (Innsbruck–Wien–Bozen: Studien Verlag, 2004) pp. 61–77.

27 Then, once the above is settled the royal majesty desires that it be deliberated and decided whether these silver and copper coins should be minted in the way described) above.

28 Then, the lord king wishes that it be decided and decreed that always one nobleman of the kingdom of Hungary, well endowed and fearful of losing and forfeiting his possessions and goods should he not faithfully and honorably watch over carefully and attentively guard what is put in his care, be chosen and placed in charge of overseeing the minting of the said money; who would receive a sample of the money minted every week and keep it with him under seal, so that at the end of the same year of this kind of minting of the moneys, a sample of the same moneys/coins may be checked and examined in the customary manner by the lord archbishop of Esztergom³⁷ and the royal officials appointed to this task.

29 Then, the lord king wishes that fixed punishments be decided and decreed by which counterfeiters should be punished, so that no inhabitant of the said kingdom of Hungary of whatever estate or status should handle in the said kingdom of Hungary any other silver or copper money than the aforementioned moneys of the kingdom of Hungary, nor should (any such) circulate in the same or be received by anybody.

30 Then, the lord king wishes that it be decided and decreed that at no time should gold and silver money be taken out or exported from the said kingdom.³⁸

31 Then, the lord king wishes that the punishments of those [persons as is laid down (?)] who would take out or export these gold or silver coins from the said kingdom be decided; so, namely, that those³⁹

³⁷ The archbishop of Esztergom had from ancient times a kind of supervisory role and a regular income from the minting of money. One of these was the pisetum, see Frigyes Kahler, "Das pizetum-Recht," Debreceni Déry Múzeum Évkönyve 1986 (Debrecen: Déry Múzeum, 1987) 181-91

³⁸ This prohibition goes back to the earliest regulations of the coinage, see 1342: 15.

³⁹ The copy ends here in mid-sentence.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY 23
July 1421

This royal decree, issued in a general meeting of Co. Pozsony, regulates the administration of justice in the county courts. The rise of their standing seems to have induced the officers of the counties to litigate in the local courts, where they served as party and judge at the same time. The decree seeks to end this abuse.

The text came down to us only in letters patent issued for certain individual families; the most complete one (see MS), for an unknown addressee, contains, however, references to the royal council's participation in the issue. Also, several records refer to this text as decretum, and, considering that it regulates matters relevant to the entire kingdom, it does qualify as a law of the realm.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MS.: Original on parchment with the privy seal en placard; MNL OL DL. 79687.

ED.: Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Budapest: Akademiai, 1978 [=DRH], pp. 240–1. Two copies, sent to the counties Fejér and Vas, in favor of noble families there, are published in Imre Nagy III et al., eds., Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeö (Budapest: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1895) [henceforth: Cod. dipl. Zichy] 8: 28–30 and in Nagy, Iván et al., eds. Hazai Okmánytár. Codex diplomaticus patrius. 8 volumes. (Győr-Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1865-1891), 1: 315, respectively.

23 IULII. 1421

Nos Sigismundus dei gratia Romanorum rex semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc, rex memorie commendamus tenore presentium significantes quibus expedit universis, quod nobis Posonii unacum prelati et baronibus proceribusque dicti regni nostri Hungarie in sede nostra iudiciaria sedentibus nonnulli proceres et nobiles ipsius regni nostri Hungarie nostre maiestatis consurgendo in conspectum humiliter curarunt significare, quomodo comites vel vicecomites nostri in plerisque comitatibus prescripti regni nostri Hungarie constituti ipsos contra se super diversis causarum articulis ad sedem iudiciariam eiusdem comitatus, quem pro honore tenerent, in causam convenirent, propter quod ipsi in eorum iuribus fuissent defraudati adeo et in tantum, ut per predictos comites vel vicecomites in eorum rebus dampnificati extitissent et spoliarentur. Supplicaverunt itaque hiis dictis nostre claritati, ut eis circa hoc regale remedium opportunum dignaremur adhibere. Verum cum via iuris et iustitie exigente, dicti etiam regni nostri Hungarie consuetudine dictante, nullus iudicum et iustitiariorum prescripti regni nostri Hungarie in una et eadem causa iudex et actor esse potest, ideo nolentes prescriptos regni nostri proceres et nobiles per predictos comites et vicecomites sic de facili et indebite opprimi et in eorum iuribus ac rebus dampnificari, matura deliberatione prehabita duximus statuendum, quod amodo inposterum nullus comitum vel vicecomitum cuiuscunque comitatus aliquem ex nostris regnicolis contra se pretextu alicuius facti ad sedem iudiciariam comitatus illius, in quo pro honore essent constituti vel constituerentur, contra se per modum citationis vel aliter in causam convenire et cum eis in lite procedere valeant atque possint, sed si quid actionis ipsi comites vel vicecomites adversus aliquos regni nostri Hungarie regnicolas aut aliquem eorum habent vel habere pretendunt, id in curia nostre serenitatis coram nostra speciali presentia aut palatinali sive iudicis curie nostre ad instar aliorum causantium requirere exequique debeant et teneantur.

Quocirca vobis prescriptis regni nostri Hungarie universis comitibus vel vicecomitibus presentibus et futuris presentium notitiam habituris firmo nostro regio damus sub edicto, quatenus amodo inposterum contra formam prescripte nostre gratie dictis nostris regnicolis modo previo facte in nullis causis et causarum articulis contra vos ipsos in dicta sede vestra iudiciaria in causam convenire, eosque vexare et impedire nullatenus presumptis nec sitis ausi modo aliquali, sed si quid actionis contra eos habetis, vel habere pretenditis, in dicta curia nostre serenitatis ad instar aliorum iuridice exequi debeatis. Presentes etiam post earum lecturam semper reddi edicimus presentanti.

Datum in dicto Posonio, feria quarta proxima ante festum beati Jacobi apostoli, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo vigesimo primo, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. XXXquinto, Romanorum undecimo et Bohemie primo.

23 JULY 1421

We, Sigismund, by the grace of God always august king of the Romans, and king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, &c., wish to have remembered through the words of these presents by all to whom it may concern that, when we were sitting on our seat of judgment at Pressburg with the prelates, barons, and lords of our said kingdom of Hungary in attendance, several lords and nobles of this our kingdom of Hungary, rose up in the presence of our majesty and humbly undertook to inform us that in many counties of our aforesaid kingdom of Hungary our ispáns and alispáns conduct trials concerning various cases of law against themselves at the court of that county the honor of which they hold,¹ and that because of this the lords and nobles have been defrauded of their rights to such an extent and manner that they had suffered losses and had been despoiled by the said ispáns and alispáns. And so, after relating these things, they requested from our highness that we deign to extend to them appropriate royal remedy against these procedures. Truly, because the way of law and justice so directs and the custom of our said kingdom of Hungary so prescribes, no judge or justice of our said kingdom of Hungary may be judge and advocate in one and the same case,² the said lords and nobles of our kingdom do not wish to be readily and unduly oppressed, nor to be harmed in their rights and goods by the said ispáns and alispáns; hence we, after mature deliberation, order it decreed that from now on into the future no ispán or alispán of any county is permitted or enabled to conduct trials by means of citation or otherwise against any one of our gentlemen of the realm³ in a case against himself by any allegation at the court of that county to the honor of which he has been or will be appointed or to proceed against them in a dispute. But, if the ispáns or alispáns should have or allege to have any kind of case against any one or more gentlemen of the realm in our kingdom of Hungary, they are obligated and required to sue and to proceed in the court of our highness at the court of the special royal presence, or that of the palatine, or of our judge royal, just like other litigants.⁴

¹ By this time, ispáns were often high officials, holding more than one county as a honor, while the actual administration was in the hands of their retainer, the vice-comes, Hung.: alispán.

² This legal maxim is a specific application of a principle of Roman civil law: “he who exercises jurisdiction ought not pronounce law in matters affecting himself or his household” (Ulpian [ca. A.D. 2151, Digesta Iustiniani 2.1.10). This principle was made law by an imperial constitution of A.D. 376: “no one may be a judge in a matter affecting himself” (Codex Iustinianus 3.5.1).

³ Regnicola (verbatim: inhabitant of the kingdom) was used in medieval Hungarian legal texts as the term for the enfranchised nobleman. We translate it as “gentleman of the realm.”

⁴ The specialis presentia regia, the royal court of the special presence appeared around 1337, presided over by the vice-chancellor, but only became fully institutionalized by the end of the Angevin rule. From 1453 to 1464 this court was presided over by the (arch)chancellor and passed sentences under his or the vice-chancellor’s seal. Its judges were among the first legally-trained professionals in a royal court. Abolished in the general judicial reform of 1464, its name was for a while occasionally also used for the new, united court of the personal presence. Here it is unclear, whether the king’s “personal presence” or the chancellor’s court is meant. The count palatine and the judge royal were the traditional highest courts, the former

Therefore we order you, the said ispáns and alispáns of our kingdom of Hungary, present and future, who will take notice of these presents, by our firm royal edict that from now into the future you should not presume in any way to summon our said gentlemen of the realm contrary to the intent of our previously noted royal grant in any case or article of a case against yourselves to a hearing at your said county court, nor to dare to vex or to harass them in any manner, but if you have or allege to have any suit against them, you must pursue it to judgment in the said court of our serenity in the same way as the others.⁵ We also decree that this charter be always returned to the bearer after its being read.⁶

Given at the said Pressburg, on the Thursday before the feast of St. James the Apostle, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and twenty-one, the thirty-fifth year of our reign in Hungary &c., eleventh as king of the Romans, and the first in Bohemia.

itinerant, the latter out of court with a seat in Buda.

⁵ The numerous explicit and implicit references to this decree in royal charters are listed in DRH, p. 241, n. 4. Some of them aim at widening the purview of the decree so as to include county magistrates and the ban and vice-ban of Croatia.

⁶ This clause is typical for letters patent, the form in which this decree survived.

ORDINANCE OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY
17 March 1427 A

This military ordinance regulates more systematically matters regarding the movement of troops addressed in earlier laws. It was issued by the king and his council, perhaps in preparation for the two Walachian expeditions of Sigismund later that year. (We mark the two decrees issued the same day by A and B)

MS.: Original on parchment, with remnants of the privy seal en placard; Archives of the convent of Lelesz, fasc. 47, Acta anni 1427, no. 22

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789- 1801), 1:328–7; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 10/6: 878–84; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 244–7.

LIT.: S. Kőszeghy, “Zsigmond király két honvédelmi szabályzata” [Two military ordinances of King Sigismund] Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 5 (1892): 587–91.

17 MARTII 1427 (A)

Nos Sigismundus dei gratia Romanorum rex semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex memorie commendamus tenore presentium significantes, quibus expedit universis, quod nos frequentibus querelis regnicolarum nostrorum, tam ecclesiasticorum, quam secularium super illationibus violentiarum, dampnorum et multarum incomoditatum per nostros ac prelatorum et baronum, militum et nobilium regni nostri familiares exercitualmente proficiscentes in possessionibus nostris et eorundem tempore expeditionum exercituum perpetratis assidue propulsati, cupientes super hiis de remedio condigno providere, una cum eisdem prelatis et baronibus nostris mature deliberantes de eorundem beneplacito et consilio ordinavimus, statuimus ac presenti decreto sancimus:

I. Ut quicumque exercituum victualia et res necessarias, quibus carere non possunt, videlicet panes, vinum, pabulum, fenum, ova, caseum, blada, pisces, legumina, ancas, pullos, porcellos, agnellos, butirum, carnes et similia minora violenter aut, pretio non soluto, seu non plene soluto abstulerint aut aliter in hiis dampna intulerint, requisitique non satisfecerint, contra illos homines dampnificati seu eorum domini debeant convocare duos iudices nobilium illius comitatus, in quo dampnum fieri contingit, et coram illis homines dampnificati simul cum eorum villico deponere debent iuramentum de quantitate dampni illati, ipsique iudices nobilium similiter ad eorum iuramentum, quod prestiterunt tempore electionis eorum in iudices, debent dare litteras eorum testimoniales dictis dampnificatis sub sigillis comitis illius comitatus et ipsorum iudicum nobilium, hominesque dampnificati cum eisdem litteris accedentes ad iudices regni in curiam regiam tempore, quo in aliqua die octavarum fit iudicium regni, ubi iidem iudices regni predictis litteris testimonialibus plenam fidem adhibere et dampnificatis super dampno principali in dictis litteris testimonialibus contento, necnon super omnibus expensis, laboribus et fatigiis in requisitione dictorum dampnorum factis et fiendis conscientioso moderamine prehabito litteras sententiales et perceptorias comiti illius comitatus, in quo exercitantes predicti, qui dampnum intulerunt, existunt, sub certo autentico sigillo dare debeant, vigore quarum dictus comes indilatam et plenam satisfactionem tam super dampno principali, quam super dictis expensis, fatigiis et laboribus iuxta moderamen dictorum iudicum cum rebus promptis et pecuniis aut occupatione possessionum et non cum estimatione exhibere teneatur.

II. Item quicumque res maiores, videlicet equos, boves, vestes, porcos, lardos et alias res maiores, quibus sine necessitate carere possent, abstulerint, seu domos, cellaria et scrinia rusticorum confregerint, aut vina receperint, currus onerantes ac alia similia dampna maiora intulerint, omnes tales per dampnificatos seu eorum dominos ad curiam regiam ad certas octavas in presentiam alicuius iudicum curie evocentur. Qui si ad ipsas octavas venire contempserint vel neglexerint, in ipso primo termino tamquam culpabiles reputentur et sententientur, per hoc tamen factum potentie et occupationis possessionum non incurrant, sed dampnum, quod contra eos propositum fuerit, quater appreciare et persolvere dampnificatis ipsis per iustitarios regni predictos compellantur. Si vero ad ipsas octavas venerint seu per procuratorem legitimum comparuerint, extunc dampno confesso similiter sententialiter condemnentur et ad satisfactionem compellantur, dampno vero negato iudices predicti mediantibus eorum litteris debent remittere dampnificatos ad inquisitionem comitatus, in quo dampna sunt illata, ubi exactis attestatoriis iuramentis corporalibus super eorum fassione constiterit dampnum illatum, illatores huiusmodi supradictis penis condempnentur et satisfacere modo premissis compellantur.

III. Quicumque autem maiora facinora et delicta commiserint, videlicet interfectiones hominum, oppressiones et raptus mulierum et virginum, effractiones ecclesiarum et vasorum sacrorum ac domorum nobilium, tales tribus inquisitionibus per illos, quibus iniuria huiusmodi fuerit illata, fieri procuratis, erga domos dominorum eorum ad certas octavas in curiam regiam debeant evocari rationem premissorum reddituri. Qui si comparuerint et se in talismodi illatis iniuriis innocentes fore allegaverint, tunc probatio ipsarum illatarum iniuriarum ad attestationem nobilium illius comitatus, in quo hoc patratum fuerit, committatur. Ubi autem in octava predicta non comparerent, extunc in sententia capitali eo facto convincantur; et si tales convicti reperti non fuerint vel reperiri non possent, extunc prefatus dominus eorum homagia ipsorum persolvat et de dampnis et iniuriis illatis lesi satisfacere teneatur.

IV. Item in omnibus premissis ubicunque illatores dampnorum et facinorum predictorum per passos iniuriam et dampnum eo, quod tales forte impossessionati vel ignoti, aut nimis remoti extiterint, ad evocandum inveniri non possent, sufficiat huiusmodi evocationem fieri circa habitationem baronis vel domini eorum, sub cuius nomine et banderio in huiusmodi exercitu procedebant, et idem dominus evocationem eandem ad notitiam suorum famulorum deducat.

V. Item si aliquis ex baronibus extiterit presens cum suis gentibus in exercitu et eidem contra suos familiares de aliquo dampno illato conquestum fuerit, de quo satisfacere non curaverit, extunc de eis dampnificati eorum dampna super ipsum baronem satisfacere non curantem requirendi et recuperandi habeant facultatem,

VI. Item exercitantes tempore estivo et alio, quo in campo stare possunt, teneant campestris descensus; graminum tamen atque ligna silvatica ignibus apta, similiter tempore iernali hospitia, sive iudei multi, sive pauci procedant, eisdem prohiberi et denegari non debent, et in istis exercitantes predicti a nemine debeant inquietari impediri atque molestari. Casu autem, quo in aliquo locorum graminum pastui iumentorum exercitantium necessaria non invenirentur, sed tantummodo prata et fenilia ad domos rusticorum reservata et custodita, tunc in illis iumenta exercitantium depasci possent et enutriri, antequam forent falcata et simul congregata. Postquam autem falcata fuerint, non recipiantur vi neque gratis, sed nisi pecunia condigna valoris eiusdem.

VII. Preterea pro avena vel ordeo aut siligine tempore caristie pro cubulo Budensi solvantur denarii triginta unus, tempore autem fertilitatis solvantur viginti quinque.

Item pro feno pro uno equo per diem unum et noctem solvatur unus [denarius], et non tamen substernatur fenum, sed quantum equo petitur, tantum detur.

Item pro pane, quantum potest competere et sufficere duabus personis pro uno prandio, solvatur denarius unus.

Item--- ante adventum exercitantium communiter tabernarii--- Item pro anca una solvantur denarii quinque.

Item pro pullo antiquo solvantur denarii tres, pro iuveni duo.

Pro porce[llo sol]vantur denarii quinque et demum pro agnello solvantur denarii octo.

Item pisces, legumina, carnes mactate, caseum, butirum et similia, de quibus non potest haberi ratio singularis, emantur et solvantur pretio competenti, considerata tamen temporis et loci qualitate.

Item ova pro denario octo.

Item si qui voluerint emere boves, porcos maiores, lardos, non emant aliter, quam cum bona voluntate vendentis et solvant secundum quod poterunt de pretio concordare.

VIII. Item videtur, quod in omnibus locis, in quibus sal regium potest sufficienter haberi, sit prohibitum vendi vel emi sal extraneum. Si quis contra fecerit, venditor prima vice repertus per camerarium regium toto sale privetur, secundo vero sale simul cum curru et animalibus ipsum currum vehentibus destituatur; tertio vero vel pluries personaliter detineatur et pena condigna, sicut cum camerario ipso concordare poterit, puniatur. Emptor sal amittat et insuper pretium, quod pro sale dederat, camerario regio secundario persolvat.

IX Item, quod de sale regio tamdiu, quousque ducitur sub nomine regio, nullus audeat exigere tributum in terra aut in aqua, nisi qui possent probare se in hoc ius habere speciale. Similiter fiat de sale dato exercituantibus, donec eorum nominibus ducitur et venditur.

Postquam autem huiusmodi sal sive de camera regia, sive ab exercituantibus ad mercaturam devenerit, mercatores ipsi videntur teneri ad tributum. Quicumque autem tributariorum de huiusmodi sale regio vel exercituantium tributum exegerit, et camerarius regius domino illius tributarii intimaverit, teneatur idem dominus dictum tributarium assignare dicto camerario ad satisfactionem ipsi camerario iuxta eius voluntatem adstringendum presentium litterarum nostrarum privilegialium testimonio mediante, Datum Brassouie, feria secunda proxima post dominicam Reminiscere, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo vigesimo septimo, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. XL, Romanorum XVII et Bohemie septimo.

17 MARCH 1427 (A)

We Sigismund, by the grace of God ever august king of the Romans and king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., wish to be remembered by notifying all to whom it may concern through the words of these presents that, induced by the complaints of our gentlemen of the realm, both clerical and lay, about the violent acts, damages, and many kinds of impositions committed by the armed retainers mobilized for campaigns by us, the prelates, barons, knights, and nobles of the kingdom on our estates and theirs while they go to war,¹ and wishing to remedy these by suitable means, after mature deliberation with the same prelates and barons and following their pleasure and counsel, we have ordained, established, and decreed the following.

1. If any soldier takes by force or without payment or without full payment or causes any kind of damage in victuals and other necessities without which one cannot live, such as bread, wine, fodder, hay, eggs, cheese, grain, fish, vegetables, geese, poultry, piglets, lambs, butter, meat, and similar things of lesser value, and does not offer satisfaction to the one demanding payment, then against him the persons who have suffered loss or their lords ought to call upon two noble magistrates of that county in which the damage was done and the plaintiffs shall swear, publicly together with their reeve, an oath on the amount of the damage incurred. The noble magistrates, according to the oath that they swore at their election to the office,² ought to give the said plaintiffs a letter of evidence under their own and of the county ispán's seals, and then these plaintiffs ought to appear with this letter before the judges of the royal court when on an octavial term³ royal court is held. At that place and time the judges must give full credence to the said letter of evidence, and after conscientious examination issue a letter of judgment and order⁴ on the damage contained in the said letter of evidence as well as on the expenses, exertions, and labors spent and to be spent by the plaintiffs for the recovery of their losses, under their distinct authentic seal,⁵ addressed to

¹ Damages caused by the military were a recurrent problem of the time, treated more than once in the laws; see 12 March 1435/II: 6–8 and Prop: 3

² The oath taken by the noble magistrates at their accession was probably as old as their institution. As early as the mid-fourteenth century, the magistrates were occasionally called iudices iurati; see Gyula Gábor A megyei intézmény kialakulása és működése Nagy Lajos alatt [Development and functions of the county under Louis the Great] (Budapest: Grill, 1908), p. 85. Cf. also 8 March 1435/I:1

³ Octavial courts (octava) refer to the session of royal courts of justice; of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times.

⁴ Litterae testimoniales (or fassionales) were issued as proof of a recognizance, that is a deposition before a place of authentication (see below n. 5); litterae sententiales et praeceptoriae, was the legal record of final sentence in a lawsuit.

⁵ A seal was called authentic if it had legal force. Documents sealed in this way were accepted as evidence in lawsuits. Besides the royal seals, those of the high justices of the realm (the count palatine, the judge royal, the Master of the Treasury and the bans), and, of course, the seals of the places of authentication, were regarded "authentic." Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, the ispán of that county where the soldiers who had caused the damages are to be found. On the strength of this letter, the ispán is obligated to secure immediate and full satisfaction not only for the main damage but also for the aforementioned expenses, exertions, and labors according to the decision of the said judges, in kind or in money or by institution to estates, but not in the amount of the estimated value.⁶

2. Then, those who will have taken major things, such as horses, cattle, clothes, pigs, bacon, and other valuable items without which one can survive, or who destroy the houses, cellars, and barns of the peasants or seize all their wine or loaded carts or cause similar major damage, should be cited by the plaintiffs or their lords to the royal court at an octavial session to the bench of a judge. Those who neglect or avoid appearing at that octave are to be judged at that first term as guilty and to be sentenced. Whereas they should not incur the punishment of confiscation of their estates for this act of might, they should nonetheless be forced by the said royal justices to repay these damaged persons four times the estimated value of the damage which was charged against them.⁷ If, however, they appear personally or through legal counsel at that octavial court and admit the damage, they should also be duly sentenced and compelled to repair the damage. However, if they deny the damage, the said judges ought to send the plaintiffs with their letters to the county where the damage occurred, and there, when the damage inflicted has been testified to by statements sworn on corporeal oath,⁸ the accused must be condemned to the aforesaid punishment and must repair the damages in the said manner.

Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66-73

⁶ Estimation was an artificial means of assessing property, mobile and immobile, in course of a legal procedure. It was not made on current prices but according to a traditional key, and the amount given in a special “mark of estimation” remained far below the real value. This law may have been intended to assure that damages were repaired in their actual worth. Another possible reading (by Erik Fügedi) implies that the measure was to prohibit the practice of pledging cattle or land for major debts, instead of paying them in money or valuable objects. Such pledges were often defined not by amount but generally as in condigna estimatione. On the other hand, the text allows payment by “occupation of estates” and there is evidence for both land and cattle being pledged under Sigismund; see, e.g., Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1954–), vol. 2, nos. 3421, 5275, 6996.

⁷ The penalty of fourfold damages may be traced to Roman civil law. However, not in remedies for damages in property (for which twofold damages were the normal penalty), but for outright theft (furtum manifestum), see Dig. 47.2, esp. 47.2.89; Codex Iustinianus 6.2.11 and 18.

⁸ Iuramentum corporale: an oath in which the number of oath helpers depended on the amount of the damage. Usually for each Mark of damage (in value of estimation, see note above) one person’s oath was

3. Those, however, who have committed major crimes and delicts, such as the killing of people, maltreatment or rape of women and virgins, robbery of churches or of houses of nobles, or theft of sacred vessels, are to be summoned from the houses of the plaintiffs lords to an octavial session at the royal court after a threefold inquiry⁹ by those who have suffered such damage in order to respond to the complaints. If they appear and claim to be innocent of the harm caused, then the proof of these inflicted damages ought to be requested from the nobles of that county where the damage was committed. If, however, they do not appear at the said octave, they should incur capital sentence for that reason.¹⁰ If these culprits have not been or cannot be found, then the said lords of theirs have to pay their composition¹¹ and make satisfaction for the damages and injuries caused by them.

4. Then, whenever regarding the aforesaid matters those who have suffered the damages and injuries cannot find those who caused the damages or inflicted the injuries in order to summon them, either because of being unpropertied or unknown or living too far away, it will suffice to deliver such a summons to the residence of that baron or lord under whose banner and name they serve in the army,¹² and that lord has to bring the summons to the notice of his retainers.

5. Then, if any baron who is among his men at arms¹³ and does not take care that satisfaction be given by a retainer of his when he is requested to do so by someone who had suffered damage, required. Cf. Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899, p. 316.

⁹ Threefold inquiry: an inquiry made in the same case by three different authorities in order to make the evidence weightier. It was carried out by the county in question and by two loca credibilia in the neighborhood. See Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet, p. 291.

¹⁰ Capital sentence. (sententia capitalis) meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment. The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

¹¹ Composition (compositio), or man price (homagium) was a sum of money (in earlier laws frequently expressed in cattle or other valuables), which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. The amount was based on the victim's or the culprit's social and legal status and the nature of the crime. According to the Tripartitum., the man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to a lesser extent the fine of the tongue.

¹² Up to the end of Sigismund's rule, the prelates and barons of the realm alone were entitled to use a banner (vexillum or banderium) as their sign when leading their retainers and other soldiers to war. Other nobles, however rich, were supposed to join the king's "banner"; hence the command of a banderium became the symbol of baronial status.

¹³ I.e. when the lord took part on the campaign in person. On many occasions the lord's banderium was led by his deputy.

then these damaged parties should have the right to demand and claim their damages from that very baron who failed to satisfy them.

6. During summer or such time when they can stay in the open, the army should camp in the fields, but they, be they many or few, ought not to be denied straw and firewood from the forest nor housing in wintertime, and in these matters the soldiers should be neither molested nor harassed or hindered. Where there is not enough pasture for the beasts of the army beyond those meadows and pastures which are necessary and reserved for the peasant households, then the animals of the army should graze and feed only before the meadows are mown and the hay gathered. After the mowing, no hay must be taken by force or without payment, but only for the proper price according to its value.

7. Furthermore: for oats, rye, and barley, for a cubulus of Buda ¹⁴in lean years 31 pennies are to be paid; in fertile years, 25 pennies.

Then, for hay for a horse for a day and a night, one penny, but the hay should not be strewn under the horse; only as much hay should be given as the horse needs.

Then, for bread, sufficient for two people to eat for one meal, one penny is due. Then, before the army's arrival, tavern keepers ...¹⁵

For a goose, 5 pennies are to be paid.

For an old hen, 3 pennies are due; for a young chicken, 2 pennies.

For a piglet, 5 pennies, and furthermore, for a lamb, 8 pennies are to be paid.

Then, fish, vegetables, cut meat, cheese, butter, and suchlike which cannot be listed singularly, should be bought and paid for at a suitable price, always considering the conditions of time and place.

Then, for a penny, eight eggs.

Then, if anyone wishes to buy cattle, fat pigs, or bacon, he should not do so without the good will of the seller and should pay the price agreed to.

8. Then, it seems best that in places where a sufficient amount of royal salt can be acquired, the buying and selling of foreign salt be prohibited. If someone acts against this, the seller at first offense should be deprived by the royal chamberlain of all the salt, at the second time also of the cart and the animal drawing the cart, at the third time or thereafter, he should be personally arrested and punished by suitable punishment according to his bargain with the chamberlain. The buyer should lose the salt and in addition should pay as much to the royal chamberlain as he paid for the salt.¹⁶

¹⁴ The measure of grain is given in cubulus Budensis—according to Emma Lederer (“Régi magyar űrmértékek” [Old Hungarian measures of volume] Századok 57, 1923/24, 135–42) ca. 80 litres—consistent with Sigismund’s efforts to make the measures of Buda compulsory for the whole land (see 15 April 1405/I:1), although the “cubulus of Kassa” was the most widely used one. The difference between the two cannot be ascertained any more precisely.

¹⁵ About five words are missing.

9. Then, no one should dare to demand toll for the king's salt wherever it is shipped in the king's name, on water or land, unless he can prove that he has a special right to do so. The same should hold for the salt of the soldiers¹⁷ as long as it is transported or sold in their name. Once, however, such salt of either the royal chamber or the soldiers' passes into the hands of a merchant, the merchants are considered liable for the toll on it. Wherever a toll-collector demands toll from such royal or military salt, and the chamberlain reports this to the master of the toll-collector, the master of the said toll has to hand over that toll-collector to the chamberlain in order to satisfy the chamberlain, according to his demands, by the force of this, our present letter of privilege.

Given at Braşov, on Monday following the Sunday of Remembrance, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred twenty-seven, in the fortieth year of our reign in Hungary etc., the seventeenth as king of the Romans, and the seventh year of our reign in Bohemia.

¹⁶ Import of foreign salt had been prohibited many times before, most recently in 14 April 1405/I: 20. On the issue in general, see István Draskóczy, Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

¹⁷ Professional soldiers were paid in cubes of salt; hence these articles here.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY
17 March 1427 B

This short decree introduced a new money of change which remained standard for decades. It goes back to the Propositio 1415/7 sent by Sigismund to the royal council. Why did it take 10 years to codify the monetary reform is not known. Although the surviving original lacks the usual privilegial form, it opens with full royal style and the text refers to a formal royal command. Since the contents also treat matters of national importance, it may count, as a law of the land. (We mark the two decrees issued the same day A and B)

MS.: Paper original, sealed on the dorso with the great seal of the realm, en placard; City Archives, Cluj (Romania) M, 54.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Elek Jakab, Oklevéltár Kolozsvár története a középkorban I. kötetéhez [Diplomatarium to the First Volume of the History of Kolozsvár/Cluj in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: Egyetemi Nyomda, 1870), pp. 164–66; Franz Zimmermann and Karl Werner, Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenburgen. (Hermannstadt: Michaelis, 1882).4: 275-7.; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, [=DRH] (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978), pp. 248–50.

LIT.: Lajos Huszár, A budai pénzverés története a középkorban [History of the minting of Buda in the Middle Ages] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1958), pp. 69–81; Márton Gyöngyössi, “Coinage and Financial Administration (1387–1526),” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308

Sigismundus dei gratia Romanorum rex semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Servie, Galicie, Lodomerie, Comanie Bulgarieque rex, marchio Brandenburgensis et Lucernburgensis heres necnon Barbara d[ei] gratia regnorum predictorum regina omnibus Christi fidelibus presentibus pariter et futuris presens scriptum inspecturis salutem in omnium salvatore. Cum inter ceteras animi nostri curas, quibus ad profectum regnorum nostrorum utilitatemque nobis subiectorum meditatione continua distrahimur, mente volveremus quemadmodum et ipsorum regnorum nostrorum expeditionibus et diversis statibus eorundem subditorum nostrorum in cusione, cursu et consuetudine monete tam auree quam argenteae utiliore et fructuosiore dispositionem ederemus, habito cum prelati et baronibus nostris, quorum sigilla una cum nostris pro maiori evidentia consensus eorundem presentibus sunt appensa, maturo superinde consilio, provida deliberatione precedente ordinationes, statuta, edictalia scripta infra contenta decrevimus, sanximus et decernimus tam effectui mancipanda quam futuris temporibus continue firmitate servanda.

I. Ordinavimus itaque statuimus, sanximus et conclusimus monetam auream nostre maiestatis in eisdem qualitate, quantitate et gradibus auri, quibus hucusque cusa est et nunc cuditur, de cetero cudi et remanere, monetam vero argenteam maiorem a modo in antea cudi et fabricari de argento finissimo in tanta quantitate, quod de una marca puri argenti exeant denarii sexcenti, quorum centum currant pro floreno auri. Minores vero denarii vulgariter filler vocati camare nostre regie hactenus cusi—quousque durabunt—remaneant et currant nec cudantur de cetero plures de istis vel alii fillerii, nisi tandem turn per nos ac prelatos et barones nostros predictos pro nostra et regni nostri utilitate de cusione minoris nostre monete aliud cogitatum extiterit et provisum.

II. Quocirca ex vigore presentis decreti et sanxionis nostre maiestatis de prelatorum et baronum nostrorum predictorum unanimi voluntate, consensu et ordinatione firmissimo sub precepto per universos comitatus et provincias ac loca dicti regni nostri insinuari, publicari et proclamari mandamus, ut omnes regnicole et alii quivis homines in regno nostro commorantes falsos denarios minores seu fillerios, quorum admixtione vera moneta camare nostre regie hactenus extitit et nunc est depravata, usque ad festum sancti Jacobi apostoli proxime venturum prorsus abicere, anichilare et abolire teneantur, nullatenus de cetero eosdem apud se detinere presumendo. Volentes et eodem edicto committentes, ut infra ipsum terminum iudices presidentes et rectores curie, nundinarum et fororum omnes falsos obulos seu fillerios necnon officiales nostri regales ad id deputandi in locis et foris suarum iurisdictionum diligenter requiri ac inventos incidi et destrui facere te[neantur] sicque incisos et destructos eis, apud quos inventi fuerint, nec hoc cupiditati imputetur, restitui faciant et resignari, Lapso autem huiusmodi termino festi sancti Jacobi apostoli, si quis cum moneta omnino falsa segregata videlicet a moneta vera camare nostre regalis ad numerum adminus duodecim denariorum se extendentem fuerit deprehensus, talis pena delatoris false monete puniatur. Quicumque vero falsam monetam intermixtam bone monete camare regie usque ad decimum, puta inter centum fillerios decem falsos aut in centum florenis verorum denariorum decem florenos falsorum, deferre comperti fuerint, tales in personis detineri ac pena falsificantium monetam puniri debeant prenotata. Denarii vero falsi sic inventi modo premissis aboleantur. Moneta autem falsa infra pretaxatum numerum, ratione cuius scilicet delator persone aut, rerum subire non merebatur penam, similiter ab eisdem iudicibus et presidentibus nundinarum, fororum et civitatum ac officialibus nostris requiratur, incidatur et aboleatur.

III. Statuimus insuper et sanximus, quod quicumque homines regnicole vel forenses—cuiuscumque status et conditionis existant—in tantam malitiam suam temeritatem extenderint, quod predictam monetam nostram novam argenteam vel aliam quamlibet contra veteres et varias nostre maiestatis ac dictorum prelatorum et baronum nostrorum ordinationes et inhibitiones radere vel quomodolibet incidendo minorare aut rasam vel minutam defferre seu cum talei quovismodo mercari vel negotiari presumpserint, pena falsorum denariorum plectantur prenotata eandemque penam subire volentes et decernentes omnes segregatores, exponderatores et electores graviorum denariorum a levioribus huiusmodique ingenio cursum et valorem dicte monete nostre vilificare satagentes.

IV. Item statuimus, ordinavimus pro statutoque et sanxione irrevocabili habere volumus et reliquimus, ut marca puri argenti Budensis ponderis valeat quingentos et quinquaginta denarios monete maioris supradicte, quorum scilicet centum currant pro floreno auri.

V. Preterea statuimus, sanximus et ordinavimus, quod nemo in mercaturis, emptionibus, venditionibus et commutationibus presumat procedere et negotiari cum auro vel argento non monetato, sed totum aurum et argentum comportetur ad camaram monete nostre regalis vendaturque ibi pretio suo modo premissis limitato. Mercantie vero quelibet exerceantur et fiant cum moneta regali vel commutationibus aliarum rerum preter aurum et argentum. Si quis autem contrarium fecerit, emptor tam aurum et argentum non monetatum modo premissis in huiusmodi negotiationibus expositum quam alia cuncta bona sua tunc secum habita et reperta, venditor vero rem venalem pro huiusmodi auro et argento non monetato expositam amittat ipso facto.

VI. Ad hec unanimi consensu et voluntate prelatorum et baronum predictorum sanximus et statuendo commisimus perpetue firmiter observanda, ut nullus omnino hominum regnicola vel forensis—cuiuscumque status et, conditionis existat—aurum et argentum necnon pecuniam auream et argenteam de regnis nostris corone nostre Hungarie suppositis sub pena capitis ac perditionis omnium bonorum suorum mobilium et immobilium ubilibet habitum audeat exportare ultra rationabiles et condecetes expensas considerata dignitate et conditione personarum., prelatis tamen et baronibus ac nobilib[us et] ceteris regnicolis nostris secundum cuiuslibet conditionis facultatem pro clenodiis et i[ab]oribus propriis aurum et argentum emenda ac ubi maluerint purgari, fabricari et laborari faciendi [libe]ra facultate remanente vigore et testimonio presentium literarumstrarum privilegialiurn mediante.

Datum Brassovie feria secunda proxima post dominicam Reminiscere anno dornini M^{mo} CCCC^{mo} XX^{mo} VII^{mo}, regno[rum] nostrum anno Hungarie etc. XL^{mo} Romanorum et Bohemie septimo.

17 MARCH 1427 (B)

Sigismund, by the grace of God ever august king of the Romans, king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria, margrave of Brandenburg and heir of Luxembourg,¹ as well as Barbara, by the grace of God queen of the above kingdoms,² to all Christ's faithful, present and future, who will read these presents, greetings in the Savior of all. When, among other concerns of our mind with which we are occupied in steady contemplation of the improvement of our kingdoms and the advantage of our subjects, we turn our thoughts to the question of how we could issue a more useful and fruitful regimen regarding the minting, circulation, and usage of money, both gold and silver, for the enterprises of our kingdoms as well as for the diverse status of our subjects in them, after having held mature counsel with our prelates and barons, whose seals are appended along with ours for greater evidence of their consent to these presents,³ we have decreed, ordered, and established, after having considered the preceding consultations, that the ordinations, statutes, and edicts set out below should be immediately observed and kept with perpetual force in the future.

1. We have therefore ordained, determined, ordered, and decided that the gold coinage of our majesty should be minted and should remain further in the same quality, quantity, and fineness of gold in which it has been minted until now and is still being minted; and the larger silver coinage should be minted and produced henceforth from the finest silver in such quantity that six hundred pennies should be minted from a mark of pure silver, and one hundred of these should equal one gold florin. The smaller pennies of our royal chamber, commonly called fillér, thus far minted should remain in circulation as long as they last, but neither more nor different fillérs must be

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources,” in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45. Sigismund added his hereditary titles to it.

² This is the only known law issued together by the king and his second wife, Barbara, countess of Cilje, perhaps because of her being the mistress of the mining towns of northern Hungary thus closely involved in matters of mining and minting.

³ Obviously, there was a parchment original with several seals pendant, now lost. The practice of appending the seals of magnates began in the fourteenth century, first only on international treaties, later on other important documents as well. For its origins in the Angevin age, see Pál Engel, “Nagy Lajos bárói” [Barons of Louis the Great], Történelmi Szemle 28 (1985): 393–4, 410–3 minted, unless we and our said prelates and barons will have considered and decided otherwise in regard to the minting of our smaller money for our profit and for that of our kingdom.⁴

2. Therefore, by the power of the present decree and order of our majesty following the unanimous will, consent, and command of our said prelates and barons, we order by most strict ordinance that it be made known, published, and proclaimed in all counties, provinces, and places of our said kingdom that all residents⁵ and any others sojourning in our kingdom are required to discard, destroy, and abolish forged small pennies or fillérs by the next coming feast of St. James the Apostle,⁶ and no one should dare to keep any of them for himself, since mixing them has caused and is still causing the devaluation of the true money of our royal chamber. We also wish and command by the same edict that within this time limit the presiding judges and the supervisors of the towns, markets, and fairs,⁷ as well as our royal officials appointed to this in the places and areas of their jurisdiction are required to have all forged obuli or *fillérs*⁸ diligently searched out and to cut up and destroy those found; and in addition, they must see to it, lest they be accused of cupidity, that the cut up, and destroyed coins be restored and returned to those in whose possession they were found. After the expiration of this time limit of the feast of St. James the Apostle, anyone who is caught at all with forged money set aside from the true money of our royal chamber in the amount of at least twelve pennies, will be punished with the penalty of a counterfeiter of forged money. Whoever is found guilty of mixing forged money with good money of our royal chamber up to one tenth, that is, ten forged fillérs among one hundred, or ten florins of forged pennies among one hundred florins of true pennies, must be detained in person and punished with the penalty for forgers of money as noted above.⁹ Forged pennies found in the above manner must be destroyed. Forged money of less than the above quantity, for which the culprit does not merit undergoing the penalty of person or property, must similarly be confiscated, cut up and destroyed by the said judges and supervisors of markets, fairs, and towns or by our officials.

3. We have laid down and ordered furthermore that any resident or foreigner, of whatever station or condition, who would extend their boldness to such evil that they dare to clip or diminish by

⁴ Counting the silver mark as the Mark of Buda (245.5 g), the new “larger silver pennies” contained 0.4 g silver. Although their face value established by this decree was far above their intrinsic value in terms of the current price of silver (see below, n. 9), they remained in circulation for the rest of Sigismund’s reign

⁵ In this text regnicolae is consistently used in contrast to foreigners and sojourners in the kingdom; “residents” is, therefore, the proper translation in this decree, while otherwise the word was used to refer to the enfranchised nobility of the realm and we translate it as “gentleman of the realm.”

⁶ 25 July 1427.

⁷ The editors of DRH emended here curia to civitas on the basis of the second mention of these office-holders, in same article, below.

⁸ Obulus was the name used for the smallest coins since the early fourteenth century. In the Angevin period obuli had the value of half a penny, but after the accession of Sigismund they rapidly lost value, which was reflected in their Hungarian name fillér, derived from German Viertel (“quarter”), meaning a farthing.

⁹ Counterfeiting money counted as one of the major felonies, called “charge of infidelity” and could be punished by capital sentence.

cutting our said new silver or any other money, have in their hands clipped or diminished money, or conduct commerce or business with such, contrary to old and various orders and prohibitions of our majesty and of our said prelates and barons, should be punished with the penalty noted above of counterfeit pennies; and we wish and decree that all those who separate, weigh out, and select heavier pennies from lighter ones and by this cunning attempt to reduce the circulation and to cheapen the value of our said money should suffer the same penalty.

4. Then, we have laid down and ordered and we wish and leave it to be held by irrevocable statute and order that a mark of pure silver of Buda weight should be worth five hundred and fifty pennies of the larger money mentioned above, namely that of which one hundred equals a gold florin.¹⁰

5. Furthermore, we have laid down, decreed, and ordered that in commerce, buying, selling, and exchange no one should dare to proceed or to negotiate with gold or silver that is not coined, but should bring all gold and silver to the chamber of our royal mint where it must be sold for the price fixed in the preceding manner.¹¹ All business affairs must be conducted and take place with royal money or by the exchange of other goods besides gold and silver. If anyone should do otherwise, the buyer should lose the unminted gold and silver mentioned above used in any such business, as well as all other goods in his possession and found with him, and the seller should for the same reason lose the goods exposed for sale for unminted gold and silver in the same way.

6. With the unanimous consent of the said prelates and barons and their agreement to all this, we have ordered and committed it to be laid down firmly so that it be observed perpetually that no resident or foreigner at all — whatever station and condition he might be — should dare to export gold and silver as well as gold and silver money from our kingdoms subject to our crown of Hungary, beyond reasonable and proper expenses appropriate to the dignity and worth of the person, under the capital penalty and the loss of all his movable and immovable goods held anywhere; however, for our prelates, barons, nobles, and other gentlemen of the realm, according to the means of their respective stations, the free allowance should remain valid by the force and witness of our present privilege to cause gold and silver to be used for their own jewels and works (of art) or, if they prefer, to purify, fabricate, and work with gold and silver.

Given at Braşov on Monday following the Sunday of Remembrance, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and twenty-seven, the fortieth year of our reign in Hungary, etc., the seventeenth as king of the Romans, and the seventh in Bohemia.

¹⁰ This price setting corresponds to a 1:12.5 ratio between gold and silver, 5.5 florins (=19.5 gold) being exchanged to a mark of 245.5 gold. The real price of silver in terms of Buda Mark around this time was, however, 3.2 florins, i.e., the ratio was rather 1:21.

¹¹ The export of unminted gold and silver was prohibited long before, see, e.g. the Cameral contract of 1342: 12, DRH p. 133.

KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY'S PROPOSITIONS ON DEFENSE OF C. 1432/1433

Very few royal proposals for discussion at diets or royal council meetings have come down to us from the Middle Ages. The Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978) [=DRH] contains, three: a brief one from Sigismund, dated ca. 1415/17 (pp. 397–404), and a short document from Ladislas V from ca. 1454. (pp. 431–34). We decided to include the the two Sigismundians, for they served clearly as a basis of decretal. The one from 1432/3 led to the one of 12 March 1435/II and was referred to as “King Sigismund’s Register” (see art. 6) as late as 1518.

The surviving copies are not dated, but the contents allow us to conjecture a fairly exact date. Sigismund refers to the loss of Trnava, which was captured by the Hussites around 24 June 1432; it must have taken some time for the news to reach the king and emperor who was at that time detained in Siena. From there Sigismund sent orders for a campaign against the Venetians on 28 October 1432, but revoked it, having made a truce with the Signoria, on 21 January 1433. Actually, in the latter command to Ladislas of Kanizsa, Sigismund refers to “other dispositions sent to you,” which most likely mean the present military arrangement, for he still expects a war in Friuli, but expresses hope to avoid it (art. 23). These and other minor indications speak for a dating “between November 1432 and 20 January 1433,” as was already proposed by Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 1: 350, 361).

Two of the sixteenth-century codices which contain this “Register” also contain a slightly different list of banderia, augmenting art. 21–22 of the ordinance. They seem to have been drawn up after the death of Sigismund, as their preface suggests, but before the mid-sixteenth century, when they were copied into three manuscript collections of legal texts. The heading runs:

In the time of king Sigismund of Hungary, who was also emperor of the Romans, the kingdom of Hungary had many enemies from different lands, and so because of this the king, with the counsel of his lords and the gentlemen of the realm, has divided all his people and those of the lords gentlemen of the realm, who were able to go on campaign from the kingdom, in the following order... .

The textual transmission of this list (see DRH, pp. 425–30) must have been different from that of the Propositions. The two texts are included in the codices at entirely different places; the later list is also contained in a codex from 1588, while it is missing from one that has the Register. We took the liberty of adding the data contained in that list to the English translation of the propositions, in brackets, because they usually clarify the size of military units assigned to the different borders. In the rare cases where the list does not contain a region or person mentioned in the Register, a note refers to this fact; persons not mentioned in the Register but in the list appear in brackets.

MSS.: No original survived; copies are in Cod. Festetich (OSzK Fol. Lat. 44355) pp. 217–31 and 391–95; Cod. Debrecen (11 pp. unnumbered); Cod. Nádasdy (Budapest University Library, Cod. G 39) foll. 190v–92v, list only. It was also copied into the now lost Cod. Szapáry.

EDD. Kovachich, Supplementum 1: 374–441 (from the Cod. Szapáry); Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818), pp. 416–40 (list only); DRH, pp. 405–30.

LIT: Kovachich, Supplementum 1: 348 sqq.; S. Kőszeghy, “Zsigmond király két honvédelmi szabályzata” [Two military ordinances of King Sigismund] Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 5 (1892): pp. 592–608; József Deér, “Zsigmond király honvédelmi politikája” [Defense policies of King Sigismund], Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 37 (1936): 1–57, 169–202, there: pp. 15–16, 25–30, 34.

CIRCA MODUM ET FORMAM DEFENSIONIS TOTIUS REGNI HUNGARIE CONTRA OMNES INIMICOS EX QUACUNQUE PARTE IPSUM REGNUM INSULTANTES NOTATA SUNT INFRASCRIPTA.

I. Quia ex regni Hungarie ab antiquo observata lege et consuetudine debitum fuit, ut ultra defensionem, quam rex et regina ac prelati ecclesiarum et viri ecclesiastici ipsius regni de regiis et reginalibus ac ecclesiarum proventibus pro conservatione regni eiusdem et confiniorum suorum ex omni parte facere tenentur, etiam universitas regnicolarum nobilium et possessionatorum pro huiusmodi defensione confiniorum regni contra omnes inimicos regnum ipsum insultantes in generali exercitu regni universaliter proficisci tenetur; item quia etiam rex Hungarie utitur ultra titulum regni Hungarie horum regnorum titulis, videlicet Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Cumanie et Bulgarie, que scilicet regna sunt ab antiquo eidem regno Hungarie incorporata, et ad horum cuiuslibet conservationem et confiniorum defensionem per regem, reginam, prelatos, viros ecclesiasticos et communitatem nobilium et possessionatorum hominum necessario semper est intelligendum, videtur itaque regie maiestati, quod domini prelati et barones in unum locum et ad certum terminum facerent generalem convocationem et aliquos de quolibet comitatu totius regni advocarent, cum quibus habito tractatu declarent per expressum de locis et terminis per totum circuitum regni, usque quem scilicet locum et terminum, ac quamdiu pro regni defensione contra inimicos communitatis regnicolarum generalis exercitus deberet, sicut tenetur, ingruente necessitate proficisci atque stare.

II. Item quia precedentia gesta generalis exercitus communitatis regnicolarum manifestam prebuerint experientiam generalis utilitatis, qualis profectus provenerit ex generali exercitu regnicolarum circa defensionem et conservationem regni, cum alii ex eisdem plurimi aut paupertate aut senio aut alia impotentia constricti potius baculis, quam armis fulciti verius mendicitati, quam militie actu vacaverunt, disponendum ergo esset et providendum, quod hi, qui irent pro defensione regni, non essent inermes, sed haberent saltem arcus et alia arma, quibus pro defensione regni ad offensam hostium se exponere possint. Videtur utilius, quod de quolibet comitatu mitterentur certo numero pharetrarii equestres secundum facultatem cuiuslibet comitatus, et ab huiusmodi pharetrariorum assignatione nullus nobilium se excusare et abstrahere possit, sed quilibet nobilis in illo comitatu, in quo possessionem habet, teneatur communiter cum communitate tale onus portare. Ita videlicet, quod videtur maiestati regie, ut in relevationem oneris pauperum, senum, orphanorum viduarum nobilium ac possessionatorum cuiuslibet comitatus ipsis regni, ut de quolibet comitatu certi numeri equestres pharetrarii bene valentes pro huiusmodi defensione confiniorum darentur et mitti deberent pro temporis necessitate; sic et ut pauperes nobiles, orphani et vidue non aggravarentur, ut per singula capita secundum regni consuetudinem proficiscerentur, sed ut corripitarentur tanti secundum eorum facultatem, quanti ex eis communi expensarum contributorie unum hominem pharetrarium equestrem mittere possent. De nobilibus autem jobagiones habentibus fieret in quolibet comitatu per nobilium communitatem certa limitatio secundum facultatem eorundem, quanti homines mitti deberent ab eisdem, et sic hominibus, quos tam pauperes nobiles, quam etiam nobiles possessiones habentes dare debent, simul computatis videretur, quanti homines de quolibet comitatu ad huiusmodi exercitum mitti possint, et quod omnes tales ad exercitum ire debentes proficiscerentur sub conductu proprii comitis provincialis, sicuti fuit antiquitus consuetum, prout super hoc etiam capi potest exemplum et informatio de gestis specialiter regis Salamonis, Geysse ducis et de comite Vid Bachiensi et Jan comite Soproniensi, qui in expeditionibus eorundem regis et ducis contra Runos et Bissenos circa Nandoralbam cum Bachiensi et Soproniensi militarunt.

III. Item videretur etiam disponendum sub gravibus penis, quod exercituantes, sive sint regis, sive regine, sive prelatorum vel baronum, aut generalis exercitus regni, dum et quandocunque ad exercitum se profecturos levabunt, neminem in suo transitu vel reditu deberent damnificare, quia sepe regnum ab huiusmodi exercituantibus plus offenditur et damnificatur, quam ab inimicis.

IV. Item quod regia maiestas non nunciat eis talismodi dispositionem faciendum ex eo, quod aliquam novam dispositionem in eorum medium introduceret vel ipsos aggravaret, sed ideo, quia, ut apparet sue maiestati, ex tali dispositione multo maior utilitas et profectus regno Hungarie provenient, et quamvis isto modo numerus exercituantium esset minor, quam si tota communitas per singula capita insurgeret, tamen multo plures utilitates inde regno possunt provenire, et talismodi exercitatio non propter quascunque leves causas insurgere debeat, sed solummodo tunc, cum tam magna potentia inimicorum regnum Hungarie vellet invadere aut ei insultare, cui dominus rex cum suo exercitu proprio nequaquam resistere valeret.

V. Item quia communitas regni Hungarie solet allegare, quod dum in generali exercitu contra inimicorum insultus insurrexerit, non vult amplius circa metas seu confinia regni stare, quam per quindecim dies, ideo videtur maiestati regie, ut si modo premissis per ipsam communitatem nobilium et possessionatorum huminum dicti equestres ex eorum medio pro exercitu generali fuerint deputati, contra quod tunc esset disponendum, quod huiusmodi equestres in metis illis, que iuxta pretacta scripta per communitatem nobilium declarabuntur seu limitabuntur, non tantummodo per dies quindecim contra inimicorum insultus stare deberent, sed tamdiu, quousque domino regi, si ipse in tali exercitu presens foret, vel capitaneis et ductoribus exercituum sua maiestate absente congruum et necessarium fore videtur, deberent permanere. Et videtur maiestati regie, quod premissa, sicut scripta sunt, disponantur in alleviationem oneris pauperum nobilium, qui sunt impotentes ad exercituandum; teneantur secundum antiquam regni consuetudinem sic et taliter equis et armis decentibus apti et fulciti in exercitum accedere aut suos mittere, ut non sint sic inermes, sicut preteritis temporibus fuerunt, quia aliter nihil boni eveniret ex talium exercituatione, sicut et alias de hoc sufficienter fuit expertum.

VI. Ut autem ad disponenda premissa consensu nobilium et possessionatorum hominum cuiuslibet comitatus accedente facilius et habilior modus habeatur, videtur, quod etiam pretacta ad quemlibet comitatum sint pro informatione in eodem existentium intimanda, ut in quolibet comitatu congregentur in unum propter habendam notitiam eis intimatorum et propter deliberare, si quid melius disponendum eis videbitur in premissis, ut cum sic deliberata eorum intentione aliquos ex eis instructos possint ad congregationem prelatorum et baronum destinare. Et ut premissa omnia ad notitiam communitatis cuiuslibet comitatus deduci possint, vult et mandat maiestas regia per vicecancellarium maioris sigilli sui regii ad quemlibet comitatum copiam huius registri de verbo ad verbum scriptam pro informatione communitatis cuiuslibet comitatus destinare simul cum litteris eiusdem maiestatis tenorem littere sue hinc illac destinate continentibus pro maiori certitudine voluntatis dicte maiestatis.

VII. Item videretur regie maiestati, quod si aliqui nobiles a rege vel regina, prelatis, baronibus, viris ecclesiasticis seu aliis quibuscunque essent stipendiati vel haberent officiolum, tunc horum nullus propter servitia dominorum suorum ab exercituatione, quam ratione possessionum suarum facere debet, excusatus seu supportatus haberetur, sed pro se, ut disponderetur per communitatem comitatus, ratione possessionum suarum mittere teneretur, qui non secum, sed cum generali exercitu regnicolarum proficisceretur, ut sic quilibet ratione possessionum suarum cum communitate onus portaret.

VIII. Item videtur etiam disponendum, quantum pro una lancea et pharetrario equestri per regem, reginam, prelatos, barones et alios quoscunque exercituantibus stipendiariis solvi debeat, non tantum ad dies, sed ad unam integram exercituationem, quia aliquando breviori tempore, et aliquando longiori poterit ipsa exercitatio expediri, et videtur, quod limitetur et taxetur huiusmodi pecunia pro lancea et pharetris ad unum florenum auri, ad quorum rationem solvatur cum moneta, quam pro eorum velle ex permissione regia prelati et barones locumtenentes maiestatis regie et regnicole cudi facient, et quod nec dantes minus dare, nec etiam stipendiarii recipientes ad plus dandum teneantur, sicut etiam fuit factum per quondam comites Piponem et Dezpoth.

IX. Et ut solutio nec solventi, nec recipienti cedere posset in damnum, sed esset in pretii moderamine equalitas utrique parti, videretur itaque disponendum et taxandum, ut venderentur et emerentur sales non eo modo, prout nunc fit, sed eo modo haberent pretium taxatum ad quodlibet sal, sicuti fuit tempore quondam domini regis Ludovici, et videretur, quod sales ponderarent unum centenarium et statuerent pretium floreni auri, ut sic sciretur, quanto pretio emeretur centenarius salis et quanto libra una, ut tam lapides, quam etiam minuta salium haberent cursum in vendendo, et quod fieret talis limitatio, ut ultra expensas secture et etiam portature salium de camera ad cameram proventus regales in salibus non diminuerentur. In Polonia autem et per totam Alemaniam et Italiam ac in toto mundo sal venditur ad pondus et mensuram et sic ubilibet inter emendum et vendendum sal bona equalitas habetur, propter quod etiam regia maiestas desiderat disponi pro communi equitate, ut in regno Hungarie ad pondus et mensuram sal et minuta salium vendantur, si tamen eis videbitur.

X. Item ordinaretur insuper, quod de salibus regalibus, qui de camera ad cameram portarentur, et etiam eorum conductoribus nullibi tributum reciperetur et contrafacientes subirent penam. Illi autem, que pro defensione regni et confiniorum ipsius de proventibus regalibus sunt disponenda, interim et hac vice disponant, prout ab ipsa maiestate regia per priora scripta habent in hoc datam eis facultatem.

XI. Videtur etiam necessario disponendum, quod omnes exercituantes generaliter et singulariter debeant et teneantur constitui die statuto et loco, in quo mandabitur eos debere, et quod hii, qui in die et loco statutis non constituerentur, subeant penam, quam vult regia maiestatis contra tales, quia sicut notum est, frequenter hi, qui prius venerant, fatigiis et tedio afficiuntur et usque dum ultimi adveniunt, in dissolutionem se converterunt.

XII. Item videtur etiam disponendum, quod nullus exercituantium de exercitu ante debitum ipsius tempus et sine licentia capitanei exercitus recedere presumeret, sub penis gravibus super hoc statutis et statuendis.

XIII. Et ut premissa sunt scripta et annotata super expeditionibus exercitibus undecunque contra inimicos rogni Hungarie insultantes futuris semper temporibus successivis pro defensione regni faciendis, verumtamen, quia inter respectum guerrarum Turcarum et Hwzitarum distincte et separatim fieri debent expeditiones exercitiales, ideo hec, que sequuntur, maiestas regia duxit premissis addenda.

XIV. Item quia dominus rex est certificatus, quod oratores Huzitarum modis omnibus in sacro Basiliensi concilio existunt cum pleno mandato in materia fidei, qui uti spes firma habetur, suscepta a sacro concilio plena informatione dimissis erroribus ad obedientiam sancte matris ecclesie se reducent, et quia etiam ab ipso sacro concilio iam frequenter et litteris et nuntiis monita est ipsa maiestas, ut personaliter se ad ipsum concilium conferat, tum pro facto fidei, tum etiam reformatione morum et pace Christi fidelium, quare ipsa maiestas attento, quod reditio Bohemorum Hwzitarum in facto temporalitatis sine ipsius principalitate debite et faciliter fieri non posset, cum et hoc idem scriptum est a concilio eius maiestati, attento etiam, quod temporale dominium Bohemorum concernit suam maiestatem, decrevit itaque sua maiestas negotiis imperialibus in Italia et specialiter cum Florentinis ad statum votive dispositionis deductis citius, ut poterit, ad ipsum Basiliense concilium transire, ubi si ipsi Boherni Hwzite ad obedientiam ecclesie et unitatem fidei reducti extiterint, sicut spes bona habetur de eisder, extunc sine armis regnum Hungarie eum terris ab eisdem occupatis plenarie liberabitur ab Hwzitis, et ipsis reductis poterit concilium sub nomine passagii a tota Christianitate de magna providentia providere, cum qua deo auxiliante sua maiestas personaliter proficiscendo poterit regnum Hungarie cum ceteris eidem annexis a Turcis penitus liberare et dominia sua dilatare atque ampliare. Si autem Hwzite in concilio reduci non poterint, extunc tota Christianitas providente ipso sacro concilio levabit manus suas in potentatu maximo contra ipsos Hwzytas, quo sic habito decrevit maiestas regia ipsa modis omnibus in Hungariam reverti personaliter et Tyrnauiam, Zakolcza ac alias terras et metas regni Hungarie ab ipsorum Hwzytarum manibus et potestate liberare. Cum autem opportunum sit ante reversionem sue maiestatis in Hungariam per prelatos, barones et regnicolas sic disponere et providere de comitatibus, quorum nobiles et alii possessionati homines pro defensione regni ex parte Bohemie contra Hwzytas sunt deputati, sive per singula capita secundum antiquam consuetudinem regni veniant, sive de quolibet comitatu pharetrarii sub certo numero mittantur, ut omnes et singuli ad reditum ipsius maiestatis sue pro recuperatione civitatum, terrarum, metarum regni ab Hwzytis occupatarum sic promptos et dispositos se conservent, ut quamprimum moniti fuerint, statim possint ad exercituandum moveri et versus Tyrnauiam proficisci, et ipsa maiestas in medium promptarum gentium exercituantium veniendo statim valeat agere pro rehabitione Tyrnaue et aliarum terrarum supradictarum, que quidem gentes non tantummodo quindecim diebus, prout consueverunt, sed usque necesse fuerit, debeant in agendis perseverare, quia si per totum ipsius recuperationis locorum pretactorum tempus remanere noluerint, utique et id, quod inceptum fuit pro recuperatione huiusmodi, transibit in vanum. Nec etiam ipsis aliter facientibus regia maiestas his personaliter vellet interesse, et qualitercunque hec dispos ita fuerint, certificetur superinde maiestas sua, pruisquam regnum Hungarie ingreditur.

XV. Disponatur etiam, quod rustici omnium et singularum villarum partium superiorum, de quibus saltem Hwzytis solvunt et ipsis obediunt, ut ad faciendos omnes labores, qui in recuperatione terrarum occupatarum fieri debent, illo tempore, quo super hoc eis iussum fuerit, venire teneantur et sint astricti, interim autem agant, ut melius poterint, pro bono et utilitate regni in offensionem Hwzytarum et recuperationem terrarum ab eisdem alienatarum et occupatarum.¹⁶ Prefatus autem dominus rex et serenissima domina regina de proventibus suis levabunt potentiam suam in recuperationem premissorum, et etiam prelatorum potentiam, qui per prelatos, barones et regnicolas contra Hwzytas deputabuntur, illac accedere faciet, quam scilicet potentiam cum sua et dicte domine regine potentia retinebit et stare faciet ibidem pro defensione regni et in recuperationem locorum ab Hwzytis occupatorum per totum tempus recuperationis, prout fuerit opportunum. Et nichilominus iidem prelati, barones et regnicole disponant et provideant, qui ex prelati et baronibus regni contra Thurcas versus Walachiam, Zewreniensem et; illas partes Danubii ac versus Boznam teneantur pro defensione regni agere et invigilare. Maiestas autem regia faciet etiam ad illas partes totum posse suum.

XVI. Item videretur maiestati regie, quod nobiles et possessionati homines cuiuslibet comitatus congregarentur sub certis gravaminibus et birsagiis, quemadmodum solitum est congregari, et quod in unum convenientes pariter condescenderent, et quilibet eorum absque quolibet timore libere secundum suum sensum dicerent suam opinionem singillatim ad singula, nec quisquam ditiorum vel potentiorum auderet quovis modo inferioribus vim adhibere aut minas imponere, ut non dicerent, quid sibi appareret, et hoc ordine observato requirerent quoslibet distinctim et seorsum per capita super sua opinione in premissis et opinionem cuiuslibet extensive perscriberent. Hisque sic peractis tandem a tota communitate nobilium divitum et pauperum, et non tantum a potentioribus et ditioribus eligerentur de quolibet comitatu certi nobiles et idonei viri, qui attentiores haberent respectum et diligentiores considerationem ad procurandas communitatis utilitates, quos de huiusmodi opinionibus et totali intentione eorum plene informatos ad prelatos et barones regni congregatos pro facienda in omnibus conclusionibus futuris semper temporibus observanda destinarent.

XVII. Videtur etiam, quod non essent admittendi quilibet nobiles alterius comitatus in medium congregatorum alicuius comitatus, nec daretur vox talibus in declaratione facienda, sed quod quilibet nobilis in suo comitatu, ubi habet domicilium, deberet dicere et suam proferre opinionem.

XVIII. Item omnia premissa circa defensionem regni descripta relinquuntur per maiestatem regiam arbitri et dispositioni prelatorum et baronum ac communitatis regni, ut quicquid pro meliori statu regni disponendum videbitur, statuamur ordinent et disponant.

XIX. Licet in precedentibus sufficienter per maiestatem regiam sit tactum, quomodo sua maiestas vult per prelatos, barones et regnicolas per expressum declarare, usque quem locum et terminum communitas regnicolarum generalis exercitus ingruente necessitate teneatur proficisci et etiam quamdiu stare deberet in eodem, verumtamen, sicuti prius scriptum est, regna Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Bozne, Gallicie, Lodomerie et Bulgarie dudum et etiam tempore serenissimi domini Ludouici regis recolende memorie ad coronam et regnum Hungarie pertinuerunt. Scit enim dominus Nicolaus de Gara palatinus et quamplures alii, quod terre et provincie, ut sunt Halomfeold, Hlewna, Berzezthel et alie, que nunc occupate tenentur per regem Bozne, et Boznenses ipsi predicto donam regi Ludouico tenebantur et possidebantur per banum regni Croatie. Scit etiam idem dominus palatinus et quamplures alii, qualiter castrum Greben et alia castra ibi circumquaque existentia cum suis pertinentiis tempore dicti quondam domini regis Ludouici tenta fuerint per Hungaros. Item sciunt, quod ecclesia Boznensis, cuius episcopus nunc in Dyalw residet, est ultra Zavum, que similiter nunc cum suis terris a Boznensibus possidetur, et sciunt multi, quoniam Seruia sive Rascia, Bulgaria sive Walachia et specialiter partes Zewrenii tente et conservate fuerint per regem et coronam regni Hungarie. His igitur respectibus maiestas regia per prelatos et barones ac regnicolas regni se vult declarare, utrum iidem dicant et velint esse dicta regna incorporata fuere regno Hungarie, intelligantque includi ac existere sub metis eiusdena. Que si sub metis regni Hungarie intelligunt et dicunt extitisse et debere esse, extunc petit sua maiestas, ut declarentur et exponantur, que loca per totum circuitum regni pro metis ipsius regni habeantur, et ad quem locum communitas regnicolarum generalis exercitus pro recuperatione terrarum alienatarum proficisci debeat, ut dicta maiestas sua sciat, dum opus fuerit, ad que loca possit facere transire regnicolas suos, aut pro regni defensione, aut terrarum alienatarum recuperatione, nec sua maiestas et regna debent deficere in iis agendis cum ecclesiis regni. Considerat namque sua maiestas, quod regnum Hungarie cum regnis et terris eidem incorporatis est taliter et adeo amplum, potentissimum et copiosum gentibus, ut contra quoscunque inimicos ex quacunque parte regni existentes, si bene et ordinate gentes regni Hungarie dividantur, poterunt sufficientes gentes pro regni defensione et terrarum alienatarum recuperatione, hostiumque offensione deputari, et levare, sicut de huiusmodi defensione per maiestatem regiam in sequentibus, prout sibi apparuit, disposita poterint suscipere informationem, et in his petit et mandat regia maiestas per prelatos, barones et regnicolas suos, antequam regnum Hungarie ingrediatur, plenissime informari, quicquid ab eisdem fuerit circa hanc materiam dispositum, ordinatum, declaratum et conclusum, ut secundum ea sciat regia maiestas et possit se, sicut et intendit, conservare.

SEQUITUR DIVISIO

XX. Quemadmodum prelati et barones regni Hungarie iam plures concitaverunt et moverunt regnicolas contra Hwzitas, sic et nunc relinquitur per maiestatem regiam arbitrio eorundem prelatorum et baronum, ut in levatione regnicolarum contra Hwzytas faciant illud, quod eis videbitur faciendum. Quia tamen maiestas sua respectum et considerationem habet ad guerras, que tam ex parte Hwzytarum, quam Turcorum et aliunde habentur, et attento potissime, quod rex Bozne et Boznensis multis insolentiis et iniuriis affecerunt regnum et regnicolas Hungarie, ideo maiestas sua hoc respectu prelatos, barones et nobiles regni sui ordine subscripto divisit, si eis sic fiendum appareat, quorum una pars contra Turcos, alia contra Hwzytas, tertia contra Boznam continuum respectum pro regni defensione et hostium offensione habere teneantur, sicut hec divisio apparet in subscriptis.

XXI. Hec est dispositio contra Thurcos et eis colligatos ac adherentes:

A parte Dalmatie seu maris et Croatie.

Banus Croatie	banderium
Ragusium	cum potentia
Comes Corbavie	banderium
Comes Segnie	banderium
Totum regnum Croatie et
Walachi in eo existentes	curn potentiis eorum

Regale	banderium
Item versus fluvium Wn.
Banus Sclavonie	banderium
Dornini de Blagay	banderium
Prior Aurane	banderium
Episcopus Zagrabiensis	banderium
Ladislaus Toth	equos centum
Item ad Wzura.
Despotus	cum quantis potest
Magtster curie comes de Posega	equis centum
Episcopus Boznensis	equis centum
Petrus Cheh de Nema	equis C
Bani Machovienses	equis CCCC
Joannes filius Gregorii	banderium
Mathko nomine Zebernik	equites M
Joannes banus de Maroth	equites M
Episcopus Quinqueecclesiensis	banderium
Filii Bothos	equites C
Joannes de Gara	equites C
Henricus filius Waywode	equites C
Georgius filius Lorandi de Serke	equites C
Comitatus Zagrabiensis	Comitatus Crisiensis
Comitatus Warasdiensis	Comitatus de Werewcze
Comitatus de Posega	Comitatus Zewriniensis
Comitatus de Walko	Comitatus Bachiensis
Comitatus de Bodrogh	Comitatus de Baronya
Comitatus Tholnensis	Comitatus Simigiensis
Comitatus Zaladiensis

Si volunt isti contra Boznenses ordinari, facilius habebitur, si vero isti comitatus nollent adiuvere, manebunt priores cum eorum banderiis.

Versus Temeskeoz usque Zewrenium inclusive.

Archiepiscopus Colocensis	banderium
Episcopus Waradiensis	banderium
Episcopus Chanadiensis	banderium
Regia maiestas	banderium
Comitatus Themesiensis	Comitatus Chanadiensis
Comitatus Horodiensis	Comitatus de Sarand
Comitatus Chongradiensis	Comitatus Crasso

Comitatus de Kewe Comitatus de Thorontal
Despotus cum quantis potest
Walachi, Sclavi et Iuanchi, Comani et Philistei.

Versus partes Transluanas

Episcopus Transsylvaniensis	banderium
Waywoda Transsylvaniensis	banderia duo
Siculorum comes	banderia duo

Waywoda Moldavus contra

Turcos et partes Transalpinas	cum tota potentia
-------------------------------	-------------------

Saxones, Siculi, nobiles

Walachi partium Transsylvanarum	cum potentia
---------------------------------	---------------------------

Comitatus Bihoriensis	Comitatus de Bekes
-----------------------	--------------------

Comitatus Zathmariensis	Comitatus de Zabolch
-------------------------	----------------------

Comitatus Maramarosiensis	Comitatus de Beregh
---------------------------	---------------------

Comitatus de Wgocha	Comitatus de Krazna
---------------------	---------------------

Comitatus Zolnok mediocris	Comitatus Zolnok exterior
----------------------------	---------------------------

Regale	banderium
--------	-----------

Et he tres partes tam scilicet versus Themeskewz quam versus partes Transalpinas respectum habent, mutuis semper respectibus contra Turcas ad loca, ad que necesse fuerit, iuvare poterunt et debent.

XXII. Pro custodia castri Posoniensis.

Episcopus Wesprimiensis	lanceas L
Episcopus Jauriensis	lanceas L
Abbas Sancti Martini	lanceas XXV
Domini de Hederwara	lanceas XXV

per quartam partem toto anno pro custodia, et de residuo pro defensione castri et civitatis Posoniensis fiat dispositio comitibus Posoniensibus de proventibus regalibus.

Contra Hwzitas

Archiepiscopus Strigoniensis	banderium
Episcopus Agriensis	banderium
Comitatus Soproniensis	Comitatus Castriferrei

Comitatus Wesprimiensis

Comitatus Jauriensis

Comitatus Philisiensis

Comitatus Mosoniensis

Comitatus Nittriensis

Comitatus de Thurocz

Comitatus Lyphthoviensis

Comitatus Scepusiensis

Comitatus Zempliniensis

Comitatus Borsodiensis

Comitatus Geomeriensis

Comitatus Hewesiensis

Comitatus Zolnok exterior

Comitatus Borsodiensis

Et si deo placebit, regia maiestas personaliter

Petrus Cheh

Comites de Bozyn

Wolfardus de Modor

Nicolaus filius Bani de Galgocz

Petrus et Joannes Forgach

Filii Noffry

Styborius

Michael Ernye

Stephanus Saffar

Magister tauernicorum

Emericus de Derenchen

Emericus de Palocz

Nicolaus de Kahmo

Comitatus Albensis

Comitatus Strigoniensis

Comitatus Comaromiensis

Comitatus Posoniensis

Comitatus Trinchiniensis

Comitatus de Arwa

Comitatus Zoliensis

Comitatus de Saaros

Comitatus Abawywariensis

Comitatus de Tholna

Comitatus Nogradiensis

Comitatus Pesthiensis

Comitatus Hontensis

Comitatus de Wngh

Archiepiscopus Strigoniensis

Episcopus Agriensis

Comes de Sancto Georgio

Stybarius

Ladislaus de Zechen

Nicolaus filius Blasii de Gyarmath

Rubertus de Thar

Stephanus de Aran

Joannes filius Jacobi

Osualdus de Zelchen

Sebastianus de Degh

Domini de Pelsewcz

Joannes filius Emerici de Peren

Domini de Homonna

Paulus Kompolth

Henricus et Demetrius de Berzencze	Joannes Zwdar
Kwkalffus	Simon Zwdar
Frank de Semse	Nicolaus et Georgius Soos
Andreas de Budamer	Georgius de Agaad
Timoteus de Nesa	Frank de Zeech
Ladislaus de Kanyasa	Ladislaus Petheo
Mathias de Hathwan	Eustachius et alii nobiles de Serk

XXIII. Item quamvis regia maiestas et regnum Hungarie a dictis partibus habent guerras, tamen quia nunc inter suam maiestatem et Florentinos sperat eadem maiestas, quod etiam Veneti per medium Florentinorum concordabunt cum sua maiestate, qua habita sperat sua maiestas, quod poterit nedum totam Turciam, imo verius totam Italiam relinquere in bona pace et tranquillitate, et si habebitur concordia cum Venetis, he gentes, que contra ipsos sunt deputate, poterunt libere se contra alios divertere. Si vero non concordaverint, tunc sua regia maiestas vult, ut omnes gentes, quibus per maiestatem suam scriptum est, intrent patriam Fori Julii, in quarum medium in ipsam patriam Fori Julii etiam maiestas sua personaliter proficiscitur ad gerenda bella contra Venetos.²⁶ Et si cum Turcis vel Hwzytis concordia habebitur et commode fieri poterit, tunc vult sua maiestas, quod etiam de illis partibus contra Turcas vel Hwzytas deputatis, quanto plures poterunt, tanto plures ipsam patriam Fori Julii intrent.

XXIV. Item de Hwzytis spes bona habetur, quod per sacrum concilium Basiliense ipsi Hwzyte in spiritualibus ad obedientiam sancte ecclesie et in temporalibus ad obedientiam sue maiestatis reducentur. Quod si sic factum fuerit, sicut speratur, tunc et ille gentes contra Hwzytas deputate poterunt contra alios inimicos regis et regni se convertere. Habetur etiam tractatus super treugis ineundis cum Turcis, que si facte fuerint, non erit opus contra ipsos Turcas aliquam potentiam movere, et sic potentia illa que contra Turcas est deputata, poterit converti contra alios inimicos regnum Hungarie hostiliter invadere machinantes, et si cum quocunque ex predictis concordia habebitur, talis potentia, que deputate fuit contra talem, qui concordat, se poterit convertere ad partem cum sua maiestate et regno concordare nolentem. Casu autem, quo favente altissimo cum quolibet predictorum concordia fiet, sicut speratur, tunc, licet predictae gentes ad presens ab omni exercituatione penitus conquiescant et sint supportate, verumtamen utile est et valde necessarium, ut in omnem eventum regni pro futura defensione super exercituatione facienda nunc omnino dispositio fiat, ut tempore necessitatis occurrente nobiles quarumlibet partium et regnicole sciant, ad quas partes respectum habeant et se conservare debeant pro regni defensione facienda. Et petit atque mandat maiestas sua per prelatos et barones disponi, sicut et in precedentibus scriptum est, quantum dari debeat pro qualibet lancea ad rationem floreni auri, et quod etiam exercituantes tempore, quo se levant et in exercitum proficiscuntur, ac ab illo revertuntur, neminem ledere ac offendere et in suis bonis damnificare presumant, et quod tempore seu die constituto omnes exercituantes in loco deputato constitui teneantur. Disponant etiam, ut quamdiu necesse fuerit, in loco necessario debeant remanere et decernere penas contra hos, qui in aliquo premissorum contrarium facere presumpserint quovis modo.

THE FOLLOWING ARE TO BE NOTED ON THE MEANS AND METHODS OF DEFENDING THE WHOLE KINGDOM OF HUNGARY FROM ALL ENEMIES ATTACKING THAT KINGDOM FROM ANY DIRECTION.

1. Whereas it was due by law and custom observed since ancient times that beyond the defense forces, which the king, the queen, the prelates of churches, and the clergy of the kingdom are required to maintain from the king's and queen's revenues and from those of the churches for the preservation of this kingdom and its borders from any direction, the community of noble gentlemen of the realm and men of property is also required to set out together in general levy of the kingdom for the same defense of the borders of the realm against all enemies attacking this kingdom; and whereas besides the title of the kingdom of Hungary the king of Hungary also uses the titles of Dalma-tia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bul-garia, namely of those kingdoms which of old have been included in the kingdom of Hungary,¹ and the preservation of these and the defense of their borders by the king, queen, prelates, clergy, and the community of nobles and men of property must necessarily be also understood at all times, therefore, it appears to his royal majesty that the lords, prelates, and barons should summon a general assembly to one place and at a particular time and call men from every county of the whole kingdom and, after discussing the matter with them, should define expressly places and borders along the circumference of the whole kingdom, namely, those places and borders to which the general levy of the community of the gentleman of the realm has to go, and how long it has to stay there to defend the kingdom against enemies, when necessary.

2. Then, because past deeds of general levies of the community of the gentlemen of the realm offer clear proof of its overall usefulness, what benefit would arise from a general levy of gentlemen of the realm for the defense and preservation of the kingdom, if many of them, hindered by poverty, age, or other weaknesses, appear more on crutches rather than with arms, more like beggars than warriors?² Therefore, it should be arranged and provided that those who will set out to defend the kingdom ought not to be defenseless, but should at least have a bow and other arms with which they can withstand the attacks of enemies for the defense of the kingdom. It seems more useful that a definite number of mounted archers should be sent from every county according to the capacity' of each county and that no noble should be able to excuse himself or to avoid sending archers, but every noble should bear the burden in common with the community of that county in which he holds property. It, therefore, seems clear to the royal majesty that in order to relieve the burden on the poor, the old, and the orphans and on widows of nobles and men of property³ in every county of this kingdom, a definite number of mounted archers, well prepared for the defense of the borders, should be equipped and sent from every county in the time of necessity, in such a way that poor nobles, orphans, and widows should not be burdened by serving personally according to the custom of the realm, but it should be calculated how many of them are able by common contribution, according to their capacity, to send one man as a mounted archer. Concerning nobles having tenant peasants it should be exactly defined in every county by the community of nobles how many men should be sent, and thus having added the men sent by the poor and the propertied nobles, it should be clear how many men are to be sent to the army from every county altogether. These men, who are required to go to the army, should set out under the leadership of their own county's ispán, as was ancient custom, for which one may find example and guidance from the deeds particularly of king Solomon, duke Géza, Vid, ispán of Bács, and Jan, ispán of Sopron, who fought in the expeditions of that king and duke against the Greeks and Pechenegs around Belgrade with the troops of the counties of Bács and Sopron.⁴

¹ These countries, listed in the royal style ever since late Árpáadian times, were glossed by the sixteenth-century editors (John Sambucus and Nicholas Telegdi) as follows: "Rama means Bosnia, Serbia means Rascia, Galicia is greater Walachia, Lodomeria is Russia, Cumania has its name from the land of Walachia, earlier inhabited by the black Cumans, which lies between the Alps and the Danube, from the river Olt towards Tartary and is now inhabited by the Wallachs and is called a part of the Transalpine and Moldavian lands." By Alps, of course, the Carpathian Mountains are meant. Galicia, a Russian principality belonging to Poland since the 1340s, was erroneously identified with Walachia.

² It is believed that a report by the Grand Master of the Teutonic Order in a letter of 1422, where he speaks about many thousand "peasants" (gebawer) in Sigismund's army, was in fact a reference to the rather shabby noble levy; see František Palacký, Urkundliche Beiträge zur Geschichte des Hussitenkrieges (Prag: Tempsky, 1873) 1, pp. 191.

3. Then, it also seems appropriate, and to be enforced by heavy penalties, that soldiers, whether they belong to the king, queen, prelates, barons, or, the general levy of the kingdom, as long as and whenever they are preparing themselves to set out for campaigning, cause no loss to anyone in marching to or from the army, for the kingdom is often harmed or injured more by its own soldiers than by enemies.⁵

4. Then, that his royal majesty sends the noble assemblies these propositions of future arrangements not in order to introduce some new arrangement to their midst or to burden them, but only because in the view of his majesty, greater advantage and profit will accrue to the kingdom of Hungary from such an arrangement. Although in this manner the number of soldiers may be less than if every member of the entire community rose up one by one, nevertheless, great profit can accrue to the kingdom, for such an army should not be raised for any trivial reason, but only

³ The meaning of “men of property” was practically identical with “noble,” for almost all landowners were of noble origin.

⁴ The reference is to the chronicle text now known as Chronici Hungarici compilatio saeculi XIV, well-known in the later Middle Ages in several versions (ed. Alexander Domanovszky, in Emericus Szentpétery, ed., Scriptores rerum Hungaricarum tempore ducum regumque stirpis Arpadianae gestarum, [Budapest: Regia Universtas, 1937–38] 1: 217–506); see now: Chronica de gestis Hungarorum e codice picto saec. xiv. Chronicle of the deeds of the Hungarians from the fourteenth-century illuminated chronicle, János M. Bak, László Veszprémy, eds. and trans. (Budapest–New York, CEU Press, 2018). The war against the Pechenegs and Greeks of 1071–72 is described in cap. 105 Chronica., p. 201). The “testimony” of the chronicle is here adduced to convince the nobles of the legitimacy of local leadership (of the ispán) in contrast to their codified right to go to war only under the king’s command.

⁵ On harm done by soldiers of the levy, see 1427A: 1–6.

if a very great force of enemies intends to invade or to attack the kingdom of Hungary and the lord king cannot resist it with his own army.

5. Then, because the community of the kingdom of Hungary usually insists that when it rises in a general levy against the attacks of enemies it does not wish to remain at the frontiers or borders of the kingdom for longer than fifteen days, it seems right to his royal majesty that when the said mounted men have been dispatched for a general army from their midst in the above manner by the community of nobles and men of property, then these mounted men must remain against the attacks of enemies on those borders which will be declared or defined according to the aforementioned decision of the community of nobles, not for fifteen days only, but as long as it may seem necessary to the lord king, if he himself is present. with the army, or in the absence of the majesty, to the captains and leaders of the armies.⁶ And it seems proper to his royal majesty that the foregoing measures, as they are written, should be implemented in order to alleviate the burden on the poor nobles, who are unable to campaign; others should be required by ancient custom of the realm to go to the army or to send their men properly equipped and prepared with horses and arms so that they are not unarmed as they were in times past, because otherwise no good comes from an army of such men, as is well enough known from experience.

6. In order that the above should more easily and more conveniently receive the consent of the nobles and men of property of every county, it seems useful that the preceding should be sent to every county for the information of those living there, so that in every county they should be gathered together to receive notice of these matters communicated to them and to discuss, what seems to be the best arrangement for the foregoing, so that they can send suitable men with their decision to the assembly of prelates and barons. And in order that all the foregoing be brought to the notice of the community of every county, his royal majesty wishes and orders that the complete record word for word of this decision be sent for the information of the community of every county by the vice-chancellor under his greater royal seal, along with a letter containing the gist of his majesty's letter regarding this project⁷ for greater certainty concerning the will of the same majesty.

7. Then, it seems good to his royal majesty that if any nobles are stipendiaries or hold offices from the king, the queen, the prelates, barons, ecclesiastics, or any others, then none of them may be held exempt or free because of service to his lords from military service, which he is required to perform owing to his property, but, according to his property subject to the decision of the community of the county, he must send someone in his stead, who will set out not with him, but with the general levy of the gentlemen of the realm, so that everyone will bear his burden, according to his holdings, along with the community.

8. Then, it also seems good that it be decided how much should be paid for one lance and one mounted archer by the king, the queen, the prelates, barons, and all others to the professional soldiers, and not the amount per day, but the one for an entire campaign, because one campaign may last a shorter time, another a longer time; and it seems right that this pay for lances and archers should be limited and prescribed as one gold florin, and that this amount should be paid in that money which at their wish by royal permission the prelates and barons, who are the vicars of of the royal majesty,⁸ and the gentlemen of the realm will have minted, and that those paying must give no less and those paid must take no more than what is expected, just as was done by the late count Pipo and the despot.⁹

⁶ The extension of the duty of service was in fact an innovation in contrast to customary limitation of noble service.

⁷ The letter of Sigismund from Siena did not survive; the vice-chancellor in question was Andrew of Szentgyörgy, 1428—33.

9. And in order that payment may cause no loss for either the payer or the receiver, but there should be equal moderation in the price on both sides, the following disposition and prescription seem equitable, that salt should not be sold and bought in the way it is now done, but the price should be set for any salt in the way it was in the time of the late lord king Louis;¹⁰ and care shall be taken that one piece of salt should weigh one ton and its price be one gold florin, so that it be known what is the price of a ton of salt and what of one pound, so that both the blocks of rock salt and pieces of salt will have a value in selling. And there should be such a regulation that the royal revenues from salt should not be diminished beyond the expenses of cutting and of shipping the salt from chamber to chamber. In Poland, in all of Germany, in Italy, and indeed throughout the whole world, salt is sold by weight and quantity, and, consequently, there is fair exchange everywhere between salt for sale and salt bought; because this is so, the royal majesty also wishes to arrange, for the common good, that in the kingdom of Hungary blocks and pieces of salt should be sold by weight and quantity, but only if this seems right to them.¹¹

⁸ The vicars of Sigismund in 1430–34 were Nicholas of Gara Jr. (son of Nicholas senior, ban of Mačva 1387–90, 1393–94, of Dalmatia and Croatia 1394–1402, of Slavonia 1397–1402, count palatine 1402–33); Matthew of Pálóc (secret chancellor 1419–23, judge royal 1425–35, count palatine 1435–36), Peter of Berzevicze, (knight of the household, ispán of Szepes 1411–33, of Liptó 1420–33, Master of the Treasury 1419–33); John of Rozgony (ispán of Sáros 1410–35, lord treasurer 1412–36, Master of the Treasury 1433–37), George of Pálóc ((brother of Count Palatine Matthew, bishop of Transylvania 1419–23, archbishop of Esztergom 1423–39, archchancellor 1438–39) Clement of Molnári (bishop of Győr 1417–38), and Peter of Rozgony, (bishop of Veszprém 1417–25, of Eger 1425–38).

⁹ Filippo (Pipo) Scolari of Ozora, count of the salt chambers 1401–26, ispán of Temes 1404–26), and Stephen Lazarević, Despot (Prince) of Serbia 1389–1427.

¹⁰ The price of salt under Louis I is not known; this passage was included here because many a professional soldier was paid in salt; cf. 1427A:8–9.

¹¹ Rock salt from the mines in Máramaros Co. and Transylvania was sold widely in East Central Europe both in blocks (lapis, petra salis) and in smaller pieces as well, contrary to what Robert P. Multhauf in the Dictionary of the Middle Ages (New York: Scribner, 1986) 10: 634 maintains. The royal income from this monopoly was in fact one of the main items in the Hungarian “budget”; see János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter” in R. Schneider, ed. Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347–87, here pp. 356–9; István Draskóczy, Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18.

10. Then, it should be further ordained that no toll may be exacted from the royal salt which is carried from chamber to chamber or from those carrying it; those acting otherwise will be subject to punishment. However, those means from the royal revenues which are to be assigned for the defense of the kingdom and its borders should be for the time being and this case disbursed in such way, as they are empowered by the royal majesty's earlier writings in this matter.

11. It also seems necessary-to define that all soldiers together and singly must and are required to assemble at a set time and place which will be ordered for them, and that those who are not assembled at the arranged time and place must be subject to such punishment which the royal majesty desires for them, because it has been noted that frequently those who had come earlier, affected by weariness and tedium, begin to disperse by the time the last arrive.

12. Then, it also seems good to arrange that no man of the army should dare to leave the army before the set time and without leave from the commander of the army, subject to the heavy penalties that have been and are to be prescribed for this.

13. All that which is written and noted above regards the deployment of armies for the defense of the kingdom against enemies of the kingdom of Hungary attacking from any direction at any time in the future; however, in the wars with the Turks and the Hussites, distinct and separate military campaigns have to be launched; therefore, his royal majesty has caused the following to be added to the above.

14. Then, since the lord king is certain that the Hussite delegates came to the holy council of Basle with full powers in all matters of faith, and, as he firmly hopes, will, after receiving full instruction from the holy council, renounce their errors and subject themselves again to the obedience of holy mother Church, and since the same majesty has been requested frequently by the same holy council in letters and by messengers that he personally should attend the same council, for the sake of the faith and also for the restoration of the morals and the peace of Christ's faithful,¹² wherefore, the same majesty, considering that the return of the Bohemian Hussites in secular matters cannot be suitably and easily accomplished without his leadership, which has been put in writing by the council to his royal majesty, and also considering that the temporal lordship of the Bohemians belongs to his majesty; therefore, his majesty has decided that, after having brought the imperial business in Italy and particularly with the Florentines¹³ to such a conclusion as he desires, he will come as quickly as possible to the council at Basle, and, if the Bohemian Hussites there will have returned to the obedience of the Church and the unity of the faith, for which there is good hope, then the kingdom of Hungary together with the regions occupied by them will be fully freed from the Hussites without arms; and once they are reconciled, the council will be able to make provision under the name of *passagium*¹⁴ for all Christianity with great foresight, and then his majesty may set out personally with the help of God and be able to free entirely the kingdom of Hungary and its attached regions from the Turks as well as to widen and enlarge his dominions. However, if the Hussites cannot be reconciled in the council, then by the decision of the holy council all Christianity will raise its hands with the greatest power against the Hussites; in this case his royal majesty has decided that he personally will by all means return to Hungary and free Trnava, Skalica and other lands and border regions of the kingdom of Hungary from the hand and power of the Hussites.¹⁵ It seems useful that before the return of his majesty to Hungary the prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm arrange and make provision for the counties whose nobles and other men of property have been appointed to defend that part of the kingdom facing Bohemia against the Hussites, that they should either come singly according to the ancient custom of the kingdom or that a particular number of archers should be sent from every county, so that all and every one of them should be prepared and ready to recover the cities, lands, and borders of the kingdom occupied by' the Hussites upon the return of his majesty, so that as soon as they are called upon, they should be able to march immediately and be deployed at Trnava; and when his majesty arrives with his men ready for battle all should be able to act at once to recover Trnava and the other abovementioned lands. The men must remain in action not for fifteen days only, as they have been accustomed, but as long as necessary, because if they do not wish to remain for the whole time required to recover the said lands, then what was begun for this recovery will be in vain. His majesty refuses personally to take part if this is done otherwise, and his majesty is to be informed about what has been arranged in this matter before he enters the kingdom of Hungary.

¹² On the procedures at the Council of Basle, see the chronological overview by R. W. Cook "Negotiations between Hussites, the Holy Roman Emperor, and the Roman Church, 1427–36," East Central Europe/L'Europe de centre-est 5 (1978): 90–104, esp. pp. 95 ff. with references to the sources and literature.

¹³ The Republic of Florence was an ally of Venice in her war against Sigismund (see below, n. 26) and hindered the emperor-elect in reaching Rome, where he was to be crowned. Sigismund was supported only by Siena, Florence's arch-enemy, and had to stay there for nine months in 1432–33, incurring enormous debts, surrounded by enemies.

15. It should also be decided that the peasants of each and every village of the upper (i. e., northern) regions, at least those which pay tribute to the Hussites and obey them, be required and bound to come and to undertake everything which must be done to recover the occupied lands at the time they are ordered to act in this matter. In the meantime they should act as best they can for the good and utility of the kingdom in attacking the Hussites and recovering the lands occupied and alienated by them.¹⁶ The said lord king and the most serene lady queen will raise their own force from their own revenues for the recovery of the above, and the king will also send there the force of the prelates, which will be raised by the prelates, barons, and landed residents against the

¹⁴ The word passagium, although usually meaning “passage” or “travel” in general, must refer here to the safe conducts issued to the Hussite delegation by the Council and, later, by the Czechs to the conciliar envoys to Prague; on these see Cook, “Negotiations,” pp. 94, 96.

¹⁵ These towns, together with several castles, were taken by the Hussites in 1432 and were redeemed from them only in 1434, when Hussite invasions into northern Hungary ended. The six years of incursions of the Hussites into northern Hungary caused extensive damage: they sacked the royal cities in the Spis and (in 1433) the mining and minting centre Kőrmöcbánya/Kremnica; see Pál Tóth-Szabó, A cseh-huszi mozgalom és uralom története Magyarországon [History of Czech–Hussite movements and domination in Hungary] (Budapest: Hornyánszky, 1917).

¹⁶ There is no evidence that the king’s call on the peasants to fight against the Hussites had any consequences; see Tóth-Szabó, A cseh-huszi mozgalom, pp. 130–32.

Hussites, and he will keep this force with his own and that of the lady queen and have it remain there to defend the kingdom and to recover the places occupied by the Hussites throughout the whole time of the recovery, as seems suitable. In the meantime the same prelates, barons, and landed residents should decide and arrange which of the prelates and barons are required to move and be on guard for the defense of the kingdom against the Turks towards Wallachia, towards Severin and the Danubian region, and towards Bosnia.¹⁷ His royal majesty will also do everything in his power for (the defense of) those regions.

16. Then, it seems good to his royal majesty that nobles and men of property of every county should be called together under definite penalties and fines, in the way they are customarily called together, and that those gathered should deliberate in equality, and every one of them, one by one, should give his opinion freely according to his feelings without fear, while none of the wealthier and more powerful persons should dare to use force or make threats in any way against his inferiors, so that they do not say what they find best; and by observing this rule they should call on everyone clearly and separately one by one for his opinion on the above and record in full everyone's opinion.¹⁸

After these matters have been accomplished, in every county certain nobles and suitable men should be elected from the whole community of nobles, both rich and poor, and not only from the more powerful and wealthier ones, such that would respect with care and studiously keep in mind what can be done for the common good; and they, fully informed of these opinions and all the intentions (of their county), should be sent to the prelates and barons of the kingdom to pass decision on everything that is to be done in all future times.

17. It also seems good that no nobles from another county should be admitted to the assembly of any county, nor should they be permitted to vote in arriving at a final decision, but every noble must speak in his own county, where he has his residence, and present his opinion there.

18. Then, everything set out above on the defense of the kingdom is left by his royal majesty to the decision and pleasure of the prelates, barons, and the community of the realm, so that they should establish, order, and decide whatever seems right to improve the state of the kingdom.

19. Although in the foregoing it was sufficiently treated by his royal majesty what his majesty wishes that the prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm should define regarding the place and the border to which the troops of the general levy of the gentlemen of the realm are required to set out and also how long they must remain there, nevertheless, as has been written earlier, the kingdoms of Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Bosnia, Galicia, Lodomeria, and Bulgaria have been long since and also in the time of the most serene lord king Louis of venerated memory attached to the crown and kingdom of Hungary. For the lord palatine Nicholas of Gara and very many others know that that the lands and provinces, namely Hulm, Hlivno, Berzezthel, and others, which are now held occupied by the king of Bosnia and the Bosnians themselves, were subject to and held by the said lord king Louis through the ban of the kingdom of Croatia.¹⁹ The same lord palatine and many others also know that castle Greben and other castles around there with their appurtenances were held by the Hungarians in the time of the late lord king Louis.²⁰ Then, they know that the Church of Bosnia, whose bishop now lives in Dyakus, extends beyond the River Sava, which similarly with its lands is in the possession of the Bosnians, and many know how long Serbia or Rascia, Bulgaria or Wallachia, and particularly the lands of Severin were held and retained by the king and crown of the kingdom of Hungary.²¹ Regarding these things, therefore, his royal majesty wishes that the prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm announce, whether they declare and wish the said kingdoms to be incorporated into the kingdom of Hungary and whether they understand them to be included in and to be within its borders. If they understand them to be within the borders of the kingdom of Hungary and declare that they are and should be, then his majesty seeks that it be announced and defined which places around the whole kingdom should be held as the borders of the same kingdom, and to what place the troops of the general levy of the gentlemen of the realm have to set out to recover alienated lands, so that his said majesty may know to what points he can command his gentlemen of the realm, if necessary, to defend the kingdom or to recover alienated lands. Nor should his majesty and the kingdom, together with the churches of the realm, be deficient in their action. For his majesty considers the kingdom of Hungary with the kingdoms and lands included in it to be so wide, so very powerful, and so richly populated, that enough men can be enlisted and raised against any enemies from any border of the kingdom to defend the realm, to recover alienated lands and to attack the enemy, if the men of the kingdom of Hungary are well and properly distributed, so that they can take cognizance of the arrangements of defense, as it appears correct to his royal majesty in what follows. And, concerning this, his royal majesty seeks and orders to be informed as fully as possible by his prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm about what has been arranged, ordered, announced, ¹⁹ The region of Chulm in West Bosnia, with the county (iupa) Livno and its chief castle Bistrica, roughly equal to Hercegovina (see H. Kreševljaković, “Stari bosanski gradovi” [Ancient Bosnian castles], Naše Starine 1 [1953], 41), was annexed by Hungary under King Louis I in 1357 but was lost after his death. Prior to this Hum/Chulmia/Zachulmia was subject to Hungary in the twelfth century, especially to the future Andrew II in his capacity as Duke of Croatia. But at this time they were under the rule of King Tvrtko II of Bosnia (1420–43); see John W. Fine, Jr., The late medieval Balkans: A critical survey from the late 12th century to the Ottoman Conquest (Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1987), pp. 463–79; Pavo Živković, Tvrtko II Tvrtković. Bosna u prvoj polovini XV stoljeca [Tvrtko II: Bosnia in the first half of the fifteenth century] (Sarajevo: Inst. za ist. u Sarajevo, 1981).

¹⁷ These arrangements are contained in the "Division," below.

¹⁸ These measures offer a rare insight into the internal workings of county assemblies, where, apparently, the barons and their retainers, together with the major landowning nobles, dominated the discussions. The king attempted to protect the rights of the lesser nobles.

²⁰ Castle Greben in northwestern Bosnia had been in Hungarian hands from 1358 on, but returned to Bosnia after 1382.

²¹ The bishop of Bosnia, in spite of his title, had his seat in the Hungarian town Diakovár/Đakovo ever since the foundation of the see in the thirteenth century. For the other countries named here, see the Hungarian royal style as above (with n. 1). The banate of Severin, founded ca. 1250, subsisted until the Ottoman conquest in 1524, but most of its former territory had become part of Walachia; see James R. Sweeney, “Walachia–Moldavia,” in The Dictionary of the Middle Ages, 12:505f.

and concluded on this matter by them before he enters the kingdom of Hungary, so that his royal majesty can rely upon these as it is his intention.

THE DIVISION FOLLOWS

20. Just as the prelates and barons of the kingdom of Hungary had raised and moved many people against the Hussites, it is now left by his royal majesty to the same prelates and barons to decide to do what seems to be best in raising the gentlemen of the realm against the Hussites. However, because his majesty considers and keeps in his mind that wars are fought both against the Hussites and the Turks as well as elsewhere, and is particularly concerned that the king of Bosnia and the Bosnians have afflicted on the kingdom and inhabitants of Hungary many insults and injuries; therefore, regarding this state of affairs his majesty has divided the prelates, barons, and nobles of the kingdom into the order given below, if it should please them that this should be done. One part of them is deployed to the defense of the kingdom and the attack of the enemies against the Turks, another part against the Hussites, and the third against Bosnia, as is apparent from the division below.

21. This is the arrangement against the Turks, their allies and followers:²²

On the Dalmatian [Adriatic] side, at the sea, in Croatia

Ban of Croatia [one] banderium

Ragusa/Dubrovnik with its forces

Count of Krbava [one] banderium

Count of Cetina [one] banderium

Count of Segnia [one] banderium

all the Kingdom of Croatia [and Slavonia] with the Wallachs living there with all their forces

Royal banderium [1000 horse]

Then, towards the River Una

Ban of Slavonia [one] banderium the lords of Blagaj [one] banderium Prior of Vrana [one] banderium

Bishop of Zagreb [one] banderium

²² The additions in brackets are taken from the later, extended version of the list; the sequence follows the format of the Propositions, but, for practical reasons, not its two-column arrangement. Italics: not contained in the older list.

Ladislás Tót²³ 100 horse [one banderium]
 Then, towards Ozora:
 The despot with as many as he can [8000 horse]
 Master of the Court, the ispán of Pozsega [i.e. Ladislás of Tamási²⁴] 100 horse
 Bishop of Bosnia 100 horse
 Peter Cseh of Nevna²⁵ 100 horse
 Bans of Mačva 400 horse
 John, son of Gregory²⁶ [one] banderium
 Matko²⁷ for Srebernik 1000 horse
 John of Marót,²⁸ ban 1000 horse Bishop of Pécs [one] banderium
 Sons of Botos²⁹ 100 horse
 John of Gara³⁰ 100 horse [one banderium]
 Henry, son of the voivode³¹ 100 horse
 George, son of Roland of Serke³² 100 horse
 [Bulgaria] [4000 horse]
 Co. [=County of] Zagreb

²³ Szomszédvári Tót, Ladislás, aulicus

²⁴ Tamási, Ladislás of (son of voivode John, fl. 1402–40), magnate, master of the doorkeepers (of the household), 1417–34, master of the horse 1438–39, ispán of Pozsega.

²⁵ Léva, Peter Cseh of (alias of Nevna, d. 1440), magnate, master of the horse 1404–15, ban of Mačva 1427–31, voivode of Transylvania 1436–37.

²⁶ Alsan, John of (son of Gregory, nephew of Cardinal Valentine, d. 1437), magnate from Valkó Co., lord butler 1406–18.

²⁷ Tallóc, Matko (Matthew) of (d. 1445), royal captain of Belgrade from 1429, lord of Srebernik in Bosnia from 1430, ban of Slavonia 1435–45, of Dalmatia and Croatia 1436–45, count of Cetin.

²⁸ Marót, John senior of (d. 1435), ban of Mačva 1397–1410, 1427–28.

²⁹ Botos (“sons of,” of Harapk), knightly family from Valkó Co.

³⁰ Gara, John of (nephew of Dezső, d. 1439/40), magnate.

³¹ Tamási, Henry of (son of voivode John, d. 1444), magnate, master of the doorkeepers 1423–34, ispán of the Székely 1437 and of Pozsega.

³² Serke, George Lorándfi of (son of Roland, fl. 1404–59), knight from Gömör Co., lord of Némethi/Njemci in Valkó Co., ispán of Gömör 1443.

Co. Varasd

Co. Pozsega [300]

Co. Valkó [200]

Co. Bodrog [300]

[All the estates of Dalmatia, Croatia, Slavonia, likewise Bosnia and its parts, as well as the Duchy of St Sava³³ send 9000 soldiers]

Co. Körös

Co. Verőce [200]

Co. Szerém [200]

Co. Bács [500]

Co. Baranya [500]

Co. Tolna [200]

Co. Zala [600]

Co. Somogy [500]

If they want to be deployed against the Bosnians, that would be useful, but if these counties do not want to assist, the magnates will remain with their banderia.

Towards Temesköz including Severin

Archbishop of Kalocsa [one] banderium

Bishop of Oradea [one] banderium Bishop of Cenad banderium [200 horse]

Royal majesty banderium [1000 horse]

Co. Temes [200]

Co. Arad [200]

Co. Csongrád [200]

Co. Keve [100]

Co. Csanád [300]

Co. Zaránd [300]

Co. Krassó [100]

Co. Torontál [100]

³³ Shortlived state (1435–83) in what is now Hercegovina.

The Despot with as many as he can

Wallachs, Slavs, “Iuanchi”, Cumans and Jász [200]

Towards Transylvania

Bishop of Transylvania [one] banderium

Voivode of Transylvania two banderia

The ispán of the Székely two banderia

Voivode of Moldavia against the Turks and Wallachia with all his might

Co. Bihar [600]

Co. Szatmár [200]

Co. Máramaros [50]

Co. Ugocsa [100]

Co. Middle-Szolnok [with Szolnok Exterior, 400]

Co. Békés [200]

Co. Szabolcs [200]

Co. Bereg [100]

Co. Kraszna [100]

Co. Exterior Szolnok [see above]

Royal banderium

[Saxons and Székely] [4000]

[The entire nobility of Transylvania] [300]

And these three groups, namely both those toward Temesköz and toward Wallachia, should be able and obligated to go to the help of each other against the Turks, wherever need arises.

22. For guarding the castle at Pozsony/Pressburg³⁴

Bishop of Veszprém 50 lances

Bishop of Győr 50 lances

Abbot of St Martin (of Pannonhalma) 25 lances

Lords of Hédervára 25 [100] lances,

³⁴ The special position of Pressburg, the major border towards the West is emphasized by this special arrangement; it is to be noted that the ispán of Pozsony is always included among the barons listed in the eschatocol of privileges.

for a quarter of the year for guard duty, and for the rest, the defense of castle and city Pozsony should be arranged by the ispán of Pozsony, from royal revenues.

Against the Hussites

Archbishop of Esztergom [two] banderia

Bishop of Eger [two] banderia

Co. Sopron [100]

Co. Veszprém [100]

Co. Győr [100]

Co. Pilis [50]

Co. Moson [25]

Co. Nyitra [with Turóc, 600]

Co. Turóc [see above]

Co. Liptó [with Szepes, 200]

Co. Szepes [see above]

Co. Zemplén [with Borsod, 300]

Co. Borsod [see above]

Co. Gömör [with Heves, 400]

Co. Heves [see above]

Co. Szolnok Exterior

Co. Borsod [repetition]

Co. Vas [with Fejér 100]

Co. Fejér [see above]

Co. Esztergom [with Komárom, 200]

Co. Komárom [see above]

Co. Pozsony [with Trencsén and Árva, 300]

Co. Trencsén [see above]

Co. Árva [see above]

Co. Zólyom [with Sáros and Abaújvár, 600]

Co. Sáros [see above]

Co. Abaújvár [see above]

Co. Tolna [with Nógrád and Pest, 100]

Co. Nógrád [see above]

Co. Pest [see above]

Co. Hont [and Bereg] [300]

Co. Ung

And if pleases God, the royal majesty personally [with 400 horse]

Archbishop of Esztergom [repetition]

Bishop of Eger [repetition]

*Peter Cseh*³⁵

*Counts of Bazin*³⁶

*Wolfurt of Modor*³⁷

Nicholas, son of the ban of Galgóc³⁸ [100]

Peter and John Forgács³⁹ [50]

The sons of Noffry⁴⁰ [50]

Zubor⁴¹ [50]

Michael Ettre⁴² [50]

Stephen Sáfár⁴³ [50]

Master of the Treasury [Peter of Berzevice⁴⁴] [50]

³⁵ Lévai Cseh, Peter, ban of Mačva 1427–31, voivode of Transylvania 1436–7, ispán of several counties.

³⁶ Several counts of Szentgyörgy and Bazin were alive and held posts in this time.

³⁷ Wolfurt, Paul of (d. 1438), lord of Vöröskő and Modor in Pozsony Co.

³⁸ Újlak, Nicholas of (alias of Galgóc, son of ban Ladislás, d. 1477), ban of Mačva 1438–72, voivode of Transylvania 1441–65, king of Bosnia 1471–77.

³⁹ Forgács, Peter, of Gimes (fl. 1385/1435), knight, ispán of Nyitra 1405–22, master of the queen's doorkeepers 1417–19; Forgács, John senior, of Gimes (fl. 1411–49), knight, retainer of the lords Bebek, castellan of Hrušová 1445.

⁴⁰ Nofri (sons of), knightly family, sons of Onofrio Bardi of Florence, lords of Bajmóc/Bojníce.

⁴¹ Zubor, Denis (of Földvár, fl. 1433–42), knight from Tolna Co.

⁴² Ettre, Michael (of Kálnó, fl. 1406–44), knight from Nógrád Co., later retainer of Ladislás of Gara.

⁴³ Torna, Stephen Sáfár of (fl. 1392–1439), master of the king's wardrobe, 1403–09, ispán of Győr and Komárom 1411.

⁴⁴ See n. 8, above.

Emeric of Derencsény[50]⁴⁵
 Emeric of Pálóc⁴⁶ [100]
 Nicholas of Rihnó⁴⁷ [50]
 Henry and Detritus of Berzevice⁴⁸ [50]
*Rikalf of Tarkő*⁴⁹
*Frank of Semse*⁵⁰
*Andrew of Budamér*⁵¹
*Timothy of Nersa*⁵²
*Ladislás of Kanizsa*⁵³
*Matthias of Hatvan*⁵⁴
 Count of Szentgyörgy [one banderium]⁵⁵
 Stibor⁵⁶ [two banderia]
 Ladislás of Szécsény⁵⁷ [100 horse]
 Nicholas, son of Blaise of Gyarmat⁵⁸ [50]

⁴⁵ Derencsényi, Emeric, aulicus, ispán of Gömör 1419–23.

⁴⁶ Pálóc, Emerich of (brother of Matthew, d. 1433), royal castellan of Diósgyőr 1409–27, secret chancellor 1419–23.

⁴⁷ Perény, Nicholas of (alias of Rihnó, d. 1444), knight, master of the stewards 1437, royal captain of Késmárk 1440.

⁴⁸ George Berzevice, Henry of (fl. 1425–33), knight from Sáros Co..

⁴⁹ Rikalf, Ladislás (of Tarkő, fl. 1410–47), knight from Sáros Co., ispán of Liptó.

⁵⁰ Semsei, Frank aulicus 1432–40.

⁵¹ Budamér, Andrew, knight of the court, 1402–32?

⁵² Nézsa, Timothy of (fl. 1432–36), aulicus, knight from Nógrád Co. ⁵³

Kanizsa, Ladislás of (d. 1434), magnate, ispán of Sopron 1428–34. ⁵⁴

Hatvan, Matthias of, knight from Heves Co.

⁵⁵ Szentgyörgy, Ladislás of (called Count, d. 1438), magnate, lord high treasurer 1438.

⁵⁶ Stibor, junior, (of Bolondóc, son of Stibor senior, d. 1434), lord, ispán of Nyitra and Trencsén.

⁵⁷ Szécsény, Ladislás of (d. 1460), magnate, ispán of Nógrád and Hont.

⁵⁸ Gyarmat, Nicholas of (son of Blaise, fl. 1389–1435), knight from Nógrád Co., ispán of Hont Co. 1435.

Robert of Tar⁵⁹ [50]
 Stephen of Arany⁶⁰ [50]
 John Jakabfi⁶¹ [100]
 Oswald of Szelcsény⁶² [50]
 Sebastian of Dég⁶³ [50]
 the lords of Pelsőc⁶⁴ [200]
 John, son of Emeric of Perény⁶⁵ [200]
 The lords of Homonna⁶⁶ [200]
 Paul Kompolt⁶⁷ [100]
 John Cudar⁶⁸ [50, + Simon Cudar⁶⁹, 50]
 Nicholas and George Sós⁷⁰ [50]
 George of Agárd⁷¹ [50]
 Frank of Szécs⁷² [100]
 Ladislás Pető⁷³ [50]

⁵⁹ Tar, Rupert (Robert) of (son of Lawrence, d. 1448), knight, master of the queen's horse 1438–39, ispán of Heves 1441.

⁶⁰ Arany, Stephen of (fl. 1426–42), royal councillor, ispán of Nógrád, Hont and Gömör 1435–37.

⁶¹ Jakabfi, John (son of Jacob), knight.

⁶² Szcsénykei SD Zelecsényi, Oswald, aulicus 1432.

⁶³ Dég, Sebastian of (fl. 1412–39), knight of the household.

⁶⁴ Bebek, magnate family, lords of Plešivec.

⁶⁵ Perény, John senior of (son of Emerich, d. 1458), magnate, master of the stewards 1431–37, master of the treasury 1438–58.

⁶⁶ Druget(h), magnate family, lords of Homonna.

⁶⁷ Nána, Paul Kompolt of (d. 1441), magnate, lord butler 1429–38, judge of the Cumans 1439.

⁶⁸ Cudar, John, of Ónod and Makovica (d. 1440), magnate.

⁶⁹ Cudar, Simon, of Ónod and Makovica (d. 1462), magnate, lord butler 1441–56, master of the doorkeepers 1458–62.

⁷⁰ Soós, George, of Sóvár (fl. 1417–52), knight, ispán of Sáros 1435–40, of Pozsony 1450–52.

⁷¹ Agard, George of (fl. 1417–33), knight from Zemplén Co..

⁷² Szécs, Frank (Francis) of (fl. 1405–33), knight from Gömör Co..

⁷³ Gerse, Ladislás Pete of (d. 1455/56), magnate, ispán of Vas and Zala 1424–48.

Eustachius⁷⁴ and other nobles of Serke [50]

23. Then, while his royal majesty and the kingdom of Hungary are waging wars in the said areas, his majesty now has hopes for a concord between his majesty and the Florentines and trusts that the Venetians will also come to agreement with his majesty by the mediation of the Florentines. In this expectation his majesty is hopeful that he will be able to leave all Turkey⁷⁵ and even all of Italy in happy peace and quiet, and if agreement is made with the Venetians, those men who were deployed against the Venetians, will be free to turn against others. However, if no agreement is made, then his royal majesty wishes all men to whom he has written to come to Friuli, where his majesty intends to join them personally to set out to campaign against the Venetians in the same land of Friuli.⁷⁶ And if an agreement can be made and suitably arranged with the Turks or the Hussites, then his majesty wishes that also those levied in the above regions against the Turks or the Hussites, the more the better, come also to Friuli.

24. Then, regarding the Hussites there is good reason for hope that the Hussites will be brought back in spiritual affairs to obedience to holy Church and in temporal affairs to obedience to his majesty by the holy council of Basle. If this can be so done, as there is hope, then the troops levied against the Hussites can turn against other enemies of the king and the kingdom. There are also talks on making a truce with the Turks, and if that can be done, there will be no need to move any forces against the Turks, and therefore that force which has been raised against the Turks can be turned against other enemies planning to invade the kingdom of Hungary by force, and if peace is reached with any of the above, the forces raised against the one which agreed to peace can be turned against those unwilling to make an agreement with his majesty and the kingdom. In the case that, by favor of the most high, agreement is reached with any of the above, which is to be hoped, then the said troops should at present refrain from all fighting and be excused. Nevertheless, it is useful and very necessary that plans should be made for mobilization for future defense of the kingdom for any event, so that in time of emergency the nobles and gentlemen of the realm of every region will know what parts they are responsible for and are to be prepared for in acting in ⁷⁴ Serke, Eustachius of (fl. 1394–1451), knight from Gömör Co..

⁷⁵ It is unclear what is meant by Turcia here, unless it is a scribal error. A few years later, after the conclusion of the Hussite wars Sigismund organized a campaign against the Ottomans, together with a former Taborite captain, which was quite a symbolic success, but worthless in military terms; see Mályusz, Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386–1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990) p. 127.

⁷⁶ The war with Venice was, as usual, about the control of Dalmatia. King Louis I had reasserted there Hungarian sovereignty (acknowledged by Venice in the Peace of Torino, 8 August 1381), but Venice recovered the towns between 1409 and 1420, and succeeded in holding them against Sigismund's attacks in 1410–13, 1418–20 and 1431–33. The Venetian annexation of the Patriarchate of Aquileia in 1420 widened the conflict, for that was imperial territory. Sigismund planned to break the Serenissima's resistance by a commercial blockade, but that, too, failed. The conflict ended with a long-term truce between Sigismund and Venice signed on 5 June 1433, on the worst possible terms for Hungary and the Empire: it left Dalmatia and Friuli in the hands of the Republic with no reparations in return. The kings of Hungary made no more attempts to regain their Adriatic foothold. See Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund pp. 108–22.

the defense of the kingdom. And his majesty seeks and orders that it be arranged by the prelates and barons, as is written above, how much should be paid for every lance in terms of gold florins; and also that soldiers should not dare to harm or attack anyone or cause loss to his possessions when they are being raised and set out for the army or are returning from it; and that at the set time or day all soldiers must be ready in the proper place. They should also arrange that they must remain in the necessary place as long as is required and decide about the penalties of those who dare to act in any way against the above orders.

LAW OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY OF 8 MARCH 1435

Decretum maius

This major piece of legislation, conventionally referred to as the decretum maius of King Sigismund, is in fact an elaborate attempt to make an end of abuses that emerged during the long absence of the king, under the government of the baronial “vicars of the realm.” It is seen as a decree favoring the lesser nobility of the counties, by giving them extensive powers against violent magnates, limiting the expenses of litigation, regulating the procedures of arrest and seizure. Also the preamble contains the constitutionally significant clause about the county deputies representing “the entire body of the realm (regnum).”

It has been suggested that these reforms were elaborated by the royal advocate, Stephen of Arany, while in Siena with Sigismund in 1433, but this cannot be substantiated; see Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits. (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), p. 183-4.

In the Corpus Iuris Hungarici this decree has been erroneously called the “second decree of 1435,” even though it preceded the decree of 12 March 1435 by four days. Also, the numbering of the paragraphs in all the manuscript copies and older editions are inconsistent. The editors of the Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445 (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978), Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, and Vera Bácskai [DRH], have changed the numbering in several places, which we follow (see Concordance).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: Six originals: two in MNL OL DL 12642; one was in the Croatian National Archives, now lost but copied by Döry; one in the Esztergom Archiepiscopal archives Arch. Saec. Acta radic. Lad. V fasc. 1; one in the archives of Trenčín, in Slovakia, Cista 1, fasc. 1, no. 6; and one from the Zichy archives now MNL OL DL 804498, all on parchment, their double seals pendant lost or broken except on the Esztergom copy. (For details, see DRH, p. 260)

EDD: Magyar Törvénytár/Corpus Iuris Hungarici, Sándor Márkus et al. eds. (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1: 254-76; DRH pp. 260-76.

LIT: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801.1: 462-6; Elemér Mályusz, “Die Zentralisationsbestrebungen König Sigismunds in Ungarn” in Études historiques. Budapest : Akadémiai., 1960, 1, pp. 317- 58, here p. 350, Idem, Kaiser Sigismund p. 183-7; János M. Bak, “Tradition and Renewal in the Decretum Maius of King Matthias,” in Matthias Rex 1458–1490: Hungary at the Dawn of the Renaissance <http://renaissance.elte.hu/wp-content/uploads/2013/09/Janos-M.-Bak-Tradition-and-Renewal-in-the-Decretum-Maius-of-King-Matthias.pdf> [see also in Studies, below.]

8 MARTII 1435
DECRETUM MAIUS

Sigismundus divina favente clementia Romanorum imperator semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Gallicie, Lodomerie, Cumanie Bulgarieque rex universis Christi fidelibus, presentibus pariter et futuris, presentium notitiam habituris salutem in omnium salvatore, Inter cuncta, que pro subiectorum salute conservanda nostre meditationis perpendit acumen, ad ea presertim cordis nostri curas innata nobis inclinatione nature solemus divertere, quibus humane temeritatis audacia effrenata nonnunquam iuncta potentie reprimatur et iuris integritas abutentium prevaricatione depravata nunc apertiori priorum consuetudinum declaratione, nunc novarum utili constitutione legum principantis providentia reformetur. Proinde ad universorum., tam presentium quam futurorum notitiam volumus pervenire, quod cum nos pro imperialis fastigii honore finaliter adipiscendo post electionem nostram in regem Romanorum factam et prime corone regie Romane Aquisgrani susceptionem novissimae sacri Romani imperii principibus electoribus nobis consulentibus in partes Lombardie descendentes in civitate Mediolani secundam coronam regiam Romanam recepissemus, et demum in urbem Romanam profecti fuisset infulasque nostras imperiales de manibus sanctissimi domini nostri domini Eugenii pape quarti cum debita solemnitate suscepissemus et deinde nonnullis partibus Italie et Germanie perlustratis rebusque tam sancte Romane ecclesie, quam nostris imperialibus nobis interim occurrentibus votive dispositis exonerati, tandem in peculiare regnum nostrum Hungarie medio tempore presentia nostra regali viduatum iniuriisque et dampnificationibus potentialibus in suo statu et sue quietis ac pacis amenitate disturbatum regressi in hac civitate nostra Posoniensi primam residentiam personalem fixissemus ac unacum fidelibus nostris, prelatis videlicet et baronibus eiusdem regni rostri ad nostram maiestatem confluentibus certam conventionem nobilium de singulis ipsius regni nostri comitatibus convocari fecissemus, tandem ipsorum congregatione adunata de eorundem prelatorum et baronum nostrorum necnon nobilium regni nostri totum corpus eiusdem regni cum plena facultate absentium representantium unanimi consilio, deliberatione et consensu pro debita, ordinata et conformi iustitie amministrazione incolis eiusdem regni equaliter omnibus de cetero exhibenda, necnon quieto et tranquillo statu eorundem regnicolarum infrascriptas constitutiones, statuta et leges in perpetuum duraturas et inviolabiliter observandas disposuimus, decrevimus et duximus ordinandas, declearandas et firmandas.

I. Primo quidem, ut omnis scrupulosa suspicio, que contra iudices et iustitios ipsius regni nostri de favore vel odio aut quoquomodo concipi posset, de cordibus quorumlibet penitus removeatur et tollatur, statuimus, ut semper successivis temporibus omnes et singuli iudices et iustitiosi dicti regni nostri, tam ecclesiastici, quam seculares, qui videlicet in palatinum, iudicem curie regie, magistrum tauarnicorum regali, cancellarium aut vicecancellarium regalem., in prothonotarios seu vicesgerentes iudicum pretactorum ac etiam assessores eorundem in iudicio, in wayuodam partium Transsilvanarum, comitem Siculorum, banum regnorum Dalmatie et Croatie, banum Sclavonie, banum Machouiensem ac in comites quorumlibet comitatum et iudices nobilium eligentur et assumuntur, eorundemque in iudicatu vicesgerentes substituti et assessores tempore receptionis eorundem ad huiusmodi honores et officia, amministrationis iudicii et iustitiie in manibus nostris regiis vel deputatorum a nobis iuramentum prestare teneantur per formam verborum infrascriptam, videlicet sic: Ego T. iuro per deum et per gloriosam dei genitricem virginem Mariam, per omnes sanctes et electos dei, quod annibus et singulis coram me causantibus absque cuiusvis persone, divitis scilicet et pauperis acceptione omnibusque prece, premio, favore, amore et odio postpositis et remotis, prout scilicet secundum deum et iustitiam faciendum cognovero, iustum et verum iudicium et iustitiam faciam meo pro posse. Sic me deus adiuvet et beata virgo Maria et hoc lignum vivifice crucis domini nostri Jhesu Christi.

II. Iudices autem nobilium in quolibet comitatu eligantur et preficiantur ex nobilibus potioribus et bene possessionatis illius comitatus communiter omnibus nobilibus eiusdem comitatus concorditer visi et merito acceptandi, et ipsi electi teneantur non refutare, sed suscipere officium iudicatus sub pena viginti quinque marcarum per ipsam communitatem, si secus fecerint, irremissibiliter exigendarum, exceptis tamen officiolatus et honores regios, reginales, prelatorum, baronum vel aliorum tenentibus vel stipendia ratione exercituandi habentibus vel aliis rationabilibus ex causis in ipso comitatu continuam residentiam non facientibus, et huiusmodi officium ad minus per annum exercere, habendo sigillum cognoscibile ad dandum cum sigillis aliorum iudicum nobilium et comitis vel vicecomitis litteras fidedignas. Si vero elapso anno voluerint, habeant recusandi facultatem. Quod si resignaverint aut per communitatem nobilium comprovincialium remoti seu mutati fuerint, ante annum quintum futurum ad idem officium assumendum inviti non coartentur. De birsagiis autem sedium parochialium ad portionem iudicariam cedentibus comes parochialis et iudices nobilium equam inter se divisionem facere teneantur in duas partes.

III. Verum quia frequenti querela regnicolarum nostrorum ymmo quadam palpabili experientia teste nostra percepit celsitudo per nonnullas novas possessionum occupationes et potentiariorum actuum illationes eosdem regnicolas, inferiores videlicet a potentioribus multipliciter opprimi et gravari, ideo volentes insolentiis et novis attemptationibus per remedia opportuna viam precludere statuimus et ordinavimus, quod quandocunque et ubicunque fuerint facte nove possessionarie aut terrarum occupationes, potentialiter vadiationes seu rerum et bonorum ablationes, succisiones silvarum, interemptions, vulnerationes et verberationes hominum, domorum et possessionum invasiones et depredationes ac alii similes novi actus potentiarii maiores, extunc lesi, dampnum et iniuriam passi impetratis litteris nostris regalibus querimonialibus et preceptoriiis comites parochiales et iudices nobilium comitatus illius, in quo facta huiusmodi patrata extiterint, accedant et requirant. Qui quidem comites et iudices nobilium cum testimonio capituli vel conventus illi comitatui deservire soliti a vicinis et commetaneis ac nobilibus comprovincialibus sub certis penis in huiusmodi litteris nostris regalibus declarandis in sedem eorum iudicariam per modum proclamate congregationis partibus quoque litem habentibus convocatis ad fidem eorum deo debitam fidelitatemque nobis et sacre corone observandam tactis sanctorum reliquiis prestitam super huiusmodi novis occupationibus possessionariis et aliis actibus potentiariis plenam et indilatam requirant veritatem, qua requisita et inventa possessiones occupatas auctoritate eis in hac parte attributa mediante restatuant eisdem, a quibus fuerant indebite occupate, ipsosque in dominio earundem protegant et conservent, alia vero bona et vadia potentialiter ablata absque defectu reddant et restitui faciant.

IV. Super facto autem potentie in talibus commisse partes utrasque discussionem et, sententiam finalem recepturas ad certum terminum mediantibus eorum et dicti capituli vel conventus litteris seriem totius facti exprimentibus ac propria et possessionum factum huiusmodi attestantium nomina continentibus in personalem presentiam nostram regiam aut palatinali seu iudicis curie nostre transmittant, ubi absque ulterioris termini et litigionarii processus observatione et continuatione, etiam partis non venientis absentia. non obstante, nos vel iudex alius, ad quem causa transmissa fuerit, iuramentum capitis decernendo tandem finalem sententiam proferemus et proferre tenebitur. Partes tamen litigantes, quandocumque voluerint, absque requisitione iudicis et onere solutionis birsagiorum liberam concordandi habeant facultatem, quemadmodum antiqua et laudabilis regni nostri consuetudo huiusmodi concordiam in quibuscumque factis potentialibus et aliis libere fiendam dictat et consentit.

V. Ne autem barones, iudices et alii honores regios et officiolatus a regia maiestate tenentes seu comites parochiales honori et iudicatu ipsorum subiectos, quibus ipsi etiam ab aliis iustitiam. tenentur ministrare, per se ipsos quavis cupiditate vel propria voluntate allekti aliqua occasione indebite gravent, opprimant seu dampnificent, aut per eorum vicesgerentes talia fieri permittant, statuimus, ut a talibus lesi, dampnificati et iniuriati impetratis litteris nostris ipsorum querelam continentibus preceptorisque, modo pretacto eorum iudicibus nobilium ac testimonio capituli vel conventus eiusdem comitatus per modum similis proclamate congregationis veritatem inquiri facere et sua dampna ac gravamina comprobare valeant, et per ipsos iudices nobilium unacum nobilibus comprovincialibus comitatus eiusdem iudicium et iustitia ex parte huiusmodi officialium impendatur, aut nostre maiestati seu iudicibus et iustitiariis curie nostre prenotatis modo prescripto per litteras ipsorum iudicum nobilium seu capituli et conventus seriem totius facti continentes causa discutienda ad certum terminum transportetur, ubi huiusmodi causa modo premissa sine dilatione terminetur. Si vero iidem barones seu officiales regales aut comites debitum moderamen sui officii in tantum excesserint, ut ex parte totius communitatis officiolatui suo subiecte generalis vociferatio querulosa contra eos emergerit, extunc nos ad fidelem et litteratoriam assertionem iudicum comprovincialiumque nobilium et capituli aut conventus comprovincialis personaliter vel per idoneum hominem ad hoc specialiter deputatum volumus et tenebimur ex parte talium condignam iustitiarn ministrare.

VI. Statuimus itaque et ad reprimendum potentiariorum actuum effrenatum abusum presenti ordinatione sancimus, quod si qui castellanorum aut ceterorum officialium nostrorum, aut reginalium, necnon prelatorum ac baronum et, nobilium ac regnicolarum nostrorum de castris, officiolatibus et cum potentiis dominorum suorum, a quibus huiusmodi castra, possessiones et officiolatus pro honore obtinent, aliquos actus potentiarios, dampnificationes, iniurias et quecumque mala perpetraverint et commiserint, talium domini, qui eisdem huiusmodi castra, officiolatus et honores contulerunt, super omnibus dampnis et nocumentis per se et de suis bonis plenam satisfactionem exhibere sint obligati et teneantur effective, se ipsos in huiusmodi actibus potentiariis per suos castellanos seu officiales perpetratis inscios, innocentes et immunes fore debito iuramento purgaturi, suum autem dampnum in huiusmodi satisfactione pretacta perceptum, si voluerint, a suis familiaribus, castellanis seu officialibus, qui ipsi satisfactioni causam dederant, per ablationes rerum et bonorum ipsorum ac possessionum occupationes seu rebus et bonis ac possessionibus minus sufficientibus personarum eorum detentionem et in captivitatem redactionem et conservationem usque ad recuperationem damnorum suorum predictorum fiendam, non obstante libere conditionis et alterius cuiuslibet dignitatis privilegio, liberam habeant facultatem, quantitatem tamen sui dampni in solutione huiusmodi percepti non excedendo.

VII. Ut autem officiales et comites nostri pretacti nobiles et incolas regni nostri sub suo honore et iudicatu constitutos indebitis birsagiorum exactionibus gravandi occasionem non habeant, antiquam in hac parte consuetudinem regni nostri imitando declaramus, quod nullus iudicum secularium iudicia seu birsagia extorquere possit, nisi tempore congregationis palatinalis vel alterius per regiam maiestatem ad congregationes generales celebrandas deputati in singulis comitatibus celebrande secundum consuetudinem ab antiquo observatam, exceptis casibus infrascriptis, quibus etiam extra tempus dictarum congregationum generalium birsagia exigere debite possint.

Primo videlicet propter violentam retentionem aut dampnificationem jobagionum petita licentia, iusto terragio deposito allisque suis debitis persolutis ad alterius possessionem se transferre volentium, quo casu comes parochialis cum suis iudicibus nobilium, absque quibus nullum in talibus processum facere debet, ab hiis, qui in hoc casu culpabiles legitime inventi fuerint, iudicium seu birsagium trium marcarum toties quoties et quandocunque culpabiles inventi fuerint, sine expectatione extorquere potest, jobagionem retentum seu dampnificatum cum omnibus bonis suis, dampnis etiam recuperatis liberum abire permitti faciendo.

Item si quis jobagionem alterius non petita nec obtenta licentia, vel petita sed non obtenta ante dies quindecima huiusmodi petite licentie potentialiter abduxerit, talis pro abductione violenta jobagionis huiusmodi birsagium trium marcarum solvet et eundem jobagionem cum aliis tribus marcis birsagialibus per comitem parochialem cum iudicibus nobilium restituere compellatur. Si vero jobagio aliquis non obtenta licentia sed furtive ad possessionem alterius recesserit et idem, ad cuius possessionem accesserit, requisitus reddere recusaverit, extunc ad restitutionem ipsius jobagionis fugitivi comes parochialis talem cum birsagio trium marcarum compellere debeat et teneatur.

Item violator sedis iudicarie birsagium viginti quinque marcarum persolvat.

Item quicumque furem vel latronem aut aliquem publicum malefactorem captivaverit et eum de captivitate sua voluntarie abire permiserit, solvere debet comiti parochiali homagium malefactoris prenotati.

Item ubicunque lucrum camere tempore debito solutum non fuerit, comes parochialis cum iudicibus nobilium de qualibet villa non persolvente post emanationem litterarum birsagialium per iudices nobilium contra tales dari solitarum exigere debeat ipsum lucrum camere cum birsagio trium marcarum.

Consimiliter quia certa scientia meminimus nostrorum predecessorum litteris et per nostram maiestatem frequentius litteratorie ex laudabili consuetudine regni nostri precipi solitum esse et usitatum fore decimas ecclesiarum de singulis villis decimas persolvere post interdictum ecclesiasticum certo consueto tempore observari commissum recusantibus per comites parochiales aut vices suas gerentes exigi debere cum singulis tribus marcis, ideo presentis ordinationis et statuti vigore eandem consuetudinem ratam habentes, innovantes et imitantes committimus, quod post interdictum ecclesiasticum in singulis diocesibus et locis temporibus hucusque solitis impositum de singulis villis, que per unius mensis spatium huiusmodi interdictum ecclesiasticum animo indurato tollerando easdem decimas persolvere recusaverint seu non curaverint, mox elapso ipsius mensis spatio comites vel vicecomites parochiales per decimatores requisiti decimas easdem cum singulis tribus marcis birsagialibus pro se indilate exigendis eis, quibus solvi debent, absque dilatione et defectu persolvi facere teneantur.

Item quodcumque nobiles alicuius comitatus vigore litterarum regalium per modum proclamate congregationis sub pena trium marcarum in eisdem litteris regalibus expressa convocati fuerint, quicumque ad illam congregationem non venerint, nisi egritudine, senio, viduitate, orphaneitate, paupertatis impotentia, absentia remota vel eorum arduis negotiis rationabiliter se excusare potuerint, comes parochialis et iudices nobilium predictas tres marcas in dictis litteris nostris expressas indilate exigere possunt.

Item palatinus et iudex curie et ceteri iudices ordinarii ecclesiastici et seculares universa iudicia in causis coram eis vertentibus aggregata statim ipsis causis finitis ac per sententiam finalem conclusis primo parti adverse de sua portione satisfactionem impendere teneantur et ad partem suam iudiciariam cedentia exigendi liberam habent facultatem.

VIII. Item statuimus, quod ad faciendas statutiones, inquisitiones et evocationes et alios quoslibet processus cum hominibus et testimoniis capitularibus et conventualibus fieri solitos, que communiter fidedignitates vocantur, de capitulis et conventibus persone seu homines simplices non mittantur, sed de ipsis capitulis canonici ad minus aut persone in beneficiis vel officiis constitute, de conventibus vero monachi conventuales sacerdotes destinantur. Qui quidem pro huiusmodi testimoniis capitularibus et conventualibus deputati, priusquam ad faciendas aliquas possessionarias statutiones, metarum reambulationes, revisiones possessionarias et communes inquisitiones transmittantur et procedant, iurare teneantur, ut in eisdem factis fideliter et recte procedent et veram relationem seu fassionem facient. Homines etiam regii in premissis procedentes tempore reversionis eorum ac fassionis seu relationis coram ipsis capitulis et conventibus faciende simile iuramentum prestare teneantur. Quicumque autem contra suum iuramentum falsum processum vel falsam relationem fecisse repertus extiterit, talis tamquam falsarius et periurus pena amissionis beneficii sui, si quod habuerit, puniatur, et insuper, sive beneficiatus, sive non beneficiatus existat, perpetuis carceribus mancipetur; homo vero regius, si in premissis possessionariis statutionibus, metarum reambulationibus ac revisionibus sinistre vel false processerit, in facto periurii, pena capitis ac amissione omnium bonorum suorum convincatur. Quicumque vero nobilis per alium seu alios quoscumque mediantibus nostris regiis aut aliis consuetis litteris nomen suum continentibus pro homine regio coram testimonio alicuius capituli vel conventus requisitus onus huiusmodi processus assumere et exequi recusaverit, in birsagio consueto trium marcarum per comitem parochialem indilate exigendo convincatur eo facto.

IX. Statutiones autem possessionarie, metarum reambulationes et revisiones aliter fieri non debeant, nisi vicinis et commetaneis huiusmodi possessionum inibi legitime convocatis, et ut fraus et dolus in talibus melius evitentur, nomina singulorum vicinorum et commetaneorum tempore premissorum processuum illuc presentialiter convenientium in litteris capitularibus et conventualibus superinde emanandis seriatim conscribantur.

X. Et ut materia discordie super facto redemptionis litterarum capitularium et conventualium, necnon super satisfactione viarum seu laborum testimonialis capitularibus et conventualibus fienda hactenus sepius suboriri consueta de cetero cesset et, succidatur, presenti ordinatione antiquam tamen et laudabilem consuetudinem imitantes statuimus, ut in omnibus locis, tam capitularibus, quam conventualibus pro qualibet littera evocatoria per se, videlicet evocatoria prima, secunda et tertia in capitulo aut conventu simul cum eorum notario et scriptore pro redemptione littere recipiantur seu solvantur singuli denarii viginti quatuor maioris monete.

Item pro qualibet littera prociamatoria denarii centum.

Item pro qualibet littera procuratoria denarii viginti quatuor.

Item pro qualibet littera prohibitoria, protestatoria et aliis similibus, si patenter emanantur, denarii viginti quatuor, si vero clause, denarii duodecim.

Item pro qualibet littera fassionali emanata privilegialiter denarii centum, patenter vero denarii viginti quatuor, clause autem denarii duodecim. Item pro qualibet littera inquisitoria sive patenta, sive clause denarii viginti quatuor.

Item de paribus antiquarum litterarum in conservatoriis requisitarum custodi seu requisitori per se denarii centum et pro redemptione littere requisite, si non habuerit multum de scriptura et patenter confecta fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, si vero labor scribendi fuerit magnus et littera privilegialiter confecta, denarii centum.

Item de simplicibus transcriptis seu transcriptionalibus litteris patenter emanatis, ubi labor scribendi magnus non fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, ubi autem littera fuerit proluxa aut privilegialiter emanata, denarii centum.

Item de littera statutoria, in qua contradictio facta fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor, de litteris vero statutorialibus perpetuis, in quibus contradictio facta non fuerit, recipiatur redemptio litterarum secundum quantitatem possessionis et numerum sessionum modo subscripto, videlicet de sessione una, duabus aut tribus vel quatuor in toto denarii centum, ubi autem fuerint ultra quatuor sessiones usque ad decem, pro qualibet sessione denarii triginta tres, ubi vero fuerint ultra decem usque viginti, de qualibet sessione denarii viginti quatuor; ubi autem fuerint ultra viginti usque centum, de qualibet sessione denarii duodecim; si vero fuerint ultra centum usque quaque, de qualibet sessione denarii octo. Item de litteris reambulatoriis metalibus, in quibus contradictio et evocatio facta non fuerit, denarii viginti quatuor; in reambulationibus autem metalibus, in quibus simplex consignatio vel cum hominibus regiis de curia regia transmissis similis consignatio vel finalis metarum erectio cum iuramento super terram in forma iudiciaria aut partibus concordantibus facta fuerit, pro redemptione littere denarii quadringenti. Ubi autem partibus in huiusmodi reambulationibus et demonstrationibus metalibus discordantibus causa ad curiam regiam reducta fuerit, tunc pro redemptione talium litterarum denarii ducenti. Item de communi inquisitione ordine iudiciario commissa denarii centum.

Item de revisione possessionarie occupationis denarii centum.

Item de occupationibus possessionum hominum in sententia capitali convictorum et rerum ablationibus iudiciaria commissione mediante fiendis de rebus ablatiis ex antiqua consuetudine capitulum habebit decimam partem; pro redemptione autem littere denarii centum.

Item de estimationibus possessionariis iudiciaria commissione fiendis denarii centum.

Item de possessionariis divisionibus de singulis possessionibus divisis singuli denarii centum.

Item de expeditoria iuramentali denarii viginti quatuor.

Item de expeditoria iuramentali continente nomina coniuratorum denarii centum.

Item de solutionibus pecunialibus coram capitulis vel conventibus, vel eorum testimoniis fieri solitis capitulum seu conventus decimam et nonam partes exigere non possint, nisi quando propter discordiam partium in eorum sacristiis seu conservatoriis huiusmodi pecunie reposite fuerint; de talibus nempe de iure decimam et nonam recipere possint, ad illius tamen partis rationem, que causam dederit pecuniam huiusmodi in conservatoriis reponendi.

Personis autem testimonialibus capitulorum et conventuum pro singulis diebus, quibus in itinere fidedignitatis processerint, solvantur singuli duodecim denarii maiores, sive in propriis equis, sive in equis causantium ambulent et ducantur; ita tamen, quod in victualibus et expensis causantium et ipsos ad facta sua conducentium simul cum equis et familiaribus eorum de domo iterum in domum semper duci debeant et reduci.

XI. Preterea. ex quo in iudiciis in curia nostra regia fieri consuetis coram iudicibus ordinariis eiusdem curie ac eorum notariis supratactis littere et redemptiones earum necessario occurrunt, ideo ad tollendam cuiuslibet altercationis occasionem, que inter ipsos notarios et causantes emergi possent, antiquam consuetudinem redemptionis litterarum earundem modo subscripto duximus similiter declarandam, videlicet quod in ipsa curia nostra notariis ipsius curie iudicarie de una littera prorogatoria communi solvantur denarii duodecim;

de littera iudicali seu birsagiali similiter denarii duodecim;

de simplici littera inquisitoria similiter denarii duodecim;

de secunda evocatoria denarii viginti quatuor;

de tertia evocatoria denarii centum;

de proclamatoria denarii centum;

de littera iuramentali tertio vel sexto se alicui adiudicata denarii quatuor;

de eo, qui iurabit duodecimo vel vigesimo quinto aut quinquagesimo se, denarii centum; de communi inquisitione denarii centum;

de littera duellari denarii ducenti;

de iuramentali super caput denarii ducenti;

de prima instrumentali exhibitione denarii viginti quatuor; de secundaria et tertiaria instrumentali exhibitione cum gravamine assumpta similiter denarii viginti quatuor;

de prorogatoria respondentis cum tribus marcis denarii viginti quatuor;

de littera procuratoria patenti denarii viginti quatuor; de littera fassionali communi denarii viginti quatuor;
de aliis litteris generalibus, videlicet prohibitoriis et similibus denarii viginti quatuor;
de prohibitoria facie ad faciem denarii centum;
de littera sententionali facti potentialis conservatori sigilli floreni decem per centum, scriptori autem denarii ducenti;
de litteris statutoriis et reambulatoriis simplicibus denarii viginti quatuor; de litteris autem adiudicatoriis reobtentionis possessionum seu aliarum rei'um iuxta quantitatem possessionis seu rei reobtente habita concordia inter causantes et prothonotarios fiat solutio.

XII. In cancellaria autem nostra regia quoad redemptiones litterarum iuridicarum et consuetarum servetur antiqua consuetudo eiusdem cancellarie; similiter de donationibus et confirmatoriis per sata quantitate rei donate vel confirmate erit concordandum cum cancellario modo hactenus observato.

Quia vero in omnibus premissis redemptionibus litterarum et aliis quibuscunque solutionibus ac birsagiorum exactionibus de numero et quantitate denariorum pro tempore currentium sepenumero mentio facta est, gratia removendi dubii presentium serie declaramus, ut denarii tales intelligantur, quorum singuli centum unum florenum aut valeant et representent. Et si denarios minores pro aliquo tempore cursum habere contigerit, ad eandem rationem cum ampliori et equivalenti numero suppleantur

XIII. Item de arestationibus mercatorum et aliorum hincinde proficiscentium, que pro debitis et aliis excessibus propriis aut alienis in possessionibus seu locis communibus tam per ecclesiasticos, quam seculares, nobiles et ignobiles satis frequenter fieri solent, in quibus etiam hactenus nonnulla impedimenta et dampna ac iniurie per extra consuetudinarias huiusmodi arestationes commissa sunt et patrata, eandem antiquam regni nostri consuetudinem approbantes declaramus, quod nullus arestare volens in suis propriis aut fratrum suorum condivisionalium possessionibus, terris aut officiis pro quacunque causa arestationem aliquam facere possit, alioquin pro indebito aresto in pena trium marcarum vincatur et arestum huiusmodi indebite factum cum altero birsagio trium marcarum relaxare et liberum permittere per comitem parochialem compellatur. Cum autem in loco communi quispiam arestationem facere voluerit, iudex ipsius loci communis eandem arestationem coram se sic et non aliter fieri patiatur et acceptet, si videlicet arestans prius se a domino vel villico possessionis, in qua arestatus residentiam habuit, iustitiam postulasse et huiusmodi iustitiam aut sibi temerarie denegatam aut finaliter exhibitam fore et satisfactionem debito non impensam extitisse litteris comitis vel vicecomitis parochialis aut iudicum nobilium vel aliis credibilibus poterit comprobare. Dum autem hec premissa modo pretacto evidenter potuerit comprobare, extunc dominus vel iudex aut villicus ipsius loci seu possessionis communis arestum retinere et inter partes more in talibus consueto iudicium et iustitiam faciendo super debitis aut aliis excessibus vel rebus coram eo rationabiliter obtentis debite satisfactionis complementum de rebus et bonis iudicialiter condemnati aut rebus et bonis ipsius minus sufficientibus per detentionem personalem impendere teneatur.

XIV. In casu enim, quo ipse iudex aresti pro favore aut timore cuiuscunque vel ex qualibet alia causa rationem non habente arestum coram eo legitime factum seu fiendum retinere iudiciumque et iustitiam ac satisfactionis complementum modo superius descripto exhibere recusaverit, extunc ipse arestatori, cuius adversarium liberum abire permiserit, pro dampno, quod per huiusmodi arestum requirere et mediante iustitia obtinere poterat, et pro toto interesse teneatur et existat obligatus, nisi arestandus vel arestandi tantam potentiam et vim habuerint, propter quam dominus seu iudex loci communis eis resistere et eos retinere non valebit, aut alia potentia superveniens arestatos contra voluntatem iudicis aresti violenter abduxerit; quo casu eveniente ad sui excusationem super eo, quantocius poterit, suis v cinis et commetaneis publice protestetur.

XV. Volumus autem, quod in nostris et reginalibus liberis civitatibus, opidis, villis et possessionibus mediantibus eorum iudicibus, officialibus et presidentibus quibuscunque per cives, mercatores, hospites et incolas earundem pro suis debitis, rebus et acquisitionibus quibuscunque arestationes huiusmodi modo suprascripto et sub penis antedictis per magistrum tauarnicorum aut alios eorum superiores indilate exigendis fieri nullatenus debeant neque possint, sed in locis communibus et coram iudice communi, cum necesse fuerit, fiant arestationes per eosdem modo superius declarato.

XVI. Iudex autem communis arestationes huiusmodi coram eo debite et legitime factas discernens et iudicans pro suo labore et honore, si fuerit iudex per dominum possessionis constitutus aut dominus ipsemet, quadraginta denarios, si vero villicus, duodecem denarios ab homine iudicialiter condemnato pro se exigendi habeat facultatem.

XVII. Porro equitatem et iuris observantiam, quam inter regnicolas nostros vigere peroptamus, a nostra regia maiestate exordium habere demonstrare volentes presenti decreto stabilimus, quod in quocunque comitatu aliqua iura per defectum seminis quorumcunque decedentium devoluta fuerint, et de huiusmodi possessionibus manifeste non constat, an ad ius regium pertineant vel aliquos fratres generationales seu heredes feminei sexu concernant, sed inter ista duo, videlicet ius regium et ius aliorum, scilicet generationalium vel femineum dubium intervenerit, extunc homo communis nobilis et idoneus in quolibet comitatu ad id per comitem parochialem cum iudicibus nobilium et aliis nobilibus comprovincialibus in unum locum congregatis, non tamen ex baronibus, nec de potentioribus, sed de mediocribus nobilibus electus huiusmodi iura devoluta et dubiosa, et etiam alia similia, si qua contigerint, tamdiu conservet et manuteneat absque damnificatione qualibet, excepto solum, quod de proventibus consuetis huiusmodi possessionum, donec in manibus suis remanebunt, expensas moderatas capere et facere possit, de quibus tandem rationem reddere valeat et teneatur, quousque huiusmodi devolutio iurium sine herede decedentium in sede iudiciaria curie nostre regie publicata fuerit, ipsaque publicatione facta quiscunque easdem possessiones et iura sibi pertinere allegaverit, in certis octavis sequentibus quantocius rationabiliter poterit, iura sua producendo easdem ad se pertinere comprobet; quod si facere poterit, iudices curie regie eidem statui mandent et faciant cum effectum. Si vero in probatione defecerit, iuri regio relinquantur; et si qui ulterius ad easdem ius habere speraverint, eas de manibus regiis legitime requirant.

XVIII. Ubi autem uxores vel filie huiusmodi hominum absque heredibus masculinis decedentium in talibus possessionibus et iuribus remanserint, extunc possessiones eedem et iura a manibus earum occupari et auferri non debeant, priusquam de earum iuribus, videlicet an hereditarie et perpetuo ad ius femineum pertineant, aut ne, veritas inquiratur. Quod si repertum fuerit eadem iura iuri femineo non competere, extunc dictis uxoribus talium decedentium, antequam de dominio dictarum possessionum excludantur, per regiam maiestatem vel, alios, ad quos reperte fuerint esse devolute, de earum dotibus et iuribus plena satisfactio impendatur. Filiabus vero usque tempus maritacionis earum domus paterna cum quarta parte possessionum paternarum pro quarta filiali secundum consuetudinem regni nostri sequestretur et possidenda relinquuntur. Postquam vero maritate et traducte fuerint, de earum iure quartalatio pecuniaria solutione mediante satisfiat. Uhi autem aliqua ex ipsis filiabus homini impossessionato maritata fuerit, dictante eadem regni nostri consuetudine in perpetuo iure et dominio huiusmodi quarte filialis possessionarie succedere debet et remanere, ita tamen, si ipsa de voluntate et consensu fratrum seu consanguineorum suorum, in quos post ipsius matrimonium huiusmodi iura sua quartalitia reverti et redundare deberent, homini, ut prefertur, impossessionato nupserit. Alioquin sive de domo paternali, sive de curiis et servitiis baronum seu maiorum nobilium, dictis suis fratribus seu consanguineis aut parentibus irrequisitis et nolentibus seu non consentientibus id fecerit, ius suum quartalitium non cum possessione, sed cum satisfactioe pecuniaria requirendi habebit facultatem.

XIX. Adiicientes statutis superioribus, quod nullus comes, banus, wayuoda seu alius officialis regius cuiuscunque denominationis et dignitatis existat, ecclesias episcopales, archiepiscopales, abbatiales, prepositales et alias quascunque regio iure patronatus disponendas, earundemque tenutas, pertinentias, decimas et possessiones intra terminos et limites sui honoris seu officiolatus absque speciali mandato regio occuare aut se de eisdem partialiter vel totaliter ingerere presumat.

XX. Verum quia ex inmoderata et superflua exactione tributaria per longiturni temporis abusum et inadvertentiam ac neglectum dispositionis superinde necessarie multa gravamina, dampna et incomoda regnicolis nostris et extraneis hominibus cum eorum rebus et mercibus in regno nostro hincinde proficiscentibus per tributarios, tam nostros regales et reginales, quam aliorum propria cupiditate nullo ad dei timorem aut equitatem habito respectu allectos illata fore hactenus ferventiorique aviditate dietenus irrogari experientia teste nostra cognovit celsitudo, ideo presenti sanctione decernimus, quod in singulis comitatibus regni nostri tempore celebrationis generalium congregationum palatinalium per palatinos pro tempore constitutos vel alios ex regia deputatione celebrandarum inquirantur a iuratis assessoribus huiusmodi congregationum numerus et loca verorum tributorum in ipso comitatu exigi solitorum et a dominis seu possessoribus eorundem tributorum petantur exhiberi littere primarie institutionis tributorum eorundem, in quibus si inventa fuerit quantitas solvendi tributi de singulis rebus solvi consueti, talis solutio moderetur et reducatur ad rationem presentis monete taliter, quod tributariis seu tributa habentibus eorum iusti proventus non decrescant, nec e contrario solutionis modus onus in tributa solvere debentium supercrescat.

XXI. Ubiunque autem huiusmodi littere primarie institutionis tributorum reperiri et exhiberi non poterunt, aut reperte forsitan et exhibite quantitatem solvendi tributi non expresserint, tunc a predictis iuratis assessoribus dicte congregationis inquiratur et rescatur quantitas solutionis tributorum in quibusvis tributis ipsius comitatus de singulis rebus tributari solitis tempore antiquiori, quod humana memoria comprehendere potest, fieri consueve et retrahatur ad consuetudinem antiquam compensata qualitate, quantum iustius fieri poterit, pecunie tunc currentis, semper absque dampno et detrimento tributa exigere et solvere debentium, equitate videlicet utriusque partis semper salva. Similiter inquiratur, discutiatur et moderetur, que et ubi sint false vie et indirecte quorumlibet tributorum, et quantum longe vel prope huiusmodi vias falsas singuli tributarii obsidendi ac itinerantes in eisdem prohibendi vel impediendi iustam et consuetudinariam habuerint et habere debeant facultatem. Vias autem novas in locis, quibus vie ab olim nunquam esse consueverunt, nemo pro communi et universali transitu itinerantium in detrimentum et dampnum tributorum vicinorum in faciebus suarum terrarum adinvenire presumat, alioquin de huiusmodi viis noviter adinventis in predictis congregationibus generalibus iuxta affirmationem iuratorum assessorum huiusmodi congregationum decernatur, an pro falsis viis reputande sint vele aliter restringende et moderande. Habentes insuper et exigentes tributa ratione pontis vel navium pontes huiusmodi aut naves sub debita reformatione semper studeant conservare taliter, quod viatores et tributa solventes absque impedimento per pontes et naves eorum transitum liberum et non impeditum facere possint; id vero facere negligentes penis et gravaminibus opportunis ad debitam reformationem et conservationem suorum pontium et navium in dictis congregationibus promulgandis per comites eorum parochiales astringantur toties, quoties eorum negligentia exlgente fuerit opportunum.

XXII. Postremo antiquam regni nostri consuetudinem presenti edicto confirmantes prelatorum, baronum et nobilium regni nostri approbante conventu stabilimus et ordinamus, quod nullus prelatorum, baronum, nobilium et regnicolarum nostrorum cuiuscunque status, dignitatis et conditionis existat, quoscunque infideles manifestos nostros et corone nostre ac regni nostri, necnon publicos fures, latrones ac malefactores presertim in congregationibus generalibus proscriptos in suis castris, domibus, bonis et possessionibus retinere, hospitare et conservare aut eis auxilium, hospitalitatem et favorem impendere presumat sub pena consimilis infidelitatis et furum ac latronum hospitalitatis, excepto, quod fures, latrones et alios malefactores in congregationibus generalibus proscriptos, demptis infidelibus, barones et castellani nostri in confiniis regni castra et fortalitia ac officiolutus et honores pro defensione confiniorum tenentes usque tempus acquirende gratie poterunt in huiusmodi castris et fortalitiis metalibus receptare et retinere.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales pendentis autentici sigilli nostri novi dupplicis, quo pro nunc uti rex Hungarie utimur, munimine roboratas. Datum per manus venerabilis domini Mathie de Gathalowcz, prepositi ecclesie Quinqueecclesiensis, aule nostre sumpmi cancellarii, fidelis nostri dilecti, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo tricesimo quinto, octavo idus Martii, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. quadragesimo octavo, Romanorum vigesimo quinto, Bohemie quintodecimo, imperii vero secundo. Venerabilibus in Christo patribus dominis Georgio Strigoniensi, Johanne Colocensis et Bachiensis canonice unitarum, Duymo Spalatensi archiepiscopis, Jadrensi sede vacante, Petro de Rozgon Agriensis, Waradiensi sede vacante, Georgio Lepes Transsiluanensis, Zagradiensi sede vacante, Henrico Quinqueecclesiensis, Simone de antedicta Ruzgon Wesprimiensis, Clemente Jauriensis, Waciensi sede vacante, Georgio Nitriensis, Chanadiensi sede vacante, Jacobo Sirimiensis, Joseph Boznensis, Johanne Tininiensis, Vito Corbauiensis, Johanne de Domnis Segniensis ecclesiarum episcopis ecclesias dei feliciter gubernantibus, Sibinicensi, Nonensi, Scardonensi, Traguriensi, Makarensi et Pharensi sedibus vacantibus. Item magnificis Mathyus de Palocz predicti regni nostri Hungarie palatino, spectabili et magnifico Hermanno Cilie et Zagorie comite, socero nostro carissimo, totius regni nostri Sclauonie bano, comite Stephano de Bathor iudice curie nostre, Ladislao de Chaak wayuoda nostro Transsiluanensi, Johanne et Stephano de Wegle, Segnie et Modrussie comitibus, regnorum nostrorum Dalmatie et Croatie predictorum, Desew et Ladislao de Gara Machouiensibus, Nicolao de Radwycz crucifero ordinis Prutenorum Zewriniensi banis, Johanne de sepedicta Rozgon tauarnicorum, Emerico filio Nicolai wayuode de Marczalianitorum, Johanne et Stephano de Peren dapiferorum, Paulo et Johanne Komplot de Nana pincernarum, Laurentio de Hedrehwar agazonum nostrorum magistris ac Stephano et Georgio de antelata Rozgon comitibus nostris Posoniensibus aliisque quampluribus regni nostri comitatus tenentibus et honores.

8 MARCH 1435

Sigismund, with the aid of divine mercy ever august emperor of the Romans and king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia; Croatia, Serbia, Rama, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, and Bulgaria¹ to all of Christ's faithful, present as well as future, who will have notice of these presents, greetings in the Savior of all. Among all the matters which our attentive mind contemplates concerning the preservation of the welfare of our subjects, we are accustomed, by innate inclination of our nature, to turn our heart's attention particularly toward those things, with which the prince's foresight may restrain by a clearer definition of ancient custom as well as by the useful creation of new laws, the unbridled recklessness of human rashness not infrequently coupled with acts of violence, and may restore the integrity of justice, debased by the devious actions of abusers. Therefore, we wish herewith to notify all, both present and future, that recently, after we had been elected and made king of the Romans, and received the first Roman royal crown in Aachen, we then, with the advice of the electors of the Holy Roman Empire, went to Lombardy, in order to obtain the supreme imperial dignity, and received in Milan the second royal crown of the Roman Empire. Next, we visited the city of Rome and there received the imperial symbols with the usual solemnity from the hands of our most holy lord, lord Pope Eugene IV, then visited many regions of Italy and Germany, setting aside, at our discretion matters we encountered on our way regarding both the holy Roman Church as well as our empire.² Returning finally to our very own Hungarian kingdom, which had been deprived of our royal presence and was disturbed in her state and enjoyment of peace and tranquility by unjust and harmful violence, we established our first personal residence in our city of Pressburg, whence we summoned to our majesty, together with our loyal subjects, namely, the prelates and barons of this kingdom of ours, a special assembly of the nobles from every county of our kingdom. Finally, after they have gathered together, we have decided, determined, declared, decreed, and confirmed with the unanimous counsel, deliberation, and consent of these prelates and barons and nobles of ours, representing the whole body of our kingdom with full powers of those absent,³ in the interest of a proper, well-ordered and just ² This narrative summarizes the events of two decades: Sigismund was elected king of the Romans on 20 September 1410 by a split vote, and, after his accord with King Wenceslas IV, on 21 July 1411, unanimously; he was crowned king of Germany on 8 November 1414 in Aachen, king of the Lombards on 28 November 1431 in Milan, and emperor of the Holy Roman Empire on Whitsun, 31 June 1433, in Rome. Between 1410 and 1435 Sigismund was absent from Hungary about half the time (12 years: 1412–19, 1420–21, and 1430–34). During these years the kingdom was governed by vicars and lieutenants, initially two (the archbishop of Esztergom and the count palatine), in 1430 augmented by four more: the bishop of Eger, the judge royal, the Master of the Treasury and the treasurer (see Kovachich, Supplementum 1: 422–3, 449–56).

¹ The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of "kingdoms" that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, "Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources," in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

³ The clause about the diet's representing the totum corpus regni cum plena facultate is one of the first explicit statements of the noble deputies' claim to corporate sovereignty; see, among others, Joseph Holub, administration of justice, which shall be rendered equally to every inhabitant of this kingdom and also for the peace and tranquility of the same inhabitants, the following decrees, statutes, and laws to last forever and to be obeyed without fail.

1. Namely, first of all, in order to destroy and remove entirely all disquieting suspicion from everyone's heart which may arise against the judges and administrators of justice of this kingdom of ours because of favor or hatred or any other reason, we have decided that henceforth for all times in our said kingdom each and every one of the judges and administrators of justice, both ecclesiastical and secular, namely those who may be elected and appointed as palatines, judges royal, Masters of the royal Treasury, royal chancellors, vice-chancellors, and the protonotaries and deputies of the said judges and the assessors of their courts, voivodes of Transylvania, ispáns of the Székely, bans of the Dalmatian and Croatian kingdoms, the bans of Slavonia and Mačva, also the ispáns and noble magistrates of any county, together with their deputies at court who are to be appointed to substitute for them, and the assessors of the county court,⁴ should at the time of their installation into these legal and jurisdictional honors and offices swear an oath into our royal hands or into that of our appointed deputies in the following words, namely: I, T., swear to God and to the Holy Mother of God, Virgin Mary, to all the saints and God's chosen ones that I will pass just and true judgment and do justice to the utmost of my ability, leaving aside and discarding any kind of request, reward, favor, love, or hatred, as I understand that according to God justice is to be done, to each litigant appearing before me, each and every one of them, without regard to person, not discerning between rich or poor. So help me God and the Blessed Virgin Mary and this wood of the life-giving cross of our Lord, Jesus Christ.⁵

2. Noble magistrates of every county must be elected and appointed from the richer and wealthier noblemen whom all the nobles of that county by common consent regard and consider suitable for that office, and those elected must not refuse the magistracy but must accept it under the penalty of 25 marks which must be pitilessly collected by the county community from those who act contrariwise, except those who are placed by the king, the queen, prelates, or barons or others into honors or offices or who receive payment as soldiers or who for other proper reason do not live permanently in the county; and those elected are bound to hold this office for at least a year and to have seals which are easily recognizable, so that they will be able to issue trustworthy documents together with the seals of other noble magistrates and ispáns and alispáns. After one year they are free to refuse the office. If they resign or are removed from office or are replaced by the community

“La représentation politique en Hongrie au Moyen Age” in Etudes présentées à la Commission Internationale pour l’Histoire des Assemblées d’États 18 (Louvain-Paris 1958), pp. 104-6.

⁴ The protonotaries of the higher courts and the deputies of the judges of regional and local courts were becoming ever more frequently the actual administrators of justice. They were laymen learned in the laws; see György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] pp. 175-201 (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), summarized in “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary,” East Central Europe/L’Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 181-91.

⁵ The text of the oath is seen as having developed over a long period, F. Kovács, “Régi magyar esküminták” [Old Hungarian oath formulae], Magyar Nyelv 57 (1961): 290. The last words suggest that the oaths were sworn on a cross regarded as containing a relic of the Holy Cross.

of the county's nobles, they are not to be forced against their will to accept the same office before the fifth following year.⁶ From the fines levied at the court of the county magistrates, the portion due to the judges must be divided in two equal parts between the ispán and the noble magistrates.

3. As our majesty perceives from the repeated complaints of the gentlemen of the realm and also from personal experience that the more powerful gentlemen of the realm oppress and harm the less powerful in many ways by new seizures of estates and acts of might,⁷ wishing to hinder by suitable means these unusual acts and new atrocities, we establish and order that wherever and whenever anyone commits new seizures of estates or lands, takes a security by violence, robs goods and chattels, cuts down forests, beats, wounds or kills men, breaks into houses and estates and pillages them, or commits other similar new acts of might, then the aggrieved, damaged and injured parties should, after having acquired our royal letter of complaint and command,⁸ go to the ispáns and noble magistrates of that county where these acts were committed and call upon them. These ispáns and noble magistrates should then establish the full and complete truth about these new seizures of estates and acts of might with the testimony of that chapter or convent that usually acts in the county, summoning the neighbors, abutters and other fellow nobles from the county in form of an extraordinary county assembly,⁹ under the penalty specified in our royal letter on this matter, to their county court together with the parties of litigation under their oath swarm by touching the

⁶ The arrangements in this passage suggest that county administration had deteriorated in the preceding decades, so that better-off nobles (those later called bene possessionati) were often replaced by poor nobles (unius sessionis). The king's efforts to remedy the situation do not seem to have born fruit. Seals of noble magistrates (from the wealthy lesser nobility) are known from the early fourteenth century onwards. Having been usually attached en placard, they did not survive. The earliest extant exemplars are from the late fifteenth century.

⁷ "Act of might" (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, "criminal cases" falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between "major" and "minor" acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one. The terms nova occupatio, nova potentia had emerged around 1400 in royal charters (see e.g., (Zsigmondkori Oklevéltár [Calendar for the age of Sigismund]. Elemér Mályusz, et al. eds. Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1954– [=ZsO] 2, nos. 1172, 1213) and became technical terms in the subsequent years. It cannot be decided whether they denoted a special group of violent deeds, or the adjective "new" or "recent" simply referred to crimes committed since the regulations passed earlier; see 1397: 53.

⁸ A letter of complaint (littere querimoniales) was a royal mandate specifying the plaint for initiating a lawsuit and ordering an extraordinary county assembly (see below).

⁹ In obvious cases of acts of might a proclamata congregatio, verbatim: "announced assembly," which we translate as "extraordinary county assembly," was summoned on royal order. This kind of jurisdiction is first attested from 1404; see Imre. Hajnik, Bíróági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Árpád and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1899), pp. 303–6, and Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1990) p. 179. This procedure was often followed by the counties with reference to this paragraph, see e.g. MNL OL DI. 67797 relics of saints, on their faith in God and their fidelity to us and to the Holy Crown. Then, having inquired and established the truth, they should by their authority in this matter restore the occupied estates to those from whom they were illegally taken away, and defend and save them in these possessions, and completely restore and enforce the return of other violently abducted things and securities.

4. In order that they should have a trial and final judgment on the act of might in these cases, both parties are to be sent to our personal presence or to that of the count palatine or our judge royal by a set date with their letter and that of a chapter or convent describing the course of all the facts together with the names and the names of the estates of those who testify in this matter,¹⁰ and we or any other judge to whom the suit will have been entrusted shall and must pronounce final sentence without setting any further term or process of trial or extension, regardless of the absence of a party not appearing, by granting capital oath.¹¹ The parties of the suit, however, should have leave to settle without the intervention of a judge or the payment of any fine whenever they wish, for the ancient and laudable custom of our kingdom prescribes and allows free settlement to be made in such cases of act of might and others.¹²

5. Moreover, so that neither barons or judges or others who have been royal office-holders and those who have been appointed to honors by the king or the county ispáns, moved by greed or ill will, at any occasion unjustly burden, oppress or damage those people who are subject to their honor and jurisdiction and to whom they are bound to render justice against others, or let their deputies act in such a way, we have decided that those injured, damaged, or aggrieved persons who have suffered unjustly shall be able to find truth and prove their damages and injuries before a similar extraordinary assembly, with the testimony of the county's noble magistrate and a chapter or convent, by obtaining our letter of command which contains their complaints presented in the way mentioned above. And the noble magistrates, together with the noblemen of the same county, must carry out the law and render justice vis-à-vis these office-holders, or, following the way mentioned above, the noble magistrate or the convent or chapter must send a letter by a fixed date containing all the facts of the case to our majesty or to the judges and administrators of justice of

¹⁰ In cases involving estates, only noblemen had the right to give evidence. Since the nobility of certain witnesses was frequently contested, it was important for the court to know the principal estate (domicile) of the witnesses so that their status could be verified. Thus the use of the place of residence (estate) was a legal necessity; the form of "N. of M." replaced the earlier form referring to the origin of a nobleman, by "N. de genere M." By the end of the fifteenth century they came to be family names and were not altered even when the family's possessions changed.

¹¹ This kind of efficient procedure was followed in cases preceded by an extraordinary county assembly (see n. 9, above). A capital oath (iuramentum ad caput, Tripartitum II 32) meant that the defendant was not allowed to counter it by his own oath. Such a decisive oath was also allowed when the plaintiff presented three favorable letters of inquest and the defendant refused to submit to a fourth one.

¹² Settling "out of court" was ancient custom, see, e.g., in the thirteenth-century Regestrum Varadiense examinum ferri candentis ordine chronologico digestum, János Karácsonyi, Sándor Borovszky, eds. (Nagyvárad: Capitulum Varadiense, 1903), passim. Bónis (DRH, p. 258) pointed out, however, that this custom also opened the way to forcing lesser men to settle with their powerful enemies without applying the full force of law to the trespassers.

our court so that it can be tried there, so that the case can be settled finally and without delay in the aforesaid manner. And if these barons or royal office-holders or ispáns exceed the power given them by their office to such an extent that against them the whole community of their subjects lodges a general complaint, then we in person, by appointing a suitable man to this particular task, will and must, based on a true written statement by the noble magistrates, the nobles of the same county, and by the chapter and convent, render justice to the community as they deserve.¹³

6. We have decided and, in order to repress the unrestrained offense of act of might, command in our present decree that if castellans or officers appointed to castles by us, the queen, the prelates, barons, nobles, or our gentlemen of the realm commit acts of might, cause damage, act against the law, or carry out other evil deeds from the castle and with the power of their masters who have granted them these castles, estates, offices, or honors, then their masters who had given them the castles, offices, or honors are obligated and bound personally and from their own properties, to give full satisfaction for all damage and injury and must clear themselves by a proper oath that they were not privy to, nor involved in, and are innocent of the acts of might committed by their castellans or officers; and if the masters wish, they are allowed to make their retainers, castellans, and officers who caused the need for satisfaction compensate for the damage which the masters suffered in giving such satisfaction by taking away their goods and chattels and seizing their estates and, if these goods, chattels, and estates are not sufficient, by arresting them in person and taking and holding them captive until all the said damages are repaid, regardless of nobility, free station, or privilege of any other status whatever, but not exceeding the amount of the damages arising out of the said payment.¹⁴

7. In order that our said officers and said ispáns have no opportunity to burden the nobles and the inhabitants of our kingdom living under their administration and jurisdiction by arbitrary fines, we, following in this the ancient custom of our kingdom, declare that no penalties or fines are to be exacted by any secular judge at any other time but at an assembly held according to long-established custom by the count palatine or by someone appointed by the royal majesty to hold general assemblies, except in the following cases when penalties can be collected at times other than at the general assembly:

First, to wit, for the forced retention and harm caused to tenant peasants, who after having paid the just rent and all their debts, requested leave to move to someone else's estate, the county's ispán with the noble magistrates (without whom he must not act in such cases) is allowed to exact the ¹³ There is no evidence that such inquiries against royal office-holders were ever held; it is, however, interesting to note that a kind of administrative court was envisaged.

¹⁴ On the responsibility of lords of castles for the deeds of their castellans (noble retainers); see Erik Fügedi, Castle and Society in Medieval Hungary (1000-1437) transl. J. M. Bak (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1986), pp. 78-80. See also: István Tringli, 2014, "Mittäter oder Anstifter? Die Rolle der Helfer bei den Fehdehandlungen im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn," In Fehdehandeln und Fehdegruppen im spätmittelalterlichen und frühneuzeitlichen Europa, M. Prange and Ch. Reinle, eds. (Göttingen: V & R Unipress, 2014) pp. 163–194.

penalty or fine of 3 marks without delay at any time and as often as he finds him guilty from whomever they find guilty of this according to the law, in order to let the tenant peasant who was restrained and defrauded leave freely with all his goods and with his losses recompensed.

Then, anyone who abducts by violence someone else's tenant peasant who has neither requested nor obtained leave or has requested 15 days in advance but did not obtain it, shall pay the penalty of 3 marks for this violent abduction of the tenant and shall be forced by the county's ispán and the noble magistrates by the penalty of another 3 marks to return the same tenant peasant. If, however, any tenant peasant secretly escapes to someone else's estate without having obtained leave to move, and he to whose estate the tenant moved refuses to return him having been called upon to do so, then the county's ispán must and is bound to force him to return the tenant by a fine of 3 marks.¹⁵

Then, for contempt of court the penalty is 25 marks.

Then, anyone who will have captured a thief, a robber, or any other common criminal and then deliberately releases him must pay the criminal's composition to the county's ispán.¹⁶

Then, if the chamber's profit is not paid by the appointed date, then after the usual letter of fines is issued by the noble magistrate to the offenders, the county ispán with the noble magistrate is to collect the chamber's profit together with the fine of 3 marks to be paid by the village which has not paid the tax.¹⁷

¹⁵ The guarantee of free removal of tenants from their lord's land and the prohibition of their abduction was already decreed in 15 April 1405/I:6. Apparently there was still a shortage of labor in the mid-fifteenth century which might have encouraged illegal moves of peasants from one estate to another. It has been pointed out that lesser nobles were more vulnerable to such acts, for they could ill-afford to offer easier terms to their tenant, while greater lords could be more generous; see János M. Bak "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, eds., pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005).

¹⁶ The matter of bringing a captured criminal to justice was already addressed in the legislation of the eleventh century; see, e.g., Ladislás 2:3, Ladislás 3:9, 19. Composition (compositio), or man price (homagium) was a sum of money, which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system (the wergeld), widespread among Germanic peoples of the post-migration age, aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge but continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid was based on the victim's or the culprit's social and legal status and the nature of the crime. According to the Tripartitum, the man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks.

¹⁷ This procedure and penalty goes back to the chamber's profit's (lucrum camerae)—originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins—transformation by the late thirteenth century into a direct tax, but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. On its origins, see Boglárka Weisz, Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Period, in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64.

Similarly, since we specifically recall edicts of our predecessors and also several writings of our majesty established the custom and made it usual, that according to the honorable custom of our kingdom, ispáns of counties or their deputies collected the ecclesiastical tithe with the penalty of 3 marks each from villages which were reluctant to pay after the lapse of the specific and customary time following the church ban, we, therefore, approving, renewing, and following this practice, command by the force of these presents that after the imposition of the ban at times usual for the individual dioceses and places, the county ispáns or their alispáns are bound to make each village which has stubbornly suffered the ban for a month and still refuses or neglects to pay the tithe, pay this tithe on the request of the tithing-men after the lapse of a month immediately, without delay and in full, to whomever it has to be paid, along with a fine of 3 marks each for the officers themselves.¹⁸

Then, when the nobles of any county are summoned to an extraordinary county assembly by royal mandate in which it is stated that they are under the penalty of 3 marks, the county's ispán and the noble magistrates have the right to collect without delay the said 3 marks specified in our letter from those who do not come to that assembly unless their absence is caused by illness, old age, widowhood, orphanhood, or by disability of poverty, or if they can excuse themselves reasonably on account of urgent matters.

Then, the palatine, the judge royal, and every common judge ordinary, both ecclesiastical and secular, have the right immediately after finishing a case and passing final judgment in all cases tried in the courts to give first of all satisfaction to the opposing party from his portion and also to collect the judicial fines due to him.¹⁹

8. Then, we have decided that in cases of institution, inquest, summons, and other judicial procedures which are usually done with the participation of the men and the testimony of chapters and convents, commonly known as cases of authentication, the chapters and convents should appoint no common or simple members but from the chapters only canons, or at least such who hold ecclesiastical prebends or offices, and from the convents only monks who are consecrated priests.²⁰ The persons appointed to such testimonies by chapters or convents should, before they are sent to assist and to act at institutions, inspections of boundaries, examination of estates, or common inquests, take an oath that they will proceed faithfully and justly and will give true report or evidence in the matter. And the king's bailiff who proceeds in the aforementioned cases also must take an oath upon returning and before giving evidence or making a public report to the chapter or convent. Whoever is found to have proceeded unfaithfully and to have made a false report against his oath should be punished as a forger and perjurer by losing his prebend if he has any, and in addition, whether he has a prebend or not, by being incarcerated forever. If the king's bailiff proceeds illegally and unfaithfully in the said cases of institutions, examination or inspection of boundaries, then he will be convicted of perjury and of capital punishment, losing all his properties. Any nobleman, asked to be the king's bailiff accompanying the witness of a chapter or convent by one or more persons with our royal mandate containing his name or with any other customary type of letter, who refuses to accept and to bear the burden of proceeding and acting in this manner, is therefore under penalty of the usual 3 marks which is to be collected by the county's ispán without delay.

¹⁸ On the payment of tithes, see the earlier decrees, e.g., Stephen II: [20]; Syn. Szab:40; and 1351:6. For an overview, see Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed up to date monograph on the issue is missing.

¹⁹ The judicial fines could amount to considerable sums; they started out with 3 Marks (e.g., for a prorogation issued on the request of one party) but outstanding fines doubled every session.

²⁰ The purpose of this measure, just as the one (further below in the same article) regulating the duties of the royal bailiff, is to assure the impartiality of official witnesses at legal transactions; cf. the abolition of the authenticating function of lesser convents in 1351:3. See also Ferenc Eckhart, "Die glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter," MIÖG, Ergänzungsband 9 (1913/15), 395–558, here pp. 449–62 and Elemér Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon. [Clerical society in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), p. 72 ff. on higher clergy entrusting clerics in minor orders with important tasks.

9. Institutions to estates, examinations and inspections of boundaries ought not be done except with the neighbors and abutters legally summoned there, and to prevent fraud and cheating in such cases, the names of the neighbors and the abutters who were present at the time of the said proceeding must be fully included in the reports issued by chapters and convents.²¹

10. And in order that the causes for disagreement, which until now frequently arose regarding the charges for redeeming letters issued by chapters or convents, as well as for travel expenses so that the trouble of the witnesses of the chapters or convents should cease to exist in the future and be eliminated, we order by the present ordinance, following old and, indeed, honorable custom,²² that in all places of authentication, both chapters and convents, for each letter of summons, that is the first, second, and third, 24 pennies of the larger coin²³ are to be paid and rendered to the convent or chapter, together with their notary and scribe, for redemption of the letter.

Then, for any letter of final summons, 100 pennies.

Then, for any letter of advocacy, 24 pennies.

²¹ The importance of witnesses, whose memory was often called upon, was emphasized by Erik Fügedi, "Verba volant..." in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak. London: Variorum Reprints, 1986 ch. 6. Actually, this is a rare case when a rule proclaimed by law was immediately followed by practice: records of proceeding according to this prescription abound in the time following its promulgation.

²² The fees for letters and charters issued by places of authentication and the expenses to be paid for their service as authentic witnesses were regulated earlier (in 1351:21) but not as extensively as here. This list of charges remained a point of reference for very long time.

²³ Moneta maior refers to the silver coins (denarii), the exchange rate of which was regulated in 1427B, Additional measures relating to these coins were passed both by the king and, in his absence, by the royal council in 1430 and 1432; see DRH, pp. 251–57. However, the new coins were soon displaced by debased emissions. In the 1430s, the actual small coin in circulation was the quarting, initially worth a quarter of denarius but by the end of Sigismund's reign 6000–8000 of them were worth a florin (instead of 400). Under such circumstances the regulation of fines and fees in stable money was most necessary.

Then, for any letter of prohibition, protest, or similar document, if issued as letters patent, 24 pennies, if close, 12 pennies.

Then, for any letter of record, if issued as privilege, 100 pennies, if letters patent, 24 pennies, if close, 12 pennies.

Then, for any letter of inquest, whether patent or close, 24 pennies.

Then, for copies of ancient deeds retrieved from the archives, 100 pennies for the guardian or the retriever and for the redemption of the retrieved charter; if there was not too much writing and it was issued as letters patent, 24 pennies; but if the task of copying is extensive and it was issued as a privilege, then 100 pennies.

Then, for simple transcripts or for transcripts issued as letters patent for which the task of copying is not great, 24 pennies, but where the writing was long and was issued as a privilege, 100 pennies.

Then, for letters of institution when contradiction was made, 24 pennies, and for letters of institution in perpetual possession without contradiction, a redemption of the letter is to be paid according to the size of the property and the number of plots in the following manner: namely, for one, two, three, or four plots, 100 pennies; where there will be more than four plots but fewer than ten, for each plot 33 pennies; where there will be more than ten but fewer than twenty, for every plot, 24 pennies; where there will be more than twenty plots up to a hundred, for each plot 12 pennies; and where there will be any number of plots above a hundred, 8 pennies for each plot.

Then, for letters of inspection of boundaries, when no contradiction or summoning will be made, 24 pennies; but in the case of inspection of boundaries with simple conscription, or when similarly a simple conscription and final designation of boundaries is made with a royal bailiff sent from the court and an oath is sworn on the soil²⁴ in proper legal form or with the consent of the parties, for the redemption of the letter 400 pennies. Where, however, the case is sent to the royal court because the parties do not agree in such an inspection of boundaries, for the redemption of such letters, 200 pennies.

Then, for common inquests by judicial procedure, 100 pennies. Then, for the inspection of seizure of estates, 100 pennies.

Then, for seizing the properties of men sentenced to capital punishment and the confiscation of their chattels on court order, the chapter receives according to ancient custom the tenth of things taken away; and for redemption of the letter, 100 pennies.

Then, for estimations of estates on court order, 100 pennies.

²⁴ Oath on the soil had a particular ritual. It was sworn in a pit (grave) dug at the border of the disputed property, and the swearer had to speak the oath, dressed in burial cloths, with a clog of earth held above his head; the oath- helpers stood around the pit; see Márta Belényesy, "Le serment sur la terre au moyen âge et ses traditions postérieures en Hongrie," Acta Ethnographica Academiae Scientiarum Hungaricae 4 (1955) 361–394.

Then, for the divisions of estates, 100 pennies from each divided estate. Then, for proof of an oath, 24 pennies.

Then, for proof of an oath containing the names of the oath-helpers, 100 pennies.

Then, from amounts paid in the presence, or with the testimony of chapters or convents, the chapter or convent has no right to take a tenth or ninth unless when such an amount is deposited in their sacristy or safekeeping because of a disagreement between the parties; from those payments they can rightfully receive a tenth and ninth at the expense of that party which caused that the amount had to be deposited in this way.

The men of the chapters and convents taken as witnesses should receive for every day which they spend on the business of authentication, 12 larger pennies, whether they ride their own horses or are taken and led on the horses of the parties; thus, they and their horses and servants are to be taken from and led home on the victuals and expenses of those in whose case they were summoned.

11. Besides, because the issuance of letters and their redemption frequently occur in course of normal trials in our royal court by the judges ordinary and their aforementioned notaries, in order to prevent occasions in which argument can arise between the notary and the litigants, we regarded it advisable to declare the old custom of the redemption of these letters in the following way,²⁵ namely, that for letters of prorogation, 12 pennies must be paid to the notary of the court of judgment; for a letter of judgment or fine, also 12 pennies; for an ordinary letter of inquest, also 12 pennies; for a second letter of summons, 24 pennies; for a third letter of summons, 100 pennies; for a letter of final summons, 100 pennies;

for a letter on oaths taken, if the oath is granted to be sworn with two to five oath-helpers, 24 pennies; from him who swears with twelve, twenty-five, or fifty oath-helpers, including himself, 100 pennies; for a common inquest, 100 pennies;

for a letter on judicial combat, 200 pennies;

for a letter on capital oath, 200 pennies;

²⁵ These fees reflect old received practice of the courts; they were summarily regulated earlier in a charter of Sigismund of 21 July 1417 (DRH, pp. 235–7).

for the first presentation of legal instruments, 24 pennies; for second or third presentations of legal instruments under specific penalty, similarly 24 pennies; for letters of prorogation on summons to respond at 3 marks fine, 24 pennies; for letters patent of advocacy, 24 pennies;

for a common letter of record, 24 pennies; for other common letters, such as those of protest and similar ones, 24 pennies; for a letter of protest face-to-face, 100 pennies;

for a letter of sentence in cases of act of might, to the keeper of the seal, 10 florins with 100 pennies each, and to the scribe, 200 pennies; for a letter of institution into estates and simple inspection of boundaries, 24 pennies; for a letter of sentence on the recovery of an estate or other things, the fee should be decided by agreement between the litigants and the protonotaries according to the size of the recovered estate or chattels.

12. Regarding fees for the redemption of customary letters of sentence in our chancellery, the old custom of the chancellery is to be retained; and similarly in regard to letters of donation and confirmation, agreement is to be made with the chancellor according to the size of the granted or confirmed estate in the manner hitherto followed.²⁶

And because in all the cases of the abovementioned redemption of letters and of other payments and exaction of fines frequent reference was made to the number and quantity of pennies presently circulating, in order to remove any doubt, we declare in these presents that such pennies are meant of which 100 are equal and worth one golden florin; and if at any time smaller pennies happen to appear in circulation, then they will have to be augmented proportionately, with higher numbers of equal value.

13. Then, considering the all too frequently occurring uncustomary arrests of merchants and of other travelers for debts and other offences of theirs or of others,²⁷ by clergy and laymen, nobles and non-nobles, on their own property or that of others or in public places, by which hitherto much harassment, damage, and injury has been done and inflicted in the course of these sorts of irregular arrests, we declare, sanctioning the ancient custom of our kingdom, that anyone who intends to arrest someone is not allowed to make the arrest for any reason on the person's own or his co-proprietor brothers' estates, land, or official tenancy; otherwise, he must pay for unfair arrest a penalty of 3 marks, and the county's ispán must force him to end the imprisonment and to release his prisoner with another penalty of 3 marks. If, moreover, someone wants to make an arrest in a public place, then the judge of that very place should permit and allow the arrest in his presence only if the arrester can prove with a letter of either the county ispán or alispán or of the noble magistrates or some other authentic proof that he has already sought justice from the lord or the reeve of the estate where the arrested person lives, but he was recklessly refused, or if he was given final judgment that was not satisfactory and complete, and not otherwise. Once he has clearly proven the said facts in the aforementioned way, then the lord or the judge or reeve of that public place or estate has to keep the arrested person in custody and, by administering the law and justice among the parties in the customary way, give satisfaction for debts or other offences or things proven at his bench from the judicially-seized goods and chattels of the convicted person or, if his goods and chattels are insufficient, by detaining him in person.

²⁶ The fees of the royal chancellery were regulated earlier in 1351:7, and 1397:33.

²⁷ On such arrests and "reprisals," see 1290:10; and 15 April 1405/I: 8. Repressalia usually meant the right of a person, harmed or injured by a foreigner, to make reprisals on any citizen whatsoever of the native country of the offending foreigner. Here the concept seems to have been widened and included locals as well, aiming at the prohibition of self-justice. It is also evidence for the increasing literacy in administration.

14. In a case, however, in which the judge of the arrest, because of fear or favor or for any other unwarranted reason, would hesitate to confirm the arrest which was or is going to be legally accomplished in his presence or would hesitate to mete out justice and judgment and give satisfaction in the manner described above, then he should be altogether liable and indebted to the arrester whose adversary he permitted to go free, for the damage which would have been sued for by the arrest, unless the person or persons who are to be arrested has such power and might that the lord or judge of the place cannot resist or arrest him or if the arrested person manages to escape from the custody with the help of external power and against the will of the judge; in such a circumstance, the judge ought to protest in his own behalf publicly as soon as possible in the presence of his neighbors and abutters.²⁸

15. We also wish that the burghers, merchants, settlers, and other inhabitants of the free cities, towns, villages, and the estates of the king and the queen should not and must not make such arrests in the abovementioned way through their judges, officials, or magistrates on behalf of debts, properties, and other claims under the abovementioned penalties to be collected without delay by the Master of the Treasury or by their other superiors; if it is necessary to make arrests, they should be made in the same abovementioned way in a public place by a public judge.

16. The judge who acts and passes judgment regarding an arrest made properly and legally in his presence has the right to exact for himself, if appointed by the lord of the estate or if he is the lord himself, for his trouble and office, 40 pennies; if he is the reeve²⁹ of the community, 12 pennies from the legally convicted person.

²⁸ This paragraph is an unusually candid admission of the limits of public justice vis-à-vis powerful lords. A noble magistrate of humble origin or even the judge of a royal city was, indeed, not supposed to arrest a magnate. In these cases the king had to intervene. There is ample evidence that Sigismund was able to impose his will on all of his subjects, and did not hesitate to do so if his royal prerogative was at stake. Since the court of specialis presentia ceased to exist around 1429, it was at the personalis presentia where successful action could be implemented against violent nobles. For example, between 1433 and 1435, three powerful magnates received capital sentence for alleged misdeeds; see Pál Engel, Királyi hatalom és arisztokrácia viszonya a Zsigmond-korban [Relationship of royal power and the aristocracy under Sigismund] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1977), p. 62

17. Furthermore, as we greatly desire that justice and observance of the law flourish among the gentlemen of the realm and because we want to prove that these qualities have their origin in our majesty, we establish by our present decree that if in any county the rights of a deceased person escheat because of the extinction of the line and it is not clear whether such a property falls under royal right or belongs to the kinsmen or to the heirs in the female line³⁰ and there is doubt regarding these two, namely the right of the king and that of others, that is, of kinsmen and of female heirs, then those escheated and doubtful rights and any other rights which might occur in these cases must be looked after and held in trust until the devolution of the rights of such an heirless deceased owner is announced by the judicial bench in our royal court, by a suitable lesser nobleman, elected in each county by the county's ispán, the noble magistrates, and other nobles gathered together in a meeting from among the middle-ranking nobles and not the barons or major lords,³¹ without causing any damage, except that he is allowed to make and to spend moderate expenses from the usual income of these properties for which he must and is obliged to give account afterwards; and if after the announcement anyone should claim these estates and rights, he should go as soon as possible to one of the upcoming octavial courts³² in order to prove that he has right to these; and if he can do so, then the judges of the royal court should order and carry out institution to the estate. If however, evidence fails him, the estates and rights shall remain under royal right and whoever wants to submit claims later will have to seek his rights at law from the hands of the king.

18. Where, however, wives or daughters of men dying without male heirs are left in the estates and rights of such a man, these estates and rights ought not to be seized and taken from their hands until the truth is established about their rights, namely, whether those rights belong by heredity in perpetuity to the female heirs or not. If it is found that these rights do not belong to the female line, then, before the wife of such a deceased man is excluded from the dominion of the abovementioned

²⁹ The reeve (villicus) was the head of the village administration, in charge of minor jurisdiction and enforcement of royal laws, mentioned as early as in King Stephen's laws. Little is known about their status.

³⁰ While estates were usually inherited only in the male line, there were exceptions. If it could be proven that the property was purchased or acquired through defaulted mortgage, daughters and their successors in both the male and female line had rights of inheritance. Female hereditary right might have also originated in royal grant of 'son's rights' (prefectio) to sole surviving daughters; daughters of women so privileged enjoyed the same rights and could pass on the estate to their daughters. The sons and descendants of such a daughter might accordingly be designated "men of the female line" (homines foeminei sexus). On details, see e.g., Tripartitum 1: 17–41, passim.

³¹ As far as the record permits to judge, this arrangement for guardianship of estates did not become general practice. The properties were usually either seized by the crown or retained by those (widows, kinsmen) in actual possession of it.

³² Octavial courts (octava) refer to the session of royal courts of justice; of which here were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times estate, she is to be given full satisfaction for her dower³³ and other rights by the royal majesty or by those to whom the rights devolved. For the daughters, however, the paternal house and a quarter of the property are to be set aside as filial quarter and kept in her possession until the time of her marriage, following the customs of our country.³⁴ After the daughter has been given away and married, she should be given satisfaction by way of a monetary payment for her rights to the filial quarter. When, moreover, one of these daughters marries a man without property, then she should enter into the possession of the filial quarter according to the same customs of our country and keep it in perpetuity, provided that she married the abovementioned man without property with the knowledge and permission of her brothers and of those kinsmen of hers to whom these rights and the filial quarter would devolve after her marriage. Otherwise, if she marries either from the paternal home or from the court and service of a baron or a major noble,³⁵ without the knowledge and permission or without asking the consent of her brothers, kinsmen or her parents, she can demand her filial quarter not in land, but as a monetary satisfaction.

19. In addition to the preceding decisions we order that no ispán, ban, voivode, or other royal official of whatever title or position should dare to seize the churches of bishops, archbishops, abbots, or provosts or any other churches under royal right of patronage or their lands, appurtenances, tithes, and estates within the confines of their power and authority without special permission of the king, nor should they dare to enter partly or entirely into these rights.³⁶

³³ In Hungarian customary law the widow was entitled to a part of her husband's estates in return for her "cohabitation" (concubitus). Dower (dos, dotalitium) was originally the "price of the bride" paid by the bridegroom's family to that of the bride, then a grant of the husband to his wife on the occasion of their marriage. The dower was usually given both in land and chattels, but the woman did not have free disposal of the land so given, which was managed together with her husband's goods. After her husband's death, the widow could keep the dower unless she remarried. In this case, the kinsmen of the deceased husband redeemed the dower from her. The term often also included those valuables that were brought by the bride in the marriage (res parafernales, trousseau), which remained with the wife. See Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), pp. 24–6. In practice these claims had relevance only after the husband's death, at which time the widow's claims to immobile and mobile property had to be redeemed in money by his successors in the estate.

³⁴ The filial quarter (quarta [filialis])—first mentioned in 1222: 4—was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. See Fügedi The Elefánthy, pp. 45–6, Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary pp. 103–7 (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000). Péter Banyó, "Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére." [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92. See also Tripartitum I, 17–30 passim and elsewhere.

³⁵ The reference implies that young noblewomen served in the household of barons as ladies-in-waiting.

³⁶ The royal right of patronage was not part of the honores granted to officeholders and interference in ecclesiastical prebends was always seen as an abuse; see Vilmos Fraknói, A magyar királyi hegyúri jog Szt. Istvántól Mária Teréziáig [The right of Hungarian royal patronage from St. Stephen to Maria Theresa] (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1895), passim. The clause "without special

20. Then, because our eminence knows from experience that our toll collectors and those of the queen and of others, spurred by their own greed, not fearing God or respecting the law, owing to long-lasting abuse and carelessness as well as to neglect of necessary measures, have been able to cause a great deal of trouble, damage, and loss to our people and to foreigners traveling to and from our country with their merchandise and goods, by taking excessive and unnecessary tolls, we decree by our present statute that in every county of our kingdom sworn judges of the general assembly should ascertain at a general assembly held by the palatine currently serving or by someone appointed by the king the number and places of true tolls usually collected in that county and request the lords or owners of those tolls to present the letters about the initial establishment of the same tolls, and if in the letter the amount of the toll which is normally to be paid for each ware is given clearly, then the amount is to be adjusted and reduced to the presently circulating money, so that neither the just income of the collectors or owners of the toll be diminished nor the burden of those who pay the toll be increased.³⁷

21. Where, however, the letters about the first establishment of the tolls cannot be found and presented, or the found and presented letter perhaps does not state the amount of the toll to be paid, in that case, the said sworn judges of the aforementioned assembly are similarly to inquire and to ascertain the amount of tolls collected, and usually paid, in the past at the various tolling places in the county for certain goods subject to tolls, as far as the memory of men can recall, and adjust value of the toll to the value of the currently circulating money in the most just way without causing any loss or disadvantage to the collectors or to the payers of tolls and saving the rights of both sides. They are also bound to investigate, examine, and restrict those illegal routes and detours which are used to evade the tolls; they are also to decide how far from or close to these illegal routes the toll collectors should have and ought to have customary and just right to prohibit or hinder travelers from using these roads. Where, moreover, roads have never been established, no one may dare to create new ones across his fields for the common and general crossing of travelers, to the loss and damage to the nearby tolls; otherwise these newly created routes are to be judged by the community during the aforementioned assembly according to the reports of the sworn judges whether they are to be considered as illegal routes or to what extent their use is to be reduced permission of the king” calls attention to the fact that protection of ecclesiastical prebend had no power against the king. Actually, at the time of this decree, five out of fourteen bishoprics and other rich prebends (such as the priory of Vrana of the Knights Hospitallers) were vacant and governed by royal administrators; see Engel, Királyi hatalom, p. 80.

³⁷ See the earlier regulation of tolls in 1351:7; in the course of the fourteenth century the originally royal tolls fell into the hands of private landowners and, on the other hand, royal exemptions from them also increased (see 1397: 58). This article legalized the practice of county assemblies which tried to clear up the situation by inquiring into the title of the tolls and their customary amounts. Such a list, drawn up by the noble assembly of Co. Nógrád, presided over by the palatine, is known from 1405 (ZsO 2, no. 3890); similar actions are recorded from 1412 and 1424. One of these documents was published by Gusztáv Wenzel, Nyitra vármegyének XV. századbeli vámhelyei. Tanulmány hazánk közlekedési viszonyainak történetéhez [Tolls in fifteenth-century Co. Nyitra: A study on conditions of traffic in Hungary] (Budapest: Eggenberger, 1872). In general, see Magdolna Szilágyi, “Mobility, Roads, and Bridges in Medieval Hungary,” in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

or restricted. Those, moreover, who collect tolls for bridges and ferries must always take diligent care to keep the bridges and ferries in good repair so that the travelers and toll-payers can cross by these bridges and ferries freely and unimpeded without any hindrance; those who neglect to do so should be forced by suitable penalties and fines issued by the county's ispán announced at the abovementioned assembly, as often as the negligence of the toll-collectors makes it appropriate, to make the necessary repairs and maintenance on their bridges and ferries.

22. Finally, confirming by our present charter the old custom of our kingdom, we generally establish and order, with the approval of the prelates, barons, and nobles of our kingdom, that none of the prelates, barons, nobles, or any of our gentlemen of the realm of whatever station, rank, or condition dare to receive, entertain, or keep in his castles, houses, estates, and properties or give help, hospitality, or favor to those who are manifestly disloyal to us, our crown, and our kingdom, likewise to common thieves, robbers, and criminals, particularly to those who have been proscribed in general assemblies, under the penalty of the same charge of infidelity as that of receiving thieves and robbers, except those barons and castellans of ours who hold castles and fortifications or offices and honors in the frontier regions for the defense of these borders, who are allowed to receive and keep thieves, robbers, and other criminals who were proscribed in a general assembly, but not traitors, in the castles and border fortresses until such time as they receive pardon.³⁸

In memory and in perpetual validity of which we have issued our present letters of privilege confirmed with our new authentic double seal pendant that we now use as king of Hungary. Given in the city of Pressburg, by the hand of the reverend lord Matthew of Gathalóc,³⁹ provost of the Church of Pécs, arch-chancellor of our court, and our beloved faithful servant, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and thirty-five, on the eighth of March, in the forty-eighth year of our reign as king of Hungary etc., the twenty-fifth as king of the Romans, the fifteenth as that of Bohemia, and the second as emperor; when the following reverend fathers in Christ governed the churches of God felicitously: archbishops George of Esztergom,⁴⁰ John of the canonically ³⁸Proscription, Hung. levelesítés): criminals (publici malefactores), thieves, forgers and counterfeiters were proscribed by the county, usually at the county assembly, which meant that their properties, and sometimes their lives, were forfeit; see 31 August 1405/II: 12. The peculiar custom of tolerating criminals in the border castles is not mentioned elsewhere, therefore, not easy to explain. It is possible that, considering the enormous burden which the defense of the southern frontier placed on the kingdom, criminals were not pursued if they were willing to serve in the castles of the defense lines. There is a possibility that some special fortified keeps are meant, for the word metallis, used here for the castles, also means “round tower,” but is rarely used in that sense.

³⁹Matthias/Matthew? of Gathalóc (d. 1457), chancellor 1433-37, secret chancellor 1433-39, bishop of Vác 1438-40, of Veszprém 1440-57.

⁴⁰George of Pálóc (brother of Count Palatine Matthew, d. 1439), bishop of Transylvania 1419-23, archbishop of Esztergom 1423-39, archchancellor 1438-39.

united sees Kalocsa and Bács⁴¹, and Duim of Split;⁴² bishops Peter of Rozgony of Eger,⁴³ the Oradea see being vacant, George Lépes of Transylvania⁴⁴, the see of Zagreb being vacant, Henry of Pécs,⁴⁵ Simon also of Rozgony of Veszprém,⁴⁶ Clement of Győr⁴⁷, the see of Vác being vacant, George of Nitra,⁴⁸ the see of Cenad being vacant, James of Srem⁴⁹, Joseph of Bosnia,⁵⁰ John of Knin⁵¹, Vid of Krbava,⁵² John de Dominis of Senj,⁵³ the sees of Šibenik, Knin, Skradin, Makarska and Hvar being vacant; further, when the honorable lord Matthew of Pálócz held the palatinate of our said kingdom of Hungary,⁵⁴ the respectable and honorable Hermann, count of Cilli and Zagorje, our beloved father-in-law was ban of all Slavonia,⁵⁵ count Stephen of Bátor, judge royal,⁵⁶ Ladislás of Csák, our voivode of Transylvania,⁵⁷ John and Stephen, counts of Krk, Senj and Modrus bans of our said kingdoms of Dalmatia and Croatia,⁵⁸ Desiderius and Ladislás of Gara ban of Mačva,⁵⁹ Nicholas of Redwicz from the Prussian Order of the Crusaders ban of Severin,⁶⁰ John

⁴¹ John (Buondelmonte of Florence, d. 1448), archbishop. of Kalocsa 1424-48

⁴² Duimo, archbishop of Split 1412-35

⁴³ Peter of Rozgony (d. 1438), bishop of Veszprém 1417-25, of Eger 1425-38

⁴⁴ George Lépes (of Váraskeszi, d. 1442), bishop of Transylvania 1427-42

⁴⁵ Henry (of Alben, d. 1444), bishop of Pécs 1421-44

⁴⁶ Simon of Rozgony (d. 1444), bishop of Veszprém 1428-40, of Eger 1440-44, chancellor 1441-44

⁴⁷ Clement (of Molnári, d. 1438), bishop of Győr 1417-38

⁴⁸ George (of Berzevice, son of Peter, d. 1437), bishop of Nitra 1429-37

⁴⁹ James, bishop of Srem 1419-60

⁵⁰ Joseph, bishop of Bosnia 1428-42

⁵¹ John (Ivan), bishop of Knin 1427-35.

⁵² Vito Ostoir Marinich, bishop of Krbava 1431-?.

⁵³ John (de Dominis, d. 1444), bishop of Senj 1433-40, of Oradea 1440-44.

⁵⁴ Pálóc, Matthew of (d. 1436), secret chancellor 1419-23, judge royal 1425-35, count palatine 1435-36.

⁵⁵ Hermann, count of Cilli/Celje (d. 1435), ban of Dalmatia, Croatia and Slavonia 1406-08, of Slavonia 1423-35.

⁵⁶ Bátor, Stephen of (d. 1444), master of the stewards 1417-31, judge royal 1435-39.

⁵⁷ Csák, Ladislás of (d. 1439/40), voivode of Transylvania 1426-37.

⁵⁸ Frangepán/Frankapan, John (d. 1436), count of Modrus, Krk and Senj, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1432-36 and Frangepán, Stephen (d. 1481), count of Modrus, Krk and Senj, ban of Dalmatia and Croatia 1432-37.

⁵⁹ Gara (Garai), Desider of (fl. 1402-38), master of the queen's horse 1408-12, ban of Mačva 1419-27, 1431-37 and Gara, Ladislás of (son of the count palatine Nicholas iunior, d. 1459), magnate, ban of Mačva 1431-42, 1445-47, count palatine 1447-58.

⁶⁰ Redwitz, Nicholas of, knight, of the Teutonic Order, captain (sometimes titled ban) of Severin 1430-35.

of the oft mentioned Rozgony was Master of the Treasury,⁶¹ Emeric, son of voivode Nicholas of Marczal Master of the Doorkeepers,⁶² John and Stephen of Pereny Masters of the Stewards,⁶³ Paul and John Kompolt of Nana Masters of the Cupbearers,⁶⁴ Lawrence of Hédervár Master of the Horse,⁶⁵ and Stephen and George of the said Rozgony ispáns of Pozsony⁶⁶, and many others held honors and comital offices of our realm.

CONCORDANCE

Magyar Törvénytár	DRMH
I	I
II-III	II
IV	III
V	IV–V
VI-XVII	VI–XVII
XVIII-XX	XVIII
XXI	XIX
XXII	XX
XXIII	XXI
XXIV	XXI–Esch.

⁶¹ Rozgony, John of (d. 1438), ispán of Sáros 1410-35, lord treasurer 1412-36, master of the treasury 1433-37.

⁶² Marcali, Emerich of (son of voivode Nicholas, d. 1448), magnate, master of the doorkeepers 1434-37, 1446-48, master of the stewards 1440.

⁶³ Perény, John senior of (son of Emerich, d. 1458), magnate, master of the stewards 1431-37, master of the treasury 1438-58, and his brother, Stephen of (d. 1437), magnate, master of the stewards 1431-37.

⁶⁴ Nána, Paul Kompolt of (d. 1441), magnate, lord butler 1429-38, judge of the Cumans 1439 and Nána, John Kompolt of (d. 1451), magnate, lord butler 1432-38.

⁶⁵ Hédervár, Lawrence of (d. 1447), master of the horse 1429-37, count palatine 1437-47.

⁶⁶ Rozgony, George of (brother of bishop Simon, d. 1457/58), magnate, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1423-50, judge royal 1441-46, and his brother Stephen junior (d. 1443), magnate, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1421-43.

EDICT OF KING SIGISMUND OF HUNGARY OF 12 MARCH, 1435

This royal edict (as Kovachich called it, mandatum edictale), issued a few days after the decretum mains, may not have been a decree passed by the same diet, but rather a decision of the royal council based on the responses Sigismund received to his military propositions (see Prop. 1432/3). There is no precedent for two decrees issued by same diet and this document makes only perfunctory reference to the estates. Also, it was issued in non-privilegial form. In legal collections of the early modern centuries, it is regularly referred to as a manifestum of the king. However, its main measures regulating military service by the major and lesser nobles remained the basis for the country's defense arrangements for a long time; hence, it is appropriate to include it among the laws of the realm.

The structure of this law is also unique for its time: the decree opens with royal promises about the crown's duties in the defense of the realm and continues in almost perfect dualist-corporate form, with the duties of the nobles in response. It essentially codifies the king's propositions of a few years earlier, however, without distinguishing between richer and poorer nobles, which may have displeased the nobility, insistent on its legal unity as one estate. Earlier editions changed the sequence of the two decrees of 1435 and called this one the fifth of Sigismund's, placing it in front of the law of 8 March 1435; also the numbering of the articles was inconsistent and had to be corrected by the editors Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, of the Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978.) [=DRH] (see Concordance).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS.: Three originals; two in the MNL OL DL (12674 and 25064), one in the State Archives, Sibiu (Romania); all on parchment, only the last one has still the double pendant seal (for details, see DRH, p. 278).

EDD.: Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66) 10/7: 619–21 (incomplete); Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:245–51; DRH, pp. 278–82.

LIT.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789–1801), 1:462–6; József Deér, “Zsigmond király honvédelmi politikája” [Defense policies of King Sigismund], Hadtörténelmi Közlemények 37 (1936), 1–57, 169–202, here pp. 29–30, 32–4; András Borosy, “The militia portalis,” in: János M Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary. (Brooklyn,: Social Science Monographs, 1982), 63–80.

Nos Sigismundus dei gratia Romanorum imperator semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex, notum facimus tenore presentium significantes, quibus incumbit universis, quod nos, cuius regie celsitudinis providentia subditorum suorum et terrarum ac regnorum sue ditionis tuitioni et illese conservationi nedum introrsus, verum potius ab extraneis invasoribus officio sue dignitatis exigente se obligatam profitetur, volentes fines regni nostri predicti a partibus Bohemie et Morauie, a quibus propter ingruentiam presentis temporis ab aliquibus elapsis annis hucusque frequentiores ferventioresque ipsum regnum pertulit hostilitates, vi nostra regia reddere securiores, onus infrascriptum sponte, ymmo ex debito regali in nostras regias curas et expeditiones duximus assumendum:

I. Videlicet, ut civitates et castra subscripta: civitatem et castrum Poseniense, civitates Tirnauensem et Zakolcza, castrum Trinchiniense et alia castra ac munitiones et fortalitia in confinio Moraue et iuxta fluvium Wag situatas, quemadmodum tam in ipso ex parte Bohemie, quam in aliis omnibus confiniis et metis regni nostri ex quacunque parte apud nostras regias manus habita et in futurum, quovis eventu et casu eisdem nostris manibus applicari contingentia nostris sumptibus regalibus contra gwerram Bohemorum et alias undecunque emergentes munemus et tutabimus sufficientibus gentibus, armis et victualibus, aliisque necessariis, tam pro conservatione et defensione castrorum ac munitionum in se, quam ad tenendos campos et defendenda circumiacentia campestria contra quosvis insultus hostiles occurrentes. Si autem tanta potentia inimicorum irrepserit, quod maior foret viribus gentium nostrarum imperialium, nec ab invasione finium regni arceri et prohiberi per easdem gentes nostras imperiales posse verisimiliter videretur, extunc prelati deputati pro defensione illarum partium cum suis banderiis et viribus iuxta dispositionem de ipsis factam et observari consuetam, necnon comites singulorum comitatuum pro earundem partium vel aliarum gwerras habere contingentium defensione modo simili deputatorum sub banderio regali cum baronibus, proceribus et nobilibus dictorum comitatuum et eorum gentibus per modum generalis expeditionis exercitualis viribus coniunctis et adunatis succurrere debebunt ad repellendos insultus hostiles supradictos.

II. Conclusum est insuper et statutum per nostram maiestatem cum prelatibus, baronibus et regnicolis nostris prenotatis, quod tempore universalis exercitus generaliter proclamati singuli barones, proceres et nobiles possessionati secundum quantitatem dominiorum ipsorum, videlicet de singulis triginta tribus jobagionibus proprias sessiones et terras more aliorum jobagionum in possessionibus, quibus resident, habentibus, ac census, collectas, munera et alia servitia dominorum cum aliis jobagionibus supportantibus unum, de centum vero tres et sic consequenter de aliis, quotquot habuerint, de singulis centum singulos tres pharetrarios equestres, ad minus videlicet arcus, pharetras, gladios et biccellos habentes et ad bellandum aptos et utiles ipsimet personaliter antecedendo ad quoslibet exercitus regni generales conducere teneantur. Hii vero, qui minus quam triginta tres habent jobagiones, suos jobagiones, quos habuerint, cum jobagionibus aliorum taliter coniungere et connumerare teneantur, quod semper de triginta tribus jobagionibus quorumcunque unus pharetrarius modo premissis armatus et dispositus ad exercitus generales transmittatur. Ceteri denique nobiles jobagionibus carentes singuli singulariter propriis in personis, hii videlicet, qui dominos habere dinoscuntur, sub quorum nominibus et expensis exercituare solent, cum eorum dominis ac gentibus seu banderiis, alii autem huiusmodi dominos non habentes, de propriis ipsorum possessionibus, domibus et expensis cum earum comite parochiali, illis tantum exceptis, quos decrepite etatis, viduitatis aut orphaneitatis et alterius consimilis impotentie causa necessaria videtur excusare, similiter pro sua facultate condecenter armati et dispositi exercitualmente proficisci teneantur. Ubi autem duo vel plures fratres indivisi et in uno victu manentes extiterint, uno eorum ad huiusmodi generales exercitus proficiscente alius vel alii remanere debent excusati. Illi vero, qui propriis in personis sub banderio et stipendio regali vel baronum procedere habebunt, preter et ultra gentes suas de honoribus aut stipendiis regalibus vel baronum secum servientes et exercituare debentes nichilominus pretactum numerum exercituantium de suis propriis possessionibus cum comite suo parochiali seu comitibus illius seu illorum comitatum, in quo vel in quibus possessiones sue existunt, expediant et transmittant ad illas partes in pro illo tempore, quibus iidem comites parochiales singulorum comitatum debebunt exercituare.

III. Preterea prelati, barones et nobiles regni nostri castra., fortalitia et munitiones habentes eorum castellanos seu alios nobiles pro custodia huiusmodi fortalitorum necessarios, similiter ipsi barones, nobiles et maiores persone seculares coram coniugibus et domesticis suis personas nobiles pro magistris curie et alias ad conservandum honorem curiarum suarum deputandi et relinquendi habeant facultatem, moderate tamen et tantummodo inevitabiliter necessarias personas in huiusmodi servitiis occupando et relinquendo.

IV. Et propterea commissum est, quod in quolibet comitatu universitas nobilium eiusdem comitatus conveniendo certum ex eis eligere debeant de mediocri statu nobilium, non ex potentioribus, qui cum iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus numerum jobagionum quorumlibet regalium, reginalium et baronum ac nobilium in ipso comitatu possessiones habentium tempore proclamationis exercitus generalis fideliter computet, dicet, conscribi faciat et registrari, par seu copiam huiusmodi registri tradendo comiti suo parochiali.

V. Item quod quilibet tam in generali exercitu regnicolarum, quam ad stipendia exercituare debens die et termino expeditioni exercituali, cui interesse debeat, assignatis absque omni crastinatione in loco deputato cum omni gente sua, cum qua ad exercitum ire tenetur, constituatur. Quicumque autem ad huiusmodi generales exercitus proficisci debentes tempore proclamationis et instaurationis eorundem contumaciter ire et proficisci neglexerint, aut multum tarde terminum et locum universalis conventionis ipsius exercitus prenotatos studiose pretermittendo, ceteris exercituantibus fatigatis aut dispersis seu conflictu bellicoso iam commisso et habito supervenerint, aut tempore debito venientes et comparentes tandem ante debitam et finalem expeditionem belli occasione qualibet conficta, non habita nostra vel capitaneorum ipsius exercitus licentia, de eodem exercitu temerarie recesserint, tales expediti minime reputentur, sed eorum possessiones, pro huiusmodi non venientia vel tarditate aut temerario discessu occupentur; et de huiusmodi possessionibus occupatis per nostram maiestatem de consilio prelatorum et baronum nostrorum, quid agendum sit, deliberetur.

VI. Item quod exercituantes tempore estivo in villis et segetibus descensus facere non debeant, sed in campis vacuis, in quibus segetes pedibus equorum non conculcent neque destruant, nullaque dampna et nocumenta inferre presumant, nichil omnino preter herbas non falcatas, ligna et aquam absque debito pretio capientes seu auferentes. Pretia vero victualium cuiuslibet generis, tam pro borninibus, quam equis necessariorum in quolibet comitatu ante adventum exercituantium per communitatem nobilium eiusdem comitatus secundum fertiliorum vel infertilem eventum temporis et anni limitentur, moderentur et taliter ordinentur, ut intuitu ipsorum exercituantium pretia victualium in nullo excrescant ultra cursum priorem et communem in foris communibus usitatum, prout cupiditate hominum fieri consuevit.

VII. Si qui vero contra premissam ordinationem in villis et aliis locis modo pretacto prohibitis descensus facere aut victualia cuiuscunque maneriei absque pretio ordinato auferendo dampna irrogare presumpserint, extunc homines dampnificati, sive nobiles sint, sive ignobiles, ad presentiam comitis parochialis et iudicum nobilium comitatus illius, in quo huiusmodi descensus et dampna facta et illata extiterint, accedendo super quantitate damnorum, que sibi illata fore conquesti fuerint, si nobiles, per se, si vero ignobiles fuerint, cum suo villico et duobus vicinis suis domui sue ex utraque parte proxime coniunctis iuramentum prestant, ipsique comes et iudices nobilium super huiusmodi dampno et iuramento ipsi conquerenti litteras eorum testimoniales tradant, vigore quarum, quamprimum ad curiam regiam in presentiam iudicum et iustitiariorum ipsam curiam iudicantium accesserit, mox absque ulteriori probatione et litium protractione eisdem conquerentibus et dampnificatis iuxta contenta litterarum predictorum comitis et iudicum nobilium illius videlicet comitatus, in quo huiusmodi dampna per quoscunque exercituantes illata fuere, quibus quidem litteris absque ulterioris probationis, requisitione ex vigore presentis constitutionis plena fides adhibeatur, ex parte cuiuslibet dampna inferentis omnimoda satisfactio dampnorum necnon expensarum pro ipsis dampnis requirendis factarum sententialiter fieri decernatur, et cum executione debita finaliter et effective per sententiam iudicariam, quam palatinus aut iudex curie pro tempore constitutus vel eorum vicesgerentes et sigilliferi litteratorie dare et proferre teneantur, comitibus vel vicecomitibus et iudicibus nobilium illorum comitatum, in quibus ipsi exercituantes, qui premissa dampna irrogasse modo antelato comprobati fuerint, possessiones et bona habere dinoscuntur, per huiusmodi litteras sententiales scribatur et demandetur, quatenus ipsi mox receptis dictis litteris sententialibus huiusmodi levis et dampnum passis ex parte ipsorum dampna inferentium per ablationes rerum et bonorum eorumdem, et si necesse fuerit, possessionum occupationes, super omnibus in huiusmodi litteris sententialibus contentis coram testimonio alicuius capituli vel conventus omnimodam et indilatam satisfactionem teneantur exhibere.

VIII. Quicumque autem ex huiusmodi exercituantibus potentiarias seu voluntarias succensiones et combustiones aut depredationes villarum et possessionum, effractiones ecclesiarum, nobilium et virorum ecclesiasticorum propriarum curiarum et domorum invasiones et depredationes, mulierum vel virginum spoliaciones, raptus et dehonestaciones, hominum interfectiones, verberaciones et vulneraciones et alios similes maiores et enormes actus potentiarios committere presumpserint, extunc contra tales premissis modo et ordine in illis comitatibus, in quibus huiusmodi facta potentaria patrata fuerint, inquisita et comperta veritate in facto potentie convincantur, et ex parte eorum indilata satisfactio modo superius declarato per sententiam iudicariam impendenda declaretur et demandetur, ac per comites parochiales et iudices nobilium ipsius delinquentis et in facto potentie convicti ad executionem earundem sententiarum per occupationes possessionum, rerum et bonorum ablationes et alia in talibus fieri solita per palatinum aut iudicem curie finaliter et effective procedi litteratorie committatur et demandetur.

In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras nostras pendentis et autentici sigilli nostri novi dupplicis, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, munimine roboratas. Datum Posonii, in festo beati Gregorii pape, anno dornini millesimo quadringentesimo tricesimo quinto, regnorum nostrorum anno Hungarie etc. quadragesimo octavo, Romanorum vigesimo quinto, Bohemie quintodecimo, imperii vero secundo.

12 MARCH 1435

We, Sigismund, by the grace of God ever august emperor of the Romans and king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia etc. notify by these presents all to whom it may concern that we, who profess to be bound by the duty of our royal eminence to protect and, safely maintain the subjects, territories, and countries of our dominion not only internally but even more against foreign invaders, wish to make more secure the borders of our said kingdom with our royal might from the direction of Bohemia and Moravia, whence, because of the present circumstances, this country has been exposed for several years to ever more frequent and violent attacks,¹ have decided, of our own accord and in keeping with our royal obligation, to assume the following burden as part of our royal care and concern.

1. Namely, that we will support at our royal expense against Czech or any other kind of attack and provide with sufficient men, arms, foodstuff, and everything else which is necessary for the maintenance and protection of the castles and fortifications and for campaigns to secure the neighboring fields and, defend the surrounding regions against any sort of hostile attacks the following cities and castles: city and castle of Pressburg, the cities of Trnava and Skalica, castle Trenčín, and those other castles, fortresses, and fortifications which are on the border towards Moravia, on the banks of the river Váh, and also those which are there towards Bohemia, and those situated on any of the borders and borderlands of our country on either side² both those in our possession now and those which may fall into our hands under whatever circumstance. If, however, enemies should invade our country in strength that is greater than that of our imperial forces, and we with these imperial troops of ours would not appear to be able to hold them back and to prevent them from overrunning our borders, then those prelates who have been ordered to protect this frontier region with their banderia and soldiers according to the arrangements made and customarily observed in this matter,³ as well as the ispáns of those counties which were designated in the same way to defend that frontier region or to repel any attack together with the said counties' barons, lords, and nobles, and their men, will be obligated to relieve us with joined and united forces under the royal banner, according to the rules of the general levy, in order to repel the said hostile attacks.

¹ Attacks by the Hussites, in response to Hungarian troops fighting in the crusade against them, began in 1428, when the troops of Prokop the Great and Prokoupek advanced as far as Pressburg. Hussites waged several campaigns in the northwestern part of the kingdom (today's Slovakia) and acquired some strongholds, such as Trnava and Tapolčiany in 1432, whence they extended their control over considerable areas. These towns were redeemed from them later for money.

² At that time the Margravate of Moravia was governed by Sigismund's son-in-law and ally, Duke Albert V of Austria (the later Albert I, king of Hungary), but some important Moravian fortresses, such as Brumov and Uherské Hradiště, were, since the 1420s, temporarily in the hands of Hungarian garrisons.

³ Hungarian prelates (the archbishops, bishops, and the prior of Vrana of the Knights of St. John) had the obligation, as "ecclesiastical barons", to mount an army under their own banner and report to the king's call, as other barons holding honors, ever since Árpáadian times. The specific arrangement of the northwestern border's defense being entrusted to the archbishop of Esztergom and the bishop of Eger was, however, recent; see Propositions 1432/3.

2. Our majesty, together with our abovementioned prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm, has furthermore decided and established that when a general levy is announced, each baron, lord, and propertied nobleman is obligated to appear in person and to lead with him to the general royal army a certain number of soldiers in relation to the size of his property, namely, for every thirty- three tenant peasants who have a plot and land in peasant tenancy in the village where they live, pay rent, taxes, and dues, and render other seigneurial services, together with the other tenants, one soldier; hence, for every 100 tenant peasants, three mounted archers,⁴ and, in the same way, for each additional 100 tenant peasants whom they have, three additional equestrians who will at least have bows, quivers, sabers and daggers, and are fit and able to fight. Those, however, who have fewer than thirty-three tenant peasants, must jointly count their tenants with other tenant peasants, so that for every thirty-three tenant peasants they always send one mounted archer, armed and prepared in the abovementioned manner to the general levy. Those, however, who have no tenant peasants have to go to war in person; those among them who have masters under whose name and at whose expense they customarily go to war should serve with their masters' men and banderia;⁵ others who have no such masters must proceed to the army from their own properties and houses at their own expense, with their county's ispán, likewise properly armed and equipped according to their means, except those who are excused from service because of old age, widowhood, being orphaned, or owing to some other disability. Where two or more brothers live on undivided family property within the same household, only one of them has to go to war during such a general levy, while the other or the others are excused and may stay at home.⁶ Those, however, who serve under the banner and on the payroll of the king or of the barons, nevertheless, must also send and dispatch, besides their own men serving and fighting with them from their royal or baronial offices and stipends, soldiers armed and equipped in the abovementioned manner from

⁴ The original arrangement of the militia portalis in 1397:6, the ratio was 1:20 (=5:100); the reason for the reduction of the numbers is not known. It may be worth noting that in 1397 Sigismund expressly promised to demand this kind of militia only for the impending war against the Ottomans; see Borosy, "The militia portalis."

⁵ This clause refers to those noble retainers (familiares), who served in the banderia of barons and prelates. These were a lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, was forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron or major landowner. He kept his noble privilege and was subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which he received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The laws refer to them very rarely, as in principle all noblemen were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See: Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. Budapest: CEU Press, 1998. 137-40; Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000., 110-31, and János M. Bak, "Feudalism in Hungary?" in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011) pp. 203-17.

⁶ In order to avoid the reduction of family estates, properties were often not divided among heirs, sometimes even for generations. See Rady, Nobility, pp. 45-8.

their own properties and with that county ispán or with those county ispáns where their estates lie to that region and for that time where and when the county ispáns of the counties in question are to be deployed.

3. Furthermore, those prelates, barons, and nobles of our realm who own castles, fortresses, or fortifications should be free to command and leave behind castellans or other noblemen needed for the protection of these types of strongholds; likewise barons, nobles, and other major secular lords may leave with their spouses and households noble persons and others as stewards of their household for the preservation of the honor of their court, but only in reasonable measure and only as many persons as are unavoidably necessary to stay home and perform these services.⁷

4. It has been ordered, therefore, that in each county the community of nobles should assemble and elect one person from the middle rank landowners, and not from the mighty ones, who, when a general levy is announced, together with the noble magistrates of the county, will count, declare, register, and hold a true list, compiled of all the tenant peasants, of the king, the queen, the barons, and nobles who have estates in that county and shall hand to the ispán of the county the duplicate or the copy of it.⁸

5. Then, that both those who have to go to war with the general levy of the gentlemen of the realm and those who serve for pay must present themselves together with all the men whom they are obligated to lead to the army, without delay at the designated place, on that day and date for which the campaign was announced. Moreover, anyone who should appear at such a general levy, but obstinately refuses to go and appear at the time for which the campaign is called and summoned, or, deliberately ignoring the time and place for assembling, comes and appears too late, when the other warriors have already been exhausted or have been scattered or the combat has already been held and fought, or though having presented himself and arrived on time impudently leaves the army before the proper and final settlement of the battle on any pretext, without our permission or that of the commanders of the army, is in no way to be considered as free from his obligation, but because of his absence, delay, or impudent desertion, his estates are to be seized, and our majesty will consult with the prelates and barons concerning what should be done with the estates of such a person.⁹

6. Then, that in summer time soldiers are not to quarter themselves in villages or on sown land, but in empty fields, where the horses will not trample down or spoil the crop; they should not cause

⁷ In Sigismund's times the greatest lords began to organize households modelled after the king's. They created dignitaries (chancellor, marshal, and so on) from among their noble retainers and in records issued for their subjects used formulas typical for the royal chancellery. These can be seen as the first symptoms of a new social order, based on the predominance of the magnates, which was to be fully established by the end of the fifteenth century.

⁸ No such register survived. A list of landowners in Co. Ung, from 1398, obviously the implementation of 1397:6, drawn up by the noble magistrates on the king's command was studied by Pál Engel in his unpublished dissertation, "Ung megye nemesi társadalma" [Noble society in Co. Ung], Budapest, 1985.

⁹ Confiscation of property was the customary punishment of deserters; a charter of Sigismund of 21 April 1411 refers to such a procedure, based on a generale edictum of the king.

any damage or loss, and they are not allowed to take or collect anything without paying its due price, except for uncut grass, wood, and water. In every county the community of nobles of that county ought to fix, prescribe, and determine the price of all the foodstuff needed by the soldiers and the horses before the army's arrival, according to the fertility or infertility of the year and the season, so that upon the arrival of the army the prices of foodstuff should not rise above the previous general price asked at the public market, as usually happens because of people's greed.¹⁰

7. If anyone dares to billet in villages or other prohibited places or dares to take any kind of food without paying the established price, against the aforementioned ordinance, then the wronged persons, be they nobles or not, ought to go to the court of the county ispán and noble magistrates or that county where that kind of billeting or damage happened or was inflicted, and swear an oath on the amount of damage done which they claim to have suffered; noblemen swear by themselves, non-nobles with their village reeve and with two next-door neighbors from either side of their house. The ispáns and the noble magistrates ought to issue a letter of evidence on the damage and on the oath to the claimant, by the authority of which, as soon as the plaintiff arrives at the royal court, at the bench of the judges and justices sitting there, then without further inquiry or litigation on the case, or the basis of the abovementioned letter of the ispán and the noble magistrates of that county where the damage had been inflicted by a soldier — since that letter, by authority of the present law, is granted full credit without requiring further proof — full satisfaction must be given in regard to the damages done by anyone to the wronged person as well as for the expenses incurred while claiming the damage in a final and valid judgment, which must be issued and given by the count palatine or the judge royal, or by their deputies and the keepers of their seals in writing. By this letter of judgment the ispáns, alispáns, and noble magistrates of those counties where estates and goods of those soldiers lie who have been proven guilty in the abovementioned way of committing the said damages are to be informed and commanded that after having read the said letter of judgment they ought to confiscate the soldiers' goods and chattels and, should it be necessary, seize their estates in the presence of witnesses from a chapter or convent and give full satisfaction without delay to the wronged and damaged party, in accordance with all the items of the letter.¹¹

8. Those soldiers, however, who violently and deliberately set fire to, burn down, or loot villages and estates, attack churches, invade, and loot residences and houses of nobles and clergy, rob, violate, and rape women and virgins, kill, beat or injure people, or commit any other similar atrocious violent act, ought to be, after proper inquiry and the establishment of the truth, indicted of act of might in the counties where they have committed these violent acts in the abovementioned way and manner, and immediate satisfaction must be given. The count palatine or the judge royal should require in writing the county ispáns and the noble magistrates to ensure complete and effective judgment on the person found guilty and convicted of act of might by seizing his estates, confiscating his goods and chattels, and other things customary in such cases.

¹⁰ Cf. 1427A, passim. It is peculiar that this decree does not refer to the earlier legislation, which it repeats in essence in this and the following article.

¹¹ This unique procedure of compensation based solely on the damaged party's oath, even if he was a peasant, was unprecedented and soon fell into oblivion. It was contrary to legal custom in many aspects: first, the oath of a non-noble was never regarded valid against that of a nobleman; second, an unfree peasant was not considered able to act at law but had to request his lord to litigate for him.

For the eternal memory and force of which we have issued these presents and validated it with our new, authentic double seal pendant, which we use as king of Hungary. Given at Pressburg on the feast of St Gregory the pope, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred thirty-five, in our forty-eighth regnal year in Hungary, etc., the twenty-fifth as king of the Romans, the fifteenth in Bohemia and as emperor the second.

CONCORDANTIA CONCORDANCE

Magyar törvénytár	DRH /dDRMH
Pr.	Pr.-I
I	I
II-IV	II
V-X	III-VIII

LAW OF KING ALBERT (1437-40) OF HUNGARY

29 May 1439

Shortly after the death of Sigismund, a group of barons “elected” his son-in-law, Duke Albert of Austria, as king of Hungary. The main opponent to the accession of Albert in Hungary seems to have been Queen Barbara, but Sigismund had her incarcerated shortly before his death, thus the accession of their daughter Elizabeth’s husband was unproblematic. Nevertheless, the barons compelled the “elected king and queen” to issue a set of election promises—just as Sigismund had done in 1387, and as was to become general practice at Hungarian successions—in which a number of centralizing reforms were rescinded and the role of the “royal council”, that is, of the magnates holding baronial offices, was enhanced. (Undated, between 17-31 December, 1437; edited from a sixteenth-century copy in Wilhelm Wostry, König Albrecht II. (1437–1439) (Prag: Rohliček, 1907) pp. 145–49; repr. with corrections in J. M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973, pp. 136–38.) However, King Albert’s long absence on imperial and Bohemian business during the following years and a major Ottoman campaign that devastated southern Hungary caused such disaffection among the nobles that a diet had to be called to pacify them. The meeting took place under circumstances very disadvantageous to the king and his barons: a popular rebellion against foreigners in Buda (on 23 May 1439) made Albert and his entourage virtual prisoners in the royal castle. This situation was well exploited by the nobility who managed to change a good number of the election promises to their own advantage, reducing the magnates’ codified influence on the central authority.

Although the decree was not issued in a full-dress privilegial form, no historian doubts its formal legal character; also, King Matthias referred to it as a decretum (1458:1). There is, however, an entirely new element, pointing to the gradual emergence of corporate dualism: a day after the royal edict—which was, as usual, sent in several copies to the counties (see below, MSS)—the nobility issued a promise in return, not to request further privileges and to keep the law of May 1439. This was done through a charter, signed and sealed by more than fifty individuals (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 301–2). M. G. Kovachich, who edited the charter from a copy (Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790, p. 232), compared the pair of the royal diploma and the nobility’s “charter in return” to a “mutual pact and convention” as between parties to a contract. A few months later this procedure was repeated in an even more explicitly “contractual” style, however this time not with county deputies, but merely with magnates. The decree about a general tax for a major campaign against the Ottomans of 17 September 1439 begins with the decision of the king and his council and continues with the obligation of several dozen barons, prelates and major nobles, some of whom sealed the charter next to the king’s seal, to support the measure and help levy the subsidy (see DRH, pp. 304–07) See: Pál Lövei, “Sokpecsétes oklevelek a 14-15. századi Magyarországon” [Charters with several seals in Hungary of the 14.15th C.] Ars Hungarica, 39/2 (2013), 137-144.

The numbering of the articles 1439: 23–34 in the older editions is illogical. Döry and the others editors of DRH introduced a new count, which we follow. (See the Concordance).

MSS.: Eight authentic originals survived: in Hungary MNL OL DL. 103590, 88151, 13381/1-2, 59249, 64340, copies sent to known or unknown counties, all on parchment, two still having their pendant seals; one in Zagreb (Državni Archiv, Doc. Med. Varia 256), one in Košice (City Archives, Coll. Schwartzbachiana 220) both on parchment with seals broken or lost; and the transcript included in the charter of the nobles (Vienna, State Archives, Ung. Urkk. 96). For details, see DRH, pp. 285 and 301.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

- EDD.: Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779-1817), 13:882-900; Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829-66), 11: 244-56; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds. (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:278-99; DRH, pp. 283-304. The nobility's charter was first edited by Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum . . . (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 228-30; now in DRH, pp. 302-3.
- LIT.: Wostry, König Albrecht II. (<https://archive.org/details/knigalbrechtii00wostgoog>) 2:146 sqq.; Dezső. Szabó "Albert királlyá választása" [Election of Albert to king], in Fejérpataky Emlékkönyv &c. (Budapest: Franklin, 1917) pp. 312-25; Ferenc Eckhart, Magyar alkotmány- és jogtörténet [History of Hungarian Law and Constitution] (Budapest: Politzer, 1946), p. 42; Elemér Mályusz, "A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában" [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 70-74; János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 39-41.

Nos Albertus dei gratia Romanorum rex semper augustus ac Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex et dux Austrie etc. memorie commendamus tenore presentium significantes quibus expedit universis, quod excellentissimo principe domino Sigismundo, Romanorum imperatore ac prefati regni Hungarie etc. rege, patre nostro carissimo laudande memorie tempore noviter preterito deo celi, cuius nutui humana fragilitas nequit obviare, volente viam universe carnis ingrediente nobisque divina favente clementia in regimen et solium ipsius regni Hungarie votive succedentibus prelatorum et baronum necnon procerum et nobilium regni nostri cetus et universitatis idemptitas nostrum regium conspectum adeundo et libertates ipsius regni nostri, quibus ipsi prelati, barones et nobiles eorumque predecessores temporibus divorum regum, presertimque condam serenissimi principis domini Lodouici regis felicis recordii, predecessoris nostri freti fuere et gavis, in quampluribus suis articulis diminutas esse recitantes et nostram regiam serenitatem super reformatione status dicti regni nostri precibus et instantia propulsantes infrascriptos articulos et in eis contenta nostris litteris inseri et conscribi facere, approbare et in eisdem se per nos illibate conservari humillime supplicarunt; nosque promisimus, ymmo promittimus bona fide, quod articulos infrascriptos tenere et adimplere volumus et debemus.

I. Primo quod antiquas leges et consuetudines huius regni et libertates regnicolarum ecclesiasticorum et secularium cuiuslibet status ad priorem suum modum et statum, quantum de iure et cum honore eorundemque prelatorum et baronum ac regni nobilium consilio et auxilio possumus, reducemus, reintegramus et reformabimus, et de cetero in eisdem manutenebimus et conservabimus.

II. Insuper quod regia maiestas palatinum regni antiqua consuetudine ipsius regni requirente eo, quod idem palatinus ex parte regnicolarum regie serenitati, et ex parte ipsius regie serenitatis regnicolis iudicium et iustitiam facere potest et tenetur, ex consilio prelatorum ac baronum et regni nobilium pari voluntate eligat.

III. Item quod regia dignitas pro tuitione regni et confiniorum ipsius conservatione hominibus suis exercituantibus de stipendio regali dispositiones faciat, sic quod regnicolas ipsi stipendiati exercituantes non predentur. Exercitus vero generalis regnicolis tamdiu, donec huiusmodi stipendiati exercituantes adversariis resistere poterunt, non proclametur. Ubi autem ipsi exercituantes regnicolas predati fuerint, tunc tales pronuncientur ad instar aliorum patratorum actuum potentiariarum. Dum vero necessitate urgente exercitum generalem proclamari contigerit, tunc nobiles regni ultra metas et confinia regni ex quacunque parte eiusdem regni inviti more exercituantium non ducantur antiqua eorum libertate requirente.

IV. Item quod novitates et nocive consuetudines introducte aboleantur et destruantur.

V. Item alienigenis et forensibus hominibus, cuiuscunque nationis et linguagii existant, officia in ipso regno nostro non committemus, nec castra, fortalitia, metas, possessiones, honores, prelaturas, baronias, comitatus vel quascunque ecclesiasticas vel seculares dignitates ad tempus vel imperpetuum extraneis vel forensibus, nisi hominibus Hungaris conferemus, quodque prelati et barones homines extraneos et forenses non conservent.

VI. Item de triecsimis, lucro camare, montanis, urburis, cusionibus monetarum, camaris salium eorundemque comitibus necnon mardurinis, quinquagesimis et quibuscunque officiolatibus in arendam vel amministrative seu aliter quovis modo similiter hominibus idoneis, corone Hungarie suppositis et non extraneis liberam disponendi facultatem more consueto habeamus.

VII. Item lucrum camare in regno Hungarie, quinquagesimam in partibus Transsiluanensibus ac mardurinas in regno Sclauonie exigere consuetas exigere more alias ab antiquo consueto faciemus, reducendo ad statum tempore prefati condam domini Lodouici regis observatum.

VIII. Item prelati et barones duas dignitates, honores, baronias, scilicet seculares et ecclesiasticas simul tenere non valeant, nec homo secularis, sive vir ecclesiasticus dignitates ecclesiasticas occupative servare possit.

IX. Item nullus mercatorum forensium et extraneorum, cuiuscunque nationis existat, ad mercandum seu forizandum in medium regni, sed ad loca tempore pretacti condam domini regis Lodouici ad forizandum ac emendum et cambiendum deputata negotiationes suas peracturus more consueto accedat.

X. Item quod monetam auri et argenti in valore et cursu, quibus pro nunc existit, sine consilio prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium non immutabimus, sed cudantur obuli in eadem lega, qua ipsi maiores denarii cuduntur, quorum obulorum duo unum integrum denarium valeant; et quod penes dominum archiepiscopum Strigoniensem et magistrum tauarnicorum unus fidelis et idoneus vir in probatorem huiusmodi cusionis monete, auri scilicet et argenti deputetur.

XI. Item monete et pecunie extranee atque sales forenses in regnum non inducantur et nec acceptentur; celerius, quantum potest.

XII. Item quod dispositio pro serenissima principe domina Elizabeth regina et eius status honoris conservatione ex quo est heres huius regni, fiat ubicunque vult in regno, sic tamen, quod ipsa domina regina honores et officiolatus suos non extraneis et alienigenis, sed incolis huius regni, quibuscunque maluerit, conferendi et collatos, dum sibi placuerit, ab eis secundum suum arbitrium habeat facultatem auferendi.

XIII. Item dum in exercitibus et pugnis seu quibuscunque rixis cum inimicis regni committendis Hungaros aliquos de hostibus capitivare vel aliquid aliud lucrari contigerit, tunc ipsi Hungari huiusmodi captivos et lucrum, exceptis notabilibus personis vel capitaneis ipsorum exercituum inimicorum regie maiestati in captivos pertinentibus, quos nos ab ipsis captivantibus pro donis condignis recipere valeamus, pro se retinendi vel vendendi aut ecclesiis perpetue servitutis iugo tradendi et donandi habeant potestatem.

XIV. Item quod in defensionibus et conservationibus metarum et confinium huius regni consiliis regnicolarum utemur, XV. Item honores seculares absque quolibet consilio hominibus istius regni Hungarie et non advenis liberum arbitrium conferendi et ab eisdem auferendi habeamus.

XVI. Item possessiones et iura possessionaria non forensibus, sed bene meritis incolis tamen regni et corone Hungarie subiectis iuxta eorum merita et obsequia et non pro pecunia conferemus.

Perpetuas vero venditiones vel impignorationes iurium regalium et corone nec cum consilio, neque sine consilio quorumcunque faciemus.

XVII. Item quod proscriptiones seu dispositiones super metis et graniciebus inter Hungariam et Austriam prius facte in suo robore perdurent. De metis vero et graniciebus inter Hungariam et Morauiam quicquid de consilio eorundem prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium de iure facere debemus, libenter faciemus.

XVIII. Item quod in possessionibus et bonis nobilium et ecclesiarum seu quarumcunque secularium et ecclesiasticarum personarum violentas exactiones victualium, procuraciones hospitalitatum et alias quascunque aggravationes preter voluntatem invitantium non faciemus nec fieri permittemus, nec in domibus et locis prelatorum, baronum et in aliarum quarumcunque secularium et ecclesiasticarum personarum pro tractatibus habendis et aliis quibuscunque negotiis disponendis ipsis invitatis morabimur aut eos expensis, victualibus, curruum et sarcinatum vecturis, nunciorum et familiarium ac quorumcunque ad nos et de hoc fiat provisio pertinentium procuracionibus ultra eorum spontaneam voluntatem in aliquo gravabimus, sicut abusive et contra eorum voluntatem ab aliquo tempore retroacto fieri erat inchoatum.

XIX. Item ecclesie et ecclesiastice persone a taxis non diu abusive introductis libere et absolute relinquuntur, servitia tamen exercitualia more alias consueto facere teneantur.

XX. Item quod de maritacione filiarum nostrarum agemus cum consilio prelatorum et baronum ac nobilium regni nostri Hungarie, necnon cognatorum et proximorum atque subditorum regnorum et ducatum nostrarum.

XXI. Item quod ecclesiastica beneficia vacatura non faciemus neque permittemus per seculares occupari personas.

XXII. Item quod habitationem nostram hic in Hungaria more aliorum regum faciemus et continuabimus.

XXIII. Item quod procuratores nostre regie et reginalis maiestatum in sede iudiciaria una cum iudicantibus sedere non possint, sed inter causantes tempore, quo videlicet causa ipsarum regie et reginalis maiestatum agitur, stare debeant. Litteras etiam per causidicos in ipsa sede exhibendas per se non conspiciant, nec tractent suis manibus, nisi magistri iudicantes.

XXIV. Item in facto possessionum per regiam aut reginalem maiestatem aut eorum procuratores a talibus, qui perprius in dominio earum extiterunt, recaptivandarum et iuri regio acquirendarum, quas regalis seu reginalis maiestates iure mediante vigore huiusmodi recaptivationis sibi appropriare non possent, contra tales, qui sic indebite et absque iure impediti et expensis fatigati fuerint, ipse maiestates in estimatione talium possessionum ad instar aliorum similia facientium regnicolarum convincantur. Et similiter, si quipiam aliqua iura possessionaria nomine iuris regii pro se impetrarent et eadem ipsi iuri regio pertinere comprobare non valerent, in estimatione eorundem, si vero tales impetrantes ante decisionem cause in facto huiusmodi iurium impetratorum mote se de dominio ipsorum iurium ac de proventuum eorum perceptione occupative seu alio quovis modo intromitterent, nec tandem iuridice sibi appropriare possent, contra partem lesam seu litigantem et expensis fatigatam in facto potentie, prout ordo iuris requirit, convincantur.

XXV. Item iuxta requisitionem regnicolarum nostrorum nos unacum eisdem operabimus, quod despotus Rascie et comes Cilie ceterique magnates, dominia, videlicet possessiones, castra, fortalitia, civitates, opida et alia bona in hoc regno Hungarie habentes et tenentes huiusmodi castra, fortalitia, opida civitates et possessiones non advenis et forensibus, sed Hungaris hominibus pro honore dare debeant.

XVI. Item honores et officia nostra illis regnicolis nostris Hungaris, quibus voluerimus, more ab antiquo consueto iuxta huius regni nostri Hungarie consuetudinem conferemus.

XVII. Item quod nullus nobilium regni pro quibuscunque factis per quemcunque preter talem, contra quem sententia capitalis iuridice lata fuerit, possit detineri seu quoquomodo captivari.

XXVIII. Item quod nobiles tam jobagiones habentes, quam non habentes decimas dare non teneantur antiqua eorum libertate requirente.

XXIX. Verum quia frequenti querela regnicolarum nostrorum, ymmo quadam palpabili experientia teste nostra percepit celsitudo per nonnullas novas possessionum occupationes et potentiariorum actuum illationes eisdem regnicolas, inferiores videlicet a potentioribus multipliciter opprimi et gravari, ideo volentes insolentis et novis attemptationibus per remedia opportuna viam precludere statuimus et ordinavimus, sicuti etiam in decreto maiori antefati domini Sigismundi imperatoris alias Posonii de unanimi prelatorum et baronum ac potiorum huius regni nobilium consilio assensuque et voluntate edito aperte continetur, quod quandocunque et ubicunque fuerint facte nove possessionarie aut terrarum occupationes, potentiarie vadiationes seu rerum et bonorum ablationes, succisiones silvarum, interemptiones, vulnerationes et verberationes hominum, domorum et possessionum invasiones et depredationes ac alii similes novi actus potentiarii maiores, extunc lesi et dampnum et iniuriam passi impetratis litteris nostris regalibus querimonialibus et preceptoriiis, comites parochiales et iudices nobilium comitatus illius, in quo facta huiusmodi patrata extiterint, accedant et requirant. Qui quidem comites et iudices nobilium cum testimonio capituli vel conventus illi comitatui deservire soliti a vicinis et commetaneis ac nobilibus comprovincialibus sub certis penis in huiusmodi nostris litteris regalibus declarandis in sedem eorum iudiciariam per modum proclamate congregationis partibusque litem habentibus convocatis ad fidem eorum deo debitam fidelitatemque nobis et sacre corone observandam tactis sanctorum reliquiis prestitam super huiusmodi novis occupationibus possessionariis et aliis actibus potentiariis plenam et indilatam requirant veritatem, qua requisita et inventa possessiones occupatas auctoritate in hac parte eis attributa mediante restatuant eisdem, a quibus fuerant indebite occupate, ipsosque in dominio earundem protegant et conservent, alia vero bona et vadia potentialiter ablata absque defectu reddant et restitui faciant. Super facto autem potentie in talibus commisse partes utrasque discussionem et sententiam finalem recepturas ad certum terminum mediantibus eorum et dicti capituli vel conventus litteris seriem totius facti experimentibus ac propria et possessionum factum huiusmodi attestantium nomina continentibus in personalem presentiam nostram regiam aut palatinali seu iudicis curie nostre transmittant, ubi absque ulterioris termini et litigionarii processus observatione et continuatione, etiam partis non venientis absentia non obstante, nos vel iudex alius, ad quem causa transmissa fuerit, iuramentum capitis decernendo tandem finalem sententiam proferemus et proferre tenebitur. autem huiusmodi attestationem vicinorum commetaneorum ac aliorum nobilium comprovincialium fieri de et ablatiis lesis et dampnificatis satisfactionem impendi non eisdem omnino resistendo, extunc talis in illo termino, ad factum seu causa huiusmodi per comitem ac capitulum seu rescribetur, in facto potentie convictus pronuncietur seu eo facto. Volumus etiam et presentibus decernimus, ut premissorum executio seu causa per modum proclamate exinde mota sive vertens nec nostris regalibus seu alibus, neque prelatorum seu baronum quorumcunque, etiam regni nostri tenentium litteris, nec videlicet ratione exercitualis, neque conservationis castri cuiuscunque possit prorogari, sed eadem causa in uno termino ad hoc finaliter .

XXX. Item quod quilibet patrator novorum actuum potentiariorum, qui coram regia maiestate aut palatino seu iudice curie nostre regie per querulantes personaliter reperietur, in continenti sine ulla prorogatione ullaque cautela adinventata super omnibus sibi obidendis ipsi querulanti debeat respondere, alioquin contra tales tamquam absentes ipsa congregatio generalis detur. Partes tamen litigantes, quandocunque voluerint, absque requisitione iudicis et onere solutionis birsagiorum liberam concordandi habeant facultatem, quemadmodum antiqua et laudabilis regni nostri consuetudo huiusmodi concordiam in quibuscunque factis potentialibus et aliis libere fiendam dictat et consentit.

XXXI. Redemptiones autem litterarum et additiones testimoniorum capitularium seu conventualium, et qualiter aut quomodo false vie tributorum custodiantur, in eodem statu, quo in ipso decreto domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis continentur, relinquuntur.

XXXII. Item alia facta potentiaria minora, pro quibus videlicet proclamata congregatio non datur, in tribus terminis seu octavis finaliter in iudicio concludantur, sic videlicet, quod duas evocationes precedentes trina forensis proclamatie subsequatur. In factis autem seu acquisitionibus quarumcunque possessionum similiter duabus evocationibus et trina forensi proclamatione precedentibus pars adversa respondere teneatur, tali modo, quod si aliqua litteralia instrumenta apud se habere asseruerit, tunc semel sine onere, binis autem vicibus cum oneribus iudiciorum absque confidentia ulterioris prorogationis exhibere teneatur; aut si ad primurn terminum exhibitionis non venerit, tunc etiam duo termini, et si ad secundum non venerit, tunc unus terminus compleatur, causaque in facto possessionario mota finem sortiatur effectivum. Si vero pars adversa sua litteralia instrumenta apud manus alienas habere asseruerit, tunc eidem pro requisitione huiusmodi suorum litteralium instrumentorum unus annus assignetur, ut contra adversarium in facto ipsorum instrumentorum terminus compleatur sic, quod elapso ipso anno in primo termino iuridice assignato dicta instrumenta sua exhibeat, vel si exhibere nollet aut non posset, tunc absque ulteriori prorogatione ipsa causa similiter finem sortiatur effectivum. Si vero in acquisitione alicuius possessionis tres vel quatuor aut quinque sive plures persone, unius tamen et eiusdem generationis in causam fuerint attracte, non obstante absentia et non venientia unius vel duorum aut plurium, aut si ex ipsis unus vel duo aut plures in exercitu aut in conservatione confiniorum seu castri vel aliis quibuscunque servitiis regalibus fuerint constituti, tunc ratione horum causa in facto talis possessionis mota nullatenus prorogari possit, sed in eadem causa cum uno vel pluribus eorundem in propriis residentibus termini legitimi simul compleantur. Ubi autem omnes huiusmodi in causam attractos nullo penitus eorum in propriis remanente in notabilibus regni vel regiis servitiis occupari contigerit, extunc causa ipsa dempto facto proclamate congregationis generalis ad ulteriorem terminum more alias consueto poterit prorogari.

XXXIII. Item quecumque persona ecclesiastica aliquem nobilem in presentiam cuiuscunque iudicis ordinarii citaverit vel evocaverit, et si idem nobilis contra ipsam personam ecclesiasticam ordine iudiciario in sententia convictus fuerit, tunc gravamina maiora incurrere non possit idem nobilis, nisi homagium suum, scilicet emendam capitis sui precise eodem modo, sicuti ipsa ecclesiastica persona, et de dampnis tam ex parte ecclesiasticarum, quam secularium personarum iudex dampnum patienti satisfactionem impendere teneatur.

XXXIV. Item decrevimus, prout etiam per certos predecessores nostros reges decretum fuisse intelleximus, quod pro funeribus hominum per aliquem vel aliques interemptorum archidiaconi seu plebani parochiani, prout hucusque de mala consuetudine fuit observatum, nullam solutionem pecuniariam recipere valeant sive possint.

Nos itaque huiusmodi petitionibus ipsorum prelatorum, baronum, nobilium et regnicolarum nostrorum aures exaudibiles regio cum favore inclinantes suprascriptos articulos quoad omnes suas continentias et clausulas mera nostra auctoritate et potestatis plenitudine ex certaue nostre maiestatis scientia, necnon de consensu et beneplacito prefate domine Elizabeth regine, consortis nostre predilecte presentibus nostris litteris inseri fecimus, ipsos prelatos, barones, nobiles et regnicolas nostros premissis libertatibus in eisdem articulis superius expressis perhenniter fruituros et gavisuros committendo. Addicimus preterea ac nostro et pretacte domine regine, consortis nostre nominibus spondemus, quod memoratos regnicolas nostros et totum regnum nostrum in quibuscunque eorum necessitatibus non deseremus, sed fidefiter et toto posse nostro pariter cum eisdem ipsum regnum ac preassertos omnes regnicolas nostros ab omnibus emulis defensabimus ac in cunctis, tam premissis, quam etiam in aliis singulis bonis et laudabilibus ac iustis antiquis consuetudinibus eorum et regni nostri Hungarie predicti inviolabiliter semper et ubique tenebimus et conservabimus effective.

Quicumque autem hominum, cuiuscunque status et conditionis existant, hec ipsa, que in superioribus continentur, quavis illicita occasione impugnare molirentur, contra omnes et quoslibet tales ad eorum proterviam domandam et compescendam pariter cum eisdem regnicolis nostris, prout et ipsi omnes universaliter id ipsum se facturos spoponderunt, operabimur toto posse, presentium litterarum nostrarum, quibus secretum sigillum nostrum, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, appensum est, vigore et testimonio mediante. Datum Bude, feria sexta proxima ante festum sancte Trinitatis, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo tricesimo nono.

29 MAY 1439

We, Albert, by the grace of God ever august king of the Romans, and king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc. and Duke of Austria etc.,¹ entrust to memory notifying through these presents all to whom it may concern, that when in time recently past, by the will of the God of heaven, whose command human frailty cannot resist, the most excellent prince lord Sigismund, emperor of the Romans and king of the said kingdom of Hungary etc., our most dear father of blessed memory, went the way of all flesh,² and we, favored by divine grace, according to our prayer, succeeded to the governance and the throne of the same kingdom of Hungary, then the body and unified community³ of prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of our realm approached our royal presence and told us that those liberties of the same kingdom of ours, which these prelates, barons, and nobles and their ancestors relied upon and cherished in the time of the holy kings, and especially under the late most serene lord King Louis of blessed memory, our predecessor,⁴ were infringed upon in many respects, and they urged and most humbly entreated our royal serenity with urgent requests to reform the state of the said realm of ours, and to have the following articles and what is contained in them inserted and written down in a charter of ours, approved and to keep them in these said liberties. And so we promised; furthermore, we promise in good faith that we desire and feel obligated to maintain and fulfill the following articles.

1. First, that we shall restore, renew, and reform the ancient laws and customs of this kingdom and the liberties of the gentlemen of the realm both ecclesiastical and secular, of whatever station, to their prior form and station and, henceforth, preserve and maintain them in these as far as we shall be able to do so by law, in honor and according to the aid and counsel of the same prelates, barons, and nobles of the kingdom.

2. Furthermore, that the royal majesty shall choose a palatine of the kingdom, with the unanimous counsel of the prelates, barons, and nobles of the realm as required by ancient custom of the same

¹ Albert of Habsburg (born 1397), son of Albert IV, Duke of Austria, succeeded his father in 1404. Assuming government in 1411 as Albert V, Duke of Austria, he received the margraviate of Moravia in 1422 as a Bohemian fief from Sigismund whose daughter, Elizabeth, he married on 28 Sept. 1421. The couple was “elected” king and queen of Hungary on 18 December 1437 and crowned on New Year’s Day 1438. His wife’s claim to the throne of Hungary was not accepted by the estates. While Albert was crowned by the archbishop of Esztergom with the “Crown of St. Stephen,” Elizabeth was crowned, as queens as consorts usually were, by the bishop of Veszprém with a private crown. She was not considered a reigning queen, therefore, this decree bears only Albert’s name, while the election patent was still issued and signed by both the future queen and the king. Albert was elected King of the Romans (as Albert II) on 18 March 1438 and king of Bohemia by the Catholic majority of barons on 5 May 1438.

² Sigismund of Luxemburg died on 9 December 1437 in Znojmo (Bohemia).

³ Cetus (Class.: coetus) was frequently used for the community of the nobility of the realm.

⁴ The references here and in several subsequent articles (e.g., art. 7, 9) to King Louis I imply the opposition of the diet (and the barons) to the “harmful novelties” of Sigismund (see explicitly art. 4, below). Here, of course, the immediate reference is to the decree of 1351.

kingdom,⁵ because the palatine is empowered and required to render judgment and justice to the royal majesty on behalf of the gentlemen of the realm, and to the gentlemen of the realm on behalf of the royal majesty.

3. Then, that the royal eminence shall make provision from the royal income for his soldiers for the safety of the kingdom and the preservation of its borders, so that the paid soldiers will not pillage the inhabitants. A general levy of the gentlemen of the realm ought not be proclaimed, as long as these paid soldiers are able to resist the enemy. When, however, the soldiers plunder the gentlemen of the realm, such men should be sentenced like other perpetrators of act of might.⁶ When it happens by urgent necessity that a general levy is proclaimed, the nobles of the kingdom, from whatever part of the kingdom they may come, should not be led on campaign beyond the borders and confines of the kingdom, as their ancient liberty⁷ requires.

4. Then, that novelties and harmful customs that were introduced should be abolished and eliminated.

5. Then, we shall not entrust offices in our kingdom to aliens and foreign men, of whatever nation and language they might be; nor shall we confer castles, fortifications, borderlands, estates, honors,

⁵ Older literature saw in this article the introduction of the elective character of the highest officer of the realm, even though attempts of the nobility to have a say in its selection are already reflected in earlier laws, e.g. in 1290: 5. Norbert C. Tóth has recently demonstrated that the practice was at least a hundred years older. Ever since the election of Nicholas Zámbocki at a diet in 1342 (of which no decree survived), the palatine used the title palatinus regni Hungariae; see “Az ország nádora” [The palatine of the ország] in Középkortörténeti tanulmányok 7, Attila Kiss P., Ferenc Piti and György Szabados, eds. pp. 439-50 (Szeged: Szegedi Középkorász Műhely, 2013). The term ország/regnum meant in the Middle Ages not only the kingdom but also the great men of the country or even the entire enfranchised nobility. J. Holub (“La représentation politique en Hongrie au moyen âge,” Etudes présentées à la Commission Internationale pour l’histoire des assemblées d’états, 18 [1958], 84) put it thus: “Qu’était ce regnum?...aux XI^e–XII^e siècles, il designait les notables qui conseillaient le roi dans la gestation de ses affaires.” On the problems and the development of this term, see László Peter, “Antecedents of the Nineteenth Century Hungarian State Concept”, D. Phil. Thesis, Univ. of Oxford, 1966, espec. pp. 410ff.

⁶ The general levy, was defined last in 1397:6 obliging all nobles to take up arms if the king’s and the barons’ banderia cannot repel the enemy; certain excuses are listed and so is the arrangement for arming the so-called militia portalis -- for which, see András Borosy “The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526,” in János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary. Brooklyn, N. Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982) pp. 63–80. The trespasses of the army are discussed in detail in 1427A:1–4. -- “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. “Criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (sc. rape). Lesser violent acts were classified as “minor,” but no decree specified the precise nature of these crimes. Both of these delicts were repeatedly condemned in this decretum, suggesting the increase of lawlessness during the years of interregnum.

⁷ Cf. 1222:7, as renewed in 12 March 1435/II:6.

prelacies, baronies, counties, or any ecclesiastical or secular dignities temporarily or in perpetuity on strangers or foreigners, only on Hungarians; and that prelates and barons should not keep strangers or foreigners in their service.⁸

6. Then, regarding the thirtieths, the chamber's profit, mines, mining dues, the minting of coins, chambers of salt and their counts, as well as the mardurina, the fiftieths,⁹ and other offices,¹⁰ we should have the right of free disposition to grant these in farm, administration or in any other way, by approved custom, to suitable men subject to the Crown of Hungary, and not to strangers.¹¹

7. Then, we shall cause the chamber's profit, usual in the kingdom of Hungary, the fiftieth, usual in Transylvania and the mardurina, usual in the kingdom of Slavonia, to be collected as of old

⁸ Mályusz (p. 72) pointed out that in contrast to the election patent, which had only stipulated that such offices should not be granted to foreigners without the council's approval, this article imposed an absolute prohibition and underlined it with the clause "only Hungarians." See also ibid. p. 556, n. 418.

⁹ The thirtieth (tricesima) was a customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls; the chamber's profit was a direct tax, introduced after the royal mint ceased to profit from repeatedly issuing coins of lesser value by the early fourteenth century at the latest. Dues of mining of metal and salt, as regalia, were the most important incomes of the royal treasury. The mardurina, (marten-fur tax) was collected, primarily in Slavonia. Originally it was levied in kind but since the late eleventh century it was expected in cash. In the first third of the thirteenth century it was fixed at twelve Friesach pennies after each mansus. After the exemption of the nobles of Slavonia from royal taxation in 1351, the mardurina became the tax imposed on tenant peasants and hospites. In general, see: Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpadian Age" in József Laszlovszky et al. eds. The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64 and Árpád Nógrády, "Seigniorial Dues and Taxation Principles in Late Medieval Hungary" Ibid., pp. 265–78. The "fiftieth" was an old type of tax, collected in Transylvania (see art. 7, below). Not much is known about this tax, apparently rendered by mainly Romanian shepherds living on the lands of Transylvanian nobles, in cattle or sheep; see György Székely, "Az erdélyi románok feudalizálódása" [Feudalization of Romanians in Transylvania], in Idem, ed. Tanulmányok a parasztság történetéhez Magyarországon a 14. században (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1953), pp. 240–77, here p. 244; for its earlier history, see Ferenc Eckhart, A királyi adózás története Magyarországon 1323-ig [History of royal taxation in Hungary to 1323] (Arad: Réthy, 1908), pp. 12–13. It is to be distinguished from the quingena-tax introduced by King Sigismund on the authorization of the Council of Basle, but not collected regularly in Hungary.

¹⁰ The word officiolatus meant something similar to the honor (see n. 31, below), only for lesser officeholders; that is, it implied the income from the office as well as the administrative and judicial tasks. This is a rare reference to what may have been, albeit marginal, venality of offices in medieval Hungary, for which there is no firm evidence.

¹¹ This article was changed in a similar sense as art. 6; the formulation "subjects of the Crown of Hungary" may have been chosen in order not to exclude the (German) burghers of royal cities from farming the royal revenues (cf. Mályusz, p. 72).

according to ancient custom, reducing these to the status observed in the time of the aforesaid late King Louis.¹²

8. Then, prelates and barons should not be permitted to hold two dignities, honors, or baronies, at the same time,¹³ whether secular or ecclesiastical, nor are secular or ecclesiastical men permitted to hold ecclesiastical dignities by way of occupation.

9. Then, no foreign or outside merchant, of whatever nation he may be, should go to transact business, market, or trade in the middle of the kingdom, but should do so by approved custom at the places that were designated for trade or buying and exchange in the time of the aforementioned lord King Louis.¹⁴

10. Then, that we shall not change the presently existing value and duration of validity of the gold and silver coinage without the counsel of the prelates, barons and nobles of the kingdom; but halfpennies should be struck in the same alloy as that of the large pennies, in which two halfpennies should equal one whole penny;¹⁵ and that one faithful and suitable man should be assigned to the lord archbishop of Esztergom and the Master of the Treasury as inspector of the minting of coinage, that is, of gold and silver.¹⁶

¹² This article was addressed against the increased taxation under Sigismund, about which, however, few details are known. We know, for example, that the chamber's profit, previously paid in silver pennies, was under Sigismund collected at the rate of a gold florin from every five portae.; (Porta was the taxation term for a sessio jobagionalis, Hung. telek., a complex made up of a plot in the village, arable land, and rights to commons assigned to one or more tenant peasant.) On Sigismund's taxation see Mályusz, "Rendi állam" p. 114; also Idem, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1990), p. 246

¹³ Cf. 1222:30.

¹⁴ No legislation of Louis I on this matter is known. The measures implied here are more similar to the grant of right of staple to towns other than Buda by Sigismund, which was, however, rescinded in the decree of 15 April 1405/I:11.

¹⁵ In the decree of 1427B and again on 20 January 1432 (see DRH, pp. 255–57) Sigismund had decreed the same exchange rate for pennies. The quality of the smallest coins (obulus), worth half a penny needed regulation as they had lost their value, so that they were called in Hungarian fillér (from German Viertel) meaning a quarter. In the 1430s copper quartings ("farthings") were issued, of which 6000-8000 were worth a florin, instead of the previous 400 (cf. 8 March 1435: 10-13). The attempt here is to return to the old exchange rate. -- The election pact was here, once again, changed in favor of the nobility by granting the diet the right of approving the coinage (cf. Mályusz, p. 71), a major right of estates in all medieval parliaments, but one which did not become reality in Hungary until much later.

¹⁶ According to the cameral contracts of the fourteenth century, the archbishop of Esztergom (because of his claim to the pisetum, an addition to the archbishopric's claim to the title of royal revenues—on which, see Frigyes Kahler, "Das pizetum-Recht," Debreceni Déry Múzeum Évkönyve 1986 (Debrecen: Déry Múzeum, 1987) 181-91—and the Master of the Treasury had an agent each for supervising the coinage (see e. g., the cameral contract of 1342: 2). This article seems to have aimed at having a deputy of the diet also involved in the minting. Nothing is known about the implementation of this demand.

11. Then, foreign coinage, money, and salt from abroad must not be brought into the kingdom and should not be accepted;¹⁷ and let this be attended to as quickly as possible.

12. Then, that provision for the most serene princess lady Queen Elizabeth and for the preservation of the honor of her station, whence she is the heir of this kingdom, should be made wherever she wishes in the kingdom;¹⁸ with this exception, that the lady queen should not have the power of conferring her own honors and offices on strangers and foreigners, but only on inhabitants of this kingdom, whomever she prefers, and of removing these from them according to her own will.

13. Then, if, while engaged in wars and battles or any other conflicts with enemies of the kingdom, Hungarians happen to capture any of the enemy or anything else of value, then those Hungarians should have the right to retain their captives or plunder for themselves, or to sell or to give or donate to churches into the yoke of perpetual servitude, except for notable people or commanders among the captives who are enemies of the royal majesty, whom we should have the right to acquire from their captors in return for suitable gifts.

14. Then, that regarding the defense and preservation of the borders and boundaries of this kingdom, we shall take counsel with the gentlemen of the realm.¹⁹

15. Then, we should have the right freely without any counsel²⁰ to confer secular honors on, and to remove them from men of this kingdom of Hungary, and not on newcomers.

16. Then, we shall not confer estates and proprietary rights on foreigners, but on deserving inhabitants of the kingdom and subjects of the crown of Hungary according to their merits and ¹⁷ Cf. 15 Apr. 1405/I:20; 5 Aug. 1405/II:8; 1427A:8.

¹⁸ Elizabeth of Luxemburg, only offspring of Sigismund and Barbara of Cilje, born in 1409, was by unwritten Hungarian custom regarded as heiress of the kingdom or rather, as the suitable transmitter of dynastic claims by marriage. Her father obtained the throne as the spouse of a reigning queen (Mary), now it was Elizabeth's husband who de facto (if not de iure) inherited the kingdom. It has been recently pointed out that this kind of transmission of inheritance through the female line (even where succession of women was not accepted) was much more widespread in medieval Europe than hitherto noted; see Armin Wolf, "Prinzipien der Thronfolge in Europa um 1400," in Vorträge und Forschungen 32 (1987): 233-78. The queen's properties were extensive for she took over her mother's domains (for these, see Pál Engel, Királyi hatalom és arisztokrácia viszonya a Zsigmond-korban [Relationship of royal power and the aristocracy under Sigismund] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1977, pp. 197-99), apparently as a temporary arrangement. Shortly after this decree, on 11 June 1439, she was generously provided for by her husband with estates that were more modest than Barbara's, but still included at least nine castles and their appurtenances (see, József Teleki, A Hunyadiak kora [The Age of the Hunyadi] [Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1853], 10: 43-55).

¹⁹ In contrast to the election patent, the baronial council was left out from this article; see Mályusz, "Rendi állam," p. 71, n. 107.

²⁰ While art. 5, above, merely stipulated the exclusion of "foreigners" from all offices, here the exclusive prerogative of the king to make exceptions on his own was codified, clearly reducing baronial control on this matter; see Mályusz, "Rendi állam," pp. 72-73, nn. 113-4. Whether the expression advena ("newcomer") means here something different from the foreigners, otherwise generally described as forenses, is unlikely.

services and not for money.²¹ We also shall not sell in perpetuity nor shall we mortgage the rights of the king and the crown, either with or without the counsel of anyone.

17. Then, that decisions and arrangements made earlier on the borders and boundaries between Hungary and Austria should remain in force. Regarding the boundaries between Hungary and Moravia, we shall gladly do whatever we ought legally to do, according to the counsel of the prelates, barons, and nobles of the realm.²²

18. Then, that we shall neither make nor permit to be made forced exactions of supplies, demands for hospitality, or any other oppressions in the estates and goods of nobles and churches or any secular or ecclesiastical person, against their will; nor shall we remain uninvited, against their will, in the houses or places of prelates, barons, or any other secular or ecclesiastical persons for the purpose of holding meetings or conducting other business; nor shall we oppress them with expenses, provisions, the supply of carts, the transporting of baggage, or the requirements of messengers, retainers, or others belonging to us in any way beyond their free will, as had become the abusive usage, against their will, for some time.²³

19. Then, churches and ecclesiastical persons are to be freed and absolutely relieved from taxes abusively introduced not long ago, but, nevertheless, they are required to perform military service as was customary of old.²⁴

20. Then, that concerning the marriage of our daughters, we shall act with the counsel of the prelates, barons, and nobles of our kingdom of Hungary, as well as of our relatives, kinsfolk, and the subjects of our kingdoms and duchies.²⁵

21. Then, that we shall not keep ecclesiastical benefices vacant or permit them to be occupied by secular persons.

²¹ While neither Sigismund, nor, as a matter of fact, Albert, were able to stop giving away estates from the dangerously shrunken royal domain, it became usual that the king mortgaged these properties and even if he was unable to recover them (which was usually the case), at least some of the monetary burden on the royal purse was thus alleviated. The last major portion of the royal domain—some twenty to twenty-five royal castle estates—was lost to private lords under Albert. See: Engel, Királyi hatalom.

²² Since Albert was duke of Austria and margrave of Moravia, the border between his realms needed special attention by the Hungarian estates. The “previous arrangements” mentioned here are not known, for these borders seem not to have been disputed ever since the mid-fourteenth century.

²³ The descensus violentus, the forced exaction of hospitality (droit de gîte), was prohibited as early as in 1222:3, but seems to have become a renewed abuse under Sigismund.

²⁴ Since 1397, the churches were obligated to pay half of their income to the royal treasury (see 1397: 63). This “extraordinary measure for the duration of the present war” seems to have remained in force until Sigismund’s death. For the military obligations of the prelates, see 12 March 1435/II:1, with note 3.

²⁵ The demand of the estates for a voice in the marriage of the king’s daughters (Albert and Elizabeth had two daughters, Anna, born 1432, who later married William, Duke of Saxony, and Elizabeth, born 1437, queen of Poland 1454–1505) implies that the diet assumed that their husbands might claim rights to the throne of Hungary; see note 18, above

22. Then, that we shall take up residence and maintain it here in Hungary as other kings have done.

23. Then, that at such times when a case of the royal majesties is being heard, the advocates of the majesties of the king and queen cannot sit on the judicial bench with those judging, but must stand among those pleading cases.²⁶ They should not look at records presented to the bench by the opposing parties, nor should they take them in their hands; only the judging masters²⁷ may do that.

24. Then, in cases of such estates which are disputed by the king's or queen's majesty or their advocates in order to recover them for the royal right²⁸ from such men who previously had dominion in them, if the king's or queen's majesty cannot appropriate for themselves through legal process by way of this action of recovery, their majesties should be convicted, just as any other gentlemen of the realm doing the same things in the estimated value²⁹ of these estates in favor of

²⁶ Cases between the king (or the queen) and gentlemen of the realm were judged as a rule by the count palatine, whose bench, like all central courts (with the exception of that of the Master of the Treasury), consisted of members of the royal council. Under Sigismund, some of the king's advocates were at the same time influential royal councillors, such as Stephen Arany (fl. 1426–42, royal councillor, ispán of Nógrád, Hont and Gömör 1435–37) and were entitled, by this fact, to judge in cases where the king himself was an interested party. See also. Elemér Mályusz, “Die Zentralisationsbestrebungen König Sigismunds in Ungarn” in Études historiques (Budapest : Akadémiai Kiadó, 1960), 1, pp. 317–58, here p. 350; Idem, Kaiser Sigismund, pp. 233–34.

²⁷ This reference is to the magistri protonotarii, those practically trained lawyers who became in the fifteenth century ever more frequently the actual judges on royal and palatinal courts of justice; cf. György Bónis, “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary.” East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 187. The expression “masters of judgment” seems to be the verbatim translation of their Hungarian name (ítélőmester), which, however has not been recorded before the sixteenth century.

²⁸ Royal right (ius regium) was an ambiguous term, apparently referring to royal claims to any estate which, though not actually possessed by the king, was assumed to belong to him in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. Actions were moved by or in the name of the crown against persons accused of “hiding royal rights” (celatores iurium regalium) i.e., allegedly usurping a royal claim. The concept in its initial form emerged in the fourteenth century as a legal device for expanding royal power and was amply developed later by Sigismund's legal experts. Any landowner could be the victim of such a process and those who could not prove the legality of their dominion ran the risk of losing it, even if it happened to be their ancestral home. The danger could safely be averted only by a new royal confirmation of ancient rights. Such charters were sought for and were issued indeed in great number, as a kind of reward for services, by Sigismund's chancellery since the 1410s. They either contained a “new royal grant” (nova donatio regia) on the ancient property, or invested the privileged person in advance “with all royal rights that might be hidden in it.”

²⁹ Estimation (estimatio, estimatio) meant an estimate of the value of immovable and movable property, usually on the traditional basis (estimatio communis), but occasionally a tenfold (estimatio perennalis) valuation for immovable property. The low common estimation assured kinsmen's and even neighbors' and abutters' ability to purchase (alienated or judicially-seized) property, and also reduced the burden placed on families having to pay the so-called filial quarter in money, which was likewise calculated by reference to the common estimation. -- The “filial quarter,” first mentioned in 1222:4, was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates (see property rights) of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Antal Murarik, in Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the basic institutions of aviticitas] (Budapest:

those who have thus been harassed and burdened with expenses unwarrantedly and unlawfully. And similarly, those who may request for themselves any proprietary rights under the title of royal right and are not able to prove that it belongs to royal right should be convicted in its estimated value in the same way; and if such claimants enter into the dominion of these rights or the income from them by occupation or any other way before the case regarding these requests has been decided, and then they can not appropriate them legally for themselves, they should be convicted of act of might against the injured or litigant party burdened with expenses, as the order of law requires.

25. Then, according to the request of the gentlemen of the realm, we shall strive together with them that the despot of Serbia and the count of Cilje³⁰ and other magnates (namely, those lords who have and hold possessions, such as estates, castles, fortifications, cities, towns, and other properties in this kingdom of Hungary) should not give such castles, fortifications, towns, cities, and estates as honors to newcomers and foreigners, but to Hungarians.

26. Then, we shall maintain the custom of conferring our honors and offices in the usual way, according to the ancient customs of our kingdom of Hungary, on those of our Hungarian gentlemen of the realm whom we wish.³¹

Sárkány, 1938), pp. 163–192) saw it as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished this provision (Inst. Bk. III. tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, “Vita a leánynegyedről” [Debates on the Filial Quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 103–7

³⁰ George Branković, (1377–1456, Serbian despot [ruler] from 1427) and Frederick, count of Cilje, Ortenburg and Zagorje (d. 1454), the queen’s uncle, counted among the largest landowners of the realm. Both of them being foreigners, they were—with good reason—suspected, more than others, of having officials of foreign birth in their service.

³¹ Unlike his predecessors who conferred royal honors (a combination of courtly, baronial offices with that of one or more country ispán including the collection of royal revenue in the assigned counties, typical for the Angevin age) “in the usual way,” Sigismund appointed royal castellans who probably were not entitled to keep the entire revenue of their honor for themselves. This article of law aimed at suppressing this new usage. Actually, it soon fell into abeyance. See. Pál Engel, “A honor. (A magyarországi feudalizmus birtokformáinak kérdéséhez)” [The honor: Regarding the question of property in Hungarian feudalism]. Történelmi Szemle, 34 (1981), 1–19 here p. 14; English summary as “Honor, castrum, comitatus. Studies in the Government System of the Angevin Kingdom.” in Questiones Medii Aevi Novae 1 (1996): 91–100.

27. Then, that no nobleman of the kingdom can be detained or held captive in any way by anyone for any deed excepting those against whom a capital sentence has been passed by law.³²

28. Then, that nobles, having tenants or not, must not be required to pay tithes, in accordance with their ancient liberties.³³

29. As our majesty perceives from the repeated complaints of the gentlemen of the realm and also from personal experience that the more powerful gentlemen of the realm oppress and harm the less powerful in many ways by new seizures of estates and acts of might, wishing to hinder by suitable means these unusual acts and new atrocities, we establish and order, just as is also clearly contained in the decretum maius previously published by the said former lord Emperor Sigismund in Pressburg with the unanimous counsel, will and assent of the prelates, barons, and greater nobles of our kingdom,³⁴ that wherever and whenever anyone commits new seizures of estates or lands, takes a security by violence, robs goods and chattels, cuts down forests, beats, wounds or kills men, breaks into houses and estates and pillages them, or commits other similar new acts of act of might, then the aggrieved, damaged, and injured parties should, after having acquired our royal letter of complaint and command, go to the ispáns and noble magistrates of that county where these acts were committed and call upon them. These ispáns and noble magistrates should then establish the full and complete truth about these new seizures of estates and acts of might with the testimony of that chapter or convent that usually acts in the county, summoning the neighbors, abutters, and other fellow nobles from the county in form of an extraordinary county assembly, ³⁵under the penalty specified in our royal letter on this matter, to their county court, together with the parties of litigation, under their oath sworn by touching the relics of saints, on their faith in God and their fidelity to us and to the Holy Crown. Then, having inquired and established the truth, they should by their authority in this matter restore the occupied estates to those from whom they were illegally taken away, and defend and save them in these possessions, and completely restore and enforce the return of other violently abducted things and securities. In order that they should have a trial and final judgment on the act of might in these cases, both parties are to be sent to our personal presence or to that of the count palatine or to our judge royal by a set date with their letter and that of a chapter or convent describing the course of all the facts, together with the names and ³² This habeas corpus rule was first decreed in 1222:2.

³³ The exemption of nobles from paying the tithe was contained in a now lost edict of Sigismund of 23 June 1405, referred to in a charter of 1 August 1421, see DRH, pp. 216–17. In 1415, Pope John XXIII confirmed this exemption based on the service of the nobles “in the defense of the faith,” see Josephus Nicolaus Kovachich, Monumenta veteris legislationis Hungaricae (Claudiopolis: Collegium, 1815). 2:8–9. -- The reference to nobles without tenant peasants (jobagiones, Latinized from Hung. jobbágy, peasants under seigneurial jurisdiction holding land in tenure but personally free) indicated that a great number of legally noble men lived on the level of peasants. Later they were called “nobles with one plumbtree.” See: Rady, Nobility, Land and Service, pp.20-4.

³⁴ With the exception of the reference to Sigismund’s decretum maius, this art. repeats 8 March 1435:3–4; the last sentence of art. 4 wandered to the end of the following article.

³⁵ At an extraordinary county assembly (proclamata congregatio), in major criminal cases county nobles were gathered in a single place and examined under oath.

the names of the estates of those who testify in this matter, and we or any other judge to whom the suit will have been entrusted shall and must pronounce final sentence without setting any further term or process of trial or extension, regardless of the absence of a party not appearing, by granting capital oath. If anyone does by outright obstruction not permit that evidence of this kind be given by neighbors and abutters or other fellow nobles concerning losses and outrages committed and that satisfaction for losses inflicted be paid, then such a man, in that term to which a deed or case of this kind is assigned by the ispán or chapter or convent, shall be pronounced and regarded as convicted by that fact in the deed of act of might. We wish also and we decree by the present statute that the conclusion of the aforesaid matters or a suit of this kind initiated or heard at an extraordinary county assembly cannot be delayed for any reason, not even by a charter of our royal self or of the queen or of any prelate or baron or of those barons guarding the borders of the kingdom, or by reason of a military campaign, or of the defense of any castle; the case must be concluded finally in the one term appointed to it.

30. Then, that any perpetrator of recent acts of act of might, who, when personally confronted by the plaintiffs in front of the royal majesty or the palatine or our judge royal, must reply substantively, without any delay or frivolous evasion to all matters brought against him by the plaintiff; otherwise, a general assembly must be granted³⁶ against such men even if they are absent. The parties of the suit, however, should have leave to settle without the intervention of a judge or the payment of any fine whenever they wish, for the ancient and laudable custom of our kingdom prescribes and allows free settlement to be made in such cases of act of might and others.³⁷

31, Payments for letters, arrangements for the testimony of chapters or convents and how or in what way the illegal roads avoiding customs should be guarded, should be left in the same state as they are contained in the same decree of the lord Emperor and King Sigismund.³⁸

32. Then, other minor cases of acts of might, namely those for which an extraordinary county assembly is not granted, must be concluded in three terms or octavial courts by judgment; thus, namely, that a threefold proclamation at market days must follow the two prior summons:³⁹ In matters regarding estates or their acquisition, the opposing party must be required to reply after two summons and a threefold proclamation in the same way, in such a manner, that if the said party claims to have any written instruments with him, then he must show them at the first term without, or at the second time with, the burden of a fine without expectation of further delay; or if ³⁶ This formula seems to mean “give permission to hold an extraordinary county assembly,” but is not otherwise known from records of the royal chancellery.

³⁷ Settlement “out of court” seems to have been a widely used conclusion of lawsuits.

³⁸ Reference to 8 March 1435/I:10–12, 20–21.

³⁹ Octavial courts (octava) were the sessions of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George’s (23 April), St. James’s (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. Summons were first delivered to the respondent at his noble residence, giving notice of a lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, the citatio trineforensis (announced on three fairs) was issued.

the said party does not come to the first term to present them, then two more terms, and if he does not come to the second, then one more term must be granted, and the case moved in the matter of possession must be brought to an effective end. However, if the opposing party asserts that he has his written instruments in the hands of someone else, then one year must be granted to him for the recovery of such written instruments of his, so that the term may be completed against the adversary in the matters of the instruments; thus, when the year granted has elapsed, he must show his said instruments in the first judicial term, and if he is unwilling or unable to show them, then without further delay the case must be brought to an effective end in the same way. However, in the acquisition of any estate, if three, four, five, or more persons of one and the same kindred⁴⁰ have been summoned to the case, notwithstanding the absence or non-arrival of one, two, or more, or if one, two, or more of them are serving in the army or in the guard of the borders or of a castle or in any other royal service, then, for this reason, by no means should the case initiated in such a matter of a possession be postponed, but judicial terms must be similarly completed in the same case with one or more of those who reside at home. However, where it happens that all such men summoned to a case are occupied in the royal service or affairs of the realm with none of them remaining at home, then, unless the case pertains to an extraordinary general assembly, it can be delayed to a later term as is the usual custom.

33. Then, if any ecclesiastical person should cite and summon any noble to the presence of any justice ordinary, and, if that noble should be convicted with a sentence against that ecclesiastical person by the order of law, then that noble cannot incur greater penalties than his composition, namely the price of his head in precisely the same manner as the ecclesiastical person,⁴¹ and the judge is required to order compensation for the losses as much on behalf of ecclesiastical persons as of secular ones.

34. Then, just as we understand that some of the kings preceding us also decreed,⁴² we have decreed that no archdeacon or parish priest may or should take any payment in money for the funerals of men killed by a person or persons, as has become usual until now by evil custom.

⁴⁰ Note the assumption of joint property of (or at least common interest in) estates by several members of a kindred. As each defendant (and also claimant) had to be summoned three times, they could prolong a lawsuit almost infinitely by remaining absent alternately on some excuse. There is ample evidence for this practice.

⁴¹ Composition (compositio), or man price (homagium) was a sum of money, which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid (the wergeld) was based on the victim's or the culprit's social and legal status and the nature of the crime. The man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. (A mark was a measure of silver—and sometimes of gold—often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century the Buda mark [~245.54 gr.], belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary.) Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to a lesser extent the fine of the tongue.

⁴² Cf. 1351:1.

Having turned our listening ears⁴³ with royal favor to these petitions of our prelates, barons, nobles, and gentlemen of the realm, we have caused, therefore, the above articles in regard to all their contents and clauses to be inserted in our present charter entirely by our own complete authority and fullness of power in accordance with our specific understanding of our royal majesty,⁴⁴ as well as with the assent and approval of the said Lady Queen Elizabeth, our beloved consort, and shall permit our prelates, barons, nobles, and gentlemen of the realm to enjoy and to cherish eternally the aforementioned liberties described in those same preceding articles. Furthermore, we add and promise in our name and in that of the said lady queen, our consort, that we shall not abandon our said gentlemen of the realm and our entire kingdom in any of their exigencies, but we shall defend this realm and its inhabitants, together with them, faithfully and with all our might against all enemies; and we shall keep and preserve them effectively and inviolably, always and everywhere, in all the aforesaid and other good, praiseworthy and just ancient customs of theirs and of our said kingdom of Hungary.

If any man, moreover, of whatever station and condition he may be, dares to attack those things which are included in the above by any illicit act, we shall act with all our might against any and all such men, together with our gentlemen of the realm, as they have conjointly agreed to do, to restrain and harness their insolence, by the force and testimony of these presents to which our privy seal that we use as king of Hungary⁴⁵ is appended. Given at Buda, on the Friday before the feast of the Holy Trinity in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and thirty-nine.

⁴³ Cf. e. g., Ps. 16:6, 30:3; Prov. 5:1.

⁴⁴ Ex certa nostre maiestatis scientia is a recurrent phrase of royal charters, but its exact meaning is not clear. The translation we chose is probable, not certain, but renders the traditional sense of the words, which is something like “according to our understanding of our authority...” Zsuzsanna Teke’s interpretation in: DRH, p. xix, according to which this clause was to refer to the king’s special jurisdiction (absoluta potestas) does not explain its use here ⁴⁵ Albert was the only king of Hungary in the late Middle Ages who did not have a great seal of majesty. This puzzling fact has not been explained yet in a satisfactory way. (Cf. Elemér Mályusz, “A kancelláriai tevékenység Albert király uralma alatt, 1438–1439” [Activity of the chancellery under King Albert], in Opuscula classica mediaevaliaque in honorem J. Horváth composita, ed. János. Bollók [Budapest: ELTE BTK Latin nyelvi tanszék, 1978], pp. 287.

CONCORDANCE 1439

MTvt/CJH	DRH /dDRMH
I-XXIX	I-XXIX
XXX-XXXI	XXX
XXXII	XXXI
XXXIII-XXXVII	XXXII
XXXVIII	XXXIII
XXXIX	XXXIV

COMPILATION OF LAWS IN HUNGARY

before 1440

This collection of legal prescriptions has come down to us through a transcript by King Wladislas I on 20 July 1440, wherein it follows the decretum of Andrew III of 1298. Therefore, we decided to call it “ante 1440.”

After the initial publication of this collection by Kovachich in 1798, legal historians were quick to note that this text did not form part of the laws of 1298, and some historians (e.g., Bartal) suggested that it may have originated in the early fourteenth century in connection with the judicial reforms of King Charles I (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1445 (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 73–79). The proposal of Kiss (dating it to the age of Andrew III) was challenged by Szilágyi, suggesting c. 1312–5. Gerics, expertly addressing general issues of legal practice in late thirteenth-century Hungary, argued for a later date but certainly before the mid-fourteenth century. Thus c. 1300 was accepted by Bónis et al. for their DRH (pp. 387–96) and following it, in the printed DRMH 1.

Pál Engel, however, started out with a skeptical mind and noted a number of points (some already queried by the editors but “explained away,” e.g., in notes 8, 9, 21) that do not allow a dating before the end of the fourteenth century; see his “Az ‘1300 körüli’ tanácsi határozat keletkezéséhez” [On the origin of the decision in council of ‘c. 1300’], now in his, Honor, vár, ispánság: Válogatott tanulmányok [Honor, castle, county: Selected studies], ed. Enikő Csukovics (Budapest: Osiris, 2003, pp. 638–48). Considering the legal and administrative development during the age of the Anjou and of King-Emperor Sigismund, the detailed instructions for the inquest, the reference to the lucrum camerae, the mentioning of more than one judge in the king’s court, the assumption of the existence of a regular court of the vicecomes and of county archives—taken all together suggest a terminus post quem of at least 1382 but rather later. Strictly speaking a terminus ante quem is only 1440, but the list of fines (regulated in greater detail in 1435) and the fact that the prelati et barones passed this decision (apparently in the absence of the ruler) makes a date in the “early fifteenth century”—for example during the captivity of Sigismund in 1401—most likely. Engel did not address in detail the conspicuously “early” regulation of the migration of tenant peasants, typical for Sigismund’s age, but mentioned it as an additional reason for late dating.

The purpose of the text having been copied “seamlessly” after the decretum of 1298 into the libellus of 1440 remains, however, an open question. Clearly, someone (in the royal chancellery?) intended to make a relatively recent decision of the royal council appear as “good old law” (of Andrew III). The cui prodest still begs the question.

The text published here follows the critical edition in DRH, where additional literature and commentary—some of it now out of date—can also be found.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

MSS: (Transcript of 1440), OL D1. 13894.

EDD: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789–1801 pp.144–192; DRH, pp. 387–396.

LIT: Georgius Bartal, Commentariorum ad historiam status Hungariae... libri XV (Pozsony: Wigand, 1847), pp. 208–210, I. R. Kiss, “III. Endre király 1289/99. évi törvénye” [The Law of King Andrew III of 1298/99], Emlékkönyv Fejérpataky László (Budapest: Franklin, 1917), pp. 262–278; Lóránt Szilágyi, “III. Endre 1298. évi törvénye” [The Law of Andrew III of 1298], Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae: Sectio historica., 1 (1957), 135–171; József Gerics, “Über das Rechtsleben Ungarns um die Wende des 13–14. Jahrhunderts”, ibid., 17 (1976), 45–80. Pál Engel, “Az ‘1300 körüli’ tanácsi határozat keletkezéséhez” as above.

COMPILATIO ANTE 1440

De Inquisitionibus

I. Primo notandum est, quod de inquisitionibus in factis potentie, homi[cidii], iniuriarium, furti, latrocinii et aliorum similium fiendis per prelatos et barones taliter est decretum, quod in quolibet comitatu duodecim nobiles conscientiosi et fide digni per dominum regem sunt eligendi, ex quibus tamen duodecim nobilibus quatuor debent esse in iudices nobilium, qui nobiles prestitis prius ad f[idem eorum] de[o debitam iuramentis super] omnibus factis et causis in ipso comitatu in facto premissorum emersis [et] exo[rtis] diligenter ... mandatum simul inquirendo sciscitarent deum h[abentes] pre oculis. Demum reversi ... veritate sub sigillo per dominum regem eis dato et collato ipsius inquisitionis seriem eidem domino regi rescribere teneantur, qua inquisitione visa tandem iudex ordinarius eiusdem cause in termino per ispos nobiles deputato iudicium et iustitiam inpertiri debeat, nulla alia inquisitione super hiis amplius fienda ... Sed reus vel ille, contra quem fuerit querimonia, solum bis debet evocari et tandem tertio proclamari per nobiles supradictos, et sic universe cause in factis premissis emergere vel exorte in tertio termino omni dissimulatione remota debent terminari.

II Omnia etiam instrumenta in curia regia per dominum palatinum vel iudicemcurie aut alios iudices ordinarios in factis criminalibus adiudicanda coram dictis duodecim iuratis nobilibus in sede vicecomitis deponi debent. Et de iuramento cum quotcunque personis prestito non plus nisi quadra[ginta denar]ii possint extorqueri per iuratos supradictos.

III Preterea notandum est, quod si quis nobilium vel alterius cuiusvis status et conditionis hominum in factis potentie, calumnie, exhibitionis falsarum litterarum et aliorum gravaminum iudicialium fuerit innodatus, tunc possessiones talium per iudices vel homines iudicum non debent spoliari, sed portio possessionaria ipsius convicti pro iudice et parte adversa coram uno ex predictis iuratis debet occupari et tamdiu per eosdem absque desolatione est possidenda, quousque dictis iudici ordinario et parti adverse per ipsum convictum iuxta deliberationem [bar]onum satisfactio inpendetur. In birsagiis etiam minoribus tanta portio, quanta pro ipsis iudiciis debebit, modo premissis est occupanda et usque tempus satisfactionis nichil plus preterquam veros redditus ipsius possessionarie portionis iudex et pars adversa possint extorquere.

IV Item si quis aliquem non casualiter, sed potentialiter et ex concepta malitia interfecerit, tunc per dominum regem eidem gratia non fieri debet, nisi ex voluntate fratrum et proximorum ipsius interfecti, sed talis reus plecti debet vindicta capitis, si apprehendi poterit, sin autem, tunc possessionarie portiones sue occupari debent. Si autem casualiter aliquis interfectus fuerit, tunc rex eidem interfectori gratiam facere possit, [tali] tamen modo, ut secundum deliberationem baronum proximis interfecti satisfactio inpendatur, et si satisfacere nollet vel non posset, tunc gratia sibi in nullo suffragetur. Insuper omnibus coram iudice in factis potentie, calumpnie et aliis hiis similibus convictis nulla gratia per dominum regem est fienda, nisi prius parti adverse satisfactio inpendatur. Si quis autem fratrem suum uterinum, patrualemvel generationalem seu condivisionalem interemerit, tunc possessionaria portio eiusdem interfectoris vel homicide propria in portionem suam cessa vel cedenda heredibus vel posteris ipsius interfecti perpet[uo] de]volvatur.

V Item si quis nobilis alterius res potentialiter in campis vel extra villam receperit, et ratione huius in facto potentie convictus extiterit, tunc talis reus res in decuplo seu decies se ad predictas res ablatas extendentes solvere tenetur. De quibus primo res principales ipsi leso in toto restituantur et tandem residuitas earundem in duas rectas partes dum iudice ipsi leso dividatur, cuius recta medietas similiter ipsi leso ex integro assignetur. Et altera medietas, portio videlicet ipsius iudicis in tres partes dividatur, et ipsa tertia pars iuratis p[ertineat], et due [partes] ipsius medietatis iudici ordinario proveniant. Si vero res suas ad premissa se extendentes non haberet, tunc ipse reus debet captivari et de prescriptis iuxta deliberationem baronum se debeat emendare. Si autem ipse res in villa vel curia reperte fuerint, tunc in facto potentie, ut est premissum, convincatur et puniatur.

VI. Item quicunque nobilium lucrum camere iuxta regni consuetudinem ab antiquo approbatam facta dicatione et termino congruenti sibi assignato solvere non curarent, tunc possessiones vel possessionarie portiones talis vel talium, de quibus premissa solutio facta [nondum] extitisset, presente uno vel duobus iuratorum tamdiu per comitem camerarum regalium debet occupari, quousque dicta solutio lucri camere plenarie simul cum iudicio marcarum trium fuerit persoluta; ipsamque possessionem idem comes camere sine desolatione veros proventus ipsius possessionis percipien[do] medio tempore valeat conservare.

Item si aliquis homo cuiusvis status honorem seu officiolatum ex parte prelatorum et baronum et aliorum quorumcunque hominum tenens res alicuius hominis potentialiter receperit, tunc dominus talis honorem tenentis ipsi iniuriam et dampnum patienti satisfactionem inpendere teneatur mod superius expresso; ipse dominus talis rei famuli sui sibi solus de premissis ex parte eiusdem satisfactionem habere possit. Officiales etiam dominorum regalium et reginalium simili modo facere teneantur.

Item In Factis Possessionum Ordine Iudiciario Acquirendarum
Modus Infrascriptus Est Observandus:

VII. Item quicunque aliquam possessionem vel possessiones seu portiones vel particulas possessionarias ordine iudiciario acquirere intendit, tunc ipsam possessionem trina vice recaptivare debet, et ratione prioritatis termini ac de partium voluntate ipsa causa differri non possit, sed partibus in presentia iudicis comparentibus in causam attractus omni occasione postposita respondere teneatur. Ad exhibitionem instrumentorum tres termini et non plures assignari debent, unus videlicet sine gravamine et duo cum gravamine, quilibet scilicet cum iudicio trium marcarum assignari debeant, et sic intra unius anni revolutionem quelibet causa finaliter terminetur. Medio autem tempore, quecunque pars voluerit, potest concordare. Actor etiam exhibitionem instrumentorum suorum solum tribus vicibus semper cum gravamine iudiciorum regalium valeat prolongare.

VIII. Item in ultimo termino iudicia in processu iuris emersa partes deponere teneantur. Et si quis cum pecunia vel rebus deponere nequiret, tunc possessione cum fructuosa et populosa iudici et parti adverse satisfacere teneatur; et idem convictus, per quem ratione previa possessio datur, adversam partem et iudicem in dominio eiusdem possessionis tamdiu, quousque ab eisdem in premissa pecunia seu iudicio redimetur, conservare teneatur.

IX. Item si quis nobilium possessionem seu possessiones aut particulas suas possessionarias necessitate prepeditus vendere vel impignorare aut a se alienare intenderet, tunc primo et principaliter easdem vel ipsam fratribus et hominibus sue generationis vel condivisionalibus vel commetaneis aut vicinis suis tali modo vendere possit, ut talem possessionem seu portionem possessionariam, cuius fructus, proventus et utilitates ad unam marcam se extendunt per anni circulum seu circa, puta pro decem marcis, cuius vero ad duas, pro viginti marcis et sic successive emere debeant. Et ipsam venditionem primitus coram dictis iuratis ipsis fratribus, hominibus generationalibus, commetaneis aut vicinis suis notificare teneatur, et si ipsam pro pretio prescripto emere vellent, bene quidem, alioquin eam, quibuscunque aliis maluerit, vendendi habeat facultatem.

X. Item, si cuiuscunque nobilis possessiones ratione suorum excessuum vel [gra]vaminis ad manus iudiciarias ac partis adverse devenerint, tunc easdem ipse vel alii, quibus congruit, a manibus eorundem iuxta regni consuetudinem ab antiquo conservatam redimere possint, videlicet unum aratrum terre pro tribus marcis, ecclesiam cum campanili pro quindecim marcis et sine campanili pro decem marcis, et sic de singulis.

XI. Item quicunque nobilis possessionem vel possessiones seu portiones suas possessionarias alicui hominum vendidisset et ipsum in facto huius possessionis expedire assumpsisset, et tandem talis possessio ab ipso emptore per formam iuris per quemcunque requi[rer]etur, tunc talis expeditor et sui successores modis omnibus emptorem et suos successores secundum suum assumptum in perpetuum expedire tenebuntur in facto possessionario prenotato.

De Rusticis et Jobagionibus

XII. Item quilibet rusticus seu jobagio alicuius nobilis, si voluerit, de possessione domini sui habita licentia et iusto ac consueto suo terragio consueto persoluto ad possessionem alterius nobilis vel alias, quo sibi placuerit, cum omnibus suis rebus libere se causa commorandi transferre valeat.

XIII. Item nullus equester et homo pedester, cuiuscunque conditionis existat, aliquod pondus non habens seu non deferens [ullo] in loco tributi vel alias aliquod tributum dare teneatur.

XIV. Item [si] quicunque homo seu advena de extraneis regnis ad istud regnum se transferret moraturum, ab eodem et suis bonis apud ipsum habitis tempore sue translationis in nullo loco aliquod tributum exigatur.

XV. Item si quis rusticus seu jobagio alicuius nobilis se de ipso domino suo ad alium nobilem transferre vellet moraturum, ab eodem rustico modo simili tempore translationis sue seu jobagione [in nullo loco] aliquod tributum accipiatur.

XVI. Item de victualibus prelatorum et baronum aut nobilium quorumcunque per quascunque partes, per quolibet tributa deferendis nullum tributum exigatur.

XVII. Item si quis nobilis sine herede masculino ab hac luce decesserit, cuius possessiones de iure ad manus regias sunt devolvende, tunc ius ratione quarte filialis filie vel sororis eiusdem decessi eisdem filiabus et sororibus cum possessione in uno loco et in uno ambitu debet extradari perpetuo possidendum.

Ceterum si homines capitulorum vel conventuum ad reambulandum, recaptivandum, estimandum, necnon statuendum aliquam possessionem vel alios iudiciarios processus exercendos iuxta regium mandatum aut iudiciariam commissionem palatini vel iudicis curie regie seu alterius cuiusdam iudicis ordinarii transmissi fuerint, tunc homines vel testimonium ipsius capituli vel conventus in propriis equis laborantes et transeuntes a die egressionis usque diem reversionis et adventus ipsorum ad propria qualibet die viginti quatuor denarios, si autem ipsi homines seu testimonia in equis conductorum transierint, tunc ab eisdem conductoribus qualibet die duodecim [denarios] et non plures valeant extorquere, semper tamen in expensis conductoris transeundo. Pro emanatione [vero] litterarum super premissis processibus emanandarum non plures, nisi centum simul cum notario eorum exigere possint, excepti litteris recaptivatoriis possessionum et aliis, de quibus etiam, sicut usque nunc duodecim denarii sunt exacti, sic in futurum debeant extorqueri.

Item cancellarii domini regis de litteris in factis possessionariarum collationum privilegialiter, seu patenter emanandis exactionem pro redemptione ipsarum litterarum infrascriptam debeant observare: quod de litteris possessionarias collationes vel libertates quascunque denotantibus simul cum scriptore ipsarum litterarum duas marcas, de confirmationeque litterarum quarumcunque semper de una littera privilegiali confirmatorie emananda cancellarius unam marcam et scriptor suus centum denarios, de litteris autem, mediantibus quibus per regiam maiestatem quibuscunque gratie in factis potentie, calumnie, furticinii, latrocinii et exhibitionis falsarum litterarum vel aliis vindictam capitis tangentibus facte fuerint, unam marcam cum scriptore possint extorquere. De aliis vero litteris minutis, videlicet evocatoriis, inquisitoriis, recaptivatoriis, preceptoriiis et aliis similibus, de patentibus viginti quatuor denarios, de [clau]sis duodecim de[narios] debent extorquere.

COMPLIATION BEFORE 1440

Regarding Inquisitions

1 First, it should be noted that the prelates and barons decided that for inquisitions in cases of acts of might,¹ manslaughter, assault, theft, robbery, and similar delicts, the lord king shall select twelve conscientious and trustworthy noblemen in every county, out of these twelve noblemen four should be[come] county magistrates,² and they, after having sworn an oath on their faith to God, shall in the aforementioned cases that happened or occurred in the county...inquire into the facts and cases of the delicts mentioned above ... according to their mandate, always keeping God in their minds.³ After their return ... they shall be bound to report to the lord king the course of the inquisition under the seal given and entrusted to them by the same lord king.⁴ The justice ordinary⁵ of the case, after he has seen the inquisition, shall render

¹ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one

² The peculiar Latin formulation (debent esse in iudices nobilium)—which Gerics (ibid., p. 51f.) believes to be derived from the grammar of the Psalms—can be understood in two ways. Either that four of the twelve nobles would be made county magistrates by the king who had selected them, or that four of the twelve were to be elected as magistrates by their fellow nobles. Of course, the present reading may have originated in scribal error, inserting the unusual in, in which case the more traditional translation (“four of them should be”), implying an existing body of county officers (see, e.g., 1290: 3), would be warranted. Actually, the institution of the twelve nobles is not known otherwise.

³ The reference is to what was known as common or simple inquest (inquisitio communis or simplex), a procedure for obtaining material proof in which abutters, neighbors, and other nobles from the county (comprovinciales) swore an oath on their faith and “fidelity to the Holy Crown” regarding the truth of their testimony, usually in matters of property rights. The inquest, as ordered by a higher court, was usually held where the disputed estate was located or the criminal act perpetrated. The inquest took over the role of establishing the truth once ordeals were discontinued in the later thirteenth century. See Erik Fügedi “Verba volant... Oral Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility.” in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary, ch. VI. (London: Variorum, 1986).

⁴ Nothing is known about such seals “given by the king.” Actually, written reports on inquests and similar legal actions were usually composed and submitted by the places of authentication (chapters and convents charged with these tasks). On these, see Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66–73.

⁵ This, in Roman law common, term seems to be meant the judge of the given case. In late medieval Hungary it usually referred to the justices of the royal court (palatine, judge royal, master of the treasury), but here the case itself seems to have had its own justice ordinary, hardly one of the high justices. Gerics (“Rechtsleben”, p. 47f.) understands this passage to refer to a judge who administered justice in the justice and judgment at the term set by these noblemen without any further inquisition in the case ... The defendant or he against whom the complaint was lodged, should be cited only twice and at the third term be publicly summoned by these nobles so that all suits opened or started in the cases mentioned above shall be terminated at the third term without delay.⁶

2 All records of criminal cases⁷ tried in the king's court, or by the lord palatine or the judge royal or other justices ordinary⁸ are to be deposited before the same twelve jurors at the seat of the alispán.⁹ And the above- mentioned jurors should not exact more than forty pennies for an oath sworn with whatever number of persons.¹⁰

3 Furthermore, it should be noted that if a nobleman or a man of whatever estate and condition, has been fined by a judge for acts of might, frivolous prosecution,¹¹ presentation of forged documents or other infractions, his possessions shall not be wasted by the judges and the judges' men, but a portion of the defendant's possessions shall be occupied on behalf of course of exercising another office, e.g., an ispán, (head of the county) in contrast to a judex delegatus, a judge commissioned ad hoc, which was the usage in the Árpadian age.

⁶ The limitation to three citations has its antecedents as far back as in Ladislav III: 26 and Coloman 64. The third, public proclamatio (often qualified as triforensis,) was meant as the last call, issued at three consecutive market days after which judgment was passed regardless of the defendant's appearance. In fact, summonses up to six times were not unusual as late as the fifteenth century and were abolished finally in the decretum of 29 May 1439: 32; cf. Imre. Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet és perjog az Árpád- és a vegyesházi királyok alatt [Judicial system and procedural law under the kings of the Arpad and the diverse dynasties], (Budapest: MTA, 1899), , pp. 198–199.

⁷ The distinction of "criminal cases" points to a development of legal thinking, maybe even the influence of learned (Roman, canon) law.

⁸ The judge royal (judex curiae regis, Hung. országbíró): originally the officer in charge of the royal court (comes curialis regis) and thus the head of household servants, he acquired high judicial functions once the count palatine became the itinerant judge of the entire country (c. 1200). From then on, the judge royal passed judgment in the name of the king (presentia regis) and soon acquired extensive jurisdictional functions, with a notarial and legal staff, including a vicejudex curiae regis, residing in Óbuda. The judge royal (or justiciar) held a separate court in the royal curia, where he tried cases of the nobility. The reference to other royal justices, not known before the fourteenth century was one of the reasons of Engel's revised dating the Compilatio.

⁹ The alispán (vicecomes) was the deputy of the county's ispán usually a noble retainer (familiaris) of the ispán and the actual administrator of the county. During the fourteenth century, when several counties were granted as honors, the alispán, joined by the noble magistrates, handled the financial and military matters of the county and chaired the county court; see Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 114–115. Archives of the counties developed in the course of the fourteenth century, first from the list of proscribed criminals.

¹⁰ Oath (iuramentum) was a mode of proof that survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers.

¹¹ Frivolous prosecution (calumnia) meant unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price. Prior to the fifteenth century, the term might include astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney (q.v.), or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice.

the judge and the opposing party in the presence of the a aforementioned jurors and kept by them without wasting until the judge ordinary mentioned before and the opposing party have been satisfied according to the judgment of the barons. For minor fines¹² as well, only a portion is to be occupied in this way as pertains to the judges themselves and until such time as satisfaction is given; the judge and the opposing party shall, exact no more than the true income of that portion of the possessions.¹³

4 Then, if anyone kills someone not by accident but violently with premeditated malice¹⁴ the lord king shall not grant him pardon unless the victim's brothers and kinsmen consent. Rather, such a culprit shall suffer capital punishment¹⁵ if apprehended; if not, portions of his possessions shall be occupied. If someone is killed by accident, the king shall be free to pardon that killer [but] in such way that the kinsmen of the victim shall receive satisfaction according to the decision of the barons. If he will not or cannot give satisfaction, pardon shall be of no use to him. Furthermore, those convicted by a judge for act of might, frivolous prosecution, or similar infractions shall not be pardoned by the lord king unless the injured party receives satisfaction. If someone, however, kills his brother, his cousin, his kinsman, or divisional kinsman,¹⁶ what was or would have been the killer's inheritance shall go in perpetuity to the heirs and descendants of the victim.

5 If a nobleman takes away by violence the goods of another nobleman in the fields or outside a village and is for this act convicted of act of might, such a culprit shall be bound to pay tenfold or ten times¹⁷ the value of the aforesaid stolen items. Out of this the entire loss of the injured party is first to be made good; the remainder is to be divided evenly into two parts by the injured party with the judge and one of these even halves is also to be granted entirely to the injured party. The other half, the portion of the judge, is to be divided into three parts, one of which pertains to the jurors and two parts of this half to the justice ordinary. If the culprit does not have sufficient

¹² Birsagium is the latinized form of the Hungarian word bírság, meaning “fine”, procedural as well as punitive.

¹³ The collection of fines and the seizing of possessions was regulated in detail in the decree of c. 1320.

¹⁴ Cf. Stephen I: 14. The distinction between what in modern terms would be premeditated murder and accidental manslaughter seems to have been refined in Hungarian legal practice under the influence of Italian glossators; see György Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei: Római jog, kánonjog, szokásjog [Elements of our medieval law: Roman Law, Canon Law, and customary law] (Budapest: Közgazdasági, 1972), p. 103.

¹⁵ Capital punishment (sententia capitalis) implied the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary.

¹⁶ Divisional kinsman (frater condivisionalis) was a person entitled to a share in inherited property, stemming from the custom that landed property should be partitioned equally among sons or among nearest male relatives in the paternal line (aviticitas) as decreed in 1351 Pref. See Pál Engel, “Erbteilung und Familienbildung.” in ...The Man of Many Devices, Who Wandered Full Many Ways... Festschrift in Honor of János M. Bak, Balázs Nagy and Marcell Sebők, eds. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1999), pp. 411–421.

¹⁷ Both words (Decupplo and decies) mean “tenfold”; the passage may imply a tenfold fine or ten times the value of the stolen goods.

means for the above stated arrangement, then he shall be arrested and redeem himself of the aforesaid according to the decision of the barons. If; however, things are discovered from within a village or a manor house¹⁸ which were taken by an act of might this shall be judged and punished as written above.

6. Then, if any noble fails to pay the chamber's profit¹⁹ as approved by the ancient custom of the realm once its assessment and due date have been conveniently set for him, the possessions or part-possession of such a person or persons for which the said payment has not yet been made shall be occupied by the count of the royal chamber²⁰ in the presence of one or two of the jurors until the chamber's profit and a three-mark fine²¹ are fully paid; during that time the count of the chamber shall keep the possession without wasting and shall collect its just revenue.

Then, if a man of whatever estate who holds an office or a commission either from the barons, the prelates, or anyone else, takes away someone's goods by violence, the lord of such an officeholder is obliged to give satisfaction to the injured and aggrieved person in the manner set out above; the lord can demand satisfaction only from this culpable retainer for the aforementioned matter.²² The officers of the king and the queen, moreover, are to be dealt with in a similar manner.

Similarly On Matters Of Acquiring Possessions By Judicial Process The Following Procedure Is To Be Observed

¹⁸ By this time the word curia ("court") had come to be used for the residence of lesser noblemen as well as for that of the king and the magnates.

¹⁹ The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; by the early fourteenth century, it had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages. See: Boglárka Weisz, "Royal Revenues in the Árpáadian Period," in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 255–64, and Csaba Tóth, "Minting, Financial Administration and Coin Circulation in Hungary in the Árpáadian and Angevin Periods," Ibid. pp. 279–94. This is the only reference to nobles paying this tax. In medieval Hungary, noblemen were exempt from all taxes and dues.

²⁰ Comites camerae were officers in charge of regalian revenues, based on a private contract with the crown. Most of them were foreign merchants or money lenders. These arrangements are known from the cameral contracts of the 1340s, see 1342.

²¹ Textual reconstruction based on a parallel passage in 1342: 19. The mark was a measure of silver (and sometimes of gold), often the unit of fines. Since the late thirteenth century the Buda mark (~245.54 gr.), belonging to the Troyes-mark type, was standard in Hungary.

²² The article aims at defining the liability of a lord (dominus) for the misdeeds of his retainer (famulus, familiaris, serviens), as well as the lord's jurisdiction over his retainer from whom alone he can claim satisfaction. The institution of familiaritas, by which lesser noblemen accepted service with greater landowners but retained their noble liberties, save in matters regarding their service, was a new but quickly-growing feature of Hungarian society around 1300. The employment of retainers, especially as castellans of baronial castles, was becoming widespread; see Rady, Nobility, pp. 48–53, Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998), passim, and István Tringli, "Mittäter oder Anstifter? Die Rolle der Helfer bei den Fehdehandlungen im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn," In Fehdehandeln und Fehdegruppen im spätmittelalterlichen und frühneuzeitlichen Europa, M. Prange and Ch. Reinle, eds. (Göttingen: V & R Unipress, 2014) pp. 163–194.

7 Then,, if someone wants to acquire a possession or possessions, or portions or parcels of a possession through the judicial process, that possession is to be reclaimed three times,²³ and the case cannot be postponed either because of an earlier citation²⁴ or by the will of the parties, but the person summoned in the case has to respond without any delay when the parties have appeared before the judge. For the presentation of charters three dates and no more are to be set, one without and two with a fine, which shall be set specifically at three marks each; this every case is to be definitely settled within one year.²⁵ During that time either party, if he wishes, may come to terms. The plaintiff may also delay his presentation of his charters only three times by paying in each instance the royal fine²⁶ for it.

8 Then, on the last day in court the parties have to deposit the fines imposed during the lawsuit. If someone cannot pay them in money or goods, the judge and the opposing party are to be given satisfaction in fertile and populated land; and the defendant who has in this way relinquished a possession is bound to leave the control of that possession to the judge and the opposing party until he redeems it from them in money or the fine as already mentioned.²⁷

9 Then, if a nobleman pressed by necessity intends to sell, mortgage, or alienate his possession, possessions, or part-possession, he has to sell them or it first and foremost to his brothers, clansmen, divisional kinsmen, neighbors, and abutters²⁸ in this manner: a possession or portion of a possession that yields an annual return, income, and profit of around one mark is to be valued at ten marks, one with two marks at twenty marks, and so forth,²⁹ and is to be sold for that. And this sale is to be announced before the said jurors to the brothers, clansmen, neighbors, and abutters, and if they want to buy it for this price, that is fine, otherwise he shall have the right to sell to whomever he wishes.

10 Then, if the possessions of any nobleman come into the hands of a judge or an opposing party because of a transgression or fine, then he or other suitable persons shall be able to redeem

²³ Recaptivatio was the technical term for raising a legal claim to a property not in the claimant's possession. When the claim was rejected three times by the actual possessor, the later could be cited to court to defend his title; Hajnik, Bíróági szervezet, p. 194

²⁴ Prioritas termini meant that a party was unable to attend a term in court because of a previously received summons to another court or in another case. A person empowered by such a party would appear instead of him for the assumptio termini; see Hajnik op.cit. p. 240.

²⁵ Attempts at shortening the judicial process were as old as legislation in Hungary and kept propping up many times across the centuries.

²⁶ The iudicium regale amounted to six marks, i.e., double that of the common fine; Hajnik, Bíróági szervezet, p. 442.

²⁷ See art. 2, above.

²⁸ On the development of this matter see Alajos. Degré. "A szomszédok öröklése és a szomszédi elővásárlási jog kialakulása" [Inheritance by neighbors and the development of the right of neighbors to first refusal], in Illés emlékkönyv, pp. 122–141.

²⁹ This kind of estimation was highly advantageous for the preferential buyers and was called aestimatio communis in contrast to the fifty-fold value of the annual income, the aestimatio prerennalis. In modern Hungarian the expression is still current that something "is worth so much even among brothers," which may refer to the former practice them according to the ancient custom of the realm, namely one plough land for three marks,³⁰ a church with a bell tower for fifteen, without a bell tower for ten, and so on in every case.³¹

11 Then, if any nobleman has sold his possession or possessions or part- possessions to a man and had agreed to be a guarantor in matters of this possession, and later this possession is claimed by someone from the buyer in a lawsuit, then the guarantor and his descendants have to appear as guarantors according to his agreement in perpetuity in matters regarding the said possession.³²

Concerning Peasants and Tenants

12 Then, any peasant or tenant peasant³³ of a nobleman shall, if he wishes, be free to move with all his things from his lord's possession to that of another nobleman or to another place of his choice in order to take up residence, once he had received leave and paid the just and usual rent.

13 Then, any man mounted or on foot of whatever estate having no load with him and carrying nothing³⁴ shall not be forced to pay a toll at toll stations or anywhere else.

³⁰ Aratrum (=plough): usually referring not to the tool but to the size of land that--customarily--could be cultivated by one plough team. It has been estimated at very different sizes from 50 to 150 ha; the best argued being ca. 126 hectares, containing 150 jugera (Hung. hold, a measure of Roman origin but in the Middle Ages of very varied size; a "royal hold" was ca. 0.84 ha)

³¹ These legal estimations were highly traditional, remaining unchanged for centuries regardless of market values. They appear in thirteenth-century charters as well as in formularies of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries (see Bónis, Középkori jogunk elemei, pp. 165–176) and also in the early sixteenth-century Tripartitum (Pars I, tit. 133).

³² The duty of a vendor to remain liable for the defense of the property he sold (or even of partners in an exchange or division of inheritance) against later claimants, was expected by custom (Gerics, "Rechtsleben," p. 54). This paragraph regulates the duty of expeditio (also called evicto, employing a Roman legal term) and limits it to cases in which liability is explicitly assumed by the vendor; see Bónis, op.cit., p. 98f

³³ Tenant peasant (jobagio, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid. The prohibition of their being hindered from doing so was mainly in the interest of the lesser nobility, whose peasants were sometimes moved (or lured) to the estates of greater landlords who were able to offer better conditions. The most often cited regulation of this right was in King Sigismund's Decretum maius, 1435/I:7. For a summary of the issue, see János M. Bak, "Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline" in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005), pp. 387–400.

³⁴ This passage is hardly legible in the original. The reading proposed by Kovachich--secum ad deferendum, impediatur, that is, "with him for transfer, shall [not] be importuned," also makes good sense. The conjecture in the DRH with [ullo] is somewhat unusual. On road tolls in general, see Magdolna Szilágyi, "Mobility, Roads, and Bridges in Medieval Hungary," in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

14 Then,, if any man or foreigner wishes to move from his country to this realm in order to take up residence, no customs duties shall be collected from him at any place at the time of his arrival.

15 Then, if a peasant or a tenant of a nobleman wishes to move from his lord to another nobleman in order to take up residence, similarly no tolls shall be collected from this peasant or tenant at any place at the time of his transfer.

16 Then, no toll shall be collected for the foodstuffs of prelates, barons, and noblemen whatsoever who transport them through any toll station.

17 Then, if a nobleman should die without a male heir so that his possessions would by law revert to the king,³⁵ then the portion due as the filial quarter³⁶ to the daughter or sister of the same deceased is to be given to the daughter or sister in one piece of land in one location, to be possessed in perpetuity.

Finally, if men of chapters and convents³⁷ are sent out for surveying, revindicating, assessing, or granting institution into a property,³⁸ or for any other judicial task by royal mandate or ³⁵ Cf. 1222: 4 and 1231: 5.

³⁶ The “filial quarter,” first mentioned in 1222:4, was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates (see property rights) of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Antal Murarik, in Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the basic institutions of aviticitas] (Budapest: Sárkány, 1938), pp. 163–192) saw it as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished this provision (Inst. Bk. III. tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, “Vita a leánynegyedről” [Debates on the Filial Quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József. Holub, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), 103–

³⁷ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66–73

³⁸ Reambulatio was the formal establishment of property limits in the presence of neighbors (who had the right to contradict disputed claims); revindicatio was a claim of land (see above, art. 8); estimatio the judicial commission from the palatine, the judge royal or any other judge ordinary, these men of the convent or chapter or associates of the bishop shall collect twenty-four pennies per diem from the day of their departure to the day of their return or arrival if they ride their own horses. If, however, these men or associates ride the horses of the requesting party, then they shall collect twelve pennies from that party and no more, provided that they travel always at the expense of the requesting party. Moreover, for the issuing of charters arising from the said matters no more than one hundred pennies shall be collected including the [cost of the] notary, except for charters for the revindication of possessions and others for which hitherto twelve pennies were collected and shall be collected in the future as well.

Then, the chancellors of the lord king are to observe the following fees for the redemption of charters of privilege or letters patent concerning donations and possessions: for charters concerning grants of possessions or containing any liberty, two marks together with the [cost of the] scribe; for any confirmation after the issue of a confirmation of privilege, one mark for the chancellor and one hundred pennies for his scribe; for those charters in which the lord king grants pardon for acts of might, frivolous prosecution, theft, robbery, presentation of forged charters, or other capital offenses, they can collect together with the scribe one mark. For minor letters such as summonses, inquisitions, revindications, mandates,³⁹ and the like, twenty-four pennies for letters patent and twelve pennies for letters close are to be collected.⁴⁰ assessment of the value (cf. above, art. 10). Institution (introductio or statutio) was the procedure required to validate the acquisition of property. Grantees of royal donations or new owners of purchased, pledged or exchanged estates were expected to take possession of the land within a year, with the assistance of a royal bailiff specified in the charter, and witnessed by a specified place of authentication in the presence of abutters and neighbors.

³⁹ Litterae evocatoriae were formal summonses to court, gradually replacing the citation in person (Hajnik, Bírósági szervezet, p. 200); litterae inquisitoriae mandated inquiries into the facts (ibid., p. 287; cf. above, art 1); litterae praeceptoriae were judicial mandates ordering, for instance, the transfer of a case from an ecclesiastical to a secular court (ibid., pp. 117, 196); and litterae recaptivatoriae were issued for the procedure of claiming property (see above, art. 8).

⁴⁰ The fees listed here for charters of the royal chancellery were established in detail by King Sigismund in his Decretum Maius (8 March 1435: 11).

CORONATION PATENT OF KING WLADISLAS I (1440-44) OF HUNGARY

20 July 1440

The background history of this coronation patent is only tangentially similar to that of 1439, insofar as Wladislas I agreed to a set of conditions at his election in Cracow, and these obligations were to be included in a decree issued at his inauguration. But Wladislas's election was not accepted by the widowed queen Elizabeth. Her party decided to place Albert's posthumously born son, Ladislas, on the throne and crowned the infant on 14 May 1440 with the traditional "Crown of St. Stephen," cunningly removed from its custody in Visegrád. Thereupon the adherents of Wladislas—the so-called soldier barons and a good part of the lesser nobility—assembled in Buda, confirmed the election in Cracow and declared the coronation of the Habsburg child null and void (29 June 1440; see Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779-1817), 13:70; cf. János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), n. 27, p. 102. However, before proceeding to crown their own candidate on 20 July 1440 in Székesfehérvár the estates had to bridge the gap caused by the lack of the venerated crown of the kings of Hungary. In the dietal decision of 17 July 1440 (Bak, Königtum, pp. 141-43), the nobility declared that the force, efficacy, and mystery of the crown did not rest in the object itself but "in the will of the regnum" and transferred all power to the reliquary crown of St. Stephen which was to be used for the inauguration of king Wladislas I. Three days later the king issued this coronation patent, in which parts of the charter of the estates were repeated.

MS.: a unique original from the possession of a nobleman of Co. Ung, now MNL OL DI. 13894; a somewhat careless contemporary copy on two pieces of parchment sewn together, the seal is missing but its cord survived (for details see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH] p. 309).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Stephanus Katona, Historia critica regum Hungariae. 42 vols. (Pest: Weigand, 1779-1817), 13:101–02; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 1: 474–500; Idem, Sylloge decretorum comitialium regni Hungariae (Pest: Trattner, 1818) 1:60–73; DRH, pp. 308-134

LIT.: Ferenc Eckhart A szentkorona-eszme története [History of the Idea of the Holy Crown]. (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1941), pp. 96–99; Lóránt Szilágyi, "III. Endre 1298. évi törvénye" [The law of Andrew III of 1298] Annales Universitatis Scientiarum Budapestinensis de Rolando Eötvös nominatae. Sectio historica 20 (1957), pp. 135-41; Elemér Mályusz, "A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában" [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 7579;

Josef Deér, Die heilige Krone Ungarns (Wien: Böhlau Nachf., 1966), pp. 231–39; Jan Dąbrowski, Władisław Jagiełłończyk w Węgrzech [W. J. in Hungary] (Warszawa: Gebethner & Wolff, 1923); János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 42–7; Idem, “Ein – gescheiterter – Versuch Ungarn zum Ständestaat zu verwandeln” in: Ecclesia, cultura, potestas. Studia z dziejów kultury i społeczeństwa. Księga ofiarowana Siostrze Profesor Urszuli Borkowskiej OSU, ed. Paweł Kras, pp. 451–64 (Cracow: Societas Vistulana, 2006).

Wladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Polonie, Dalmatie, Croatie, Rame, Seruie, Galitie, Lodomerie, Comanie, Bulgarieque rex etc., Lithwanieque princeps supremus et heres Russcie ad perpetuam rei memoriam. Preesse feliciter et pro[desse] salubriter auctore domino cunctis nostris subditis cupientes, quamvis omnium opiffice largiente ampla undique manus nostra concluderit et sibi commissa regat dominia, quibus intrinseca principatus sublimitate de [---] extrinsecus oblata regnorum fastigia minime nos appetere opus esset, vocati tamen novissime et assumpti dispositione, ut creditur, superna ad huius regni circumquaque emulorum atriti insultibus gubernacula, eam in primordio operam accuratius agere instituimus, illamque diligentiam primitialiter pro subiectorum utilitate et eque bono statu apud eos gerentes decrevimus, per quam et eorum desiderio propensius satisfiat et commoditas profutura uberius subsequatur, ut eo facto illic amplior nostre solertie benivolentia appareat, ubi multo desiderio expectati intensiore studio inviti ex debito cogimur, sicut pro inter subditos penitus volentes discrimina conculcare, fovere iustitiam et impunitam licentiam delinquentium obvio remedio refrenare. Sane cum nuper post obitum condam serenissimi principis domini Alberti Romanorum ac Hungarie etc. regis per universitatem dominorum prelatorum et baronum, comitum, militum, procerum et nobilium huius regni sibi, secundum quod eiusdem regni undique emulorum vicinato turbati exposceret necessitas, de novi regis confestino presidio providere cupientium efficaci vocatione et electione ad suscipienda huius regni gubernacula primum invitati et demum multa instantia etiam perducti fuisset, tam[en, quia tempore inter]medio corona illa, [cum] qua reges Hungarie perprie coronari soliti fuere, per dominam Elizabeth reginam, prefati condam Alberti regis relictam de castro Wissegradiensi propter multum incautam conservationem eiusdem clandestine sublata fuerit, tamen nunc ipsi prelati, barones, comites, milites, proceres et nobiles eiusdem regni in multitudine tam maxima, quantam precedentium regum coronationis tempore in memoria hominum non comprehendit, ad nos congregati, profitentes denuo se rectores idoneos festina gubernatione carere non posse iteratoque electionem nostram pretactam uno animo approbantes et confirmandos consequ[enterque] alia corona beatissimi regis Stephani, apostoli et patroni huius regni in theca reliquiarum capitis eiusdem alta veneratione conservata, eque egregii operis et pretiosa solempniter coronari fecerunt ipsoque sacro dyademate insigniri, omne robur et omnem efficaciam ipsius prioris corone hac vice et etiam in perpetuum, si ea recuperari non poterit, in hanc modernam transfundendo, committendoque nobis in decreto omnem regie potestatis plenitudinem et artem principatus dirigendam. Quibus in dei nomine feliciter peractis subsequenter ipsa universitas regni nostri prehabitis inter se communiter m[ul]tis [tractatibus supplicantes] sibi de generali dispositione, per quam et nociva reformatur et utilia conserventur, indebiteque commissa emendentur, per nos provideri, exhibuerunt et obtulerunt nostre celsitudini quendam libellum in sui contenti tenore per eos, ut dicebant, diligenter masticatum, certos articulos constitutionum et dispositionum ex litteris condam Andree filii tertii Bele regis et Lodouici dominorum Hungarie regum predecessorum nostrorum, item ex quibusdam aliis litteris olim prelatorum, ecclesiasticorum et nobilium regni tempore coronationis condam alterius Andree regis Hungarie dicti de Venetiis emanatis extractos et exceptos in se continentem, supplican[tes celsitudini nostre una]nimiter et humiliter, ut ex quo eedem constitutiones modo, prout in ipso libello seu registro continentur, eorum bono statui convenientes fore atque ad utilitatem eorum et totius regni conducere posse viderentur, easdem quoad omnem continentiam innovantes confirmare dignemur. Cuius quidem libelli sed et constitutionum pretectarum tenor sequitur et est talis:

LIBERTATES ET CONSTITUTIONES REGNI HUNGARIE EX LITTERIS ANDREE REGIS, FILII TERTII BELE REGIS EXTRACTE:

CONSTITUTIONES PER PRELATOS ET BARONES AC NOBILES REGNI HUNGARIE TEMPORE CORONATIONIS ANDREE REGIS DICTI DE VENETIIS FACTE SECUNTUR IN HUNC MODUM:

SECUNTUR NUNC LIBERTATES ET ORDINATIONES REGNO HUNGARIE DATE ET CONCESSE ULTRA LIBERTATES, QUAS CONDAM DOMINUS REX ANDREAS, FILIUS TERTII BELE REGIS DEDIT ET CONCESSIT PREDICTO REGNO, QUAS ETIAM IPSE DOMINUS LODOVICUS REX CONFIRMAVIT. TENOR AUTEM DICTE CONFIRMATIONIS IPSIUS LODOVICI REGIS SEQUITUR PER OMNIA IN HEC VERBA:

Nos igitur humillimis et devotis prete actis universitatis regnicolarum nostrorum supplicationibus instantius propulsati, quia ex eorundem assertionibus manifestis constitutiones, libertates et ordinationes superius specificatas veterum provida dispositione conditas ad utilitatem et bonum statum ipsorum cooperari posse verisimiliter cognovimus, libenter eorum voto admissionem concessimus prete actasque seu supranotatas constitutiones, libertates et ordinationes eo sensu, prout ad utilitatem rei publice christiane proficiunt, quoad omnes ipsarum continentias, clausulas et articulos, precipue vero intentionem supradicti Lodouici regis, quantum ad articulos per eum moderatos et mutatos acceptamus, aprobamus, ratificamus easque nichilominus ex certa nostra scientia huic regno nostro innovantes perpetuo vallituras confirmamus, et decernentes et committentes per hec scripta, ut huiusmodi constitutiones, libertates et ordinationes tam per modernos et futuros prelatos, quorum interest et intererit, quam etiam universos barones, iudices, milites et proceres amodo in posterum successivis semper temporibus universis inviolabiliter observentur et executioni debite demandentur. Quas et nos per omnia observare et immutabiliter observari debere statuimus variatione sine omni; quodque ultra hec premissa ad dictorum regnicolarum nostrorum instantiam eis nunc ex novo annuimus et declaramus:

I. Ut nullus virorum nobilium regni huius possessiones habentium vel non habentium decimas dare teneatur, prout etiam itidem in decreto supranominati Alberti regis perhibetur contineri, sed quilibet talium nobilium, dum eis per maiestatem regiam precipitur, contra emulos huius regni dimicando huiusmodi decimarum debita sanguinis sui effusione et virili defensione recompensare teneatur.

II. Statuimus prete rea et presenti decreto stabilimus, ut si aliquem ex baronibus aut nobilibus huius regni nostri Hungarie possessiones et bona aliorum baronum seu nobilium aut etiam ecclesiarum pro pignore vel qualitercunque occupata detinentem et possidentem temporis per successum infidelitatis notam contra coronam eiusdem regni incurrere contigerit, extunc illi, quos perpetuitas huiusmodi possessionum et bonorum inpignoratorum vel ocupatorum concernit, fideles existendo propter delictum eiusdem infidelis huiusmodi iure perpetuitatis eorum non priventur, sed semper talismodi ius perpetuitatis ipsorum salvum permaneat, idemque, dum eis placuerit, prosequi valeant atque possint, consuetudine horum in contrarium hucusque tempta non obstante; quam scilicet et singula preteritis hactenus temporibus secundum eandem consuetudinem et in premissorum contrarium acta, facta iudicataque atque gesta revocamus et revocata esse committimus per hec scripta.

III. Ceterum decernimus, ut dum et quodcumque per affutura tempora aliquem rusticum seu jobagionem baronis vel nobilis cum presbitero seu clerico quocumque rixare vel contendere, aut inter eos vituperia et minas simpliciter vel etiam subsecutis verberibus in thabernis vel aliis locis suspectis sive dampnorum illatione[s] vel in factis profanis suboriri contigerit, extunc talis presb[iter] vel cl[ericu]s [rusticum] seu jobagionem in sedem spiritualem non aliter, nisi prius petita [iustitia] a domino talis rustici citare et in causam convenire possit; sed petita prius iustitia huiusmodi, si tandem de iudicio domini eiusdem rustici contentari noluerit, vel si ipse dominus talis rustici sibi iustitiam facere recusaverit, ipsum rusticum in presentiam episcopi vel vicarii dyocesani liberam citandi habeat facultatem.

IV. Postremo per nos ac universitatem pretactorum regnicolarum nostrorum conclusum vetusta consuetudine exigente declaramus, ut nullus omnino hominum indigenarum vel forensium cuius[cumque] nationis et conditionis existat], sine licentia nostra aut successorum nostrorum regum Hungarie aliquas bullas vel scripta papales vel concilii aut delegatorum ab eis sive factum beneficiorum, sive penarum aut litium quarumcunque exprimant, ad hoc regnum nostrum et intra eius limites inportare aut se de quocumque beneficio vigore earundem intromittere vel etiam quemcunque regnicolarum nostrorum citare seu extra regnum in causam atrahere presumat. Si quis autem huiusmodi bullas vel rescripta inportaverit vel inportatas executioni nobis inconsultis demandare presu[m]pserit, su]perinde observata puniatur. Illud tamen quibuslibet indulgemus, ut in lite seu causa quacunque forum spirituale concernenti in hoc regno nostro et in presentia iudicum ordinariorum eiusdem mota et ventillata, finita huiusmodi lite seu causa liberam ad curiam apostolicam vel concillium appellandi habeant facultatem.

Ut autem premissarum constitutionum et confirmationis series robur obtineat perpetue firmitatis, presentes concessimus litteras nostras privilegiales. In cuius rei memoriam firmitatemque perpetuam presentes concessimus litteras sigilli nostri, [quo ut rex Hungarie] utimur, appensione munitas. Datum in Albaregali in festo beati Elie prophete, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quadagesimo.

JULY 20, 1440

Wladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, Croatia, Rama, Serbia, Galicia, Lodomeria, Cumania, Bulgaria, etc., grand prince of Lithuania and heir of Russia,¹ for the perpetual memory of this matter. Since it is our wish to preside happily over and to bring healthy prosperity to all our subjects with God's guidance, although, because of the intrinsic majesty of our lordship, we had no need to strive for the heights of rulership offered from without since our hands enclosed and ruled dominions far and wide, bestowed by the Maker of all; nonetheless, having been recently called by a command from on high, so we trust, to the governance of this kingdom which has been worn down by attacks of enemies on all sides, we have decided and chosen as our first and foremost task to exert ourselves for the advantage of our subjects and for conditions equally favorable to all of them, by which both their desires would be more fully satisfied and future benefits would accrue more fruitfully, so that, in that fashion, the benevolence of our care would be more apparent there where the strong desire for us and the great zeal exerted for our invitation obligates us as if we were indebted, desiring. . .² to eliminate thoroughly conflicts among the subjects, to foster justice, and to restrain the unbridled license of lawless men by readily available remedy. Recently, after the death of the former most serene prince lord Albert, king of the Romans and of Hungary etc.,³ when we had been first invited and then by many entreaties convinced to undertake the governance of this kingdom, because necessity implored it from a neighbor of this kingdom troubled by enemies on all sides,⁴ we were brought with great urgency

¹ Wladislas (Władisław III of Poland, called Jagiełłończyk) succeeded his father, Władisław II Jagiełło (Jogaila), king of Poland, formerly grand prince of Lithuania, in 1434; his title as "heir of Russia" rested on the Lithuanian rulers' claim to western Russian territories. The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of "kingdoms" that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, "Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European sources," in Lucie Doležalová ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Some 15 letters are missing. (There are several gaps in the text which the editors have filled in if the context allowed unequivocal emendation. We have not noted every lacuna.)

³ King Albert died in an epidemic that broke out in the camp while planning a campaign against the Ottomans, on his way to Vienna on 27 October 1439.

⁴ With the fall of Serbia (its last major fortress, Smederevo, capitulated on 18 August 1439) the Ottoman Empire reached the southern Hungarian border virtually along its entire length. In the spring and summer of 1440, Sultan Murad besieged Belgrade, the linchpin of the Hungarian defense system, for many months. The Ottoman threat was the main reason that a major part of great lords and nobles looked for a king who could defend the country. Albert's widow, Elizabeth, was still pregnant when a delegation of the Hungarian estates, consisting of five barons, was sent to Poland in January 1440, to invite King Wladislas III to the throne, then considered vacant. Having won him for the plan, the delegates, in the name of the estates, elected him king of Hungary in Cracow on 8 March. It is worth noting that he was the first king of Hungary who was in no way related to any of his predecessors. Though his father, Wladislas, in 1386 had married Hedwig/Jadwiga (d. 1399), the younger daughter of King Louis I of Hungary, Wladislas III himself was born in 1424 from the fifth marriage of the king with Zofia (Sonka) Holczańska.

by the effective summons and election of the lord prelates and barons, counts, knights, lords, and nobles of this kingdom assembled to provide for the urgent protection of a new king. However, because meanwhile that crown, with which the kings of Hungary have been accustomed to be crowned previously, was secretly taken from the castle of Visegrád by the lady Queen Elizabeth, widow of the said former King Albert, owing to the very careless watch on it,⁵ nonetheless, now the prelates, barons, counts, knights, lords, and nobles of the kingdom, having been assembled in our presence in greater numbers than the memory of men records for the coronation of any previous king, stated again that they could not be suitable guardians if they lacked auspicious rule and approved anew and confirmed unanimously our aforesaid election and consequently⁶. . . with another crown, equally precious and of equally remarkable work, of the most blessed King Stephen, apostle and patron of this kingdom, preserved with great veneration on the reliquary of his head, have caused us to be solemnly crowned and to be honored with that sacred diadem, while transferring all the force and all the efficacy of the previous crown to this new one as a substitute—and if that cannot be recovered, in perpetuity⁷—and committing to us in a decree complete royal power and the means to govern the polity. When these things had been done felicitously in the name of God, the community of our kingdom held extensive common discussions among themselves and requested us to provide for them a general decision by which harmful things can be altered, useful features preserved, and unlawfully committed deeds corrected. Then they have shown and offered to our highness a certain booklet;⁸ they had, as they said, diligently chewed over the text of this which contained certain articles of the constitutions

⁵ The queen's lady-in-waiting, Helene Kottaner, managed to get hold of the crown, smuggled it out of its custody in the castle Visegrád in February 1440 (see Die Denkwürdigkeiten der Helene Kottaner, Karl Mollay, ed. [Wien: Bundesverlag, 1971]; Engl. transl.: Maya B. Williamson, The Memoirs of Helene Kottaner [Woodbridge, 1998]) and delivered it to Queen Elizabeth in Komarno, where Ladislas (Posthumus) was born on 22 February 1440.

⁶ Some 28 letters missing or illegible.

⁷ See the charter of 17 July 1440 in Bak, Königtum, pp. 141–43. It is noteworthy that in spite of the sophisticated legal construct of the diet, based on the late Roman or Byzantine notion of the lex regia about the ultimate right of the populus to transfer power to the prince (see Walter Ullmann, Law and Politics in the Middle Ages [Ithaca, NY: Cornell Univ. Press, 1975], p. 56f.), the estates chose a diadem symbolically connected to the founding holy king of the country. (On crowns placed on head-reliquaries of saintly kings, such as Emperor Frederick II's or the Czech "Crown of St. Wenceslas," see Bak, Königtum, n. 37, p. 105–06 with literature. On the Székesfehérvár reliquary crown, which played a role in an earlier interregnum, see 1386.) Much was made of this declaration of "popular sovereignty" (e.g., by Deér, pp. 244 ff.; cf. Bak, Königtum, p. 44), but in fact it was, as Deér correctly formulated it, nothing but "an emergency solution." It should also be noted that the construct did not stand up against political realities and symbolical tradition: after the death of Wladislas, when Ladislas V (Posthumus) came of age, the estates tacitly recognized his coronation and annulled the acts of Wladislas (see 1453).

⁸ This libellus may have been an older collection of laws, or was compiled for this occasion from different sources, including a formulary (see Compilatio ante 1440). The selection of the texts was certainly well considered, for it contained long forgotten texts that favored the position of lesser nobles.

and dispositions from charters of the former king Andrew, son of King Béla III,⁹ and of Louis,¹⁰ our predecessors as lord kings of Hungary, also extracts and excerpts from certain other charters of former prelates, ecclesiastics, and nobles of the kingdom originating from the time of the coronation of the former other Andrew, called the Venetian.¹¹ They begged our eminence unanimously and humbly that we deign to confirm by renewing the contents of these constitutions as they are comprised in this booklet or register, which seem to be useful for their good state and which could lead to their greater utility and that of the entire kingdom. And the content of this booklet and also of the abovementioned constitutions follows here and runs thus:

THE LIBERTIES AND CONSTITUTIONS OF THE KINGDOM OF HUNGARY TAKEN FROM THE CHARTERS OF KING ANDREW, SON OF KING BELA III: ¹²

THE CONSTITUTIONS MADE BY THE PRELATES AND BARONS AND NOBLES OF THE KINGDOM OF HUNGARY AT THE TIME OF THE CORONATION OF KING ANDREW, CALLED THE VENETIAN, FOLLOW IN THIS WAY:¹³

THERE FOLLOW NOW THE LIBERTIES AND ORDINANCES GIVEN AND CONCEDED TO THE KINGDOM OF HUNGARY BEYOND THOSE LIBERTIES WHICH THE FORMER LORD KING ANDREW, SON OF KING BELA III, GAVE AND CONCEDED TO THE AFORESAID KINGDOM, WHICH THE LORD KING LOUIS HIMSELF HAS CONFIRMED. THE TEXT OF THE SAID CONFIRMATION IN ALL THINGS BY KING LOUIS FOLLOWS IN THESE WORDS:¹⁴

We, therefore, strongly urged by the most humble and devoted pleas of the said community of our gentlemen of the realm, since from their manifest claims we recognized that the constitutions, liberties, and ordinances specified above founded by the provident disposition of the ancients are most likely to be able to contribute to the utility and good state of the same community, have freely acceded to their prayer and approve the said abovementioned constitutions, liberties, and ordinances with the purpose that they might enhance the well-being of the Christian commonwealth; we approve all their contents, clauses, articles, and especially the intention of the abovementioned King Louis inasmuch as we accept the articles changed and altered by him, and we ratify and confirm them as valid for this kingdom, as well as renew them in accordance with ⁹ That is, the Golden Bull of 1222.

¹⁰ That is, the decree of 1351.

¹¹ The description is erroneous: the decree was not Andrew III's coronation decree (1290) but one passed by a diet in 1298, augmented by a number of legal norms which are now seen as having originated around 1400 (Comp. ante 1440).

¹² Here follows the copy of 1222:1–30. The final clause on the right of resistance and the dating were omitted.

¹³ Complete copy of 1298 and—without any transition—of Comp. ante 1440, the origin of which seems not to have been known (cf. Szilágyi, p. 138).

¹⁴ Copy of 1351, without preamble, transcript and concluding formulae of 1222, containing all the additional articles 1351:1–25.

our specific understanding of our royal majesty,¹⁵ by decreeing and committing through these presents that these constitutions, liberties, and ordinances must be inviolably observed and duly implemented by present and future prelates, whom it concerns and will concern, and also by all barons, judges, knights, and lords in posterity in all succeeding times forever. And we also decree that they be observed in all things just as we shall be required to observe them immutably without any change; in addition to the aforesaid we promise anew and declare at the request of our said gentlemen of the realm:

1. That no nobleman of this kingdom, whether holding estates or not, should be required to pay tithes, just as is also demonstrated to be contained in the decree of the above named King Albert,¹⁶ but any noble, when he is directed by the royal majesty, is required to pay the debts of such tithes by fighting against the enemies of this kingdom with the spilling of his blood and with manly defense.¹⁷

2. In addition, we order and establish by the present decree that if it happens that any baron or noble of our kingdom of Hungary, while holding the estates and goods of other barons or nobles or of churches in security or in any other way, should in the course of time be convicted of an act of infidelity against the crown of this kingdom, then those to whom the perpetual right of such mortgaged estates or pledged goods pertains should, if they are faithful subjects of ours, not be deprived by the crime of this traitor of their heritage, but such a right of perpetuity must always remain intact, and they should have the right and the means to enforce it, as long as it pleases them, notwithstanding that usage which has been recently introduced against these customs; for we revoke and order to be held revoked herewith that usage and all and every act that has been undertaken, judged, or performed in previous times according to that usage and in infringement of the above.¹⁸

¹⁵ Ex certa nostre maiestatis scientia is a recurrent phrase of royal charters, but its exact meaning is not clear. The translation we chose is probable, not certain, but renders the traditional sense of the words, which is something like “according to our understanding of our authority...” Zsuzsanna Teke’s interpretation in: DRH, p. xix, according to which this clause was to refer to the king’s special jurisdiction (absoluta potestas) does not explain its use here.

¹⁶ The exemption of nobles from paying the tithe was contained in a now lost edict of Sigismund of 23 June 1405, referred to in a charter of 1 August 1421, see DRH, pp. 216–17. In 1415, Pope John XXIII confirmed this exemption based on the service of the nobles “in the defense of the faith,” see Josephus Nicolaus Kovachich, Monumenta veteris legislationis Hungaricae (Claudiopolis: Collegium, 1815). 2:8–9.

¹⁷ The connection between the nobility’s exemption from the tithe and their military service was explicitly mentioned in a papal letter of 1415 (see n. 32 to 1439); freedom from taxation also followed from the early medieval understanding of servitium and libertas; see Jenő Szűcs, “Az 1267. évi dekrétum es háttere” [The decree of 1267 and its background], in Mályusz Elemér Emlékkönyv [Festschrift Elemér Mályusz] Éva H. Balázs, Erik Fügedi, Ferenc Maksay eds., (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1984), pp. 341–94, esp. p. 351; on the assumption that the nobles’ belonging to the kings’ familia was the basis of their judicial immunity and freedom from taxation.

¹⁸ The existence of such practice under Sigismund’s reign can indeed be documented.

3. We further decree that while and whenever in future it happens that any peasant or tenant of a baron or noble fights or brawls with any priest or cleric, or that there arise among themselves insults and threats or also subsequent brawls in taverns or other places of ill- repute or the inflicting of damages or profane deeds, the priest or cleric may not charge and summon the peasant or tenant to a spiritual court unless justice has first been sought from the lord of such a peasant, and not otherwise. But if justice was first sought in this way, if in the end he is not satisfied with the judgment of the lord of that peasant, or if the lord of such a peasant declines to render justice to him, then he should be free to summon that peasant into the presence of the bishop or the vicar of the diocese.¹⁹

4. Finally we declare, on the decision of ours and the community of our said gentlemen of the realm, in conformity with ancient custom, that no man, native or foreign of whatever nation or condition he may be, may presume without our license or that of our successors as kings of Hungary to bring into our kingdom or within its borders any bulls or letters issued by popes, councils, or their delegates regarding benefices, penalties, or cases of any kind or to interfere with any prebend on their authority or to summon any one of our people²⁰ or to prosecute him in a case outside the kingdom. If anyone brings in bulls or rescripts of this kind or presumes to recommend their importation for implementation without consulting us, let him be punished for what he has done. However, we grant this indulgence to anyone that in any trial or case in our realm pertaining to a court spiritual, and moved and argued in the presence of a justice ordinary, when a trial or case of this sort has been concluded he may have leave to appeal to the apostolic court or to the council.²¹

In order that the contents of the preceding constitutions and confirmations may hold the force of perpetual validity, we have granted these presents. For the memory of which and for its perpetual validity, we concede that these presents be fortified by appending our seal which we use as king of Hungary. Given in Székesfehérvár on the feast of the blessed prophet Elijah, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and forty.²²

¹⁹ This article extends the general rule of res sequitur reum to a special case which previously seems to have been handled differently. This article grants the right to seignorial courts to prosecute in the first instance injury-trials which were earlier handled immediately by courts spiritual. It can be seen as an advance for the secular landlords.

²⁰ The measure seems to apply to all subjects, hence it appeared better to translate regnicolae here as “people” and not, as usual, as “gentlemen of the realm,” that is, the political nation of enfranchised nobles.

²¹ Cf. 8 April 1404/I.

²² The only surviving copy lacks the usual eschatocol, although the elaborate arenga would suggest that originally a full-dress privilege was issued.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS I OF HUNGARY (1440-44)
OF 1443 (MARCH OR APRIL)

According to Elemér Mályusz in “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957) p. 83, the assembly, in which this decree was issued, must have taken place in the first days of April or, according to Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 318, n. 1, at the end of March. It cannot be considered a diet, for no delegates of the counties seem to have been present. In the face of imminent Ottoman threats, the king called together his leading generals, his council and some major lords in order to prepare a campaign, the so-called long campaign, deep into the Balkans. Its legal significance is above all the introduction of “terminal summons” (evocatio cum insinuatione), a procedure modeled after similar canonical legal practice, which was to enhance the swift administration of justice against widespread violence in the country.

MS.: Contemporary copy on paper, damaged and faulty; MNL OL DL. 80798.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

ED.: DRH, pp. 317–23.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” pp. 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 83–84, 100–12.

Wladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Polonie, Dalmatie, Cruatie etc. rex, Lythwanieque princeps supremus et heres Russie ad futuram memoriam. Cum a primevo ingressu nostro in hoc regnum avari semper et sumptuose diligentes fuerimus ad ea exercenda precipue, per que attriti regni eiusdem incommoda potuissent competentiùs celeriusque submoveri, preter multos in id factum quesitos attemptatosque modos novissime vocatis ad hunc locum in presentiam nostram magnificis fidelibus nostris Nicolao de Wylak et Johanne de Hunyad, partium nostrarum wayvadis Transsilvanarum, festinam pro eorundem adventu prelatorum et baronum, militum ac procerum regni huius convocationem fieri iussimus eo animo eoque propensito, ut adhibenda eiusdem regni necessitatibus opportuna proviso ampliori deinceps mora et negligentia non traheretur, sed ut de prefatorum wayvadarum nostrarum consilio, communi tandem omnium aliorum baronum nostrarum et procerum pretactorum deliberatione subsequente concluderetur tempestius, quomodo, quo denique ordine horrenda regni huius, tum ex paganorum, tum christianorum insultantium parte hactenus perlata turbatio reici fugarique posset atque tolli. Ob quam rem venientibus iuxta vocationem nostram pretactam diebus hiis in hunc locum memoratis wayvadis nostris concurrentibusque nichilominus ad istam previa ratione promulgatam congregationem multis aliis baronibus, spiritualibus et secularibus, sed et pluribus militibus et proceribus huius regni nostri, copiosos ad rem pretactam cum eisdem tractatus transsegitur, finaliterque in nomine domini, cuius nutu reguntur universa et diriguntur, ad certas regno eidem nostro et eorundem iudicio utiles conclusiones devenimus, quarum ordo et tenor sequitur in hunc modum:

I. Primo et principaliter, ut in estate proxime affutura pro regni huius defensione et reparando statu notabilis armorum exercitus instauretur, pro eiusque institutione et instauratione opportuna per totum regnum nostrum generaliter pecunialis contributio fieri debeat sub modis et ordine ac conditionibus et penis, qui seu que in aliis litteris nostris ad singulos comitatus regni nostri transmissis distincte notificate sunt et expresse.

II Sed ut tam in huiusmodi exercituali progressu, quam in aliis agendis sive contra emulos paganos, sive alios quoscunque nocivos regni hostes et oppressores instaurandis eo liberius quietiusque et diligentius procedatur, quo citius a singulorum cordibus alterni odii et oppressionis seu dampnificationis materia secludatur, conclusum est, et determinatum, ut quicumque inter nostros fideles hiis disturbiorum temporibus sua propria presumptione, demptis donationibus per infidelitatis notam factis, alterius fidelis nostri bona occupavit et illicite detinet, talis coram testimonio capituli vel conventus, ut hactenus moris fuit, per litteras nostras regias ad instantiam querulantium modo premissis et dampnificationum emanandas quanto citius ammoneatur, ut hinc ad infra quindecimum diem festi beati Georgii martiris proxime affuturi singula huiusmodi bona modo, quo pretangitur, usurpata illis, a quibus illicite ac propria auctoritate occupata sunt, restituere et remittere teneatur dilatione et difficultate sine omni quatenus in progressu exercitus prenotati, ubi pro defensione fidei expediendaque de inimicis crucis Christi ultione sincere fidelium certabit devotio, nullus talis appareat, qui suis notoriis criminibus, ab omnipotenti deo oppressorum contra se precibus provocato iram potius, quam adiutorium mereatur. Qui si fecerit, bene quidem, alioquin quilibet talis alienorum bonorum occupator ad instantiam huiusmodi oppressi vel oppressorum presenti insinuatione vim evocationis peremptorie ex nunc prout ex tunc obtinente hic Bude coram iudicibus deputandis octavo die festi Penthecostes proxime affuturi per se vel procuratorem tanquam legitime et peremptorie, ut pretangitur, evocatus absque spe ulterioris termini obtinendi comparere teneatur rationem detentionis huiusmodi occupatorum bonorum redditurus efficacem. Quo quidem adveniente termino, ipsisque partibus iuxta formam premissorum comparentibus, si ex efficacibus documentis ibidem iudicialiter compertum fuerit ipsum, qui ratione occupationis quorumcunque bonorum accusatus fuerit, ad eadem bona, que detinet, efficax ius habuisse et habere liciteque eadem per ipsum detineri, extunc talis in iure suo illese relinquatur. Ubi autem illicite occupasse et detinere compertus fuerit et ammonitus modo premissis ipsa restituere noluerit, extunc mox sine omni ampliori exceptione aut dilatione sententie capitali, pene facti potentialis subiciatur et ipsorum bonorum detentorum possessione privetur indilate, bonaque ipsa illi, ad quem pertinent, adiudicentur sententialiter et restituantur. Nec autem in premissis casu cuiuspiam dictarum partium amplior ad comparandum et respondendum terminus assignari valeat; quin ymo communi deliberatione statutum est, ut prefatus terminus nec per ingressum in exercitum et neque quocunque alio modo aut--- prolongari valeat, sed quod in absentia alicuius dictarum partium non venientis ad partis comparentis instantiam iudex prefatus dispositionem et determinationem prefatam nichilominus prosequatur, effectus sententieque modo premissis late et diffinitis extiterunt, illi duo capitanei nostri, qui pro defensione eius partis regni nostri, ex qua antefata lis orta fuerit, subscripto ordine deputabuntur ---- reum et condemnatum in premissis iuxta revisionem antelati iudicis facere debeant omni favore procul moto.

III. Quia autem usque ad hoc tempus maxima causa huiusmodi oppressionum et occupationis bonorum alienorum ex eo accidisse creditur, quod littere et mandata nostra regia, que ex iusta causa vel ad instantiam aliquorum vel querimoniam iuridice actenus exire et emanare contingit, per aliquot barones, dignitarios et officiales nostros regales, seu ipsorum vicesgerentes plerumque levipense et inexecuta manserunt, idcirco prefatorum prelatorum, baronum, militum et procerum regni nostri nunc in antefata congregatione existentium communi deliberatione et ordinatione commissum est et statutum, ut hinc in posterum quilibet regnicolarum nostrorum, cuiuscunque dignitatis aut conditionis existat, litteras et mandata nostra regia, dummodo ex iusta causa et iuridice exeant et emanent, prout aliorum regum predecessorum nostrorum temporibus solitum fuit, sine omni repugnantia sub pena infrascripta observare et exequi toto posse teneatur. Quicumque autem id facere contempnerent, nisi celeriter per nuncium fidedignum aut litteras efficaces se super non observatione huiusmodi mandatorum in presentia nostra ac prelatorum et baronum nostrorum apud nos pro tempore presentium se excuset, si fuerit simplex nobilis aut vicesgerens baronis aut dignitarii, seu comitis alicuius, possessiones seu bona ac res eiusdem mox ad mandatum nostrum occupentur, de eisdemque domini ipsorum lesi et iniurati, si ad quantitatem dampnorum se extenderint, digne satisfactionis dupplum impendant, cuius una pars in sortem dampnorum, altera vero pro iniuriis illatis cedat. Si vero possessiones eiusdem rei ad valorem dampnorum prefactorum se non extenderint, tunc eiusdem rei persona ad manus iniuriati et dampnificati assignetur. Vel ubi autem idem dominus suus, cuius scilicet familiaris ipse reus extiterit, id facere non valeret aut ob favorem eiusdem recusaret, extunc statim excuset se efficaciter per suas litteras, quod huiusmodi dampnificatio non fuit cum voluntate sua, coopereturque omni posse pro persone talis dampnificatis et dampnatis reis condemnatoris detentione, ac quod amplius talem nocivum hominem et sub suo nomine et in eius familiaritate non conservet; ab honoreque seu officiolatu suo in continenti per dominum suum deponatur, licet ad talem honorem sine gratia nostra de cetero venire deputatis valeat.

IV. Si vero prelatus aliquis aut baro sive dignitarius aut comes seu alter officialis regalis mandatorum nostrorum notorius contemner aut transgressor extiterit, extunc super eo nichilominus, sicuti habuimus et habemus, ita efficacius ex deliberatione prefata de cetero habeamus potestatem eundemque a sua dignitate vel baronia, honore seu officiolatu sine omni eiusdem contradictione amovere, stetque in arbitrio et voluntate nostra, quo ordine eum corripere volumus et punire.

V. Preterea ut eo citius cuiuslibet oppressionis et dampnificationis inter subditos nostros occasio adimatur, conclusum est et determinatum, quod omnia fortalitia ----atum, munitiones ecclesiarum seu monasteriorum aut aliorum locorum quorumcunque, que sub nostra obedientia hiis disturbiorum temporibus absque utilitate et defensione regni aut necessitate notabili regnicolarum nostrorum erecta facteque et constructe sunt, de quibus inter fideles nostros spolia, dampna seu nocumenta committuntur, et que tantas pertinentias aut proventus consuetos, ut de eisdem tueri possent, non habentes de bonis aliorum regnicolarum nostrorum conservantur, hinc infra quindecimum diem festi beati Georgii martiris proxime affuturi deleantur et distrahantur, possessionesque talium huiusmodi spolia de ipso fortalitio committentium pro nostra maiestate per banum aut comitem seu capitaneum occupentur, quibus occupatis prius levis et dampnificatis in eisdem possessionibus satisfactione inpena, relique ad nostrum mandatum conserventur.

VI. Item quod partes illas, puta versus Cassouienses, Sczepusienses, Zolienses, Trinchinienses, Zaladienses et Castriferrei, in quibus videlicet certorum forensium insultus pullulat, confestim per opportunos modos mittantur et preficiantur duo et duo capitanei cum dispositione decreti, qui ab ipsorum insultantium hostium infestationibus regnicolas nostros in partibus illis, ad quas singuli eorum missi fuerint, toto posse liberare defensareque tenantur, ac etiam inter regnicolas nostros alterna spolia mutuasque dampnificationes agere non permittant, ymo levis et dampnificatis iustitiam et satisfactionem durante ipsorum officio facere studiosius curent, sententiasque et mandata nostra regalia seu iudicia per nos previa ratione deputandorum fideliter et sine favore aut odio quorumcunque observari compellant et suo modo exequantur. In casu autem, quod ipsi capitanei nostri ad hec omnia facienda vel aliqua gravamina ex eis peragenda potentes cum suis armatis gentibus aut sufficientes non essent, extunc nos ac subscripti prefati barones, milites et proceres seu hii, quos ex eisdem ipsi requisierint, ipsos sine dilatione, totiens quotiens necessarium fuerit, adiuvare, singuli etiam regnicole nostri sub ipsorum capitaneatu existentes in eorum succursum mox, postquam hoc commiserint, insurgere sub pena occupationis possessionum ipsorum debeant et teneantur.

VII. Item quod iidem capitanei de cetero super bonis nostrorum fideleium per quempiam census vulgo hold imponere aut inpositos exigere non permittant, quodque de illis dampnis et iniuriis, quos et que regnicole nostri, partem scilicet nostram facientes sibi ipsis mutuo inter se hucusque intulerint irrogaverintque et fecerint, eisdem, quibus huiusmodi dampnificationes et iniurie illate existunt, libera plenaque iuxta consuetudinem huius regni iuridice requirendi concedatur et remaneat facultas et iustitia ex parte talium damnatorum cuiusmodi non denegetur.

VIII. Insuper ex quo nos unicuique regnicolarum nostrorum, quantum in nobis fuerit, suum ius ministrare et illesum relinquere parati sumus, propterea ut et nos iuribus nostris regalibus ex parte ipsorum regnicolarum nostrorum fraudari non videamur, conclusum est et determinatu--

1443 (MARCH OR APRIL)

Wladislas by the grace of God king of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., grand prince of Lithuania, and heir of Russia,¹ for future memory. Because ever since our first entry into this kingdom we have always been most eager and diligent in pursuing, in particular, those things by which the troubles of this weakened kingdom could be more suitably and more quickly removed, after having attempted several measures, consequently, having first summoned just recently our distinguished loyal subjects Nicholas of Ujlak/Ilok and John Hunyadi, voivodes of our Transylvanian regions,² to this place into our presence, we have ordered that an urgent assembly be held on the occasion of their arrival by the prelates and barons, knights, and lords of this kingdom with that thought and intention in mind that proper provision for the necessities of this kingdom should not be retarded by further delay and negligence, but that we should decide swiftly with the counsel of our aforementioned voivodes and then with the subsequent deliberation of all our other said barons and lords in what way and in which order the terrible disturbances of this kingdom from the attacks of both pagans and Christians hitherto endured should be resisted, held off, and stopped. For this reason after our said voivodes have come according to our said summons at this time to this place and when many other barons, spiritual and secular, as well as many knights and lords of our kingdom have come together to an assembly proclaimed for the above reason,³ we accomplished much in treating of the said business with them, and finally in the name of the Lord, by whose will all things are ruled and governed, we arrived at certain decisions useful in our judgment and theirs for that kingdom of ours, the order and content of which follow in this manner:

1. First and principally, that in the coming summer for the defense and recovery of the state of this kingdom a great military army must be established, and for its proper institution and establishment a financial contribution must be levied generally throughout our whole kingdom in the form and

¹ Wladislas (Władisław III of Poland, called Jagiełłończyk) succeeded his father, Władisław II Jagiełło (Jogaila), king of Poland, formerly grand prince of Lithuania, in 1434; his title as “heir of Russia” rested on the Lithuanian rulers’ claim to western Russian territories. The Hungarian royal style, as developed during the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, contained a number of “kingdoms” that were essentially only claims of the kings. Most of these, such as Rama, Bosnia, Serbia, Galicia (Halič), Lodomeria (Vladimir), Cumania (Wallachia) and Bulgaria acknowledged Hungarian suzerainty only for very short periods, if at all. See János M. Bak, “Lists in the service of legitimation in Central European Sources” in Lucie Doležalova ed., The Charm of a List: From the Sumerians to Computerised Data Processing (Newcastle upon Tyne, Cambridge Scholars Publishing, 2009), 34–45.

² Nicholas of Újlak, (alias of Galgóc, son of ban Ladislas, d. 1477), ban of Mačva 1438–72, voivode of Transylvania 1441–65, king of Bosnia 1471–77, and János Hunyadi (d. 1456), ban of Severin 1439–46, voivode of Transylvania 1441–46, governor of Hungary 1446–52, count of Beszterce, captain general 1453–6, were the mightiest magnates of Hungary in their time. Besides the voivodate of Transylvania which was their most important office after 1441, they held jointly a number of other honors including all the frontier castles from Severin to Belgrade, and were thus responsible for the defense of the kingdom along its entire southeastern border.

³ Mályusz (p. 83) has demonstrated that this was not a diet proper, for the lesser nobles did not attend.

order and under the conditions and penalties which have been clearly promulgated and described in our other letters sent to all the counties of our kingdom.⁴

2. But in order that both the campaign of this army and other actions against pagan enemies or any other vicious fiends and other oppressors of the kingdom might be done more boldly, smoothly, and efficiently, so as to eliminate more quickly reasons for mutual hatred, oppression, and harm from the hearts of all men, it has been concluded and determined that any one of our loyal subjects who in these times of troubles by his own audacity has occupied and illegally keeps the goods of another loyal subject of ours, with the exception of grants made on the basis of high treason, must be warned as soon as possible with the testimony of a chapter or convent, as has been the usual custom, by means of our royal charters to be issued upon the request of those complaining and who suffered damage in the said manner, from now until the fifteenth day of the next feast of Saint George the Martyr,⁵ that he is required to restore and to return without any delay or hindrance all the goods wrongfully acquired in the abovementioned way to those from whom they were taken illegally, while acting solely on his own authority. Moreover, where the devoted faithful will fight sincerely to defend the faith and to exact vengeance from the enemies of the cross of Christ, no such man may take part in the campaign of the said army, who by his notorious crimes would more deserve anger than help from almighty God moved by the prayers of the oppressed against him.⁶ If he does make restitution, all is well; otherwise any such usurper of the goody of others is required, in accord with the present notice by a terminal summons,⁷ on the complaint, new or outstanding, of the oppressed person or persons to appear, in person or through an advocate without the hope of obtaining a further term on the eighth day of the next feast of Pentecost⁸ here at Buda in front of judges to be appointed, in order to render an acceptable reason for holding the usurped goods. If the man accused of usurping properties, when the term opens and the parties appear according to the said form, is found from proper records by law to have and to have had, proper rights to those properties which he holds and that they are legally held by him, then such a man

⁴ One of these letters, sent to the county of Közép Szolnok, has survived, unfortunately mutilated like the copy of the decree and therefore also having no date (see DRH, p. 318, n. 1). However, on 11 April 1443, the king issued an additional order, raising the demanded contribution to one gold florin (MNL OL DL. 65057). The tax seems to have been collected, as we have records about parts of it being handed over as dispositio (stipend for soldiers) to Hunyadi and Újlaki (Mályusz, p. 111).

⁵ May 8.

⁶ Note the implication that victory is seen as granted by God to the righteous, hence the sinful would endanger the success of the campaign; the idea behind this is may be the equation of war and battle with ordeal, a common idea in the Middle Ages. It may also be derived from the concept that a bellum iustum may not be successfully waged by the impious, which may go back through St. Augustine to Roman reflections on civil wars during the first century B.C.; for some apposite comment, see Paul Jal, La guerre civile a Rome (Paris: Presses universitaires de France, 1963), pp. 473–88.

⁷ This seems to be the first known instance of such a summons, which came to be known citatio cum insinuatione—which we translate as “terminal summons”—meaning that after this summons the case would be adjudicated whether the party appeared or not. The deadline here would have been 17 June.

⁸ 16 June.

should be left unmolested in his right. However, if he is found to have usurped and holds something illegally and after being warned in the said manner is unwilling to restore it, then at once without any further excuse or delay he Will be subject to capital punishment, the penalty for an act of act of might, and will be deprived at once of the continued possession of the properties usurped, and the properties themselves will be adjudicated at law and restored to whomever they belong. In the aforesaid case none of the said parties should be granted a further term for appearing and answering; and, furthermore, it has been decided by common deliberation that the said term cannot be prorogued by joining the army or by any ether means . . .,⁹ but in the absence of any on the request of the party present, the said judge must make the said decision and disposition. Once a sentence has been given and pronounced in the said way, then those two captains of ours, who are responsible for the defense of that part of our kingdom in which the preceding case arose, will be appointed by the following procedure,¹⁰ in order to enforce the culprit and the condemned in the foregoing according to the requirement of the said judge unmoved by any favor.¹¹

3. Since hitherto the most important cases of oppression and usurpation of properties of others seem to have happened because our royal letters and mandates, which until now were issued and sent out by law for a just reason or at the instance or complaint of someone, have been taken lightly or remained unexecuted by certain barons, dignitaries, and royal officials of ours, or by their deputies, therefore it has been decreed and ordered by common deliberation and decision of the said prelates, barons, knights, and lords of our kingdom now gathered in the above mentioned assembly that from now on into the future anyone of our gentlemen of the realm, of whatever dignity and condition he may be, should be required to observe and to follow with all his ability without any reluctance, under the penalties written below, our royal letters and mandates, insofar as they are issued and sent out for just reasons and by law, just as was customary in the times of the other kings, our predecessors. Any man who is found to be in contempt of this, be he a simple noble or a deputy of a baron or office-holder of any ispán, his estates or properties and possessions should be occupied on our order, and from these their lords¹² should pay double the proper amount

⁹ Lacuna of some 10 letters.

¹⁰ In the same way as Hunyadi and his colleague Nicholas of Újlak were responsible for the defense of the south (see above, note 2), other parts of the kingdom were committed to other persons who in the 1430s began to be titled “captains” or “captains-general” (capitaneus generalis). The title capitaneus has been used for the commanders of the most important royal castles. The new captains-general held their office in pairs (cf. below, art. 6) and were invested with exceptional authority, including the appointment of the ispáns in the counties of their areas.

¹¹ Lacuna of some 20 letters; another lacuna at the end of the same sentence (of some 8 to 10 letters) does not seem to distort the meaning.

¹² This is a rare occasion when the dependence of noblemen on their more powerful fellows is being legally admitted. In fact, a great number of noblemen with limited means joined (or, occasionally were forced into) the service of barons or large landowners. They did not lose their noble privileges and were subject to their seniores only in matters of service. This kind of familiaritas was, however, also a road to social mobility. Familares (noble retainers) often followed their seniors into higher offices as their deputies. The laws refer to it very rarely, as in principle all noblemen were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by of compensation for damages and injuries if they suffice for the amount of losses, and one part should go to the share of the damaged party and the other for the injuries sustained, unless he quickly excuses himself by a suitable messenger or the proper letter regarding his contempt of such an order of ours in our presence and in that of our prelates and barons who accompany us at that time. If, however, his estates do not cover the value of the aforementioned losses, then his person must be given over into the hands of those injured and robbed. If, however, his lord, namely whose retainer the accused is, is not able to do this or refuses for favor of him, then at once he must properly excuse himself through his letter, stating that the loss caused was not at his will and he will do his best to arrest the person of such an evildoer who scorns the one who suffered the loss, and that he would not keep any longer such a harmful man under his name and in his retinue; and he should be immediately deposed from his honor or office that he holds, by his lord, even if he would be eligible to receive such an honor without our grace.¹³

4. If any prelate, baron, dignitary, ispán, or other royal official happens to be notoriously in contempt or in transgression of our orders, then, regarding this person, just as we used to have and still have, the more effectively we should now have, based on the above deliberation, the power to remove this man from his dignity or barony or honor without any objection from him, and it should be according to our judgment and will in what way we wish to seize and punish him.

5. Furthermore, in order that the cause of any oppression or damage among our subjects might be more quickly removed, it has been agreed to and decided: that all fortifications...¹⁴ defenses of churches and monasteries or of any other places under our obedience which were built, made, and constructed in these times of troubles and do not serve the defense of the kingdom or important needs of our people, or which, lacking such appurtenances or regular revenues from which they can be kept, are maintained from the properties of other subjects of ours, must be destroyed and demolished between now and the fifteenth day of the next feast of St. George the martyr,¹⁵ and the estates of those who committed the said plunderings from these fortifications ought to be seized for our majesty by a ban or ispán or captain, and after these properties have first been seized and compensation has been made for damages and losses on the estates of others, the remainder must be kept for our disposal.

6. Then, that two captains each should be sent and placed in charge by suitable means ordered by a decree immediately to those regions, namely to those of Košice, Špis, Zvolen, Trenčín, Zala, and Vas, in which the attacks of certain foreigners are increasing. They will be required to free and to only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See: Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998) pp. 137–40; Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 110–31, and János M. Bak, “Feudalism in Hungary?” in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011) pp. 203–17.

¹³ The text is corrupt and partly illegible.

¹⁴ Lacuna of about 5 letters.

¹⁵ 8 May.

defend with all their might our gentlemen of realm against the insults of the attacks of those enemies in those regions to which each of them was sent, and that they shall not permit further plundering and mutual harm to be done among our gentlemen of realm, but rather that they should take care zealously to render justice and compensation for damages and losses during their term of office, and that they should compel the observance and the fulfillment in the prescribed way of the sentences and orders of our royal selves or of judges to be appointed by us on the above grounds faithfully and without favor or hatred of anyone.¹⁶ However, in case our captains are not powerful enough or have sufficient armed men to do all these things or to rectify other complaints rising from these, then they can ask us and the said barons, knights, and lords undersigned,¹⁷ and then we and the said barons, knights, and lords written below or those whom they would ask among them must and are required to assist without delay, as often as is necessary, as well as all our gentlemen of the realm living under their captaincy after they have been asked, under the penalty of the confiscation of their estates.

7. Then, that these captains must not permit any man to impose or to demand in the future the rents commonly called *hold*¹⁸ on the properties of our loyal subjects, and those who suffer such damages and wrongs, should be granted free and full faculty and the right to proceed legally according to the custom of this kingdom against those who cause, conjure up or do such damages and wrongs among our gentlemen of realm, namely those belonging to our party, mutually among themselves, and justice against such evil-doers must not be denied to any man.

8. Furthermore, just as we are prepared to administer his own law to every one of our gentlemen of realm as far as it is up to us and to leave him unmolested, therefore, so that we ourselves should not appear to be defrauded of our royal rights by those same gentlemen of our realm, it has been decided and determined...¹⁹ ¹⁹The surviving copy ends here in mid-sentence.

¹⁶ The fighting to which reference is made here was the civil war between the followers of King Wladislas and the infant King Ladislas V. The war broke out in summer 1440 and lasted, with interruptions, until after Wladislas' death in 1444. The greater part of the kingdom with the capital was controlled by Wladislas, but extended regions of northern and western Hungary (as listed here), including many royal cities and mining-towns, remained faithful to his rival. After his mother's death in December 1442, Ladislas' case was supported by his distant cousin and guardian, Emperor Frederick III of Germany who, of course, largely depended on German and Czech mercenaries. Hence the many allusions, as here, to the enemy as "foreigners" in the contemporary propaganda of Wladislas' party.

¹⁷ Since the surviving copy is truncated, the signatories referred to are not known. The original may have been similar to the charters of 1440 with their 94 and 78 signatories and seals; see Pál Lővei, "Sokpecsétes oklevelek a 14.–15. századi Magyarországon" [Charters with many seals in 14th-15th C. Hungary] ars hungarica 29 (2013) 137–44.

¹⁸ The term hold does not seem to refer here to the Hungarian measure of land, but to an exaction of tribute, widespread in Bohemia, the name of which probably goes back to the German term Huldigung, homage; see Hugo Toman, Husitské válečnictví za doby Žižhovy a Prokopovy &c. [Hussite warfare under Žižka and Prokop], (Prague: Král. České Spolenost Nauk, 1898), pp. 62–4. Thus, this type of forced exaction, probably comparable to the descensus violentus of the Hungarian sources, may have been introduced to Hungary by the Czech Hussite troops who occupied the northern counties for decades.

LAW OF KING WLADISLAS I OF HUNGARY (1440-44)

OF 18 APRIL, 1444

This decree originates from a diet held by King Wladislas I in April 1444 and aimed at restoring order and strengthening royal authority after years of open civil war between the Habsburg and Jagiello factions.

It seems to have been issued in different forms, by the king and by the estates. The text refers to 218 aristocrats and nobles who had committed themselves, just as the king did, to observe the articles, and had sealed an exemplar with their seals. No such sealed exemplar survived. Two of the surviving originals issued under the king's seal contain the clause and the list of names, the third omits both. All three, however, contain art. 32, added after the dating clause, in which the decision of the estates about foreign office-holders is contained. It is presumed that the reversalis of the noble estates was issued a few days later and added to some copies of the royal diploma.

MSS.: Three originals: two on parchment, one with royal pendant seal, MNL OL DI. 13827, one with royal seal on simple cue, Archives of the Archabbey Pannonhalma, Caps. 1044; one on paper, damaged, with royal seal en placard. (For details, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301– 1457, (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 325.)

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Josephus Nicolaus Kovachich, Monumenta veteris legislationis Hungaricae (Claudiopolis: Collegium, 1815) 1: 30–55; Idem, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. . . (Pest: Trattner, 1818) 1: 74–93; DRH, pp. 325–37.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46–123, 529–602, here pp. 66, 84, 536–7; Pál Engel, “János Hunyadi: The Decisive Years of His Career, 1440–1444,” in János M Bak and Béla K. Király, eds. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary pp. 103–24 (Brooklyn, N.Y.: Social Science Monographs, 1982). pp. 103–24; Jan Dąbrowski, Władisław Jagiełłończyk w Węgrzech [W. J. in Hungary] (Warszawa: Gebethner & Wolff, 1923), pp. 138 ff.

18 APRILI 1444

Nos Wladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Polonie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex Lithwanieque princeps supremus et heres Russie ad universorum notitiam harum serie volumus pervenire, quod quamvis hoc preterito tempore, quo pravis pravorum ausibus multa variaque in regno isto nocumenta viguere, sepius quesita sit via, per quam eiusmodi nociturnitatibus, turbinibus quoque, sed et tot periculis, tot denique dissensionibus et malorum generibus, que pululasse obtigisse et efluxisse iam sub oculis visa sunt, continuatio et occasio clauderetur; quia tamen effrene mentis dissoluta manus cohiberi non facile patitur, quanto mollius incautiusque parabatur reprimi, tanto diuturnior malis peiora iungens perdurabit. Nunc autem, cum in dies magis magisque huius regni turbatio succresceret, visum est communi omnium voto eo celeriori remedio occurrere, quo et amarior tot malorum dilatio sentiretur. Ob hoc post novissimum reditum nostrum ab expeditione exercituali, quam adversus paganos Turcos felicibus divino munimine potiti triumphis transegimus, generali convocatione promulgata convenit prelatorum, baronum, militum et regnicolarum nostrorum in hunc locum multitudo tam magna, quam maior vix umquam in simili congregatione visa fuit, quibus per hos plures iam dies in tractatibus mutuis residentibus, tandem domino volente una nobiscum pro reintegranda pace et concordia mutua agendaque tutela regni huius ad infrascriptos articulos firmissime sub penis infrascriptis observandos devenerunt.

I. Primo, ut recto ordine a capite inceptum videatur, statutum est, ut pro ampliori et validiori potentia et facultate nostra ad nostros regendos quilibet prelatorum, baronum, nobilium et regni procerum nunc hic presentium et etiam absentium, qui scilicet sub nomine et obedientia nostris se hucusque gesserunt et gerent, obligent se nobis per eorum proprias litteras sigillis eorum, quibus utuntur, appensis pro fidelitate observanda, et quod nobis viventibus nullum alium pro rege Hungarie preter nos habebunt et nominabunt, nobisque in omnem eventum assistent et adherebunt. Qui vero pro aliquo fratre suo nunc absente responderet, talis frater absens infra unum terminum sibi per nos deputandum teneatur advenire modo simili nobis se obligaturus.

II. Item, sicut predecessores nostri reges Hungarie habuerunt, conclusum est, ut imposterum omnimodam facultatem auferendi omnes honores et officiatus nostros habeamus, toties quoties et quandocunque voluerimus, et illis, quibus maluerimus, regnicolis tantuna et non alienigenis, conferre valeamus, omnisque digantarius et officialis huiusmodi honores, dignitates et officiatus, puta palatinus palatinum, wayuoda wayuodatum, banus banatum, cancellarius cancellarium, comites comitatus et quoslibet alios honores et officiatus ad statim ad manus nostras regias :resignet per nos hiis, quibus voluerimus, distribuendos. Preterea ordinatum est, ut camere salium nostrorum regalium, tam in partibus Transsilvanensibus, quam Maramorosiensibus sicuti alii officiatus ad manus nostras regias remittantur disponende per nos de eisdem illis, quibus voluerimus.

III. Item, quia lucrum camere de dicto regno nostro Hungarie, proventus mardurinarum de regno nostro Sclavonie et proventus quinquagesimales de partibus nostris Transsilvanensibus communi omnium regnicolarum nostrorum contributione pro sustentatione curie regie ac defensione regni agenda instituti et dispositi fuerant, et nec ab aliquo regum, predecessorum scilicet nostrorum iidem proventus a corona regia in toto vel in parte alienari debere potuissent, idcirco conclusum est, ut huiusmodi proventus alienati rursum ad coronam regni reintegrentur, et non obstante exemptione qualicunque aut remissione eorundem per quemcunque regurn facta, de omnium possessionibus, puta tam nostris regalibus et reginalibus, quam ecclesiasticorum prelatorum baronum et procerum regni ac aliorum possessionatorum hominum exsolvantur integre sine defectu..

IV. Item de camaris salium tam Traussiluanarum, quam Maramorosiensium partium, de foclinis et montanis urburarum, de proventibus tricesimalibus, civitatum ac Comanorum, Philisteorum et Judeorum conclusum est, ut quia neque nos, neque nostri predecessores reges cuiquam relaxare perpetue, aut pro pignore locare, seu quomodolibet aliter a corona alienare potuimus et potuerunt, ideo debeant corone reappropriari et in manibus nostris resignari.

V. Item conclusum est, quod omnes et singuli ex prelatis, baronibus ac nobilibus regni nostri universas possessiones et bona ac proventus decimales et alios, que minusiuste et ex eis aliquis tenet seu occupavit et usurpavit hiis disturbiorum temporibus ab hiis, qui nobis fideles fuerunt et partem seu adherentiam nostram tenuerunt, eisdem fidelibus nostris remittere et resignare teneantur; et etiam illa, que nos illicite et minus iuste cuipiam donavimus, remittantur, ac etiam illis, qui usque in presentem diem venerunt ad fidelitatem nobis, bona eorum, etiamsi cuipiam per nos donata fuissent, restituantur, et nos contentemus illos, cui ipsa donaveramus., exnunc vel quocunque modo, aut promittamus, quod successive de hiis, que devolventur ad coronam, eos contentabimus.

VI. Item quod illi etiam omnes, qui ex parte alia nobis adversa infra festum Penthecostes proxime venturum nobis ad fidelitatem venerint, tales etiam sub pretacta conclusione quoad restitutionem bonorum ipsorum contineantur, sed contententur, ut supra. Qui autem usque ad terminum pretactum nobis ad fidelitatem venire non curaverint, tales in perpetua nota infidelitatis remaneant et bona ipsorum hiis, quibus voluerimus, conferre valeamus, nec amplius iidem ad gratiam admittantur.

VII. Item, quia ex variatione monete notabilia, ymmo indicibilia regno huic detrimenta provenisse visa sunt,, idcirco ad obviandum huiusmodi periculis statutum est, ut nullus ex prelatis et baronibus aut regnicolis nostris monetam quamcunque cudat, nec cudere vel cudi facere presummat et valeat, sed solum nos in locis seu cameris, ubi ab antiquo moneta cudi solita fuit, ipsam monetam cudi faciamus, nec nos habeamus facultatem indulgendi cuipiam ipsam cusionem monete sub qualicunque colore, et quod lega ipsius monete, in qua cudi inchoabitur, non possit per nos immutari absque voluntate et scitu regnicolarum nostrorum. Contra premissa autem faciens notam infidelitatis seu falsarii incurrat.

VIII. Item moneta talis cudatur, ut centum denarii et ducenti obuli dentur et cambiantur pro uno floreno auri sub pena premissa.

IX. Item de factis potentiariis conclusum est, quod nos ab illo, cui officia maiora vel minora, puta sive palatinum sive banatum, vel iudicatum curie aut comitatum contulimus vel contulerimus, talem obligationem recipiamus, quod nec ipse solus iniurias, dampna et nocumenta aut occupationes bonorum faciat, nec fieri per quempiam sub suo officiolatu et honore consentiat seu permittat, nec in hac parte alicui faveat. Quod si talis dignitarius vel comes huiusmodi facta illicita perpetrasset vel aliis in faciendo consensisset aut favorem impendisset vel patrones non emendasset compertus fuerit, extunc talis mox ipso honore privetur et privatus intelligatur, nec amplius ad tale officium recipi aut promoveri valeat. In iudiciis autem, que wayuoda, banus vel aliquis comes in sua provincia fecerit, curn transmitti in curiam nostram petuntur, teneatur semper delferre appellationi seu transmissioni in curiam nostram regiam, et, talis causa in curiam nostram deducta in primo termino, ad quem devenerit, terminetur et ipse wayuoda sive banus vel comes tandem adiudicationem curie nostre exequi teneatur. Quod si idem wayuoda, banus aut comes in dispositione pretacta non perstiterit, aut contra premissa cuipiam favorem exhibuisse visus et compertus fuerit, extunc ultra prernissam privationem honoris sui in facto potentie sit convictus; et quod lesis et dampnificatis de propriis eorum bonis satisfactio impendatur. Premissa tamen libertatibus antiquis ecclesiarum non obsistant.

X. Item in quoleibet comitatu eligantur per communitatem quatuor probi homines ex nobilibus illius comitatus penes comitem et iudices nobilium, qui cum comite ac ipsis iudicibus nobilium et communitate querulantibus iudicium ministrent et dent litteras oportunas. Si qui autem ex ipsis electis actus potentiarios commiserint, tales iudicio comitis et iudicum nobilium ac communitatis subiaceant.

XI. Item iudicia in facto possessionum fiant iuxta consuetudinem regni.

XII. Item omnia fortalitia et castella in parte nostra, ex quibus spolia, nocumenta, exactiones censuum vulgo hold dictorum, furta et alia maleficia commissa sunt, de novo erecta distrahantur et aboleantur.

XIII. Item omnia iudicia et sententie iin disturbiiis preter illa, que, ubi partes presentes fuere, habita sunt, revocentur et revocata intelligantur.

XIV. Item omnes statutiones de bonis aliorum facte, quarum donationes supra revocate sunt, vigoribus careant, demptis tamen illis, quarum donationes licite per nos de propriis nostris vel devolutis facte sunt.

X.V. Item quod nullus ex baronibus aut nobilibus secularibus ecclesias episcopales vel abbatias auit preposituras seu alias quascunque amplius occupatas teneat, et nec imposterum titulo gubernationis aut iure patronatus vel alio quocunque colore se de huiusmodi ecclesiis intromittat, salvo qui ex fundatione ius patronatus habent.

XVI. Item quod illi, qui pecunias taxe anni preteriti recollectas habuerunt et pro se retinuerunt, ipsas pecunias reddant sub penis pretactis.

XVII. Item quod in progressu regali nostro vel exercituali, vel ad curiam nostram vel ad alia quecunque loca nullus baronum vel aliorum in villis aut opidis, in quibus descensus facient, dampna aliqua inferat, nec in domibus nobilium descendat. Quodsi quicunque huiusmodi dampna intulerint et descensum fecerint, tales mox una evocatoria evocentur in curiam nostram ad proxiam octavam, et sive compareat evocatus, sive non, in eodem termino causa sententialiter terminetur.

XVIII. Item de restitutionibus jobagionum sine licentia recedentium teneatur antiqua consuetudo et pena.

XIX. Item quicunque aliis de parte nostra intulerint dampna extra servitia nostra vel regni nostri in domo persistendo, coram iudicibus prefatis iuxta consuetudinem regni per dampnificatos in causam attrahi valeant et per eosdem iudices iuxta iudicata ad satisfactionem compellantur.

XX. Item quicunque hiis disturbiorum temporibus possessiones aliorum indebite occupaverunt, usque festum Penthecostes proxime venturum easdem remittant et absque subterfugio resignent. Quod si non fecerint, evocentur ad proximam octavam, et sive compareant, sive non, sententia finalis in eadem octava terminetur. De factis autem potentiariis post pridie nostrum decretum commissis modo simili usque dictum festum Penthecostes lesis et dampnificatis satisfactio impendatur. Quod si qui non fecerint, similiter ad proximam octavam evocentur et in eadem octava causa sententialiter terminetur.

XXI. Item redemptiones litterarum et solutiones testimoniorum capituli vel conventus fiant secundum decretum condam domini imperatoris.

XXII. Item quod tributa omnia, que tam per condam dominum Albertum regem predecessorem nostrum, quam per nostram maiestatem donata essent, revocentur et revocata habeantur.

XXIII. Item quod comes parochialis in possessionibus nobilium non descendat, et si descenderit, dampna non inferat; quod si fecerit, in facto potentie convincatur, demptis solummodo antiquis consuetudinibus et exactionibus birsagiorum.

XXIV. Item quicunque prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium in presentia nostre maiestatis personali aut palatini seu iudicis curie nostre durante presenti congregatione repertus et per quemcunque citatus fuerit, teneatur super patris post decretum anni iam elapsi respondere ad obiecta. Quodsi presumptione ductus comparere renuerit, extunc mox contra talem sententia detur et emanetur.

XXV. Item quicunque prelatorum, baronum et regni nobilium aut aliorum possessionatorum hominum occupationes possessionum aut spoliaciones, sive nobilium captivaciones aut interemptions, sed et alia similia facta amodo deinceps perpetraverint, tales per hominem nostrum regium presente testimonio capituli vel conventus ad primam octavam cum insinuatione evocentur; ipsique patres huiusmodi actuum potentiariarum ad ipsam octavam venire teneantur; et ipsis partibus comparentibus fiat iudicium partes inter easdem, causaque huiusmodi nec ab eadem octava per litteras regias aut per alium quemcunque modum ulterius differatur. Si vero evocatus non comparuerit, non obstante ipsius absentia, sententia capitalis cum amissione bonorum suorum contra talem pronuncietur et emanetur; sententiamque ipsam exequantur tandem presentibus hominibus nostris et capitularibus seu conventualibus, si necesse fuerit, comites parochiales et alii premissis modo deputati sine omni negligentia.

XXVI. Item quod universe cause, que in ultima octava tempore predicti condam Alberti regis habite erant et vertebantur, in eodem statu, in quo tunc existebant, in octavis festi beati Jacobi apostoli proxime venturi inchoentur et verti debeant iuxta antiquam consuetudinem regni.

XXVII. Item quod tempore istorum disturbiorum quecunque littere sub quacunque forma verborum sub sigillis capitulorum vel conventuum illorum, qui per manus potentum tunc fuissent, emanate extitissent, tales cassate et vigoribus cariture habeantur.

XXVIII. Item quod nullus omnino hominum gentes forenses et extraneas ad hoc regnum nostrum causa inferendi malum inducat sub pena amissionis capitis et omnium bonorum suorum.

XXIX. Item quod nullus prelatorum, baronum et regni procerum preter consensum nostrum cum quibuscunque hominibus nobis et regno nostro adversantibus treugas inire presummat.

XXX. Item quod quicunque in premissis non prestiterit et monitus per litteras nostras se non emendaverit, talis pro ipso facto in pena facti potentialis convincatur. Et quod quicunque mandatis nostris regiis, licitis tamen et iustis, non paruerit et monitus se non excusaverit, in simili pena vincatur ipso facto.

XXXI. Ut autem iidem nostri fideles subnominati exinde primum a nobis certitudinem sumpmant, presentium tenore et vigore in verbo nostro regio iureiurando promittimus, nos ea omnia, que in prescriptiis articulis notificata et declarata sunt, ex nostri parte irrefragabiliter observare velle et tenere per aliosque, qui forsitan in hac parte rebelles comperti fuerint, cum adiutorio, consilio et assistentia ipsorum infranominatorum fidelium nostrorum teneri facere et, observari, et quod ad inferendas penas pretactas singulis talibus, qui hiis premissis repugnare presumpserint, toto posse cum eisdem nostris fidelibus intendemus, et si opportunum fuerit, procedemus, in omnem eventum eis in hac parte indivisibiliter assistemus faciemusque et exequemur etiam alia omnia, que nobis cum eorum consilio in hac re et circa ea incubuerint facienda.

In quorum omnium premissorum testimonium presentes concessimus litteras sigilli nostri, quo uti rex Hungarie utimur, appensione munitas. Datum Bude, decimo octavo die mensis Aprilis, que est sabbatum proximum post festum Pasce domini, anno eiusdem millesimo quadringentesimo quadragesimo quarto.

XXXII. Intelligatur etiam conclusum in premissis, quod nec perpetuitates, nec beneficia, nec officolatus, sed neque castellanatus alienigenis conferamus, immo et collata talibus ab eisdem auferamus, excepto episcopatu Transsilvanensi per nos domino Matheo Polono collato. Hec dispositio facta est per prelates, barones, milites, proceres et nobiles infrascriptos suis et communitatis totius regni Hungarie predicti nominibus et personis non obstante, si per prius in quocunque decreto huius contrarium fuisset. Datum ut supra.

Et nos Simon de Rozgon episcopus Agriensis, regie maiestatis sumptus cancellarius, Johannes Waradiensis, Mathias Wesprimiersis, Petrus Chanadiensis, alter Petrus Waciensis et Demetrius Tininiensis ecclesiarum episcopi, Georgius despotus Rascie, Laurentius de Hedrehwara regni Hungarie palatinus, Nicolaus de Wylak et Johannes de Hwnyad wayuode Transsilvanenses, Michael Jakch de Kwsal alias similiter wayuoda Transsilvanensis, Georgius de Rozgon iudex curie domini regis et comes Psoniensis, Ffranko comes Cetine, regni Sclauonie banus, Emericus de Hedrehwara banus Machouiensis, Stephanus de Bathor alias similiter iudex curie regie, Ladislaus de Palowcz magister curie domini regis, Emericus, Ladislaus, et Stephanus de Pelsewcz, Johannes de Peren comes de Vgocha, Simon de dicta Palowcz magister agazonum regalium, Michael Orzaag de Gwt11 sumptus thesaurarius domini regis, Paulus filius bani de Alsolindwa, Henricus filius wayuode de Thamasy comes de Posega, Joliannes senior de Peren, Simon Zudar de Olnod magister pincernarum regalium, Johannes Orzaag de Gwth predicta magister thauarnicorum regalium, Stephanus de Homonna, Ladislaus de Zechen comes Neugradiensis, Johannes Kompolth de Nana, Ladislaus filius wayuode de Lewa, Johannes de Korogh, Stephanus et Detricus Poharnok de Berzeuicze comites Hewesienses, Nicolaus et Paulus de Peren, Ladislaus Rykalff comes Liptouiensis, Silvester de Thorna, Georgius filius Lorandi de Serke, Ladislaus de Nazpal, Nicolaus et Dominicus de Kyswarda, Akus de Chap, Ladislaus de Naghmihal, Paulus et Philipus de Zekchew, Ladislaus iunior et Petrus Jakch de Kusal, Ladislaus Pethew de Gerse comes Zaladiensis, uterque Johannes Fforgacz dicti de Gymes, Rupertus de Thar, Paulus de Hedrehwara, Emericus filius Johannis et, Ders filius bani de Zerdahel, Nicolaus Anthimi de Thapson, Nicolaus, filius Lorandi de Berzencze, Nicolaus de Beltevk, Ffranli de antefata. Gwth, Gregorius Bado et Pangracius de Dengeleg vicewayuode Transsiluanenses, Johannes de Somos, Michael de Beel, alter Michael: de Cyl, Ladislaus de Zenthmihal, Georgius Orros, Dernetrius de Parn., Ladislaus de Thold, Petrus Zopa, alter Petrus Thwz de Lak, Michael Etre, Nicolaus filius Draag, Ladislaus Tythews de Bathmonostra,, Ladislaus de Zeche, Andreas de Anual, Thomas Zyrke, Sandrinus de Helemba, Simon de BcdogAzzonfalwa, Michael Poharnok, Georgius de Sebes, Johannes de Zana, alter Johannes de Solyag, Michael de Izmen, Path de Gywla, Michael Pooch, Johannes de Kallo, Nicolaus de Zakal, Petrus de Ugra, Nicolaus Sobonya, Andreas de Kozar, Ladislaus de Maroth pridem banus Machouiensis, Raphael Herczeg electus ecclesie Boznensis, Michael abbas Simigiensis, Clemens de Thapan,, Sebastianus de Zend, Nicolaus de Zenthmihal, Michael de Philpes, Briccius de Gych, Nicolaus Nyakathlan de Thythews, Georgius Orros de Seryen, Johannes et Thomas filii Ipoliti de Gywrke, Petrus de Tetetlen, Stephanus Danch de Maczadonya, Georgius de Maryas, Thomas Chirke de Poly, Gywla de Ratold, Georgius de ZenthJanits, Bernardus de Dengeleg, Johannes de Apay, Nicolaus Kwn de Kessenew, Johannes de Scepus, Ladislaus de Myske, Stephanus de Bayon, Nicolaus de azdyan, Petrus de Pap, Johannes de Ina, Ladislaus filius Mathei dc Menche, Johannes de Chaan, Colomanus de Dewregd, Paulus Paznan, Daniel de Kustan, Ladislaus de Paka, Ladislaus de Tetetlen, Ladislaus de Horth, Georgius de Rohman, Petrus de Hangon, Stephanus de Janusy, Michael Barowcz de Wislas, Martinus prepositus de Posega, Michael de Gench, Johannes filius Stephani de Zenthmihal, Georgius de Rathan, Nicolaus de Zombor, Gregorius Josa de Galya, Ladislaus de Chepon, Georgius de Gergellaka, Ladislaus de Somos, Ladislaus de Rohman, Ladislaus de Zelemyr, Gaspar de Were, Simon de Hutichyna et Mathias de Klisich de regno Croatie, Demetrius de Thapaz, Georgius de Megyurechya, Egidius de Peder, Johannes de Zytha, Ladislaus litteratus de Pethke, Albertus litteratus de Zenthmarthon, Johannes de Bakta, Sandrinus de Kewde, Mathias de eadem, Stephanus de Dombo, Andreas de Stanch, Sebastianus de Kolyn, Ladislaus Gagan de Gywrky, Ladislaus Hernad de Hernadfalwa, Michael de Monak, Matheus de Tofev, Nicolaus de Alak, Jacobus de Pelys, Andreas de Lukafalwa, Petrus Fanch de Gordwa, Laurentius de Keer, Jacobus de Leztemeer, Vincentius de Ruzka, Ladislaus de Irsa, Stephanus de Laczk, Ladislaus filius Abrahe de Gerla, Nicolaus filius Petri de Zenthlelek, Dionisius de Zeech, Blasius de Bewren, Ladislaus de Myske, Elias de Kecczer, Nicolaus Warias, Georgius Orzag de Gwth, Marcus de Nadan, Ladislaus de Monostor, Georgius de Wicza, Gaspar et Georgius de Hathna, Benedictus de Lykwa, Bartholomeus abbas de Borsmonostra, Georgius prepositus Scepesiensis, Stephanus filius Georgii de Telekes, Michael Aztalnok de Herman, Benedictus de Zempes, Sigismundus de Chap, Benedictus de Bewken, Laurentius de Cheged, Ladislaus de Bolyan, Petrus de Kemend, Petrus de Berenthe, Benedictus de Wamos, Ladislaus de Nytazeg, Georgius de Domanhyda, Johannes de Lyzka, Jacobus de Rypak, Oswaldus Feyer, Jacobus de Chepen, Dionisius de Wag, Johannes Bak de Berend, Valentinus de Magofalva, Blasius de Dobo, Martinus de Pethenye, Johannes filius Viti de Mohora, Johannes de Kalna, Laurentius de Kallo, Paulus de Zerdahel, Georgius de Bathor, Johannes de Wask, Clemens de Kesy, Andreas de Jakabfalwa, Johannes Kewtheu de Kewthewgyan, Andreas de Kohar, Ladislaus de Wesen, Petrus de Basky, Zorardus de Zenthersebeth et Ladislaus de Thapalowcz, ceterique procures et regni nobiles in presenti congregatione constituti fatemur omnia et singula superius descripta quoad omnes eorum articulos de nostro communi consilio, deliberatione et assensu acta et conclusa fuisse et esse, et propter hoc ea omnia, que superius describuntur, promittimus bona fide inviolabiliter observare et per alios, qui hiis premissis in parte vel in toto contraire vellent, omni modo et via opportunis totis viribus observari facere, presentium, quibus iuxta sigillum reale sigilla nostra appensa sunt, testimonio mediante. Datum ut supra.

18 APRIL, 1444

We, Wladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Poland, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., grand prince of Lithuania and heir of Russia, wish to bring to the knowledge of all by these words that even though in this time just past, when, owing to the distorted daring of the depraved, many, and varied harmful things thrived in this kingdom, means have frequently been sought by which the continuance and opportunity for harm, turmoil, numerous dangers, and as many dissensions and kinds of evils, which our eyes have seen to grow, spread and overflow,¹ can be stopped; because a dissolute hand led by an unrestrained mind does not easily tolerate being restrained, and the more gently and carelessly repression is pursued, the longer will the worsening evil last. Now, therefore, since every day upheaval in this kingdom grows more and more, day by day, it seems that the more bitterly felt the spread of evil is, the quicker will a remedy be sought by the common assent of all. Hence, after our recent return from a military campaign, which we conducted against the heathen Turks with happy victories granted by divine help,² when a general assembly was called, a greater multitude of our prelates, barons, knights, and gentlemen of the realm came together than had ever been seen in such an assembly. After having held mutual discussions through these many days, they finally, by the Lord's will, agreed as one with us that for the sake of restoring peace and mutual concord as well as for the safety of this kingdom, the articles written below should be kept most firmly under the penalties written below.

1. First, so that things might be undertaken in a proper manner starting at the beginning, it has been decided that in the interest of our fuller and stronger power and capacity to rule our subjects, any one of the prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of the kingdom here present now and also those absent—namely those who so far have acted and act subject to our name and obedience—should promise us by their own charters with their seals, which they use, appended as proof of fidelity, that as long as we live they will have and name no one else except us as king of Hungary, and that they will assist and stand by us in every event.³ In the case of those who promise on behalf of an absent brother, the absent brother is required to come to us within the term determined for him by us in order to bind himself to us in a similar manner.

¹ On the civil war that raged almost continuously from the election of Wladislas I to the issuing of this decree, see n. 15 to 1443.

² The so called “Long Campaign,” led by the king and János Hunyadi, started on 22 July 1443 and lasted unusually long: the army did not return to Belgrade until 25 January 1444. The Hungarian and allied forces reached the passes of the Balkans beyond Sofia and defeated Ottoman armies in three major battles, but the campaign, while a military feat of great moral success, brought no tangible gains; see: Ferenc Szakály, “Phases of Turco-Hungarian Warfare before the Battle of Mohács, 1365–1526,” Acta Orientalia Acad. Sc. Hung. 23 (1979): 88–91; John V. Fine, The late medieval Balkans: A critical survey from the late 12th century to the Ottoman Conquest (Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1987), pp. 548–51; c.f. pp. 478–79

³ A formal profession of allegiance demanded from all present and obviously directed against the infant King Ladislas’ party. This practice of appending the seal of a great number of barons and nobles was rare; this decretum is one of the most often cited ones; see Pál Lövel “Sokpecsétetes oklevelek a 14-15. századi Magyarországon” [Charters with multiple seals in 14.-15. C. Hungary], Ars Hungarica 39/2 (2013), 137–44.

2. Then, it has been resolved that henceforth we have, just as the kings of Hungary our predecessors had, every right to withdraw all our honors and offices, as often and whenever we wish, and of conferring them on whomever we prefer, provided they are residents of the kingdom and not aliens.⁴ And every dignitary and official must immediately resign his honors, dignities, and offices, as, for example, the palatine the palatinate, the voivode the voivodeship, the ban the banate, the chancellor the chancellery, the ispáns the counties, and any other honors and offices into our royal hands for distribution by us to whomever we prefer. It was also ordained that the chambers of our royal salts, both in Transylvania and in Marumureș, must be surrendered into our royal hands as with the other offices, for distribution by us to whomever we wish.

3. Then, because the chamber's profit of our said kingdom of Hungary, the revenues of the mardurina of our kingdom of Slavonia, and the fiftieth revenues of our Transylvanian regions⁵ were instituted and allocated by the common contribution of all our gentlemen of the realm for the sustenance of the royal court and for the defense of the kingdom, and these revenues could not be alienated from the royal crown in whole or in part by any of the kings, our predecessors, therefore, it has been resolved that such alienated revenues must be returned to the crown of the kingdom,⁶ and, notwithstanding any reduction granted them by any of the kings, they must be paid from all estates, both those of the king and the queen as well as those of ecclesiastics, prelates, barons and lords of the kingdom and other men of property without fail and in entirety.

⁴ In this context regnicola—usually referring only to the enfranchised nobility—clearly emphasizes the opposite of “foreigners.”

⁵ The chamber's profit was a direct tax, introduced after the regular diminishing of the value of coins was abandoned. The mardurina, originally a marten-pelt tribute, levied in Slavonia, was changed into monetary tax as early as the eleventh century. It was fixed at twelve Friesach pennies after each manse. After the exemption of the nobles of Slavonia from royal taxation in 1351, the mardurina became the tax imposed on tenant peasants and hospites. On the salt revenue, one of the major incomes of the royal treasury, see István Draskóczy, “Salt Mining and the Salt Trade in Medieval Hungary from the mid-Thirteenth Century until the End of the Middle Ages,” in: The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 205–18 and János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter”, in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987, pp. 347–87

⁶ The use of both forms of reference to the crown in one paragraph is worth noting: corona regia (royal crown) is the older formulation implying the exclusive rights of the king to the power and property attached to the kingship; the other, corona regni (crown or the realm) came to be used in the fifteenth century with the intention of implying that the regnum, that is, the community of the estates was the depository of these rights and properties; see János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 33–5; Idem, “Corona,” in Lexikon des Mittelalters 3:256 (München: Artemis, 1988) with literature. On the inalienability of royal rights and possessions, see 1222:16, and the discussion in James R. Sweeney, “The Decretal Intellecto and the Hungarian Golden Bull of 1222,” in Album Elemér Mályusz (Bruxelles: Librairie Encyclopédique, 1976), pp. 89–96.

4. Then, it has been resolved that the chamber of the salt-works of Transylvania and in Marumureș, dues of mines and mining,⁷ and the revenues of the thirtieth,⁸ the cities, the Cumans, the Philistines,⁹ and the Jews¹⁰ must be returned to the crown and resigned into our hands because we cannot, nor could the kings our predecessors, cede these in perpetuity to any man, or use them as collateral, or in any way alienate them from the crown.

5. Then, it has been resolved that each and every prelate, baron, and noble of our kingdom is required to return and to hand over to our loyal subjects all estates and goods as well as revenues from tithes and other sources, which any of them holds by defective right and illicitly, or in these times of troubles has occupied and usurped from those who were faithful to us and held fast to our cause or adherence; and also those things, which we gave illicitly and by defective right to anyone, must be returned; and the properties of those who up to the present day have come to pledge fidelity to us must be restored, even if they have been given by us to someone else, and we shall compensate those, to whom we had given those things, now or in any other way, and we promise that we shall compensate them in due course from those properties which devolve to the crown.¹¹

6. Then, that all those who, from the other party opposing us, come to our fidelity before the next feast of Pentecost,¹² shall also be included in the aforesaid resolution in regard to the restoration of properties, and shall be compensated, as above. Those, however, who do not care to come to

⁷ Mining dues (urbura), were to be paid to the treasury by the owner or exploiter of mines of metals; 1/10 of gold, 1/8 of silver and other metals.

⁸ The thirtieth (tricesima) was customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. On its history, see Zsigmond Pál Pach, A harmincadvám eredete [The origin of the thirtieth customs] (Budapest: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1990), Idem “A harmincadvám az Anjou-korban és a 14–15. század fordulóján,” [The thirtieth-toll in the Angevin Period and at the turn of the 14th and 15th centuries] Történelmi Szemle 41 (1999), 231–277. On royal revenues in the later Middle Ages, see Bask, Monarchie im Wellental, passim.

⁹ In Hungarian Latin, the Biblical name Philistine denoted the Jász/ As tribes, a seminomadic people who settled in Hungary in the thirteenth or early fourteenth century in the north of the Great Plain, close to the Cumans. Both people were long considered royal subjects of free status and owed the royal treasury an annual tax, paid in cash as well as in kind. See: Nora Berend, At the gate of Christendom. Jews, Muslims and “Pagans” in medieval Hungary, c. 1000–c. 1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) esp. pp. 68–73 and András Pálóczi Horváth, Pechenegs, Cumans, Iasians. Steppe Peoples in Medieval Hungary (Budapest: Corvina, 1989).

¹⁰ Jews in Hungary, as in many other medieval kingdoms, lived under the protection of the royal chamber, for which they paid a regular fee that was frequently farmed out by the king. This article intends to recover this income for the crown, which in 1453 amounted to some 4000 gold florins; see Berend, as above esp. pp. 149–55.

¹¹ After the virtual dissolution of the royal domain, royal grants could only entail land that escheated to the crown, when all male heirs in a given clan had died out.

¹² 31 May 1444.

pledge fidelity to us by the aforesaid date should be treated as perpetual infidels,¹³ and we shall have the right to confer their possessions on whomever we wish, nor may they be admitted to grace again.¹⁴

7. Then, owing to the variation of coinage, considerable—nay, indescribable—harm appears to have been caused to this kingdom. Therefore, to preclude such dangers, it has been ordered that no prelate or baron or any of our gentlemen of the realm may mint or presume or attempt to mint or cause to be minted any money, but we alone may cause money to be minted in places or in chambers where of old money has been customarily minted, nor shall we be able to grant the right to mint money by any means to anyone; and that the alloy of the money, once it has begun to be minted, cannot be changed by us without the will and knowledge of our gentlemen of the realm Anybody acting against the foregoing will incur the charge of infidelity or forgery.¹⁵

8. Then, money should be minted so that 100 pennies and 200 half-pennies should be given and changed for one gold florin under the above penalty.¹⁶

9. Then, concerning acts of might,¹⁷ it has been resolved that we should take such a pledge from all those on whom we have conferred or will confer major or minor offices, be it the palatinate or

¹³The charge of infidelity (nota infidelitatis) was a charge for specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. That meant loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary..

¹⁴ Since the beginning of the civil war both parties had generously rewarded their followers with estates confiscated from partisans of the other party. Many lords changed side during the war for different reasons but, in spite of promises made here and also later, they often did not succeed in recovering their lost possessions. Exceptionally we have evidence that they did: a charter of Wladislas I of 12 July 1444 (MNL OL DL 13788) refers to this law when restoring the estates of Michael Nodlar.

¹⁵ On the attempts at rescinding private minting, see Márton Gyöngyössi, "Főúri pénzverési jogosultak a 15. századi Magyarországon" [Magnates with right to minting in the Hungary of the 15th C.] Századok 150 (2016) 341–368.). Still, in 1441, King Wladislas invested some of his partisans with the right of minting, which had been a royal monopoly at all times (cf. Mályusz, p. 11). This unprecedented measure might have contributed to the monetary disorder which, though otherwise unknown, is referred to here and is plausible in view of the fact that most of the gold and silver mines were held by Ladislas' captains.

¹⁶ The same exchange rate was fixed in 1427B, cf. also 1439:8. This was an attempt to restore the equivalence of the gold florin and the florin as money of account.

¹⁷ Act of might (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was: a term for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. "Criminal cases" falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (incl. rape).

banate, royal judgeship or the office of ispán, that neither they themselves will cause injuries, losses, harm, or occupation of goods, nor will they consent or permit such to be done by anyone subject to their office or honor, nor will they favor anyone in this respect. If such a dignitary or ispán is found to have perpetrated such illicit deeds or to have consented to or favored others doing them or not to have punished those committing such deeds, then he shall be deprived of his honor and considered as such, and he is not again to be received or promoted to such an office. Furthermore, when a transfer to our court is sought in the case of trials which a voivode, ban, or any ispán may hold in his presence, the latter are required to refer the appeal or transfer to our royal court, and such a case brought to our court must be completed in the first term in which it comes, and then the voivode, ban, or ispán is required to implement the judgment of our court.¹⁸ If that voivode, ban, or ispán does not abide by the aforesaid decision or he is seen or found to have shown favor to someone contrary to the foregoing, then in addition to the abovementioned deprivation of his honor he should be convicted of act of might, and compensation must be given to the damaged and injured party from his own goods. Nevertheless, the foregoing provisions should not restrict the ancient liberties of churches.¹⁹

10. Then, in every county, four trustworthy men must be elected by the community from the nobles of that county to join the ispán and the magistrates,²⁰ who with the ispán and the magistrates and the community will render judgment to plaintiffs and will issue the appropriate documents. If anyone of those elected commits acts of act of might, he should be subject to the judgment of the ispán, the magistrates, and the community.

11. Then, trials concerning estates must be conducted according to the custom of the kingdom.²¹

12. Then, all fortifications and castles newly constructed in our domain from which plundering, destruction, exaction of the rents commonly called hold,²² thefts, and other evil deeds were committed must be razed and destroyed.

¹⁸ This measure was a significant attempt at introducing appeal as an ordinary judicial procedure. Earlier the lower (provincial or county) courts were not obligated to transfer cases to the royal court, except on a specific mandate (introductoria cause) from the chancellery.

¹⁹ The meaning of this clause is not clear, but may refer to the privilegium fori of clergy to be tried in courts spiritual. But does not really make sense here.

²⁰ Mályusz (pp. 65–6) demonstrated that this clause was introduced on the initiative of the delegates from Co. Somogy, in western Hungary. The activity of such elected nobles in the neighboring county, Zala, is documented for the years 1444 and 1445 (ibid.). The noble magistrates (Hung.: szolgabíró) were administrative and judicial assistants of the ispán or alispán, elected by the county's nobles, usually four in every county.

²¹ Cf. 1439:32.

²² The term hold does not seem to refer here to the Hungarian measure of land, but to an exaction of tribute, widespread in Bohemia, the name of which probably goes back to the German term Huldigung, homage; see Hugo Toman, Husitské válečnictví za doby Žižkovy a Prokopovy &c. [Hussite warfare under Žižka and Prokop], Praha: Král. České Spolenost Nauk, 1898, pp. 6264. Thus, this type of forced exaction, probably

13. Then, all judgments and sentences which were passed during these troubles are revoked and held as revoked, except those which were passed in the presence of the litigants.²³

14. Then, all measures taken concerning the goods of those whose donations were revoked above²⁴ shall be null and void, except for those whose grant was legitimately made by us from our own properties or those devolved to us.

15. Then, that no baron or secular noble may occupy any longer episcopal churches, abbacies, or priories, or any other churches, nor henceforth may he interfere with such churches by a claim to secular protection²⁵ or right of patronage or any other title, except those who from the foundation have the right of patronage.

16. Then, that those who had money collected for the tax of the last year and have retained it for themselves must return the money under the abovementioned penalties.²⁶

17. Then, that no baron or any other person should cause any damage in the villages or towns where he takes lodgings during our royal travels or military campaigns or on his way to our court or elsewhere, nor should he billet in the houses of nobles. If, however, anyone does inflict such losses and exacts hospitality, he should be summoned with one summons to our court for the next octavial term,²⁷ and, whether the person summoned appears or not, the case must be concluded with a sentence in the same term.²⁸

18. Then, concerning the recovery of tenant peasants absconding without license, the ancient custom and punishment must be followed.²⁹ comparable to the descensus violentus of the Hungarian sources, may have been introduced to Hungary by the Czech Hussite troops who occupied the northern counties for decades.

²³ This clause refers to the procedures in contumaciam, ordered in 1443: 2.

²⁴ Cf. above, art. 5 and 6.

²⁵ Secular protector (gubernator) was the official title of lay administrators appointed by the king to major ecclesiastical benefices in case of a vacancy. During the civil war, a number of churches were occupied by Wladislas' adherents who pretended to be their protectors and refused to hand them over to the lawful claimant.

²⁶ During Wladislas' reign, the tax was mostly collected by the captains-general and other magnates who had it exacted without mercy but were seemingly not so eager to hand it over to the treasury. (See Mályusz, p. 111 f.)

²⁷ At this time, the four usual octavial terms—sessions of the royal courts—were those of Epiphany (from 13 January), St. George (from 1st May), St. James (from 1st August) and Michaelmas (from 6 October).

²⁸ Damages caused by the military were regulated previously in 1439: 3 and 18. Here and in the following, attempt is made to shorten trial in matters of damages. Cases were usually dragged on across several terms by various judicial instruments, contradictions and repeated prorogation.

²⁹ Tenant peasants (jobagiones, Latinized from Hung. jobbágy) were peasants living on the lands of their lords, owing dues (in money, kind and some labor) and subject to their jurisdiction, but personally free. They were allowed to change lords, once they paid their debts and obtained license. On this right, see 1397:6; 15 April 1405: 14–16, but those laws do not contain the clause about the duty to return illegally

19. Then, those not in our service, nor that of our kingdom, who remained at home, but inflicted damages to others who are on our side,³⁰ may be prosecuted by the damaged party before the aforementioned judges, according to the custom of the kingdom, and should be compelled by the same judges to give satisfaction in accordance with the judgment.

20. Then, any men who in these times of troubles have occupied the estates of others improperly must remit and resign them without subterfuge before the next feast of Pentecost. If they do not do this, they must be summoned to the next octave, and, whether they appear or not, a final sentence must be given in that octave. Concerning acts of act of might committed after our previous decree, compensation for damages and losses must similarly be paid before the said feast of Pentecost. Culprits who fail do so must be summoned similarly to the next octave, and the case must be terminated with a sentence in the same octave.

21. Then, fees for charters and payments for testimonies of a chapter or convent should be paid according to the decree of the late lord emperor.³¹

22. Then, that all tolls, which were granted by the late lord king Albert, our predecessor, and by our majesty, are revoked and must be kept revoked.³²

23. Then, that no ispán of a county should sojourn on the estates of nobles, but if he does, he should not cause harm; if he does so, he must be convicted of an act of act of might unless there exists some ancient custom or he is collecting fines.

24. Then, if any prelate, baron, or noble of the kingdom, who in the personal presence of our majesty or of the palatine or of our judge royal during the present assembly has been identified and accused by someone, he is required to reply to the accusations on what was done after last year's decree.³³ If, guided by presumption, he refuses to appear, then a sentence against such a man must be given and pronounced.

absconded tenants. This right was also abused by landlords, luring or removing tenants in times of labor shortage. See: János M. Bak “Servitude in the medieval kingdom of Hungary (a sketchy outline).” in Forms of servitude in Northern and Central Europe: decline, resistance, and expansion, ed. Paul H. Freedman and Monique Bourin, 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005).

³⁰ The measure seems to aim at lords who did not join either party but tried to remain neutral, an attitude always dangerous in a civil war. The last sentence makes sense—considering the wording of relevant charters (e.g., MNL OL DL 13782)—if the word iudicata is emended to iuramenta.

³¹ There are many examples known (see DRH, p. 331, n. 3) in which usurped possessions were returned; also, several charters of the royal chancellery survived that refer to this article, pass summary judgment, and emphasize that the usurpation happened after this decree (ibid. n. 4).

³² See 8 March 1435: 10–12, 20–21 and 1439:31. On tolls, see Magdolna Szilágyi, “Mobility, Roads, and Bridges in Medieval Hungary” in The Economy of Medieval Hungary, József Laszlovszky et al. eds. (Leiden-Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 64–80.

³³ On the descensus, (originally hosting the king and his entourage or the high officers, like the droit de gîte, later became a financial extraction) see 1439:8; for the collection of fines (birsagia), as an exceptional case of exacting hospitality, see ibid. art. 7.

25. Then, if any prelate, baron, or noble of the kingdom or any other men of property who henceforth in the future should occupy or plunder estates, or capture and kill nobles, or commit other similar deeds, must be summoned by final summons through our royal bailiff in the presence of a witness from a chapter or convent to the first octave; these perpetrators of acts of act of might are required to come personally to that octave; and when the parties have appeared, a trial should be conducted, and such a case may not be prorogued beyond that octave by royal letters or any other means. If the man summoned does not appear, notwithstanding his absence, a capital sentence with the loss of his goods must be passed and pronounced against him; our bailiffs and the men of the chapter or convent, or, if necessary, the ispán of the county and others deputed in the aforesaid manner must execute that sentence without any negligence.³⁴

26. Then, that all cases which were conducted and treated in the last octave in the time of the said late King Albert must be resumed at whatever stage they were then and continued in the next octave of the feast of St. James the Apostle,³⁵ according to the ancient custom of the realm.

27. Then, that any charters issued in whatever form of words in these times of troubles under the seals of any chapter or convent, which was in the hands of some powerful man, must be regarded as canceled and without force.³⁶

28. Then, that no man may bring in any foreigners or strangers to our kingdom in order to inflict evil under the penalty of the loss of his head and all of his goods.³⁷

³⁴ Terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione) was a summons issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might. It followed two summons, when the cited party did not appear. This institution, introduced in 1443, became general practice after 1444 (see the examples of charters referring to this decree in DRH p. 332, n. XXV/1), so much so that in 1447 in a suit at the king's court, extensive debate was held as to whether a certain act of might was perpetrated before or after the issue of this law (MNL OL DL. 14067).

³⁵ 1 August 1444.

³⁶ It cannot be even surmised to what extent the ecclesiastical places of authentication (chapters and convent acting in a notarial capacity) were influenced by those secular lords who promoted themselves to their protectors (cf. above note 24). There is evidence for quite open misuse of such power. For example a papal letter tells us how Nicholas of Perény (alias of Rihó, d. 1444.), Wladislas' captain in Kežmarok/Késmárk, ousting the chapter of Spišská Kapitula/Szepeshely from its seat and obtaining its seal, compelled a canon to forge two documents for him in the chapter's name. One attesting that the late George of Somos, a local lord, had mortgaged to him his castle and all of his estates, and another testifying that he was duly introduced to the same goods. The canon was punished by excommunication, but was later absolved by Pope Nicholas V; see Pál Lukcsics, XV. századi pápák oklevelei [Charters of fifteenth-century popes] (Budapest: Római Magyar Intézet, 1931), no. 997. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35.

³⁷ In view of what was said about king Ladislas' "foreign" support" (see 1443, note 15), virtually all of his followers were threatened with capital sentence by the force of this article.

29. Then, that no prelate, baron, or lord of the kingdom may presume to make treaties without our knowledge with anyone who is an enemy of ours and of our kingdom.³⁸

30. Then, that anyone who does not obey the foregoing and does not mend his ways after having been warned by our letters will be convicted for this action of an act of act of might. And he who does not follow our legitimate and just royal orders and, after having been warned, does not excuse himself will also be convicted of the same penalty for his failure.

31. In order that our loyal subjects named below might be confident in us, we promise by the words and force of these presents and swear by our royal word, that we will observe unswervingly on our part and to make others, who perhaps have been found rebels in this matter, observe all those things which were announced and set out in the foregoing articles and to cause them to be held and observed with the help, counsel, and assistance of our loyal subjects named below, and that we intend to inflict the aforementioned penalties on all those who presume to reject these foregoing with all our power, together with our faithful servants. And, if it is suitable, we shall proceed in any event to assist, achieve, and fulfill together with them all other things which are incumbent on us and related to this matter with their counsel.

In witness of all the foregoing we have granted the present charter validated by the appending of our seal, which we use as king of Hungary. Given at Buda, on the eighteenth day of the month of April, which is the next Saturday after the feast of Easter, one thousand, four hundred and forty four.

32.³⁹ It is also understood to be included in the preceding that we shall not confer donations in perpetuity, benefices, offices, or castellanies on foreigners, and shall even remove those conferred on such men from them, with the exception of the bishopric of Transylvania conferred by us on the lord Matthew the Pole.⁴⁰ This decision has been passed by the prelates, barons, knights, lords, and nobles written below⁴¹ in their own names and that of the said community of the whole kingdom of Hungary, notwithstanding if earlier there was something contrary to this in any decree. Given as above.

³⁸ Apart from several major campaigns led by the king in person or his generals, the civil war was fought by local potentates who often made treaties with the other side. So on 22 November 1443 John of Rozgony, one of the leaders of Frederick's party in West Hungary, dissolved his former truce with the brothers of Gerse, ardent partisans of Wladislas, and he even informed them obligingly that he would henceforth make himself a perfect nuisance to them (vobis scire damus non velle tenere ulterius aliquam treugam, sed in omnibus quibus nos possumus vobis ac partem vestrarum faventibus nocere seu contrarium facere, MNL OL DL 92955).

³⁹ This paragraph was obviously inserted after the initial issue of the decree in privilegial form.

⁴⁰ Matthaeus Polonus, that is, Matthew of Łabiszyn/Labischin (often referred to erroneously as "de la Bischino"), was bishop of Transylvania 1444–61.

⁴¹ Only the better known signatories are identified below.

And we, Simon of Rozgony, bishop of Eger and arch chancellor of the royal majesty,⁴² bishops John of Oradea,⁴³ Matthias of Veszprém,⁴⁴ Peter of Cenad,⁴⁵ the other Peter of Vác⁴⁶ and Demetrius of Knin,⁴⁷ George, despot of Serbia,⁴⁸ Lawrence of Hédervár, palatine of the kingdom of Hungary,⁴⁹ Nicholas of Újlak⁵⁰ and János Hunyadi,⁵¹ voivodes of Transylvania, Michael Jakcs of Kusaly, former voivode of Transylvania⁵², George of Rozgony, judge royal and ispán of Pozsony⁵³, Franko count of Cetinje, ban of the kingdom of Slavonia,⁵⁴ Emerich of Hédervár, ban of Mačva,⁵⁵ Stephen of Bátor, former judge royal, ⁵⁶Ladislás of Pálóc, Master of the Royal Court, ⁵⁷Emerich, Ladislás and Stephen of Pelgo, John of Perény, ispán of Ugocsa,⁵⁸ Simon of the said Pálóc, Master of the Royal Horse,⁵⁹ Michael Ország of Gút, chief treasurer of the lord king,⁶⁰ Paul, son of the ban of Alsólendva, Henry, son of the voivode, of Tamási, ispán of Pozsega,⁶¹ the elder ⁴² Simon of Rozgony (d. 1444), bishop of Veszprém 1428–40, of Eger 1440–44, chancellor 1441–44.

⁴³ John (de Dominis, d. 1444), bishop of Znojmo 1433–40, of Oradea 1440–44.

⁴⁴ Matthias of Gatalóc (d. 1457), chancellor 1433–37, secret chancellor 1433–39, bishop of Vác 1438–40, of Veszprém 1440–57.

⁴⁵ Peter (Himfi of Remete), bishop of Cenad 1438–57.

⁴⁶ Peter (Agmándi of Kecset, d. 1450), bishop of Vác 1440–50, chancellor of the queen 1440, chancellor 1445–50.

⁴⁷ Demetrius (Csopor of Monoszló, d. 1480), bishop of Knin 1438–57, of Zagreb 1457–58, of Győr 1466–80.

⁴⁸ Đurađ (Georgje) Branković (1377–1456) was the Serbian Despot from 1427 to 1456.

⁴⁹ Hédervár, Lawrence of (d. 1447), master of the horse 1429–37, count palatine 1437–47.

⁵⁰ Újlaki, Nicholas (d. 1477) ban of Mačva 1438–72, of Slavonia 1457–65, voivode of Transylvania 1441–65 (with interruptions), king of Bosnia 1471–77.

⁵¹ Hunyadi, János (John, d. 1456), ban of Severin 1439–46, voivode of Transylvania 1441–46, governor of Hungary 1446–52, count of Beszterce, captain general 1453–56.

⁵² Kusaly, Michael Jakcs of (1406/51), magnate, ispan of the Székely 1427–37, voivode of Transylvania 1440–41.

⁵³ Rozgony, George of (brother of bishop Simon, d. 1457/58), magnate, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1423–50, judge royal 1441–46.

⁵⁴ Tallóci, Frank (d. 1448), ban of Severin 1436–9. ban of Croatia and Slavopni 1444–6.

⁵⁵ Hédervár, Emerich of (son of Count Palatine Lawrence, fl. 1438–78), magnate, ban of Mačva 1442–45, ispán of the Székely 1453–54, master of the doorkeepers 1459/63.

⁵⁶ Bátor, Stephen of (d. 1444), master of the stewards 1417–31, judge royal 1435–39.

⁵⁷ Pálóc, Ladislás of (son of Emerich, d. 1470), master of the court 1439–46, judge royal 1446–70.

⁵⁸ Perény, John junior of (son of Peter, d. 1452/53), magnate, ispán of Ugocsa.

⁵⁹ Pálóc, Simon of (son of Matthew, fl. 1415–59), master of the horse 1438–55. ⁵⁹

⁶⁰ Ország, Michael, of Gút (d. 1484), lord chief treasurer 1436–37, 1440–53, count palatine 1458–84.

⁶¹ Tamási, Henry of (son of voivode John, d. 1444), magnate, master of the doorkeepers 1423–34, ispán of the Székely 1437 and of Pozsega.

John of Perény,⁶² Simon Cudar of Ónod, Master of the Cupbearers,⁶³ John Ország of the said Gút, Master of the Royal Treasury,⁶⁴ Stephen of Homonna,⁶⁵ Ladislás of Szécsény, ispán of Nógrád,⁶⁶ John Kompolt of Nána,⁶⁷ Ladislás, son of the voivode, of Léva,⁶⁸ John of Kórógy,⁶⁹ Stephen and Detritus Pohárnok of Berzevice, ispáns of Heves,⁷⁰ Nicholas and Paul of Perény,⁷¹ Ladislás Rikalf, ispán of Liptó,⁷² Sylvester of Torna,⁷³ George son of Roland of Serke, Ladislás of Necpál, Nicholas and Dominic of Kisvárda, Akusius of Csap, Ladislás of Nagymihály, Paul and Philip of Szekcső, Ladislás jr. and Peter Jakcs of Kusaly, Ladislás Pető of Gerse, ispán of Zala⁷⁴, both Johns Forgács of Gimes, Rupert of Tar, Paul of Hédervár, Emerich, son of John and Ders son of the ban, of Szerdahely, Nicholas Antimus of Tapsony, Nicholas son of Roland of Berzence, Nicholas of Bélték, Frank of the aforementioned Gút, George Bodó⁷⁵ and Pancracius of Dengeleg⁷⁶, vice-voivodes of Transylvania, John of Samos, Michael of Bóly, the other Michael of Cil, Ladislás of Szentmihály, George Orros, Demetrius of Pány, Ladislás of Told, Peter Zopa, the other Peter ⁶² Perény, John senior of (son of Emerich, d. 1458), magnate, master of the stewards 1431–37, master of the treasury 1438–43, 1445–58.

⁶³ Cudar, Simon, of Ónod and Makovica (d. 1462), magnate, lord butler 1441–56, master of the doorkeepers' 1458–62.

⁶⁴ Ország, John, of Gút (brother of Michael, d. 1457), master of the treasury 1443–44, ispán of the Székely 1454–57.

⁶⁵ Druget, Stephen, of Homonna (fl. 1411–66), magnate.

⁶⁶ Szécsény, Ladislás of (d. 1460), magnate, ispán of Nógrád and Hont.

⁶⁷ Nána, John Kompolt of (d. 1451), magnate, lord butler 1432–38.

⁶⁸ Léva, Ladislás of (son of Peter Cseh, d. 1467), magnate, ispán of Bars.

⁶⁹ Kórógy, John of (son of Philip, d. 1456), magnate, judge royal 1440, ban of Mačva 1448–56.

⁷⁰ Berzevice, Detritus Pohárnok of (brother of Stephen, fl. 1405–44), knight, ispán of Heves Co.; Berzevice, Stephen Pohárnok of (d. 1460), knight of the household, master of the queen's horse 1431, of the queen's doorkeepers 1438–39, ispán of Trencsén, Borsod and Heves.

⁷¹ Perény, Nicholas of (alias of Rihνό, d. 1444), knight, master of the stewards 1437, royal captain of Kežmarok/Késmárk 1440; Perény, Paul of (alias of Rihνό, brother of Nicholas, fl. 1430–75), knight, royal captain of Kežmarok/Késmárk 1440.

⁷² Rikalf, Ladislás (of Tarkó, fl. 1410–47), knight from Sáros Co., ispán of Liptó.

⁷³ Most of the following, non-baronial, signatories—nobleman from the counties—are known only as delegates at the diets of the mid-fifteenth century. They are listed and, if possible, identified in Pál Engel, Magyarország világi archontológiája 1301–1457 [Secular archontology of Hungary 103–1457] vol. 1, pp. 514–26 (Budapest: História, 1996).

⁷⁴ Gerse, Ladislás Pető of (d. 1455/56), magnate, ispán of Vas and Zala 1424–48.

⁷⁵ Bodó, Gregory, of Györgyi (d. 1459), knight from Tolna Co., retainer of Nicholas of Újlak and of János Hunyadi, vice-voivode of Transylvania, alispán of Tolna 1447, castellan of Buda 1451–55, master of the treasury 1458–59.

⁷⁶ Dengeleg, Pancrace alias George of (d. 1444), knight of the household, Hunyadi's brother-in-law, vice-voivode of Transylvania 1441–44.

Tuz of Lak, Michael Ettre, Nicholas Drágfi, Ladislás Töttös of Bátmonostora, Ladislás of Szöcsény, Andrew of Hanva, Thomas Csirke, Sandrinus of Helemba, Simon of Boldogasszonyfalva, Michael Pohárnok, George of Sebes, John of Zana, the other John of Sólyag, Michael of Izmény, Pat of Gyula, Michael Pecs, John of Kálló, Nicholas of Szakoly, Peter of Ugra, Nicholas Szobonya, Andrew of Kozár, Ladislás of Marót, former ban of Mačva,⁷⁷ Raphael Herceg, bishop-elect of Bosnia⁷⁸, Michael, abbot of Somogyvár, Clement Tapán, Sebastian of Szend, Nicholas of Szentmihály, Michael of Fülöpös, Brictius of Gic, Nicholas Nyakatlan of Töttös, George Orros of Serjén, John and Thomas, sons of Hyppolit of Györke, Peter of Tetétlen, Stephen Danes of Macedonia, George Máriási, Thomas Csirke of Pólyi, Gyula of Rátót, George of Szentjános, Bernard of Dengeleg, John of Apagy, Nicholas Kun of Besenyő, John of Szepes, Ladislás of Miske, Stephen of Bajon, Nicholas of Osgyán, Peter of Papi, John of Ina, Ladislás son of Matthew of Menche, John of Csány, Coloman of Dörögd, Paul Pázmány, Daniel of Kustán, Ladislás of Paka, Ladislás of Tetétlen, Ladislás of Hort, George of Rohmány, Peter of Hangony, Stephen of Jánosi, Michael Barocz of Vizslás, provost Martin of Požega, Michael of Gencs, John, son of Stephen, of Szentmihály, George of Ráton, Nicholas of Zombor, Gregory Józsa of Gallya, Ladislás of Csépán, George of Gergelylaka, Ladislás of Somos, Ladislás of Rohmány, Ladislás of Zelemér, Caspar of Vere, Simon of Hutichyna and Matthias of Klišić from the kingdom of Croatia, Demetrius of Tapász, George of Megyericse, Giles of Peder, John of Zytha, the learned Ladislás of Petke, the learned Albert of Szentmárton, John of Bakta, Sandrinus of Réde, Matthias from the same place, Stephen of Dombó, Andrew of Sztáncs, Sebastian of Kolyn, Ladislás Gógán of Gyürky, Ladislás Hernád of Hernádfalva, Michael of Monok, Matthew of Tófő, Nicholas of Alag, James of Pilis, Andrew of Lukafalva, Peter Panes of Gordova, Lawrence of Kér, James of Lesztemér, Vincent of Ruszka, Ladislás of Irsa, Stephen of Laczk, Ladislás, son of Abraham, of Gerla, Nicholas, son of Peter, of Szentlélek, Dennis of Zech, Blaise of Berény, Ladislás of Miske, Elias of Kecczer, Nicholas Varjas, George Ország of Gút, Mark of Nadány, Ladislás of Monostor, George of Vica, Caspar and George of Hatna, Benedict of Likva, Bartholomew, abbot of Borsmonostor, George, provost of Szepes, Stephen, son of George of Telekes, Michael Asztalnok of Hermán, Benedict of Zempes, Sigismund of Csap, Benedict of Bökény, Lawrence of Csegöd, Ladislás of Polyán, Peter of Kemend, Peter of Berente, Benedict of Vámos, Ladislás of Nyitraszeg, George of Dománhida, John of Liszka, James of Ripak, Oswald Fejér, James of Chepen, Dennis of Vág, John Bak of Berend, Valentine de Makófalva, Blaise of Dolor, Martin of Petenye, John, son of Vitus of Mohora, John of Mlena, Lawrence of Kálló, Paul of Szerdahely, George of Bátor, John Vaski, Clement of Keszi, Andrew of Jakabfalva, John Köte of Kötegyán, Andrew of Kollár, Ladislás of Verseny, Peter of Bask, Zoárd of Szentersébet, Ladislás of Tapalóc, and the other lords and nobles of the kingdom constituted in the present assembly acknowledge all things described above as far as all their articles have been and are made and concluded from our common council, deliberation and assent, and because of this we promise to observe inviolably in good faith all things, which are described above, and to cause them to be observed by others, who might wish to act against the preceding articles in part or in whole, in every way and by the way of all appropriate force, by witness of those present, whose seals are appended next to our royal seal.

⁷⁷ Marót, Ladislás of (son of John senior, d. 1446/47), magnate, ban of Mačva 1397–1410, 1427–8. 1397-1410

⁷⁸ Raphael Herceg of Szekcső (d. 1456), bishop of Bosnia 1444–50, archbishop of Kalocsa 1450–56.

Given as above.

LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF 7 MAY, 1445

After the disaster at Varna, about which only incomplete news reached Hungary during the winter of 1444/45, the magnates established first an informal and soon after a formal council of regency. In their meeting in February 1445, they called a diet for 4 April at Pest. The deliberations began only in late April and the decree was not issued until 7 May 1445. Waiting for definite news of the fate of King Wladislas, the estates issued the decretum in their own name and decreed, among others, that a seal of the realm be cut. While the original was issued under the seal of several magnates, the surviving copies are sealed by this corporate seal. Even though the decree did not formally name captains for the regional enforcement of its measures, the magnates entrusted with its implementation acquired such a position. In July 1445 a meeting in northern Hungary—representing the powerful magnate Giskra, the counties of present-day Slovakia and the cities of Upper Hungary—passed decisions about the implementation of this decree.

MSS.: Three originals: one on parchment (MNL OL DL. 13848/1), one on paper (MNL OL DL. 13848/2) and another on paper in the City Archives of Trenčín (Cista 3., Fasc. 10, No. 12), all three sealed with the SIGILLUM REGNICOLARUM REGNI HUNGARIAE; en placard, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH]. p. 339.)

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 2: 9–36; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium incliti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818), 1: 94–107; Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:302–07; DRH, pp. 338–48.

LIT.: Nándor Knauz, Az országos tanács és az országgyűlések története, 1445–1452 [History of the royal council and the diets between 1445 and 1452] (Pest: Eggenberger, 1859), pp. 20–27; Gyula Gábor, A kormányzói méltóság a magyar alkotmányjogban [The dignity of regent in Hungarian constitutional law] (Budapest: Athenaeum, n.d. [1932]), pp. 46–7; Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 85, 543, 559–60; János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 49–51; Joseph Held, Hunyadi: Legend and Reality (Boulder, Co.: East European Monographs, 1985), pp. 113–8.

7 MAII 1445

Nos universi prelati, barones, milites, nobiles ac civitatenses regnicoleque regni Hungarie in presenti generali congregatione Pestiensis pro reformanda pace et reipublice utilitati eiusdem regni insimul congregati presentium serie ad universorum volumus notitiam devenire, quod cum occulto dei iudicio regnum hoc Hungarie, quod Christi fidelium propugnaculum existit, ex sui intrinseca divisione et guerrarum intestina concitatione hiis temporibus cepisset fluctuare et in casus periculosissimos prohi dolor devenire, ita quod patrimonium Jesu Christi, ecclesie videlicet et ecclesiarum prelati ac barones unacum nobilibus utriusque sexus et incolis ipsius regni nostri per paganos aliasque circumadiacentium regionum nationes, sed et per intraneos inquietos malefactores in omnium facultatum suarum invasione et vastatione, prede continue, incendiorum et aliorum maleficiorum utniversorum commissione tantam passi fuere oppressionem et dampnificationem, quod nisi altissimi dei gratia celeris provisionis remedio humanis etiam sollicitationibus occurrentibus fuerit opportune provisum, regnum hoc ad extremam devenire cernebatur periclitationem, maxime considerato casu illo magis periculosiori, qui dei ex permissione regie maiestati anno proxime elapso ex causa fidei et Christiane defensionis cum regnicolis contra paganos Turcos, videlicet istius regni nostri atrocissimos et infestissimos emulos usque ad fines regni Bulgarie penes Nigrum Mare proficiscenti et conflictum cum paganis ipsis facienti taliter acciderit, quod usque ad septimum mensem conflictus sui nulla de eius reditu haberi potuit certitudo. Ne tamen per huiusmodi divisionem nostram et intestinam guerram maiora pericula et graviora mala nobis et ipsi regno per eiusdem anichilationem subsequi contingat, inter nos variis hincinde habitis tractatibus respectibusque et difficultatibus ad talem devenimus concordie unionem, quod si supradicta regia maiestas usque octavum diem festi sancte Trinitatis proxime venturum non redierit, aut de vita sua per nostrum nuncium ea de causa nunc ad Poloniam transmissum plena et indubitata certitudo reportata non fuerit, extunc omnes universaliter illustrissimum principem dominum Ladislaum natum condam domini nostri Alberti regis Hungarie, si et in casu, quo nobis eundem cum sacra regni huius corona restituere et in mediis nostri dominus rex Romanorum, in cuius manibus ad presens consistunt, dare voluerit dederitque et de facto assignaverit, in verum et legitimum regem Hungarie et dominum nostrum assumemus et pro rege habebimus et tenebimus vita semper sibi comite in futurum. Casu autem, quo eorundem restitutio et in medium nostri assignatio nobis fuerit recusata, in nullo sibi, scilicet Ladislao principi volumus esse obligati; quin ymo huius regni moderno statu et necessitate requirentibus providebimus de rege et principe, cuius sub regimine ipsum regnum a suis periculis et oppressionibus valeat opportune liberari et in statu tranquillo et pacifico permanere. Et ut huiusmodi dissensionis et divisionis nostre multiplicata materia sopiatur, malaque predicta in antea non committantur et pax pristina reformetur, subscriptas dispositiones effective observandas in hac generali nostra congregatione duximus proinde ordinandas,

I. Primo dispositum est, quod omnes occupationes castrorum possessionumque et terrarum, generaliterque aliorum quorumlibet iurium et bonorum, sive vigore donationum per regiam vel reginalem maiestates, vel propria temeritate seu expugnatione per quoscunque, Hungaros scilicet, Bohemos, Polonos, Thewtunicos seu cuiuscunque alterius linguagii homines quorumcunque a tempore inceptionis presentium guerrarum facte usque ad octavum diem dicti festi sancte Trinitatis hiis, apud quos tempore inceptionis huiusmodi guerrarum eedem extiterunt, sub pena perpetue infidelitatis remittantur; et signanter hii, qui in presenti congregatione sunt presentes, promittant se velle remittere et presenti ordinationi parere et obedire effective, ut sic inter eos mutuus amor et fraternalis dilectio odio et rancore exclusis vigeat et permanere dinoscatur,

II. Item quod omnes donationes post mortem dicti condam comini Alberti regis de possessionibus regalibus et ad regium ius spectantibus per regiam vel reginalem maiestates facte firmari vel infirmari differantur usque ad tempus coronationis regis.

III. Item de actibus potentiariis hiis temporibus disturbiorum perpetratis iudicium similiter ad illud tempus differatur, exceptis dumtaxat interemptionibus hominum, possessionum occupationibus, litteralium instrumentorum ablationibus ac virginum et honestarum dominarum dehonestationibus, de quibus iudicium et iustitia petentibus ministretur per iudicem competentem.

IV. Item omnia fortalitia in ipso disturbio erecta usque ad octavum diem prefati festi sancte Trinitatis per eos, qui ea erexerunt vel nunc possident, sub pena infidelitatis deponantur; in partibus tamen regni Sclauonie penes fluvium Zawa et Transsiluanis ac Posega fortalitia propter metum Turcorum facta, si que ex eis deponi debeant, relinquuntur voluntati nobilium partium earundem et deponenda sub predictis penis deponantur, exceptis quinque castris, videlicet castro Palatha Nicolai wayuode in comitatu Albensi ac Werewcze Emerici filii wayuode de Marczali in regno Sclauonie, necnon Wamus Ernerici de Pelsewcz in comitatu de Borsod, item Nana Johannis de Kompolth in Hewesiensi et Pelsewcz Nicolai et Stephani de eadem Pelsewcz in Gewmeriensi comitatibus existentibus et de eorundem propriis domibus fabricatis, que castra ipsis dominis unanimi et pari consensu tenere et habere permisimus atque relinquimus. Ita tamen, quod ipsa castra de propriis proventibus conserventur et ceteris nulla spolia, dampnificationes seu quascunque molestias de eisdem inferant, neque ad labores huiusmodi castrorum aliorum jobagiones, ecclesiasticorum virorum videlicet aut nobilium, seu aliorum possessionatorum hominum compellant. Qui si contrarium fecerint, ad primas octavas cum insinuatione evocentur et contra eosdem in eisdem octavis sententia capitalis facti potentialis decernatur et castra ipsa distrahantur sub pena predicta.

V. Item qui contumacia ducti predicta fortalitia deponenda infra prefixum tempus non deposuerint, procedatur contra ipsos tanquam contra infideles regni, pro quorum rebellionem conterenda ex ista parte Ticie et Transdanubium dominus Nicolaus wayuoda cum ceteris dominis et nobilibus ac civitatensibus partibus in eisdem existentibus, ex alia autem parte Ticie dominus Johannes wayuoda et versus Cassouiam domini Georgius de Rozgon, Johannes Giskra comes de Saros et Ernericus de Pelsewcz cum Cassouiensibus et aliis civitatensibus, in terra autem Mathie domini Michael Orzag et Pangracius similiter cum dominis et nobilibus ac civitatensibus earundem partium sunt electi et deputati; ita tamen, quod si illi domini electi alicuius favore allecti premissa non facerent, tunc tales electi in premissa pena convincantur.

VI. Item omnes cause litigiose a tempore decreti anno proxime preterito facti tam finaliter terminate, quam etiam pendentes vigore permaneat et prosequantur in suo cursu, omnesque et singule clause ad octavas festi beati Jacobi apostoli proxime venturi prorogentur.

VII. Item, quod hii, qui pecunias regni pro tutela et defensione eiusdem annis proxime preteritis contra Turcos dispositas levarunt et nulla servitia exinde pro utilitate ipsius regni impenderent sibipsis easdem usurpando, in pena facti potentialis et amissione omnium bonorum et possessionum suarum convicti permaneant. Stipendiarii vero ipso anno preterito exercituantes de dampnis, nocumentis et malorum perpetrationibus in eorum processibus per eos commissis per hos, quibus eadem intulerunt, iudicialiter conveniri valeant compellanturque iidem ad satisfactionem per iudicem suum.

VIII. Item cusiones monetarum exnunc cassari debeant in omni loco usque ad regis voluntatem sub pena communi regni ab antiquo statuta et decreta.

IX. Item de cusionibus monetarum prescriptarum, sed et aliis quibusvis proventibus regalibus, in quibuscunque rebus consistant, qui de salariis et provisionibus baronibus, capitaneis atque gentibus ad tuitionem et defensionem regni et confiniorum deputatis resultabunt, quispiam hominum, cuiuscunque status et dignitatis existat, se quomodolibet intromittere non presumat, sed talismodi proventus fisco regio reserventur et amministrentur.

X. Item si qui absque iudicio in captivitatem devenissent per Hungaros, Thewtunicos sive Bohemos ex quacunque parte, et in eadem captivate pro liberatione ipsorum castra, civitates, possessiones aut alia bona qualiacunque, sive etiam obsides dedissent aut conventionem pecuniariam fecissent, sin etiam si aliqui amici et fratres pro eisdem captivis fideiussores extitissent et pro eadem fideiussoria cautione castra et possessiones ipsorum pro eisdem assignassent fide aut litteris obligatoriis, aut qualicunque forma seu colore mediante se ad hec obligassent, absque ornni solutione remittere debeant et teneantur, excepto eo casu, quo si quipiam causa fraternitatis aut amicitie pro sui capitis seu possessionum redemptione quibuscunque pecuniam propriam sponte accomodassent seu mutuassent, quod mutuum creditoribus eorundem omnino refundere teneantur.

XI. Item quod nullus hominum, cuiuscunque status et dignitatis existat, in antea possessionum occupationes, spolia, vastationes et quascunque alias oppressiones per se vel per alium facere audeat sub pena potentiarii actus, amissionis scilicet capitis et bonorum; super quo querulanti fiat debita amministratio et executio iustitie per iudicem in primis occurrentibus octavis, et propter nullam causam prorogari valeat, quin in eisdem primis octavis leso iustitia impendatur et sententia capitalis emanetur.

XII. Item quicunque post emanationem litterarum prelatorum et baronum pridem Albaregali de et super conventionem eorundem et regnicolarum in presentem congregationem factam spolia, vastationes et quoruncunque malorum perpetraciones commiserunt, ad primas octavas cum ammonitione et insinuatione evocentur et in eisdem octavis sententialiter causa terminetur. Qui autem de huiusmodi spolio et malorum perpetrationibus convicti extiterint, pena infidelitatis, ut littere convocationis pretacte continebant, innodentur et puniantur.

XIII. Item quod si imperator Turcorum venturus est, ut famatur, extunc teneantur omnes et singuli totius regni possessionati homines et cuncti civitatenses in propriis personis exercitualmente procedere contra ipsum iuxta antiquam consuetudinem et libertatem regni Hungarie.

XIV. Item omnes episcopatus, abbacie et cetera beneficia ecclesiastica vacantia manibus laycalibus et quibusvis aliis iniustis detentoribus inde exclusis conferantur personis idoneis et benemeritis dilatione sine ulteriori, non tamen alienigenis, sed tantum regnicolis. Et quod omnes decime et alii proventus ecclesiastici solvantur et restituantur prelatis et personis ecclesiasticis, quibus alias de iure solvi consueverunt; hoc expresso, quod ipse abbacie et quecunque alie prelature religiose professis suorum ordinum et non aliis conferri debeant.

XV. Item quod disponatur unum sigillum, in quo sit signetum crucis, sicuti signetum regni Hungarie, et illud sigillum servetur in civitate Budensi, ut querulantes habeant sub illo sigillo litteras querimaniales, et procedatur iustitia secundum quod decet usque coronationem regis.

XVI. Item quod nullus presbiterorum regularium vel secularium atque clericorum sive laicorum huius regni per viam simplicis querele in quibuscunque causis ad curiam Romanam ex regnicolis quempiam citare et vexare presumat, sed prius hic in regno coram iudicibus eorum ordinariis, videlicet coram episcopo loci in cuius dyocesi moram trahit, et ab episcopo ad suum metropolitanum trahere possit in causam.

XVII. Item quod omnia tributa et theolonia tam terrestria, quam navalia a tempore decessus et mortis condam bone memorie domini Alberti regis Hungarie ex cuiuscunque et qualicunque donatione vel commissione erecta, instituta et acquisita deleantur et deponantur, et de cetera ab exactionibus eorundem omnes et quilibet prorsus et per omnia sub penis et notis prenotatis cessent et abstineant, cessareque et abstinere debeant et teneantur.

XVIII. Item quod omnes mercatores et negotiatores tam intranei, quam extranei seu forenses libere tute pacificeque et secure per queque et universa loca et civitates regni iuxta antiquam consuetudinem cum suis rebus et mercimoniis hincinde procedere valeant omnium et singulorum cuiuscunque gradus, officii et dignitatis atque conditionis hominum absque impedimento, invasione et dampnificatione, iustis tamen tricesimis et tributis suis in antiquis et consuetis locis semper persolutis.

XIX. Item quod quicumque hominum, cuiuscunque conditionis et status existat, post emanationem litterarum convocationalium prelatorum et baronum pridem in Albaregali congregatorum ad sua fortalitia atque castra homines advenas seu forenses, cuiuscunque linguagii existant, introduxisset et assumpsisset, per eosque spolia, vastationes, invasiones et rapinas fecisset; et commisisset, ac faceret et committeret in futurum, sententiam capitalem et amissionem omnium bonorum suorum, sed et notam perpetue prout in premissis litteris in Albaregali, ut predicatur, emanatis continetur, incurrat.

XX. Item quod quilibet exercituans aut viator in possessionibus aliorum quorumcunque pro se aut pro equis suis victualia pro pretio condigno ad arbitrium vendentium limitato emere debeat. Alioquin, si in huiusmodi victualium aut quarumcunque aliarum rerum receptione violentiam fecerit aut fieri permiserit, in facto actus potentialis eo facto convincatur fiatque super eo iudicium et ministratio iustitie in primis occurrentibus octavis passo dampnum querulanti.

XXI. Item quod tam prelati, quam barones regni nostri, qui ex dispositione et antiqua consuetudine tempore generalis exercitus banderia levare consueti sunt, cum eorum banderiis tempore huiusmodi exercitus prompti esse debeant et parati, ut et alii regnicole eo diligentiori advertentia se ad exercituandum promptos habeant et conservent.

XXII. Item quod quilibet possessionatorum hominum jobagiones suos iusto terragio deposito et aliis debitis iustis persolutis ad aliorum possessiones recedere volentes semper dimittere teneantur sub pena alias in decreto condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris Romanorum ac huius regni Hungarie etc. regis desuper edito contenta. Et eonsimiliter de restitutionibus jobagionum violenter abductorum teneantur modus et pena in eodem decreto contenti.

XXIII. Item quod ministratio iudicii et iustitie de occupationibus possessionum tempore huius disturbii, hominum interemptionibus et virginum ac honestarum dominarum deflorationibus ac litteralium instrumentorum ablationibus, prout superius in quodam articulo continetur, intelligatur in primis occurrentibus octavis, ut de novis actibus potentiariis sententialiter fieri debendis.

Ut autem hec omnia et quevis premissorum singula debitam efficaciam et robur obtineant firmitatis ab omnibusque et singulis effective observentur, nos prelati, barones, nobiles proceres, civitatenses et incole regni huius Hungarie predicti singuli singulariter et universi universaliter promittimus fide nostra christiana mediante observare et toto posse nostro facere observari, harum litterarumstrarum, quibus uniuscuiusque sigilla nostrum appendi fecimus, vigore et testimonio mediante. Datum et actum in civitate Pesthiensi secundo die festi Ascensionis domini, que fuit septima Maii, anno eiusdem millesimo quadringentesimo quadragésimo quinto.

7 MAY 1445

We, all the prelates, barons, knights, nobles, townsmen, and gentlemen of the realm of the kingdom of Hungary gathered in the present general assembly at Pest for the restoration of peace and the profit of the commonwealth of the same kingdom, wish to make known to all, that by the inscrutable judgment of God this kingdom of Hungary, which is the bulwark of Christ's faithful,¹ owing to internal division and the passions of internecine war, began in these times to be shaken and has, alas, fallen into a most perilous state, so that the patrimony of Jesus Christ, namely, the churches and the prelates of the churches, as well as the barons, nobles of either sex, and the inhabitants of our kingdom have suffered so many invasions and devastations, continual plundering in every possible way, losses by arson, and many other kinds of evils not only from pagans and other nations of surrounding regions but also from lawless native evil-doers, that unless swift remedy is provided by the grace of God most high and also by concurrent human effort, this kingdom may very well fall into final decline. Above all, this very dangerous situation has been considered, that by the permission of God last year, the royal majesty, for the cause of the faith and the defense of Christians with the gentlemen of the realm set out for the borders of the kingdom of Bulgaria as far as the Black Sea against the pagan Turks, these most violent and outrageous enemies of this kingdom of ours, and seven months after the battle with the pagans took place² it has not been possible to receive certain knowledge of his return. To avoid that, through this dissension and internecine war of ours, greater dangers and worse evils come upon us and the kingdom, leading to its extinction, we have reached among ourselves through various discussions, considerations, against all obstacles such an agreement of concord that, if the aforesaid royal majesty will not have returned before the eighth day after the next feast of the Holy Trinity,³ or full and certain knowledge of his life is not brought by our messenger sent now to Poland concerning this matter, then we all together will accept the most illustrious prince lord Ladislas, born of our late lord Albert, king of Hungary, as the true and legitimate king of Hungary and our lord, and we shall consider and hold him as king for the future while life is granted to him, provided and if the lord king of the Romans, in whose hands he is at present, is willing to hand over and will hand over and in fact entrusts him to us and restores him to our midst, together with the Holy Crown of this kingdom.⁴ In the case of refusal of his being returned and entrusted to our midst, we wish not to be obligated to him, namely Prince Ladislas, in any way; moreover, we shall provide such a king and prince for the requirements of the present state and needs of this kingdom under whose rule the kingdom can suitably be freed from its dangers and oppressions and remain in a peaceful and tranquil condition. And in order that the manifold cause of our dissension and division may be removed and that the said evils may not be committed henceforth, but the earlier peace be restored, we in this general assembly of ours have formulated the decisions written below to be observed effectively and ordained henceforward.

¹ The notion of Hungary as the “bulwark” of Christianity goes back to 1250 when King Béla IV, in his letter to Pope Innocent IV, hinted at his lonely fight propter bonum Christianitatis against the Mongols. Similarly, Louis I was admonished by Pope Gregory XI to continue being a defender of Christendom, and Sigismund was addressed by Pope John XXIII in 1410 as athleta invictissimus orthodoxae fidei. However, as József Deér pointed out in “Die Entstehung des ungarischen Nationalbewusstseins, East Central Europe/l'Europe de centre-est, 20-23 (1993-6) 11-53; briefly also summarized in his “Le sentiment national hongrois au moyen age,” Nouvelle Revue de Hongrie 19 (1936). This idea was for a long time restricted to the ruler, and did not refer to the nation until the later Middle Ages. It became a commonplace in the rhetoric of the chancellery under Matthias Corvinus; hence, the formulation here may count as an early example of this perception of a “Hungarian mission.”

² The battle of Varna, in Bulgaria, on 10 November 1444, where the Hungarian army was routed by Sultan Murad II and King Wladislas I killed. Cf. B. Tsvetkova, La bataille mémorable des peuples (Sofia: Sofia-Press, 1971), with previous literature; also John W. Fine Jr., The late medieval Balkans: A critical survey from the late 12th century to the Ottoman Conquest (Ann Arbor: Univ. of Michigan Press, 1987), pp. 548–50.

³ 30 May 1445.

1. First, it has been decided that all occupations of castles, estates, and lands, and generally of any other rights and goods, whether by a grant from the king's or the queen's majesty, or by his own boldness and violence by anyone, whether Hungarian, Czech, Pole, German, or one of any other language, perpetrated from the time of the beginning of the present wars up to the eighth day after the said feast of the Holy Trinity,⁵ must be handed over to those whose they were at the time of the beginning of the wars, under penalty of perpetual infidelity;⁶ and, in particular, those who are present at this assembly must promise to be willing to hand them over and thus effectively fulfill and obey the present command, so that mutual love and affection can flourish and be sustained among them, eliminating hatred and rancor.

⁴ Having left Hungary for Austria with her infant son, on 25 February 1441, Queen Elisabeth pledged the Hungarian crown for 8000 gulden to King Frederick III of Germany, then head of the House of Habsburg, who, after her death in December 1442, became also the guardian of Ladislas "Posthumus." Cf. the introduction to 20 July 1440.

⁵ That is, from the beginning of the civil war in summer 1440 to 30 May 1445.

⁶ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.. This article was frequently quoted during the subsequent months in cases against powerful lords, forcing them to return usurped possessions. The governing council of the realm issued several final summonses based on this and the following articles (see e.g., MNL OL Dl. 13846, 13851, 13857, 66910).

2. Then, that the confirmation or cancellation of all grants made after the death of the said late lord King Albert by the king's or the queen's majesty⁷ from the royal estates or from those pertaining to royal right must be delayed until the time of the coronation of a king.

3. Then, similarly, trials regarding acts of act of might perpetrated in these times of troubles must be deferred to that time, with the exception, of course, of killing of men, occupation of estates, theft of written instruments, and rape of virgins and honest matrons, concerning which, trial and justice must be administered to those seeking it by an appropriate judge.⁸

4. Then, all fortifications built in these troubles must be demolished by the eighth day after the said feast of the Holy Trinity⁹ by those who built them or now hold them, under penalty of infidelity. However, the fortifications built for fear of the Turks in the regions of the kingdom of Slavonia along the Sava River, in Transylvania,¹⁰ and in Požega, if they are among those which must be demolished, may be left by the will of the nobles of those same regions while those that must be demolished should be demolished under the aforesaid penalties, except for five castles, namely Palota of the voivode Nicholas in Co. Fejér,¹¹ Verőce of Emeric of Marczal, son of the voivode, in the kingdom of Slavonia,¹² Vámos of Emeric of Pelsőc in Co. Borsod,¹³ Nána of John of Kompolt in Co. Heves,¹⁴ and Nicholas of Pelsőc and Stephen of Pelsőc in Co. Gömör,¹⁵ built by these same lords around their own homes, which castles we permit and grant leave to these ⁷ Namely: Wladislas I Jagiello and Queen Elizabeth of Luxemburg.

⁸ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (incl. rape).

⁹ 30 May 1445.

¹⁰ Later evidence implies that in response to Ottoman raids, a number of places were fortified by local lords in the southern parts of the kingdom, mostly between the Sava and Drava Rivers. However, no such construction work is known from Transylvania.

¹¹ The still extant castle of Várpalota, in Co. Veszprém, was owned by Nicholas Újlaki, (d. 1477) ban of Mačva 1438-72, of Slavonia 1457-65, voivode of Transylvania 1441-65 (with interruptions), king of Bosnia 1471-77.

¹² Verőce, today: Vitrovice in Croatia; Emeric Marcali (d. 1448), was the son of voivode Nicholas, magnate, master of the doorkeepers 1434–37, 1446–48.

¹³ Vámos, today Sajóvámos, in Co. Borsod, Emeric Bebek of Pelsőc (d. 1448), was a magnate, ispán of the Székely 1438–41, voivode of Transylvania 1446–8.

¹⁴ Nána, today Kiszána, in Co. Heves. Remnants of castle Nána have been recently excavated. John Kompolti of Nána (d. 1451) was lord butler 1432–38.

¹⁵ Pelsőc in Co. Gömör, today: Plegivec, Slovakia. Nicholas Bebek of Pelsőc (fl. 1421–46) was ispán of Gömör in 1440, his brother Stephen (d. 1451) was, ban of Mačva 1447–48.

lords to hold and to keep by unanimous and equal consent. However, these castles must be maintained from their own revenues without being used for despoiling or causing damages or any other molestations to others and without compelling tenants of others, namely of clergy, or nobles, or other men of property, to work for these castles. Whoever acts contrary to this must be summoned by terminal summons to the first octavial court, and a capital sentence must be passed against them in the same octave, and their castles must be razed under the aforesaid penalty.¹⁶

5. Then, those who, guided by obstinacy, do not demolish the aforesaid condemned fortifications within the set time must be prosecuted as infidels against the kingdom. To quell their rebellion on this side of the Tisza and in Transdanubia¹⁷, the lord voivode Nicholas¹⁸ with the other lords, nobles, and townsmen living in those parts, on the other side of the Tisza the lord voivode John,¹⁹ and towards Košice the lords George of Rozgony,²⁰ John Giskra ispán of Sáros,²¹ and Emeric of Pelsőc,²² with the citizens of Košice and other towns, in the land of Mátyusföld²³ the lords Michael Ország²⁴ and Pancrace,²⁵ similarly with the lords, nobles, and townsmen of these regions have been elected and appointed in such a way that if these elected lords do not carry out the foregoing, ¹⁶ Terminal summons (citatio cum insinuatione) was issued—usually after three attempts at summoning a party—with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might, introduced in 1443. Octavial court refers to the term of the session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast—such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George’s (23 April), St. James’s (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)—and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George’s and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times t. -- In 1452 Governor Hunyadi referred to this passage (or to 1446:2) in a mandate ordering the razing of the castle of the noble family of Martonfalva (MNL OL Dl. 88266).

¹⁷ The central and western parts of the kingdom are meant.

¹⁸ Újlaki, see n. 11, above.

¹⁹ John/János Hunyadi (d. 1456), ban of Severin 1439–46, voivode of Transylvania 1441–6, governor of Hungary 1446–52, count of Beszterce, captain general 1453–6.

²⁰ George Rozgonyi (d. 1457/58) was a magnate, ispán of Pozsony Co. 1423–50, judge royal 1441–46.

²¹ Giskra or Jiskra, Jan (of Brandys/Brandeis, d. 1470/71), Czech mercenary leader, captain general in northeastern Hungary.

²² See n. 13, above.

²³ Mátyusföld is a region in the west-northwest of the kingdom of Hungary (now Slovakia, called Matúšova zem), so called after the oligarch Matthew Csák (1260–1321) whose territory it was; in 1387 first mentioned as terra Matthei.

²⁴ Ország, Michael, of Gút (d. 1484), was lord chief treasurer 1436–7 and 1440–53, count palatine 1458–84.

²⁵ Pancrace of Szentmiklós (fl. 1432–57), was captain of Queen Barbara, ispán of Liptó, captain general in northwestern Hungary 1445.

having chosen to favor anyone, then such elected men must be convicted of the foregoing penalty.²⁶

6. Then, all court cases from the time of the decree made in the year just past either finally terminated or still pending should remain open and be prosecuted in due course, and each and every case should be delayed until the octave of the next feast of St. James the Apostle.²⁷

7. Then, that those who in the years just past had collected the revenues of the kingdom intended for its safety and defense against the Turks and have rendered no services from them for the benefit of the kingdom but usurped them for themselves must remain convicted of the penalty of an act of might and the confiscation of all their goods and estates. The paid soldiers of the same past year ought to be summoned judicially, concerning damages, harm, and evil perpetrated during their campaign, by those whom they harmed and be compelled by their judge to pay compensation.²⁸

8. Then, the minting of coinage must cease from now on in every place until the king orders otherwise under the penalty of the country established and decreed of old.²⁹

9. Then, no one, of whatever station and dignity he might be, may presume to interfere in any way with the minting of the said coinage or with any other royal revenue of whatever form which remains after paying the salaries and provisions due to barons, captains, and their men for the safety and defense of the realm and its borders,³⁰ but such revenues ought to be reserved for and administered by the royal fisc.

10. Then, if anyone who has without trial fallen into captivity of Hungarians, Germans, or Czechs belonging to either side, and while in captivity for the sake of liberating himself has given away castles, towns, estates, or any other goods, even if they have given hostages or made agreements to pay, and even if any of their friends or kinsmen have acted as guarantors for these captives and have transferred on their behalf by trust or letters of obligation as guarantees of bonds any castles or estates, or have obligated themselves in any way or form whatsoever, are and ought to be ²⁶ The list of the elected captains and their regional jurisdiction has been critically evaluated by Kovachich (Supplementum, 2: 20–24). It has been debated, whether Giskra was from the outset one of the captains, or was named only in the Szina regional meeting, as the de facto lord of northern Hungary. One of the original charters lists him among the captains, two others do not; however, since the record of the Szina meeting (MNL OL DI, 105552), which otherwise gives the best text of the decree, included Giskra, the editors of DRH opted for that version; see also Mályusz, pp. 559–60.

²⁷ 1 August 1445.

²⁸ Cf. 1439:3 and many other decreta.

²⁹ Cf. 1444:7; counterfeiting money was regarded one of the cases for the charge of infidelity.

³⁰ On the amounts paid to the major barons, who had to hire troops for the defense of the realm, we have some indication in a “reform proposal” submitted in 1453 to King Ladislas V. That plan foresaw six thousand florins to the commander-in-chief, Hunyadi, 4,600 florins to the palatine and 1,400 florins each to the commanders of the southern defense; see János M. Bak, “Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter” in R. Schneider, ed. Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347–87, here p. 361–2.

released without any payment, except in that case in which someone has pledged his own money or taken a loan from anyone of his own free will for the sake of kinship or friendship for the redemption of his own head or estates, because then he is required to repay the loan to his creditors without fail.

11. Then, that no one, of whatever station or dignity he might be, should dare himself or through others to carry out henceforth occupations, plundering, wasting of estates, or any other attacks under the penalty of an act of might, namely the loss of his head and goods. In such cases the justice due to the plaintiff should be administered and done by a judge in the first octave that occurs and may not be delayed for any reason, but recompense for the damage must be rendered in the first octave and a capital sentence passed.³¹

12. Then, anyone who commits plundering, wasting, and any other evil deed after the issue of the charter of the prelates and barons at their and the gentlemen's of the realm recent meeting at Székesfehérvár,³² regarding the present assembly, must be warned and cited with terminal summons to the first octave, and the case must be terminated with a sentence in the same octave. Those who are convicted of such plunder and perpetration of evil must be held and punished by the penalty of infidelity, as contained in the charter of the said assembly.³³

13. Then, that if the emperor of the Turks is about to invade, as is rumored,³⁴ then each and every man of property of the whole realm and all the townsmen are required in person to set out on campaign against him according to the ancient custom and liberty of the kingdom of Hungary.³⁵

14. Then, all vacant bishoprics, abbacies, and other ecclesiastical benefices must be released from lay hands and other illegal usurpers and conferred on suitable and meritorious persons without further delay, not on aliens, however, but only on inhabitants of the kingdom.³⁶ And that all tithes and other ecclesiastical revenues should be paid and restored to prelates and ecclesiastical persons, to whom they are usually required to be paid by right, but with this specific provision, that abbacies

³¹ Cf. 1445:23

³² The invitation to the diet was issued on 8 February (see Mályusz, pp. 84–5); that regnicolae here means explicitly the lesser nobles (or their deputies), suggested by Mályusz (ibid.) is now supported by the emended text of the decree, as printed in DRH, p. 345.

³³ In a case before the council of regency the counsel for Ladislás of Marót (d. 1446/47), ban of Mačva, expressly noted that the accused committed his alleged crimes before the deadline set in this article; hence, the attempt of the diet to curb violence seems to have had a beneficial result.

³⁴ No Ottoman attack is known from this year, rather an unsuccessful siege by Hunyadi and his allies of Little Nicopolis on the Lower Danube in September 1446. Actually, no major Ottoman campaign reached Hungary's borders until after the fall of Constantinople in 1453.

³⁵ Cf. 1397:6, 1439:3, and Proposition. 1432/3: 1, 4.

³⁶ Cf. 1444:32.

and any other monastic prelacies should be conferred on those professed in their own orders and not on others.³⁷

15. Then, that a single seal be cut, on which there should be the sign of the cross, as the sign of the kingdom of Hungary,³⁸ and that seal be kept in the city of Buda so that plaintiffs may have letters of complaint under that seal and that justice may proceed suitably until the coronation of the king.

16. Then, that no regular or secular priest or cleric or layman of this kingdom may presume to harass or to summon to the Roman curia by way of a simple complaint in any case against any gentleman of the realm, but in the first instance the case should be brought to the court of his justice ordinary here in the kingdom, that is, before the bishop of that place in the diocese of which he resides, and from the bishop to the metropolitan.³⁹

17. Then, that all tolls and customs established both on land and water, instituted and acquired by anyone or in any kind of grant or commission since the time of the passing and death of the late lord King Albert of Hungary of good memory, must be abolished and canceled, and henceforth everyone should cease and desist, and is obliged and compelled to cease and desist from exacting them in any way under the said charges and penalties.⁴⁰

18. Then, that all merchants and traders, both native and alien or foreign, should be able to proceed freely, safely, peacefully, and securely to and from each and every place and city of the kingdom with their goods and merchandise without obstruction, harm, or damage from anyone of any rank, ³⁷ Mályusz pointed out (pp. 48–49) that through this measure the diet wished to assure the implementation of 1439:19, which aimed at abolishing Sigismund's practice of diverting ecclesiastical revenues for government expenditures. The diets did not object to the emperor-king's anti-Roman policies, but wished to restore the domestic position of the prelates; hence, the military "obligation" was, in fact, perceived of not as a burden on the churchmen, but rather as their right to field ecclesiastical banderia, and thus be equal to secular magnates.

³⁸ This was the only article of this decree that found its way into Werbőczy's Tripartitum (Pars II, tit. 14: 36) and the Corpus Iuris Hungarici. The cutting of a seal of the regnum, independent of king or regent was a significant symbolic act in the development of corporate political ideas. The design of the seal followed that of the seal cut by the council of barons in 1401, during Sigismund's captivity, of which several good impressions survived. The cross—actually the double cross—was regarded as the sign of the kingdom since the thirteenth century and featured also on the seal of the regnicolae, cut in 1386. See: Lajos Bernát Kumorowitz, "Die Entwicklung des ungarischen Mittel- und Großwappens," in Nouvelles études historiques publiées à l'occasion du XII^e Congrès International des Sciences Historiques (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1965) 2:319–56.

³⁹ Cf. 1440:4–6.

⁴⁰ Cf. 1444:22. The measures decreed here seem to have been interpreted in a rather extended manner; Mályusz (p. 543, n. 366) cites a case, where a nobleman suspends his grant for a market because of this paragraph. The charter of a meeting of several counties in Szina in July 1445 also includes all, even urban, tolls in the prohibition.

office, dignity, or condition, according to ancient custom, so long as they always pay their thirtieths and customs duties in the ancient and customary locations.⁴¹

19. Then, that anyone, of whatever condition and station he might be, who, after the issue of the call to the assembly of the prelates and barons recently gathered in Székesfehérvár, introduced and admitted to his fortifications and castles alien or foreign men of whatever language, and caused and committed plunderings, devastations, invasions, and robberies with them, or causes and commits these in the future, incurs a capital sentence and: the loss of all his goods, as well as the charge of perpetual infidelity, just as is contained in the said charter promulgated in Székesfehérvár, as was mentioned before.⁴²

20. Then, that any soldier or traveler should be able to buy supplies for himself and for his horses at a just price set by the decision of those selling. Otherwise, if he causes or permits the causing of violence in taking such supplies or any other goods, he shall be convicted immediately of an act of might, and a trial and administration of justice should be instituted against him at the complaint of the harmed party at the first occurring octave.⁴³

21. Then, that the prelates and barons of our kingdom, who by arrangement and ancient custom usually supply banderia at the time of a general levy,⁴⁴ must be prompt and prepared with their banderia at the time of such a levy, so that the other gentlemen of the realm might prepare and keep themselves more ready with diligent attention for campaigning.

22. Then, that any man of property is at all times obliged to dismiss his tenant peasants after a just payment of rent and of other just debts when they wish to leave for the estate of others under the penalty contained in the decree of the late lord Sigismund, emperor of the Romans, king of this kingdom of Hungary, etc., on this matter. And similarly they are required by the means and penalty contained in that decree to return tenants violently abducted.⁴⁵

⁴¹ Mályusz (p. 560) sees in this measure, suspending the commercial limitations of 30 May 1439:9, a minor victory for the urban delegates present at the diet. Actually, the deputies of royal cities were most active in the diets of the interregnum; their counsel was sought even at the election of the regent, see András Kubinyi “Zur Frage der Vertretung der Städte im ungarischen Reichstag bis 1526,” in: Idem, König und Volk im spätmittelalterlichen Ungarn (Herne: Schäfer 1998) pp. 65-102. -- The thirtieth (tricesima) was a customs duty on import and export that developed out of different types of urban and market tolls. The “usual places” are listed in 1498: 34. Exemption of minor items from the customs duty had not been previously decreed.

⁴² See above, n. 24.

⁴³ Cf. 30 May 1439:3, with reference to earlier legislation.

⁴⁴ Banderia, (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’) were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars)

⁴⁵ The right of tenant peasants (jobagiones, free men in seigneurial dependence) to move from owas guaranteed ever since the thirteenth century. In general, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary (A Sketchy Outline)” in Paul Freedman and Monique Bourin, eds. Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion. Turnholt: Brepols, 2005. (Medieval

23. Then, that the administration in the first occurring octave of law and justice concerning occupation of estates, killing of men, rape of virgins and honest matrons, and theft of written instruments in these times of troubles, as contained in the article above, must be understood so that final sentences have to be passed just as for new acts of might.⁴⁶

In order that all these things and any of the foregoing receive the required efficacy and force of validity and be observed effectively by each and every person, we the prelates, barons, nobles, lords, townsmen, and inhabitants of this said kingdom of Hungary singly and together universally promise by our Christian faith to observe inviolably and to cause to be observed with all our might, by means of the strength and testimony of these our letters, to which we have caused the seals of every one of us to be appended.⁴⁷

Given and enacted in the city of Pest on the second day of the feast of the Ascension of the Lord, which was the seventh day of May, in the year one thousand, four hundred and forty-five.

Texts and Cultures of Northern Europe 9), pp. 387–400.. Cf 1397:68 and 1405:14–16. This time the Judge Royal Ladislás of Pálóc ordered a special investigation of tenants hindered in their movement, see MNL OL DL. 13943 of 29 July 1446.

⁴⁶ See articles 2 and 11, above.

⁴⁷ This clause referred to a way of sealing as used on the decree of 1444, and must have been used on some of the now lost originals. By the time the surviving copies were issued, the new seal (1445:15) was ready and applied to the charter; however, the sealing clause was not corrected to match the actual situation, save on the one copy, now in Trenčín, which has sigillo universitatis regni Hungariae consignatarum at this place.

LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF

13 JUNE, 1446

This decree, passed in a diet that met in early June, 1446, consists of three parts: the first five articles contain the intention of the “Hunyadi-party” to elect John of Hunyad regent of the kingless country; the following nine articles define the limits of the regent’s power and jurisdiction; in a paragraph connecting the two (and also in the eschatocol) and then the elected regent accepts the office with the limitations imposed upon him. Actually, the “program” of Hunyadi’s adherents, as Elemér Mályusz, in “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 87) calls it, was apparently already circulated before the meeting (a copy of these articles survived as MNL OL DL. 55325). The final text was issued by the regent under his own seal.

The text of this decretum was transcribed verbatim into the decree of 1447; that version was also considered for the edition.

MSS.: One original, on parchment with pendant seal (missing), MNL OL DL. 13938; two transcripts in the text of 1447 and a copy of Artt. I–V separately (see above). For details, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 354.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search
--

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 253–61; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium incltyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818) 1:108–16; Henrik Marczali, A magyar történet kútfőinek kézikönyve. Enchiridion fontium historiae Hungarorum (Budapest: Athenaeum, 1901), pp. 260–65; DRH, pp. 354–59.

LIT.: Nándor Knauz, Az országos tanács és az országgyűlések története, 1445–1452 [History of the royal council and the diets between 1445 and 1452] (Pest: Eggenberger, 1859), pp. 40–46; Gyula Gábor, A kormányzói méltóság A magyar alkotmányjogban [The office of regent in Hungarian constitutional law] (Budapest : Athenaeum, n.d. [1932]), pp. 49–53; Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957) pp. 46–123, 529–602 here pp. 87–8, 113–4, 561; Joseph Held, Hunyadi: Legend and Reality (Boulder, Co.: East European Monographs, 1985) pp. 120–4.

13 JUNII 1446

Nos Johannes de Hwnyad pro illustrissimo infante Ladislao nato condam Alberti regis electo regni Hungarie gubernator generalis et waywoda Transsiluanus notum facimus presentium tenore quibus incumbit universis, quod cum universitate dominorum prelatorum, baronum et nobilium ac aliorum singulorum possessionatorum hominum huius regni Hungarie iuxta dispositionem et ordinationem eorundem nuper in civitate Albaregali factam in hanc presentem sollempnem congregationem amplissime coadunata eas res modosque, quibus divina gratia suffragante tot diebus totque annorum curiculis alternis insidiis et mutuis persecutionibus acerrime contra sese fine dato pacem reformare et caritativi sibiinvicem commorari possent, avidissime exquirere cepissent, tandem post multos habitos labores partibus ad tam salubre necessariumque opus non sine divine miserationis gratia inter se unitis pari consensu ad articulos infrascriptos observandos concordarunt. Quorum tenor verbalis hic est:

I. Primo, quod eligent et deputabunt unum gubernatorem.

II. Secundo, quod universi prelati, barones et quivis alii castra, castella, fortalitia, civitates, opida, possessiones et queque iura possessionaria, necnon episcopatus, abbatias, preposituras decimasque et quevis beneficia ac iura ecclesiastica per ipsos hiis guerrarum temporibus occupatas et usurpata remittent et, resignabunt. Civitates etiam, quas hactenus capitanei tenuissent, pristino earum statui, dispositioni, custodieque et conservationi earum proprie remittent, ipsique capitanei excipient manus et gentes ac familiares eorum de eisdem; quique ex huiusmodi occupatoribus. ac capitaneis in hac congregatione presentes forent, interim non redent de eadem, donec huiusmodi remissionem et resignationem efficient suo modo. Quodque universa castra, castella, fortalitia hiis disturbiorum temporibus erecta durante presenti congregatione diruantur et deleantur, demptis hiis, que in confinibus pro defensione regni sunt erecta et etiam, que in preterita Pestienſi congregatione certis personis indulta fuere et concessa, ac que universitas comitatuum, in quo eadem erecta sunt, pro sui defensione stare censuerit et voluerit; nec interim hii, qui huiusmodi fortalitia erexerunt vel pre manibus habent, qui scilicet hic presentes forent, recedent, donec eadem deponi facient et delere.

III. Tertio, quod omnes domini barones honores et officiatus eorum, quos habent, in presenti congregatione deponent, manibusque et dispositioni ac distributioni aliorum dominorum prelatorum, baronum et regnicolarum libere et sine contradictione committent et assignabunt.

IV. Quarto, quod universa alia, que in hac conventione pro pace, utilitate et comodo regni statuentur, concludentur et disponantur, firmiter observabunt in eisdemque persistent, ac eis obedient et parebunt.

V. Quinto, quod omnes tractatus, confederationes et vincula inter quoscumque prelatos, barones et regnicolas in alterutrum et, mutuo fide mediante vel aliter quomodocunque facte et ordinate, que scilicet utilitatem regni et reipublice impedirent, casse, annullate et inanes habeantur, et quod ipsi domini prelati et barones in omnibus pro utilitate regni regnicolis assistant et contra omnes statuta et ordinationes regni infringentes insurgent toto iuxta posse.

Quibus quidem articulis modo premissis inventis et confectis ad contentaque eorundem observanda singulis singulariter, tam scilicet maioribus, quam minoribus in forma ad hec ordinata iuratis unanimi et pari omnium voto et consensu nos licet inmeritos ad onus huiusmodi gubernationis elegerunt, idem humeris nostris imposuerunt exercendum. Cumque quamvis inviti iuramento tamen modo quo supra prestito astricti effugere non valentes iuxta vires nostras paratum serviendi animum obtulissemus, sicut ipsis dominis prelati et baronibus placuit, voluimus, ut limitatam habuissemus viam et modum, quibus et officium gubernationis huiusmodi et debitam eiusdem regni huius tuitionem exerceremus et etiam non excederemus modum, quo vel in minimo contra prefatum iuramentum laxasse manum cerneremur. Eapropter iidem domini prelati, barones et nobiles universi post maturam eorum superinde factam deliberationem articulos infrascriptos limitationem petitam in se continentes nobis presentarunt hanc seriem verbaliter continentes:

VI. Gubernator eligendus habebit tantam auctoritatem, quam haberet regia maiestas, dempto quod donationes perpetuales possessionum facere non possit ultra limitationem infrascriptam, nec etiam quempiam sine scitu consilioque et requisitione regnicolarum nota infidelitatis proscribere, nec etiam infidelibus ratione transgressionis statuti in presenti congregatione fiendi notam infidelitatis incurrentibus aliisque quibuscunque infidelibus similiter sine requisitione prelatorum, baronum et regnicolarum gratiam facere queat, sed nec archiepiscopatus, episcopatus et abbatias maiores absque scitu, voluntate, consensu et collaudatione consiliariorum suorum conferre valeat.

VII. Item gubernator manebit, ubicunque voluerit, in castris, civitatibus et opidibus regalibus aut reginalibus, omniaque castra, civitates, opida et queque tenuta regales aut reginales sibi, dum et quandocunque ac quotienscumque voluerit, liberum prestant ingressum; stabuntque cum eodem tempore celebrationis iudicii octavarum duo prelati ecclesiastici et alii duo barones seculares una cum palatino et iudice curie ac sex nobiles ad id deputandi. Medio autem tempore unus prelatus et unus baro et duo nobiles manebunt cum eodem, cum quibus querelas et necessitates audiet regnicolarum; quorumque consilio eisdem faciet relationem. Ultra autem hos consiliarios de prelati, baronibus, militibus et nobilibus huius regni incolis tot et tantos, quot et quanti sibi necessarii fore videbuntur, poterit penes se conservare consiliumque requirere ab eisdem.,

VIII. Item de proventibus regalibus, quibus ipse gubernator ac sui consilarii utantur, et de dispositione ipsis fienda committitur iudicio dominorum prelatorum et baronum, quibus de qualitate proventuum regalium plenior constat certitudo.

IX. Item gubernator ipse proficisci debet et exercituari, dum necesse fuerit, exigente magnitudine rei per se contra hostes.

X. Item ipse dominus gubernator hiis, qui fideliter sacre regni corone servierint, de illis possessionibus, que deinceps ad sacram coronam pure legitimeque sine cuiuspiam alterius iure per defectum. seminis, item propter delationem falsarum litterarum, propter cusionem falsarum monetarum et fabricationem falsi sigilli, necnon propter inductionem extranee potentie in hoc regnum ac positionem ignis in eodem fuerint devolute, in quibus scilicet possessionibus triginta. due sessiones et non plures fuerint vel fieri poterint, et etiam in quibus infra eundem numerum triginta duarum sessionum fuerint vel fieri poterint, facere valeat donationes. Si vero civitates, opida et possessiones ultra numerum prescriptarum triginta duarum sessionum etiam prescriptis modis ad sacram coronam fuerint devolute, illas partiiri seu dividere in triginta duas sessiones non valeat et sub nomine triginta duarum sessionum de illis facere cuiuspiam donationem, sed huiusmodi omnes civitates, opida et possessiones indivise ipsi sacre corone reserventur.

XI. Item dominus gubernator, si cui donationem premissio modo semel fecerit, amplius eidem donare non valeat. Et cum donationes, castrorum, civitatum, opidorum ac possessionum et similium ad ius regium dumtaxat spectare dinoscantur, igitur ipse dominus gubernator quibuscunque donationes premissio modo fecerit, illi tempore suo teneantur accedere ad dominum regem pro earum confirmatione obtinenda.

XII. Item possessiones illorum, quorum propter delationem falsarum litterarum aut cusionem falsarum monetarum vel alio quovis modo superius expressato ad coronam fuerint devolute, quousque per iudices suos competentes iudicialiter secundum antiquam et approbatam regni consuetudinem sententiati fuerint, occupare et donationem de eis facere non valeat quovismodo.

XIII. Item valeat in absentia consiliariorum facere relationem et expeditionem in occurrentibus causis, que si iudiciarie fuerint, et huiusmodi relatio inventa fuerit contra consuetudinarium, huiusmodi relatio et expeditio per iudices ordinarios regni valeat emendari, prout temporibus regum fieri consueverit.

XIV. Item ut si quid de proventibus regalibus ab expeditionibus regni remanserit, valeat dominus gubernator castra, civitates, opida et possessiones regias impignoratas nomine regio redimere de eisdem, et ea corone reappropriando domino regi reservare, quorum proventus similiter pro expeditione regni exponantur.

Nos igitur huiusmodi potestatis nostre gubernationis limitatione ab eisdem dominis prelati, baronibus et nobilibus regni modo premissio articulata recepta, iuxta eandem obtulimus eisdem omnem diligentiam, sollicitudinem et curam nostram, facereque et exercere officium gubernationis huiusmodi melius, ut possumus, atque sicut iuramento modo quo supra promisimus, limitationem et articulos suprascriptos in nullo excedere velle. In quorum testimonium presentes litteras nostras eisdem dominis prelati, baronibus et nobilibus regni universis sigillo nostro, quo ut waywoda Transsiluanensis utimur, inpendenti comunitas duximus concedendas. Datum in amplissima prelatorum, baronum et regnicolarum congregatione generali in campo Pestiensis celebrata, feria secunda infra octavas Penthecostes, qui fuit tredecima Junii, anno dornini millesimo quadringentesimo quadragésimo sexto.

JUNE 13, 1446

We, János Hunyadi, regent-general of the kingdom of Hungary and voivode of Transylvania, on behalf of the most illustrious heir-elect Ladislas, born of the late King Albert,¹ notify all to whom it may concern, by the contents of these presents, that when the community of lord prelates, barons, nobles, and other individuals who are property-owners of this kingdom of Hungary were all brought together into this present solemn assembly, according to the decisions and orders of the same men recently passed in the city of Székesfehérvár,² they had most avidly taken up the enquiry into the ways and means by which, with the assistance of divine grace, they might be able to restore peace and maintain charity among themselves, by ending so many days and so many cycles of years of attacks most bitterly prosecuted mutually against one another. Finally, after much labor at such salubrious and necessary work, not without the divine grace of compassion and united among themselves in common agreement, they agreed to observe the articles written below. The verbal form of these is this:

1. First, that they will elect and appoint a regent.
2. Second, that all prelates, barons, and others who seized and usurped castles, residences, fortifications, cities, towns, estates, and any property rights, and also bishoprics, abbacies, priories, tithes, and any benefices or ecclesiastical rights during these times of wars will hand these over and resign them.³ They will also return the cities, which the captains had held until now, to their former conditions, that is, to their own government, custody, and maintenance, and the captains will remove their troops, men, and retainers from them; any of these usurpers or captains who are present at this assembly must not leave it until they have carried out such a surrender and resignation.⁴ And that all castles, residences, and fortifications built during these times of troubles must be demolished and razed while the present assembly lasts, with the exception of those which were built on the borders for the defense of the kingdom, those granted and conceded to certain persons in the previous assembly at Pest,⁵ or those which the community of the counties in which they were built chooses and wishes to keep for their defense, and those who built or now hold

¹ See the introduction to 20 July 1440. Calling Ladislas a rex electus implied that at this time his 1440 coronation was not (yet) seen as valid.

² A diet was held in early spring 1446; its decrees, issued on 14 March survived only in a badly mutilated copy (see DRH, pp. 34952), which we omitted.

³ There are indeed several cases known from the months following this diet in which usurped rights and estates were returned to their legal owners (see the examples listed in DRH p. 355, n. II/1 and in Mályusz, p. 88, n. 177). Bónis (DRH, 355) assumed that the diet issued another decree about restitution as well, for in a reference in a sentence of the council of regency from 6 August 1446 the obligation of returning estates is more elaborate; see also Knauz, p. 53.

⁴ Cf. 1445:5.

⁵ Cf. 1445:4.

fortifications of this kind, namely, those of them who are present here, must not leave until they arrange that they be demolished and razed.⁶

3. Third, that all the lord barons should lay down their honors and offices, whatever they hold, and commit and assign them freely and without objection, in the present assembly into the hands of the other lord prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm for their decision and distribution.

4. Fourth, that in all respects they will firmly observe, adhere, and obey what will be decided, concluded, and ordered in this assembly for the peace, order, and advantage of the kingdom.

5. Fifth, that all treaties, confederations, and ties among any prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm on either side made and arranged in any way- by mutual oath or otherwise, namely those which might be against the interests of the kingdom, must be considered cancelled, annulled and void, and that the lord prelates and barons will assist the gentlemen of the realm in all things for the order of the kingdom and rise up with all their might against all those infringing the statutes and laws of the kingdom.

When these articles were devised and composed in the manner stated above, and when all in attendance, both those of greater as well as those of lesser rank, swore individually in the form prescribed for such matters,⁷ to observe the contents of these articles, they then, by unanimous vote and common agreement, elected us, although unmerited, to the burden of government and upon our shoulders the exercise of this burden.⁸ Since we, although unwilling, were bound by oath in the manner described above and unable to flee, have turned our soul, according to our strength, toward service, as it pleased the same lord prelates and barons, we wish to limit the ways and means by which we exercise this office of regency and the protection of this realm, and we shall not exceed the means nor shall we be deemed to have in the least relaxed our hand contrary to the aforesaid oath. Therefore, the same lord prelates, barons, and all the nobles after their mature ⁶ A letter of protection by Hunyadi for the family Rikolf of Tarkő (MNL OL DL. 68996, 68997 of 6 August 1447) suggests that many nobles were in fact forced to raze their illegal castles.

⁷ The text of this oath in the vernacular survived in the Codex Nádasdy and belongs to the stock of early Magyar vernacular official texts, ed. by Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 2:44. A literal English translation of the main formula is, in comparison to the elegant archaic language of the original, rather pedestrian: "God so help you, the Holy Virgin so win you mercy, God's all saints so support you, the holy body of God so may lead you to salvation at the moment of your death, the earth so received your corpse and so not eject it on the third day, your seed may so multiply, so you may see God's holy countenance on Judgment Day and avoid eternal hell " The oath formulated in the Pest diet became a point of reference in subsequent years, and was used, for example, in the treaty of alliance sworn between Hunyadi, Újlaki and Palatine Ladislas of Gara in 1450 (MNL OL DL. 14379).

⁸ The election took place on 5 June 1446. Apparently the first five articles were passed preceding this date, the rest after it deliberation hereon have presented to us the articles written below containing the limitation sought in them in the following words:

6. The regent to be elected will have such authority as the royal majesty would have, except that he should not be able to make perpetual grants of estates beyond the limitation written below, or to proscribe any man by the charge of infidelity without the knowledge, counsel, and request of the gentlemen of the realm, nor should he be able to grant pardon to those incurring the charge of infidelity by reason of transgression of a statute made in the present assembly or to any other infidels without the request of the prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm, and neither may he confer archbishoprics, bishoprics, and the greater abbacies without the knowledge, will, agreement, and approval of his councilors.

7. Then, the regent may stay wherever he wishes in castles, cities, and towns belonging to the king and queen, and all castles, cities, towns, and royal estates belonging to the king or the queen will offer him free entry while and whenever and as often as he wishes; and two ecclesiastical prelates and two other secular barons, together with the count palatine and the judge royal and six appointed nobles, should accompany him at the time of holding octavial court. At other times, one prelate, one baron, and two nobles should stay with him, with whom he will hear the complaints and cases of the people, and with whose counsel he will issue legal instruments.⁹ Over and above these councilors, he should have the right to keep with him and include in his council such and so many prelates, barons, knights, and nobles of this realm, which and as many he finds necessary.

8. Then, the decision regarding what part of the royal revenues the regent and his council should use and have assigned to them should be entrusted to those prelates and barons who have more definite knowledge of the nature of the royal revenues.

9. Then, the regent should himself set out and fight against enemies, if it appears necessary, according to the seriousness of the matter.

10. Then, the lord regent should be able to make grants to those who faithfully serve the Holy Crown of the kingdom from those estates which henceforth devolve to the Holy Crown clearly and legitimately owing to the lack of an heir, because of proffering false documents, minting counterfeit money or the making of false seals, or because of the introduction of a foreign power

⁹ This meant that the regent was not authorized to pronounce sentence in person, a royal prerogative, but only to hear the cases, and even in this judicial function he was to be assisted by a small council of four persons representing the estates. The charge of infidelity (nota infidelitatis) was made for specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property-- Artt. 10 and 12, below, list some of these) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis). That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate. Octavial courts were the sessions of the royal courts, usually four times a year beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days.

into this kingdom or committing arson, if no one has a right in them and these estates have and can have no more than thirty-two plots, and also those estates in which there are and can be less than the said number of thirty-two plots. If cities, towns, and estates with more than the said number of thirty-two plots also devolve to the Holy Crown in the foregoing manner, he should not be able to cut or divide them into portions of thirty-two plots and make grants from them under the heading of thirty-two plots, but all such cities, towns, and estates must be reserved undivided to the same Holy Crown.¹⁰

11. Then, the lord regent may not grant anything further to the same man whom he once granted something in the aforementioned manner. And, since grants of castles, cities, towns, estates, and similar possessions are known to belong to the royal right, the lord regent may make grants to anyone in the preceding manner, but they should come at the proper time to the lord king to receive confirmation of them.

12. Then, those estates which devolve to the crown because of their owners' proffering of false documents, minting of counterfeit money, or any other reason expressed above should not be seized and given away unless the accused have been judged at law by the appropriate judges according to ancient and approved custom of the kingdom.

13. Then, in the absence of the councilors he may issue reports and mandates in cases coming before him, but, if they are legal matters and such a report is found to be against customary law, then the report and the document may be amended by the justices ordinary of the kingdom, as was customary in the times of the kings.¹¹

14. Then, that if anything remains from the royal revenues after covering the expenses of the kingdom, the lord regent may redeem with it mortgaged royal castles, cities, towns, and estates and preserve them for the lord king to be re-appropriated to the crown, with their revenues being similarly utilized for the affairs of the kingdom.

We, therefore, having received this limitation on our power of regency from the lord prelates, barons, and nobles of the kingdom specified in the above manner, offer to them according to it our every diligence, solicitude, and care, and we promise to use and exercise the office of regent in this way as well as we are able, and as we have promised by our oath above, to wish. in no way to exceed the limitation and the articles above. In witness of which we found it proper to grant the lord prelates, barons, and nobles of the kingdom these presents completed by appending our seal, which we use as voivode of Transylvania. Given at the fullest general assembly of prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm held on the field of Pest, on the Monday within the octave of Pentecost, which was the thirteenth of June, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and forty-six.

¹⁰ It is noteworthy that several clauses of these articles, defining the new institution of regent, found their way into Werbőczy's Tripartitum (Pars II, tit. 14). Note also that customary law is regarded as overriding certain legal decisions, for this, see Martyn Rady, The Customary Law in Hungary: Court, Texts, and the Tripartitum (Oxford: OUP, 2015).

¹¹ The procedures referred to here are instruction (relatio) and the issuing (expeditio) of judicial mandates, written by the chancellor on the basis of the parties' statements at law.

LAW OF THE DIET OF HUNGARY OF 25 MARCH, 1447

As the proem of this decree describes, the estates had postponed the detailed regulation of government under the regency from the election diet of 1446 to one planned for Whitsun 1447. However, the diet met already in the spring and passed a fairly inclusive decree on 25 March. By transcribing the decree of 1447, expressly confirming the validity of decisions from the preceding diets, and including a number of long-term measures (such as fees for records, and so on), the nobility seems to have aimed at a general codification of its newly-acquired powers. This decree may, therefore, count as one of the earliest elaborate statements about corporate government (Ständestaat) in fifteenth-century Hungary. Many articles aim at reducing the power of the magnates, some limit clerical jurisdictions, and a few intend to curtail burgher liberties, thus, clearly expressing the political priorities of the county nobility.

MSS.: One original (MNL OL DL. 80877), from the Zichy family archives, on parchment, the pendant seal (originally on a simple cue) is now lost; one transcript by the collegiate chapter of Pozsony/Pressburg from 18 May 1447 (MNL OL DL. 14071).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), 2: 52–102; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818), 1: 116–35; Imre Nagy III et al., eds., Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeö (Budapest: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1895) [henceforth: Cod. dipl. Zichy] 9:155–59; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 361–73.

LIT.: Nándor Knauz, Az országos tanács és az országgyűlések története, 1445–1452 [History of the royal council and the diets between 1445 and 1452] (Pest: Eggenberger, 1859), pp. 57– 66; Gyula Gábor, A kormányzói méltóság a magyar alkotmányjogban [The office of regent in Hungarian constitutional law] (Budapest : Athenaeum, n.d. [1932]), pp. 54– 57; Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 89–90, 114.

Prelati, barones, nobiles et procures regni Hungarie universi ad futuram rei memoriam. Quoniam in novissima nostra Pestiensis congregatione generali circa festum Penthecostes proxime elapsam celebrata certos articulos, qui tunc magis necessarii et utiliores conductioni pacis fore videbantur, in formam decreti sub nostre universitatis et magnifici domini Johannis de Hwnyad gubernatoris sigillis redigi feceramus, alios vero certis ex causis suspendendo prorogamus, ut maior circa illos et maturior fieret circumspectionis ruminatio; nunc itaque divino nutu tam super prescriptis prioribus articulis decretatis, quam etiam modernis in hac nostra conventionem uno voto et voluntate convenimus et concordavimus, illosque articulos, tam scilicet prius decretatos, quam nunc moderatos in unum redigi et ordinari volumus et volumus articulatum. Quorum quidem prius decretatorum articulorum primus is est, quoci universi prelati ..

Aliorum vero articulorum in hac nostra conventionem moderatorum et concordatorum primus articulus talis est:

I. Quod gubernator proventus regales percipiet et pro utilitate regni fideliter dispenset.

II Item si gubernator de celebranda congregatione generali per aliquem comitatum requisitus fuerit, potestatem habebit huiusmodi congregationes generales celebrari facere per palatinum.

III. Item iuxta dispositionem in priori Pestiensis congregatione nostra factam omnes cause super actibus potentiariis in disturbiali tempore patratas ad tempus coronationis regis suspendantur, demptis hiis, que emeruerunt post congregationem certorum prelatorum et baronum anno tertio circa festum beate Dorothee virginis in Alba factam inter homines utriusque partis commissi, super quibus actibus potentiariis iustitia expeti poterit et ministrari.

IV Item honores comitatuum parochialium perpetualiter in antea non conferantur.

V. Item nemo prelatorum, baronum et regnicularum forenses et extraneos ad sua castra, fortalitias et tenutas in offensam quorumcunque inducere debeat sub pena infidelitatis.

VI. Item nullus prelatorum vel quorumcunque hominum beneficia ecclesiastica et honores hominibus extraneis conferat, sed incolis huius regni tantum.

VII. Item nullus baronum et regnicularum fures, latrones, spoliatores aut quoscunque notorios malefactores apud se aut in suis castris, castellis, possessionibus et tenutis teneat aut conservet, alioquin nobiles comitatus illius, in quo huiusmodi malefactores per quempiam conservari reperti fuerint, universaliter in loco sedis iudicarie congregati huiusmodi malefactores vel malefactorem esse promulgaverint et pronuntiaverint, litterasque eorum superinde sub sigillis comitis vel vicecomitis et iudicum nobilium emanari fecerint, mox gubernator vel ille, qui per universitatem nobilium ad id requisitus fuerit, universas possessiones huiusmodi malefactoris vel malefactorum conservatoris occupandi et tamdiu conservandi habeat facultatem, donec idem gratiam pro se poterit impetrare. Si autem malefactor ipse nobilis fuerit et possessionatus, per universitatem nobilium eiusdem comitatus modo prehabito promulgatus et proscriptus, similiter omnibus suis iuribus possessionariis usque ad gratiam impetrandam privetur per gubernatorem vel alium per universitatem nobilium addeputandum.

Ipsum autem malefactorem, sive sit nobilius, sive ignobilis, universi cuiusvis status et conditionis homines spoliandi resque et bona eiusdem auferendi tamquam proscripti hominis liberam habeant potestatem, nec unquam propter hoc iudicio debeant conveniri.

VIII. Item neque dominus gubernator, neque bani exercitum generalem promulgare debeant, nisi cum tanta et tam magna inimicorum multitudo supervenerit, ad cuius resistantiam ipse gubernator de proventibus regalibus ac banderia prelatorum et baronum ac cetera dispositiones et stipendia a viris ecclesiasticis more consueto debentia non sufficerent. Alias autem idem gubernator de proventibus regalibus ac banderiis prelatorum et baronum et ceteris dispositionibus exercituare teneatur. Nobiles etiam in exercitu generali non ulterius, nisi usque ad confinia regni vel metas transire teneantur more ab antiquo consueto.

IX. Item persone laycales contra personas ecclesiasticas in facto potentie vel calumpnie convicte non debeant pro ipso facto potentie vel calumpnie in pena vel sententia capitali ac amissione possessionum et bonorum aggravari, sed solummodo in eorum homagiis, quemadmodum ipse persone ecclesiastice contra seculares convinci solent. Damnum tamen illatum ultra id debet refundi effective.

X. Item si aliquis regnicolarum contra dominum gubernatorem aut totum regnum in aliquo insurgeret, extunc ipse gubernator contra talem exercitum generalem aut tot comitatus, quot sibi sufficere videbuntur, insurgere faciet et promulgabit.

XI. Item constitutio capitaneatum in congregatione priori Pestiensi facta est abolita.

XII. Item littere annuales ecclesiis et viris ecclesiasticis ulterius non dentur.

XIII. Item si littere et litteralia instrumenta alicuius per Turcos, Bohemos, Thewtunicos vel quoscunque alios hiis disturbiorum temporibus combuste vel ablata forent, et id cum vicinis et commetaneis suis ac nobilibus sui comitatus declarare posset, extunc talis suis iuribus possessionariis, in quorum dominio existeret vel tunc extitisset, non privetur, nisi si quis aliqua causa rationabili posset iuridice obtinere.

XIV. Item quod quatuor octave continue celebrentur et nulla alia de causa prorogentur, nisi ratione exercitus generalis, nec etiam cuiuscunque cause propter conservationem castrorum aut confinium regni seu custodiam eorundem valeant prorogari.

XV. Item quicunque hominum ulterius interemptions, vulnerationes, mutilationes, combustiones litterarum et ablationes earundem, invasiones domorum seu alia similia notabilia mala perpetraverint, aut post decretum Pestiense in anno proxime transacto editum perpetrassent, tales mediante litteris nostris aut domini gubernatoris vel palatinalibus seu iudicis curie regie ad primas octavas cum insinuatione evocentur, in quibus sine omni dilatione iudicium inter partes ministretur.

XVI. Item quod statuta tam in Pestiensi predicta, quam Albensi civitatibus edita in suis vigoribus permaneant, demptis hiis, que per modernas constitutiones immutabuntur.

XVII. Item nullus omnino prelatorum, baronum et regnicolarum pro quibuscunque debitis vel factis arrestationes seu vagationes facere debeat, qui si fecerint et ex huiusmodi vagia recipientibus quipiam interempti, lesi vel dampnificati fuerint, tales tanquam latrones censeantur, et nec propter hoc per quempiam iudicum iudicialiter valeant condemnari.

XVIII. Item domus dominorum prelatorum et baronum ac nobilium et ecclesiarum in civitate Budensi habite dicari non debeant, sed hospites in eisdem domibus existentes iuxta eorum facultatem dicari possunt.

XIX. Item comites vel vicecomites nunquam aliquod vagium vel birsagium sine iudicibus nobilium per universitatem nobilium transmissis exigere possint. Qui si sine eisdem exigere voluerint, lesionem, interemptionem vel damnificationem et iniuriam, si quam ibidem passi fuerint, sufferant, nec unquam iudicio lesorem superinde valeant convenire.

XX. Item comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium birsagia non exigant, nisi in congregatione generali, nec etiam alibi extra sedem eorum iudiciariam iudicium facere possint, sed nec nobiles sui comitatus vel jobagiones ipsorum eisdem comiti vel vicecomiti victualia dare teneantur.

XXI. Item omnia theolonia post obitum imperatoris facta et indulta aboleantur, sed et alia theolonia, que propter conservationem pontium fieri concessa sunt, si huiusmodi pontes bene non conservantur, similiter aboleantur. Insuper ut a clericis et ecclesiasticis viris ac peregrinis, necnon rebus et victualibus nobilium, que non mercandi causa deferuntur, nullum penitus tributum exigatur.

XXII. Item si dominus alicuius tributi de eo, que sint false vie sui tributi, literatorie docere non poterit, extunc illud discernendum committitur iudicibus nobilium illius comitatus, in quo ipsum tributum existit.

XXIII. Item lucrum camere non prius, quam tempore ab antiquo solito dicari debeat, et cum moneta currenti exigatur, nullusque cogatur cum florenis auri facere eiusdem solutionem.

XXIV. Item comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium aliique omnes iudices pro qualibet marca birsagiali centum denarios recipere teneantur.

XXV. Item in capitulis et conventibus redemptiones litterarum solvantur et recipiantur iuxta dispositionem in decreto condam Sigismundi imperatoris expressam, et similiter solutiones viarum testimoniis capitularibus vel conventualibus fiende fiant iuxta eandem dispositionem, videlicet [= 8 Martii 1435: X].

Capitula autem et conventus in premissis contrarium facientes per regiam maiestatem aut gubernatorem consiliariosque deputatos priventur eo facto, nec unquam huiusmodi loca valeant sigillum habere ultra.

XXVI. Item nobiles vel ignobiles, qui ulterius castra, fortalitia seu domos dominorum suorum quomodocunque alteri tradiderint, infideles habeantur, idemque dominus, cuius sic castrum traditum fuerit, huiusmodi traditorem ubicunque capiendi habeat potestatem.

XXVII. Item si dominum regem quocunque tempore decedere contingat, extunc domini prelati et barones in electione novi regis inter se dispares esse non debent, sed de singulis comitatibus certos nobiles convocari facientes cum eisdem unanimiter faciant electionem.

XXVIII. Item quod singulis annis ad festum Penthecostes omnes prelati, barones, magnates et nobiles regni, demptis nobilibus nullum jobagionem aut minus quam viginti jobagiones habentibus, in eodemque loco et die gubernator ipse officium sue gubernationis ceterique barones et consiliarii honores et officia ipsorum deponant tractentque ibidem utiliter de factis regni.

XXIX. Item quod omnes fassiones per quoscunque in captivitate vel aliter invite et coacte facte similiter cum litteris superinde confectis casse habeantur.

XXX. Item de litteris statutoriis resignatarum possessionum vel castrorum seu quorumcunque iurium possessionariorum hiis disturbiorum temporibus occupatorum capitulum vel conventus non plus quam unum florenum auri recipiat vel valorem floreni.

XXXI. Item si quis castra aut castella seu possessiones etc. resignatas iterum occuparet, penam infidelitatis incurrat et per suum iudicem superinde sententietur.

XXXII. Item cum partialitas sit mater discordie et guerrarum, ob hoc statuimus, ut nullus ex regnicolis nostris, cuiuscunque status existat, pro questu principis, cum principem pari voluntate electum habeamus, directe vel indirecte, palam vel occulte aliquibus forensibus principibus seu aliis cuiusvis status hominibus preter voluntatem communitatis regnicolarum de medio eorundem se excipiendo adherere et partialitatem in hoc regno praticare seu facere quoquomodo presumat. Qui si, quod absit, presumpserit contra communitatem, nota perpetue infidelitatis eo ipso sit aggravatus, cui nec rex, nec gubernator preter scitum et voluntatem ipsius communitatis gratiam facere valeat atque possit.

XXXIII. Item quanta mala et discordie ex provisionibus ecclesiarum katedralium collegiatarumque et aliarum dignitatum et beneficiorum ecclesiasticorum per sedem apostolicam preter presentationem nostram factis in hoc regno exorta fuerunt et sunt, peroptime claret. Proinde statuimus, ut nullus omnino clericorum seu religiosorum virorum absque presentatione et nominatione regis vel nostra aliquam ecclesiam katedrali vel quodcunque beneficium ecclesiasticum sibi per sedem apostolicam conferri et se in eisdem confirmari facere, ac etiam aliquem regnicolarum ad curiam Romanam seu extra hoc regnum, nisi per viam appellationis citare audeat. Quoquomodo contrarium facientes infideles et exules regni habeantur.

XXXIV. Item gubernator nulli sententionato aut proscripito seu alicui malefactori gratiam facere valeat, nisi prefixo termino in talibus consueto leso et parti adverse satisfactio impendatur. Quibus quidem sententiatis et aliis pretactis nullus hospitalitatem teneat aut eos defendat quoquomodo; qui si fecerint, similem notam maleficii incurrant eo facto.

XXXV. Item quia hactenus propter frequentem variationem et depravationem monetarum in exactione decimarum diverse controversie fieri consueverunt, ideo gratia removendi huiusmodi controversiarum statuimus, ut deinceps omnes decime tam vinorum, quam bladorum, que usque modo in pecunia secundum consuetudinem dyocesium uniuscuiusque archiepiscopatus et episcopatus solvi consueverunt, de rebus ipsis in specie eisdem dominis prelati et hiis, quibus huiusmodi decime de iure vel consuetudine debentur, exsolvantur, videlicet quod de frugibus et bladis in campo in capetiis et manipulis congregatis sine fraude ac dampno aliquali in ipsis capetiis et manipulis decime ipse persolvantur. Pecora autem et cetera animalia per villanos vel alios quoscunque ad loca agrorum, in quibus huiusmodi decime iacuerint, infra tempus consuetum uniuscuiusque ville hactenus in talibus observatum nullatenus admittantur, alioquin hii, quibus huiusmodi dampna fuerint irrogata, eadem valeant iure mediante recuperare. Et cum plures esse perhibeantur dyoceses, in quibus hactenus de pullis et ceteris animalibus, necnon rebus decime solvi fuerunt consuete in eadem rebus, igitur decrevimus, ut deinceps in illis dyocesibus et locis de prescriptis rebus in specie decime ipse persolvantur.

XXXVI. Item nobiles tam jobagiones habentes, quam non habentes decimas et lucrum camere solvere non teneantur, prout ab antiquo fuit observatum.

XXXVII. Item cusio monete reduci debeat, ad priorem statum, prout decretatum et ordinatum per nos fuerat in novissima nostra congregatione Pestiensi, ita quod singuli ducenti denarii unum florenum auri valeant et representent, cuius scilicet monete tertia pars argentum existat, que nunquam immutari possit, nisi cum consensu totius communitatis; nullaue alia moneta intra ambitum regni cudi et etiam cursum habere possit, quam tum lucrum camere, quam etiam alii proventus ab antiquo in moneta parva solvi consueti solvantur. Ad cuius quidem monete cusionem et intentamenta prudentes et experti ac fideles homines de civitatibus per totam communitatem regnicolarum eligi et deputari debeant, qui favore vel timore seu aliqua ambitiositate quorumcunque magnatum et potentum huiusmodi monetam vilificare, depravare et immutare nullatenus presumant. De quibus tempore suo tota communitas regnicolarum, vel hii, quos ipsa communitas ad id deputaverit, rationem recipere valeant atque possint. Ubi autem ipsi, qui ad huiusmodi cusionem monete fuerint deputati, contra premissa seu aliquod premissorum fecerint, extunc pena alias in talibus consueta irremissibiliter plectantur.

XXXVIII. Item nullus archiepiscoporum et episcoporum vel eorum vicariorum de iudicio seculari se intromittat, sed solum, quod ad forum ipsorum ecclesiasticorum spectat, contractet.

XXXIX. Item gubernator ecclesias vacantes tempore debito cum consiliariis deputatis personis ydoneis iuxta traditam sibi potestatem conferat, ne eedem per longam vacationem ad irrecoverabile dampnum incidant et ruinam, et neque ipsas ecclesias vacantes per manus laycales faciat occupare, possessionesque et bona earundem detinere. Volumus autem, ut ecclesias religiosorum virorum vacantes et vacaturas ydoneis et religiosis viris habitum illius ordinis habentibus, cuius ipse ecclesie vacantes et vacature existunt seu extiterint, conferat atque donet.

XL. Item in exercituali progressu spoliationes, rapine et exactiones victualium ac iniuste verberationes hominum non committantur. Nam si per quempiam huiusmodi spoliationes, rapine et verberationes hominum fuerint perpetratae, fiat contra eos evocatio cum insinuatione, quarum veritate comperta in primis octavis tales in facto potentie convincantur. Exactores vero victualium tam exercituando, quam etiam alias quocunque proficiscendo, cuiuscunque status et preeminentie existant, similiter evocentur cum insinuatione; quorum veritate comperta tales condemnentur ad valorem victualium ablatorum ac expensas in prosecutione huiusmodi cause per actorem factas cum solius iuramento recipiendas.

XLI. Item potentes vel magnates tam in progressu exercituali, quam alias per regnum hincinde peragantes in domibus nobilium sive locupletum aut pauperum non descendant.

In quorum omnium et singulorum premissorum robur atque testimonium presentes litteras sigillo nostre universitatis fecimus communiri. Datum Bude, in festo Annunciationis virginis gloriose, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quadragésimo septimo.

MARCH 25, 1447

All the prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of the kingdom of Hungary, so that this matter may be remembered in the future. In our last general assembly at Pest, around the past feast of Pentecost,¹ we caused certain articles, which now seem to be even more necessary and useful for the maintenance of peace, to be set out in the form of a decree under the seals of our community and of the excellent lord regent János Hunyadi, while we postponed certain others for definite reasons, namely, that; there might be greater and more mature consideration applied to them. Now, therefore, by divine guidance we have met and agreed with one voice and one will to both the previously written and agreed upon articles as well as the ones now adopted in our assembly, and we wished and do wish to collect in one place and ordain point by point these articles, that is, the previously decreed and the now adopted ones.

Of the articles previously decreed, this is the first. ...²

The first article of the others adopted and agreed upon in our assembly is this:

1. That the regent should collect the royal revenues and dispense them faithfully for the needs of the realm.
2. Then, if the regent is requested by any county to hold a general assembly, he will have the right to have the palatine call such general assemblies.
3. Then, according to the decision made in our previous assembly at Pest, all cases concerning acts of act of might committed in the times of troubles should be suspended until the time of the coronation of the king,³ save those committed by men of either party after the assembly of certain prelates and barons held in Székesfehérvár three years ago around the feast of St. Dorothy the Virgin;⁴ for these acts of act of might justice may be sought and administered.
4. Then, the honor of county ispán may, henceforth, not be conferred perpetually.⁵

¹ 13 June 1446

² Here follows a verbatim transcript of 1446: 2–14, without, of course, the inserted declaration of elected regent (after art. 5); also, expressions referring to the election in the future tense were changed to past.

³ Cf. 1445:3. The formulation suggests that the child-coronation of Ladislas in 1440 was at that time still not accepted as valid.

⁴ The meeting was held on 8 February 1445, in preparation of the diet of that year; summary proceedings were ordered against perpetrators of acts of might in 1445:12.

⁵ While a few prelates acquired the position of “perpetual ispán” of the county of their see as early as Árpáadian times, the honors (barons entrusted with the ispán’s office in one or more counties) of secular lords usually remained limited to the “king’s pleasure.” However, some of them were held, at least in practice, by magnate families. The ispán of Varazdin was appointed, for example, by the counts of Cille who were perpetual lords of the town.

5. Then, none of the prelates, barons, or gentlemen of the realm is permitted to bring in foreigners and aliens to his castles, fortifications, and holdings in order to attack anyone, under penalty of infidelity.⁶

6. Then, no prelate or any other person may confer ecclesiastical benefices and honors on foreigners, but only on inhabitants of this kingdom.⁷

7. Then, no baron or gentleman of the realm may keep with him or protect in his castles, residences, estates, and holdings thieves, robbers, plunderers, or any notorious criminals; otherwise the community of the nobles of that county in which such criminals have been found to be protected by anyone, assembled at the county's court, will denounce and declare him or them as a criminal or criminals and will issue a letter to be sent out under the seals of the ispán or the alispán and the noble magistrates. Whereupon the regent or someone who will have been requested for that task by the community of nobles will have the power of occupying all the estates of such a protector of a criminal or criminals and of keeping them until such time as he is able to ask for mercy for himself. If, however, the criminal denounced and proscribed in the said manner by the community of nobles in the same county is himself a noble and a man of property, he must similarly be deprived of all his estates by the regent or by someone else appointed to that task by the community of nobles until he asks for mercy. However, regarding the criminal himself, whether he is a noble or not, anyone of any station and condition should have the freedom to plunder his possessions and take his goods as those of a proscribed man, without ever being summoned to judgment for that.

8. Then, neither the lord regent nor the bans ought to raise a general levy, unless so many and such a great multitude of enemies invade, that the forces of regent himself from the royal revenues, with the banderia of the prelates and barons and other income and pay usually due from ecclesiastical persons are not sufficient to resist them. Otherwise the regent is required to campaign from the royal revenues, with the banderia of the prelates and barons and from other military revenues.

⁶ Cf. 1445:9. The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate..

⁷ This demand of the nobles has been repeatedly expressed ever since King Sigismund's times (see, e.g., 1397:48) and was also codified in 1445:14.

Nobles, however, have to proceed with a general levy only to the borders of the realm and not farther, according to ancient custom.⁸

9. Then, laymen convicted of act of might or frivolous prosecution⁹ against ecclesiastics must not be sentenced to a capital penalty or sentence or the loss of estates and goods for that crime of violence or frivolous prosecution, but only to the payment of their composition,¹⁰ just as clergy themselves are customarily convicted in suits against laymen. However, the damage caused must be completely compensated for.

10. Then, if any gentleman of the realm rises up against the lord regent or the whole kingdom in any matter, then the regent will raise and call against the usurper a general levy or a levy from as many counties as he deems sufficient.

11. Then, the institution of captaincies established at the previous assembly at Pest is abolished.¹¹

⁸ The restriction of the noble levy goes back as far as 1222:7. The major armed force of the country consisted, since the fourteenth century at the latest, of the troops fielded by the king, queen, barons, and prelates, called banderia (Ital bandiera=flag). Nevertheless, the less professional noble levy was also frequently mobilized, in which theoretically all noblemen were to serve under the command of the county ispán. For details, see Propositions 1432/3.

⁹ Calumnia meant in medieval Hungaro-Latin not the Classical notion of libel, but “frivolous prosecution,” unfounded and vexatious litigation (Hung. patvarkodás). Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price (see composition). The term also included astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney, or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice. Potentia, factum/actum potentiae; “act of might,” was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, “criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between “major” and “minor” acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, and the killing or assaulting of one. Lesser violent acts were classified as “minor,” but no decree specified the precise nature of these crimes.

¹⁰ On capital punishment see n. 6, above.. Cf. 1439: 38. Composition (compositio), or man price (homagium) was a sum of money, which was owed by a person (or his kindred) who had killed, maimed, or otherwise harmed a man or woman, paid to the kindred (or family) of the victim. This system, widespread among Germanic peoples of the post-migration age, aimed at replacing the extended blood feuds arising from the obligation of revenge but continued in Hungarian law until early modern times. The amount paid (the wergeld) was based on the victim’s or the culprit’s social and legal status and the nature of the crime. According to the Tripartitum., the man price of barons was 100, and of nobles and burghers 50 marks. Composition and homagium became blurred in practice with the fine of the head and to the “fine of the tongue.” There are examples for the application of this measure, e.g., in a charter of Judge Royal Ladislás of Pálóc of 28 November 1453, see: MNL OL DL. 14754..

¹¹ See 1445:5

12. Then, annual letters¹² for churches and ecclesiastics may no longer be given.

13. Then, if the charters and written instruments of anyone are burnt or taken by Turks, Czechs, Germans, or by any others in these times of troubles, and he is able to prove this with his neighbors, abutters, and the nobles of his county, then such a man must not be deprived of the property rights which he holds and has held, unless someone else is able to obtain them through reasonable cause by law.

14. Then, that the four octaves¹³ should be held without interruption and may be delayed for no other reason than that of a general levy, nor is the proroguing of cases of anyone permitted because of the guarding of castles or the borders of the realm.

15. Then, whoever commits or did commit killings, woundings, mutilations, burning and theft of charters, invasions of houses or other similar major crimes, after the publication of the decree enacted at Pest in the previous year must be cited by terminal summons¹⁴ by way of our letter or that of the lord regent or of the palatine or of the judge royal to the first octave, at which session a judgment must be handed down to the parties without delay.

16. Then, that both the aforesaid statutes issued in Pest and those of Székesfehérvár¹⁵ should remain valid, except for those which will be changed by new constitutions.

17. Then, no prelates, barons, or gentlemen of the realm at all are permitted to make arrests or take pledges for any debt or deed, and if they do this and are killed or maimed or harmed by anyone

¹² These litterae annuales were special royal permissions allowing the grantee to call on the services of any place of authentication for a year, without having to seek a royal mandate every time. Such annual letters were granted to ecclesiastical bodies ever since the mid-fourteenth century; see Georgius Fejer, Codex diplomaticus Hungariae ecclesiasticus ac civilis, 11 vols. in 43 pts., (Budapest: Regia Universitas, 1829–66), 8/2:612–15, 9/1:208, 9/3:573 from 1344 and 1366. The measures seeking their abolition do not seem to have been successful, for the practice is included in the Tripartitum (Pars II, tit. 50) as still existing in the sixteenth century.

¹³ Octavial courts was the term for the session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days.. Evidence suggests that during the interregnum octavial court sessions were not held regularly

¹⁴ The reference is to the decree of 1446. Terminal summons was issued after three or more previous personal citations, with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party (used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might). The regent and his council issued many mandates and passed capital judgment against violent offenders in the years 1447–48 on the basis of this decree (see DRH p. 364, n. XV/3). However, charters from 1449 ff. seem to refer to another, now lost, decree on the same matter; see ibid.

¹⁵ The statutes referred to are 1446 and another dietal decree, which survived only in fragments, from (March) 1446 (see DRH, pp. 349–52).

during such a pledge-taking, they should be treated as robbers, and nobody should be legally condemned for that¹⁶ by any judge.

18. Then, the houses of the lord prelates, barons, nobles, and churches in the city of Buda must not be assessed for portal tax, but burghers living in these houses can be assessed according to their means.

19. Then, ispáns and alispáns should never exact any pledges or fines without the presence of noble magistrates delegated by the community of nobles. If they attempt to do so without these officers, let them suffer the injury, death, loss, or damage that they have sustained while doing so, nor should the person injuring them be ever prosecuted by judgment for it.

20. Then, ispáns, alispáns, and magistrates may not exact fines except in a general assembly¹⁷ nor conduct a trial anywhere away from their court of law. The nobles of their county or their tenants are not required to give victuals to the ispán or alispán.

21. Then, all tolls established and tolerated after the death of the emperor are abolished; and other tolls which were permitted to be levied for the maintenance of bridges are similarly abolished if those bridges are not well maintained. Furthermore, no toll at all can be demanded from clerics, ecclesiastical men, or pilgrims, nor on the goods and victuals of nobles which are not carried for the sake of selling.¹⁸

22. Then, if the owner of any toll is unable to give written proof of the existence of illegal roads circumventing his toll, then the matter must be submitted for decision to the noble magistrates of the county in which the toll is located.

23. Then, the chamber's profit may not be assessed any earlier than the time when it is usual as of old and should be paid in the usual currency; no one may be compelled to make payment of it in golden florins.¹⁹

¹⁶ See the earlier prohibitions of violent extraction of pledges: 31 August 1405:2, 5; 8 March 1435:4; 1439:29 and 1445:11.

¹⁷ See the regulation for collecting fines in (1320). Noble magistrates (szolgabíró), usually four in every county, became the assistants of the ispáns and at the same time representatives of the noble county ever since the late thirteenth century.

¹⁸ This article is the renewal of 1444:22, 1445:17, 8 March 1435:21, Comp. ante 1440:17, and 1379:40.

¹⁹ The chamber's profit was a direct tax, introduced in the thirteenth century, replacing the income from minting ever less valuable coins. The only "legal" regulation concerning the time of paying the chamber's profit was in the cameral contracts of the fourteenth century, where it is prescribed that the tax must be paid 15 days after its assessment, see. 1342. The stipulation of not levying taxes except in the current coinage was frequently decreed, but in the 1410s it seems to have been a practice to demand the tithe in gold florins; see Elemér Mályusz, Kaiser Sigismund in Ungarn 1386-1437. Transl. by A. Szmodits (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1990), pp. 246–48.

24. Then, ispáns or alispáns and magistrates and all other judges are required to accept one hundred pennies for a mark of fine.²⁰

25. Then, fees for letters may be paid and received in chapters and convents according to the disposition expressed in the decree of the late emperor Sigismund, and similarly payments for expenses of witnesses of chapters and convents may be made according to that ordinance, namely. . . (= 8 March 1435: 10).

Chapters and convents acting contrary to the aforesaid are to be immediately deprived of their seals by the royal majesty or the regent and his appointed councilors, nor may such places ever have a seal again.

26. Then, nobles or non-nobles who in future surrender castles, fortifications, or houses of their lords to another in any way at all must be considered traitors, and that lord whose castle was thus surrendered will have the power of capturing the traitor anywhere.

27. Then, if it should happen that the lord king dies at any time, then the lord prelates and barons must not be divided among themselves in the election of a new king, but by summoning specific nobles from every county should hold a unanimous election with them.²¹

28. Then, that every year at the feast of Pentecost, all prelates, barons, magnates, and nobles of the kingdom, except those nobles who have no tenant or fewer than twenty tenants, at the same place and day at which the regent himself must surrender the office of his regency and the rest of the barons and councilors their honors and offices,²² shall have useful discussion about the affairs of the kingdom.

29. Then, that all declarations made by anyone in captivity or otherwise involuntarily or by coercion should be held void and so should any charter issued on the matter.

30. Then, a chapter or convent may not take more than one gold florin or the value of a florin for a letter of institution²³ regarding estates or castles or any other property rights surrendered after they had been occupied in these times of troubles.

²⁰ Considering the exchange rate defined in art. 37, below, this measure made a “mark of fines” equal to a half florin, while the silver mark usually had the value of four florins.

²¹ While the decree of 1440 (and the dietal decision preceding it) stated that the power of the crown rested in the will of the estates, there was no previous law about the nobility’s right to participate, by delegates, in the “election” of a king. This article set the stage for the mass participation of nobles in the election of Matthias Hunyadi (Corvinus) in 1458.

²² Cf. 1446:3; this formulation puts in writing a practice, which must have been observed for some time, namely, that the poor nobles did not attend the diets. Regent Hunyadi referred to this article in his call for a diet on 12 April 1448; see Cod. dipl. Zichy, 9: 184.

²³ Letters of introduction or institution were documents issued by a place of authentication (a chapter of convent serving in lieu of notaries) about the procedure in which the royal or palatinal bailiff (frequently a nobleman selected by the owner), accompanied by a witness of the chapter formally introduced the new owner into a property.

31. Then, if anyone reoccupies castles, residence, estates, and the like, which have been surrendered, he will incur the penalty of treason and will be sentenced for this by his own judge.

32. Then, since inequity is the mother of discord and wars, therefore we have ordered that no one from our subjects, of whatever station he might be, may presume in any way, in search for a prince—since we have a prince elected by common agreement—directly or indirectly, openly or secretly, to adhere to any foreign prince or anyone of any estate against the will of the community of the gentlemen of the realm in order to stir up or foster inequity in this kingdom. He who, God forbid, would act against the community will by that act incur the charge of perpetual treason, and neither the king nor the regent ought or can grant him pardon without the knowledge and will of the community.

33. Then, it is exceedingly clear how many evils and discords have arisen and are arising in this realm from provisions of cathedral and collegiate churches and other ecclesiastical dignities and prebends by the apostolic see without our presentation. Therefore we have ordered that without the king's or our presentation and nomination no cleric or monk should in any way dare to be assigned to any cathedral church or any other ecclesiastical benefice or to cause himself to be confirmed to them by the apostolic see, or to cite any gentleman of the realm to the Roman curia or outside the kingdom, except by the way of appeal. Those acting against this in any way will be regarded as infidels and exiled from the kingdom.²⁴

34. Then, the regent may not grant pardon to any sentenced, proscribed, or other criminal, unless his injured and wronged adversary has received satisfaction within the term usual in such cases. No one may give hospitality to the sentenced or other aforementioned men or defend them in any way; whoever does so will incur a similar charge of criminality by that very deed.

35. Then, because up to this time, on account of the frequent variations and degradation of coinage, various controversies have commonly arisen in the collection of tithes, therefore, for the sake of removing disputes of this kind, we have ordered that all tithes both in wine and in grain, which have been customarily paid up till now in money according to the diocesan custom of every archbishopric or bishopric, should be paid from the goods themselves in kind to the lord prelates and to those to whom tithes of this kind must be paid by right or by custom, namely, so that the tithes should be paid from the fruits and grains of the field in stacks and sheaves gathered without any fraud or loss in these stacks and sheaves. Neither peasants nor anyone else may admit cattle and other animals to fields in which tithes of this kind lie before the customary time hitherto observed in each village in such matters; otherwise those, on whom losses are inflicted by such acts, may recover them by law. And since it is understood that there are several dioceses in which up to now the customary tithes have been paid from poultry, other animals, and goods, therefore we have decreed that in those dioceses and places tithes must be paid in kind from the abovementioned goods.²⁵

²⁴ See 1440:4, going back to the Placetum regium of 4 April 1404.

²⁵ The issue of rendering the tithe in kind or money goes back to the thirteenth century (see 1222:20 with n. 29), and came up in 1351:6 and in 1397:46. On the traditional mode of its collection, see Syn. Szab. 40.

36. Then, nobles, having tenants or not, are not required to pay tithes and the chamber's profit, just as has been observed from old.²⁶

37. Then, the minting of coinage must be returned to its prior state, as in the decree and ordinance made by us in our last assembly at Pest, so that two hundred pennies will always be valued at and will be equal to one gold florin; the third part of this coin must be silver, and this can never be changed, except with the consent of the whole community; and no other coinage can be minted and have currency within the borders of the kingdom, except coins of small change with which both the chamber's profit and other revenues are customarily paid as in ancient times.²⁷ For the minting and maintenance of this coinage, prudent, expert, and faithful men must be chosen and appointed from the cities by the whole community of the gentlemen of the realm, who will never presume to make such coinage worthless, to devalue and to change it because of favor or fear or for seeking popularity with any magnate and powerful man. From these people the whole community of gentlemen of the realm, or those whom the community has appointed to that duty, should and must receive an account at the proper time. Where the men who are appointed to the minting of coinage act against the foregoing in general or particular, they will be irrevocably punished with the penalty customary in such cases.

38. Then, no archbishop, bishop, or his vicar may interfere with any secular trial, but may only conduct cases pertaining to their ecclesiastical courts.²⁸

39. Then, the regent, with those appointed to his council, should confer vacant churches within the appropriate time on suitable persons according to the power invested in him, lest they fall into irrecoverable loss and ruin due to long vacancy, and he may not cause those vacant churches to be taken or their estates and goods to be occupied by lay hands. We also wish that he confer and give the churches of monastic orders that are or will become vacant to suitable regular clergy having and 1397:17. There is no up-to date monograph on tithing in Hungary; for the time being, see Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn", Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kan. Abt. 61 (1975) 228–257.

²⁶ The exemption of nobles from paying the tithe was contained in a now lost edict of Sigismund of 23 June 1405, referred to in a charter of 1 August 1421, see DRH, pp. 216–17. In 1415, Pope John XXIII confirmed this exemption based on the service of the nobles "in the defense of the faith," see Josephus Nicolaus Kovachich, Monumenta veteris legislationis Hungaricae (Claudiopolis: Collegium, 1815). 2:8–9. Cf. also see 1439:28. On their exemption from the chamber's profit no decree survives; while 1351:12 explicitly codified its opposite. There is sporadic evidence for both practices, but poor nobles seem to have been increasingly obligated to pay the chamber's profit; see Lajos Thallóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit in the context of taxation in Hungary (Budapest: Weiszmann, 1879), pp. 83, 92.

²⁷ The measure seems to aim at demanding payments in the pennies of which 100 was worth a gold florin as the exchange of the florin of account could not be restored. See also in 1458 Sz.

²⁸ Cf. 15 April 1405:14. The issue of clerical interference with secular justice was a European-wide issue throughout the Middle Ages.

the habit of that same order to which the vacant churches and those becoming vacant belong or will belong.²⁹

40. Then, in the course of a general levy, no plundering, robbery and exaction of victuals, or unjust beating of people may be committed. If such plundering, robbery, and beatings of people is perpetrated by anyone, let him be finally summoned, and when the truth has been discovered, he should be convicted at the first octave of act of might. Those exacting victuals either for military use or for any other campaign, of whatever station and eminence they are, must similarly be finally summoned; when the truth of the accusation has been found, they must be condemned for the value of the victuals taken and the expenses incurred in the prosecution of the case by the plaintiff on his oath alone.³⁰

41. Then, henceforth powerful men or magnates traveling through the kingdom on a military expedition or otherwise must not exact hospitality from the houses of nobles, whether rich or poor.³¹

We have caused these presents to be fortified with the seal of our assembly³² for the force and testimony of all the foregoing. Given at Buda, on the feast of the Annunciation of the Glorious Virgin, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and forty-seven.

²⁹ Cf. 1445: 14 and 1446: 6; there is, however, no known Hungarian case of imposing an abbot of another order on a religious house. The transfer of monasteries or convents from one order to another (for example, from conventual to observant Franciscans), which happened frequently, does not seem to have been meant here.

³⁰ See 1445:7 and 20.

³¹ See 1444: 17.

³² The original was apparently sealed by the seal cut according to 1445: 15.

LAW OF KING LADISLAS V OF HUNGARY
OF 29 JANUARY, 1453

Since Ladislas V was not formally elected or crowned king at any diet, he did not issue a coronation patent, similar to those of his father and grandfather. Rather, after his release from the guardianship of Emperor Frederick III, he approved in decretal form the submissions and requests of the barons and nobles, who had gathered at a diet in Pressburg. This decree does not contain the usual detailed confirmation of noble privilege, yet assures the estates of their liberties and of the integrity of the realm, besides containing several measures that were necessary after the long interregnum. Remarkably, Ladislas always referred to this decree as that of the “prelates and barons” (e.g., in the charters MNL OL DL. 73119, 88272). The delegates seem to have planned to regulate details in a diet at Székesfehérvár, which, however, never took place.

MS.: A single original, on parchment with privy seal en placard, MNL OL DL. 44653.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:310–15 (erroneously dated 6 February 1453); Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akadémiai, 1978) [=DRH], pp. 373–7.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46-123, 529-602, here pp. 95–6; János M. Bak, Königtum und Stände in Ungarn im 14.-15. Jh. (Wiesbaden: Steiner, 1973), pp. 52–3.

Nos Ladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex, Austrieque et Stirie dux, necnon marchio Moraviae memorie commendamus per presentes, quod cum nobis novissime de manu, potestate et educatione domini Friderici imperatoris Romanorum exeuntibus prelati, barones et nobiles regni nostri Hungarie generali conventionione primum nuper Vienne ad nos congregati, relictis omnibus dissensionibus nos verum et naturalem eorum regem et dominum devota fidelitatis oblatione concordi animo honorassent, recognovissent et suscepissent, consequenterque possessionem huius regni nobis grata oblatione reddentes invitassent nos et conduxissent in hanc civitatem nostram Posoniensem pro faciendis ordinationibus, que pro conservando statu et pace ipsius regni opportune videbantur, tandem inter alia, que hincinde concorditer expedita sunt, prefati prelati, barones et nobiles universi exhibuerunt nobis concorditer et presentarunt articulos infrascriptos desiderantes et supplicantes, ut eos et in eis contenta rata habere, admittere et nos observaturos promittere dignaremur. Quorum quidem articulorum tenor sequitur in hec verba:

I. Primo. dominus rex iurabit, quod regnum suum Hungarie cum suis regnicolis in omnibus et singulis iuribus, libertatibus et legibus ac approbatis consuetudinibus inviolabiliter conservabit, in quibus predecessores sui, puta dominus Sigismundus imperator avus et dominus Albertus pater sui idem regnum et eius regnicolas tenuerunt et conservaverunt, et quod metas regni Hungarie non alienabit, sed pro posse defendet et alienata recuperabit.

II. E converso domini prelati, barones et nobiles ac procures ceterique fideles regni sui Hungarie universi et singuli, sed et deputati nobiles hic Posonii existentes iuramentum prestare debeant et teneantur eidem domino nostro regi super observanda fidelitate et obedientia.

III. Preterea conclusum est, quod dominus noster rex extraneis dignitates ecclesiasticas et seculares ac honores, officiatus vel perpetuitates conferre non debeat usque dietam Albaregalensem, quam idem dominus rex cum celebrare voluerit, quadraginta diebus prius litteris suis mediantibus ipsis regnicolis promulgare teneatur, ut ipsi in eadem dieta Albensi possint et valeant interesse; et tandem ea, que in hac parte in ipsa congregatione prelatorum et baronum ac regnicularum deliberata fuerint et conclusa, firmiter observabit.

IV. Item dominus noster rex omnibus et singulis regnicolis ac aliis cuiusvis status et conditionis hominibus ad coronam regni Hungarie pertinentibus, hiis videlicet, et qui presentes sunt et absentes, super omnibus et cunctis offensis et excessibus, qualitercunque et quibuscunque modis contra suam regiam serenitatem et eius coronam a tempore obitus condam domini Alberti regis felicis recordationis usque ad presentem diem illatis et perpetratis plenam gratiam facere dignetur et modis omnibus indulgere. Ita tamen, quod neque presenti, neque in posterum quocunque temporum in processu idem dominus noster rex de eisdem reminisci velit, neque imputare, et neque possit modis quibuscunque, et super hiis litteras suas gratiosas singulis, qui maluerint, dare dignetur.

V. Item quod idem dominus rex omnes donationes condam serenissime domine Elizabeth regine matris sue et etiam condam domini regis Polonie pro quorumcunque parte et quibuscunque ac quavis ratione factas revocabit et cassabit et committet omnino viribus carituras, excepta dumtaxat per eandem dominam reginam ecclesie Albensi facta.

VI. Item quod omnia nova castella in hiis partibus superioribus erecta et habita a die presenti usque ad quindecim dies immediate sequentes, in partibus autem inferioribus existentia usque ad octavum diem medie quadragesime, demptis illis, que sunt erecta ex indiulto regum aut sub sigillo communis regnicolarum, sub pena infidelitatis deponantur et deponi teneantur. Qui si fecerint, bene quidem, alioquin contra eos, qui non fecerint, detur sententia in Albaregali.

VII. Item castra, castella, possessiones et portiones possessionarie ac terre et alia iura, ecclesiastica videlicet et secularia, [per] quosunque absque rationabili causa occupata usque ad predictum diem medie quadragesime sub pena premissa remittantur per detentores eorum.

VIII. Item quod donationes per dominum gubernatorem [iuxta] vigorem decreti facte in suis vigoribus confirmantur.

IX. Item quod insinuationes in suis vigoribus remaneant.

X. Item taxe inconsueute ulterius non fiant quovismodo aut quacunque ratione.

Nos [igi]tur acceptis articulis prenotatis maturaque super eis deliberatione prehabita eosdem admisimus atque super primo eorundem solito more regale corporaliter prestitimus iuramentum, quoad s[ecundum] vero] e converso nos ab eis omnibus simile iuramentum suscepimus super fidelitate et obedientia. nobis observari debenda, ceteros autem omnes descriptos articulos et singulum eorum inviolabiliter observare, complere et exequi promittimus et volumus cum effectu. In quorum omnium testimonium presentes litteras nostras eidem universitati prelatorum, baronum ac nobilium regni nostri Hungarie [duximus concedendas]. Datum Posonii, feria secunda proxima ante festum Purificationis beate Marie virginis, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo tertio, regni autem [nostri anno] tredecimo.

JANUARY 29, 1453

We, Ladislas, king by the grace of God of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., duke of Austria and Styria, and margrave of Moravia,¹ wish to be remembered through these presents that, after we had been released from the hand, custody, and upbringing of the lord Frederick, emperor of the Romans, the prelates, barons, and nobles of our kingdom of Hungary, recently gathered in a general assembly with us for the first time in Vienna, honored, recognized, and accepted us as their true and natural king and lord with an avowed offering of fidelity in a spirit of concord, having laid aside all dissension, and consequently, returned the state of this realm to us as a voluntary oblation, they invited and escorted us to this our city of Pressburg to make the arrangements which seemed proper for preserving the state and peace of the realm;² finally, among the other things done by agreement at this place, all the said prelates, barons, and nobles unanimously compiled and presented to us the articles written below, desiring and entreating us to deign to approve, accept, and promise to observe them. The content of these articles follows in these words:

1. First, the lord king will swear that he will preserve his kingdom of Hungary inviolably and its gentlemen of the realm in each and every one of the rights, liberties, laws, and approved customs in which his predecessors, namely his grandfather, the lord emperor Sigismund, and his father the lord Albert, held and kept the kingdom and its gentlemen of the realm, and that he will not alienate the borders of the realm of Hungary but will defend them with all his might and he will recover what had been alienated.³
2. In return, the lord prelates, barons, nobles, lords, and the other loyal subjects of his realm of Hungary, individually and collectively, and also the delegated nobles who are here at Pressburg must and are required to swear an oath to observe faith and obedience to our same lord king.
3. Furthermore, it has been resolved that our lord king must not confer ecclesiastical and secular honors, offices, or perpetual donations on foreigners until the diet of Székesfehérvár, which the lord king must announce by means of his letters to the gentlemen of the realm forty days in advance of when he will wish to hold it, so that they could be able to and may take part in the same diet at ¹ Ladislas used the style which all Habsburg rulers had since 1282, regardless of whether they actually reigned in Austria or Styria.

² After several years of negotiation and, finally, threatened by an alliance of Austrian, Czech and Moravian estates and the powerful counts of Cilli/Cilje, on 4 September 1452, Emperor Frederick released his nephew Ladislas into the hands of Ulrich of Cilli. He was greeted by the Hungarian magnates on 7 October and at the end of the year accepted Hunyadi's resignation from the regency. King and barons agreed on several governmental reforms, such as the separation of major and a minor (secret) chancellery, with their own seals and courts of law (the "special" and the "personal royal presence," for which see the Glossary). The estates tacitly dropped the constitutional claims enunciated in the decree of 1440.

³ This summary promise became the model for the "constitutional oath" of subsequent kings of Hungary; see Bak, Königtum, p. 53.

Székesfehérvár;⁴ and, finally, that he will observe firmly that which was deliberated and resolved in these matters in this assembly of prelates, barons, and gentlemen of the realm.

4. Then, our lord king should deign to grant full pardon and complete indulgence to each and every gentleman of the realm and others of any station and condition belonging to the crown of the realm of Hungary, namely both those who are present and those absent, regarding all and any crimes and excesses inflicted and perpetrated by any means and by anyone against his royal peace and his crown from the time of the death of the late lord King Albert of happy memory until now. This should be done so that neither in the present nor at any time in the future should our lord king wish or be able to remember these matters or blame anyone for them, and to those who so wish he should deign to grant particular letters of pardon.⁵

5. Then, that the lord king should revoke, declare void, and deprive of all validity all grants of his mother, the late most serene lady queen Elizabeth, and also those of the late lord king of Poland⁶ The wording of this article implicitly denies the legitimacy of Wladislas I's Hungarian kingship, even if by cancelling the donations of both sides in the civil war of 1439–43 it appears to be impartial.made in favor of anyone, for whatever reason, except the one granted to the church of Székesfehérvár by the lady queen.

6. Then, that all new residences built and inhabited in these upper regions of the country ought and must be razed between the present day and fifteen days immediately following it, and those in the lower regions before the eighth day of the middle of Lent⁷ under pain of treason, except those which were built by permission of kings or under the seal of the community of gentlemen of the realm. For those who do this, all is well; but against those who do not comply, sentence will be passed in Székesfehérvár.⁸

7. Then, castles, residences, estates, parts of a property right in land, and other rights, namely both ecclesiastical and secular, usurped by anyone without reasonable cause must be handed over by their occupiers before the said day of the middle of Lent under pain of the aforementioned punishment.⁹

⁴ The oft-mentioned diet at Székesfehérvár never materialized; see Mályusz, p. 96. The formal obligation of the king to send out invitations forty days in advance was codified here for the first time. The stipulation that the kings should observe the future decisions of a diet sounds peculiar and suggests that the royal chancellery did not care to scrutinize this document before its issuance.

⁵ Such pardons were, in fact, issued, with reference to this article; see e.g., MNL OL DI. 102842 of 31 January 1454 in favor of a certain Oswald of Bucsán.

⁶ The wording of this article implicitly denies the legitimacy of Wladislas I's Hungarian kingship, even if by cancelling the donations of both sides in the civil war of 1439–43 it appears to be impartial.

⁷ The relevant dates are 13 February and 14 March 1453.

⁸ On razing the castles, see 1446: 2.

⁹ While the royal chancellery issued summons and threatened trespassers with the charge of infidelity on the basis of this decree (see MNL OL DI. 14665, 14761, 83242, 88272), legal practice rested more frequently on older and more detailed regulations. The problematic standing of the present decree is obvious

8. Then, that grants made by the lord regent empowered by decree should be confirmed in their validity.¹⁰

9. Then, that terminal summons should retain their validity.¹¹

10. Then, unusual taxes must no longer be levied in any way or for any reason.

We, therefore, having received the above articles, accepted them after mature deliberation, and on the first of them we have offered a corporal oath by the usual royal custom, and in regard to the second article we have in return received a similar oath from all of them on faith and obedience to be observed to us, and for each and every one of the remaining articles written above, we promise and we wish actively to observe, fulfill, and follow inviolably. In witness of all this we have commanded our present charter to be granted to the community of prelates, barons, and nobles of kingdom of Hungary.

Given at Pressburg, on the Monday before the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and fifty-three, the thirteenth year of our reign.

from an order of King Ladislav of 6 May 1453 in which he expressly mandates that judgment be passed “not according to the said decree of Pressburg, but according to the ancient custom of the realm,” where ancient custom is defined as “old law” (antiqua lex); MNL OL DL. 73119.

¹⁰ See 1446:10–11.

¹¹ These short-term “terminal summons” (issued after three or more previous citations and implying that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the accused) were last regulated in 1447:14 and 40.

LAW OF KING LADISLAS V OF HUNGARY
OF 25 JANUARY 1454

This last extant decree of King Ladislas V, aimed at the preparation of a major campaign against the Ottomans, who had taken Constantinople the year before, survived only in a mandate of the king addressed to the nobles of Co. Szabolcs. Since the king was at the time of this meeting in Prague, the diet was most likely called and presided over by Hunyadi. A few months later (probably in March 1454) a diet discussed the propositions sent by the king but its decree did not survive (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest: Akademiai, 1978) [=DRH], p. 431). The last known diet of Ladislas was held in January 1455, when additional arrangements were made for the campaign, but its decree did not survive, save in fragmentary references (see Ibid., pp. 384–86.)

MS.: Original on paper, with rests of a signet seal en placard. MNL OL DL. 55565, from the family archives of the Kállay family.

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search
--

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896) 1:317–25; DRH, pp. 378–83.

LIT.: Elemér Mályusz, “A magyar rendi állam Hunyadi korában” [The Hungarian corporatist state in the age of the Hunyadi]. Századok 91 (1957): 46–123, 529–602, here pp. 97, 118; Joseph Held, Hunyadi: Legend and Reality (Boulder, Co.: East European Monographs, 1985), pp. 148–54.

25 JANUARI 1454

Ladislaus dei gratia Hungarie, Bohemie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. rex, Austrieque et Stirie dux, necnon marchio Moraue, fidelibus nostris universis prelati, baronibus, nobilibus et alterius cuiusvis status et conditionis possessionatis hominibus in comitatu de Zabolch constitutis et existentibus salutem et gratiam. Crebrarum a dudum invalescentium novitatum notabilium hominum fidedignorum huius regni nostri Hungarie pericula formidantium patefactione edocti sumus luculenter, quomodo perfidissimus imperator Turcorum potentissima paganorum coadunatione solito multiplicata in finale exterminium firma intentione machinatur hoc regnum nostrum Hungarie subintrare. Proinde nos vigili advertentia in animo revolventes, ne velud olim hoc regnum nostrum Hungarie ex Tartarorum invasione improvisa advertentia regnicolarum in flebilem ruinam fuerat positum et in presentiarum inevitabili cursu dicti imperatoris Turcorum et campestri conflictu indispositos, quod deus avertat, nos contingat periclitari et totius huius regni machina sacra religione christiana imbuta penitus diruatur, quemadmodum etiam in proximis diebus evolutis exemplari intuitu civitati Constantinopolitane per eundem imperatorem Turcorum illatum fore iam experti sumus manifeste; quapropter predicti fideles nostri prelati, barones, nobiles et proceres dicti regni nostri Hungarie unacum certis electis nobilibus hominibus singulorum comituum eiusdem regni nostri, quibus per alias litteras nostras nuper superinde dederamus in mandatis, in hac civitate nostra Budensi hiis diebus congregati super eo, qualiter huiusmodi imperatoris Turcorum invasio prestolanda valeret tutius evitari, uniformem habentes tractatum et deliberationem, nos cum eisdem validam expeditionem exercitualem ad natalem patriam nostram altissimo propitio defendendam adversus paganorum insultus decrevimus instaurandam, presentibus litteris nostris sub certorum articulorum inclusionibus subnotandis vobis notificandam, videlicet:

I. Quod primo spectabilem et magnificum Johannem de Hwnyad, perpetuum comitem Bystriciensem infra presentis anni integri revolutionem capitaneum generalem instituimus huiusmodi exercitus nostri instaurandi.

II. Item disposuimus, quod e medio dictorum prelatorum, baronum, necnon etiam nobilium et procerum regni nostri certi eligantur, qui videre debeant, quot banderia nostra regalia de proventus nostris regalibus poterunt elevari, qui et ulterius provideant, qualiter ipsi proventus nostri regales in cameram nostram regalem aministrentur, et qualiter e camera iidem proventus dispensentur, quodque honores baroniarum tenentibus, qui scilicet more alias consueto ipsorum banderia exercitualiter soliti fuerunt elevare, de eisdem proventus nostris regalibus eorum stipendia extradentur, et cum eorum banderiis prompti sint exercituare.

III. Item domini archiepiscopi, episcopi, prepositi et capitula ac abbates, et alii dignitates et honores ecclesiasticos maiores tenentes, quemadmodum tempore condam domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis, avi nostri consueti fuerunt, cum ipsarum banderiis ac numero lancearum exercituare teneantur, ita videlicet, quod quarumcunque ecclesiarum seu personarum ecclesiasticarum proventus per inimicos extitissent minorati, iuxta limitationem electorum hominum predictorum etiam huiusmodi exercitatio earundem ecclesiarum sive personarum ecclesiasticarum cum tanto defectu minoretur. Quod etiam alie persone ecclesiastice dignitates et honores ecclesiasticos minores tenentes, quorum nomina eorum in registro nostro exercituationis scripta non existunt, secundum conscientiosam limitationem electorum hominum predictorum iuxta quantitatem proventuum earundem personarum ecclesiasticarum exercituare teneantur.

IV. Item in quibilibet comitatibus tot probi et fidedigni homines potiores per communitatem nobilium eorundem comitatum eligantur, quot in eisdem comitatibus iudices nobiliurn habentur, qui unacum eisdem iudicibus nobilium comitatus, in quo connumeratio fieri debet, prestitis iuramentis per eosdem connumeratisque portis jobagionalibus ad rationem et numerum lucri camere faciendum, de centum portis jobagionalibus tam ecclesiasticarum, quam secularium personarum quatuor equites pharetrarios et duos pedites similiter pharetras et clipeos ac cuspides habentes ad exercituandum hac vice tantum, et usque ad metas et termines regni nostri Hungarie et non ulterius disponant. Ac in quolibet comitatu per eandem universitatem nobilium e medio ipsorum unus idoneus conductor belli illius comitatus eligatur, qui cum eisdem hominibus exercituantibus connumeratis ad generalem capitaneum exercitus tempore debito teneantur accedere. Universi etiam nobiles regni nostri jobagiones non habentes per singula capita aut cum dominis ipsorum iuxta limitationem electorum hominum teneantur exercituare. Et qui equester vel pedester proficisci debeant, vel qui propter paupertatem, senium vel infirmitatem exercituare non possunt, iidem electi homines discernant et disponant. Pro personis vero filiorum magnatum parvulorum homines armati, pro aliis vero pueris et orphanis iuxta ipsorum facultatem consimiliter homines exercituantes transmittantur.

V. Universi autem magnates, barones, milites, nobiles et procures dicti regni nostri, maiores scilicet et minores ab invicem divisi per singula capita propria hac vice exercituare teneantur. In castris ex pluribus castellanis sufficiat unum remanere cum tot personis, quot pro conservatione talis castri sufficientes fore iudicaverint electi homines prenotati, alii personaliter debebunt exercituare.

VI. Item in domibus notabilium nobilium unus nobilis pro provisorio curie possit remanere, ita tamen, quod quicunque modo predicto remanserint, teneantur homines suos exercituantes connumeratos transmittere. Ex nobilibus vero et aliis maioribus filios aut fratres indivisos habentibus sufficiat unum ad exercitum proficisci antiqua consuetudine observata.

VII. Item quod jobagiones exercituantes nobilium in pluribus comitatibus possessiones habentium electi homines connumeratores talium comitatum erga et penes dominos ipsorum in illum comitatum, ubi tales domini eorum residentiam facerent personalem, transmittant. Qui quidem nobiles seu domini cum talibus hominibus eorum exercituantibus, si voluerint, sub banderio dominorum ipsorum accedant et proficiscantur, qui etiam rationem de numero et personis talium suorum exercituantium generali capitaneo dare ac de eisdem respondere tenebuntur.

VIII. Item quilibet exercituans tam maior, quam minor teneatur in propriis expensis tam in eundo, stando et redeundo proficisci, nullusque audeat aliquas res vel victualia absque competenti solutione recipere. Si qui autem violenter in aliquibus locis aliquas res vel victualia receperint, ductor exercitus talis comitatus dampnificato ex parte dampnificantis teneatur impendere satisfactionem indilatam. Et si ipse dampnificans unde satisfaceret, non haberet, caput eiusdem in manus dampnificati debeat assignari per ductorem belli comitatus prenotatum. Quod si ductor talis belli facere non posset propter persone talis dampnificantis maiorem, aviset superinde capitaneum generalem, qui teneatur dampnificato satisfacere. Alioquin dampnum passus valeat dampna sua acquirere iure mediante secundum contenta decreti dominorum prelatorum et baronum.

IX. Item omnes libere civitates tani nostre regales et reginales, quam dominorum despoti et comitis Cillie ac aliorum magnatum, necnon totum regnum nostrum Sclauonie, de quibus lucrum camere nostre solvere non consuevissent, modo premissis connumerari debeant, et similiter Philistei, Comani, Walahii et Tartarii connumerati debeant exercituare.

X. Item omnes celebrationes octavarum et iudiciorum tam ecclesiastice, quam seculares usque descensum exercitus nostri in proximo consurgendi cessare debeant. Post descensum vero presentis exercitus, aut si huiusmodi exercitus levare non debuerit, omnes octave, signanter festi beati Georgii immediate sequentis usque finem celebrentur. Quodque jobagiones quorumcunque usque ad festum sancti Martini proxime affuturum nullo modo deducantur hincinde moraturi.

XI. Disposuimus insuper, quod quicumque tam prelatorum ac virorum ecclesiasticorum, quam baronum ac magnatum, necnon nobilium, possessionatorum hominum predictam dispositionem et ordinationem in toto vel in parte observare et adimplere nollent vel non curarent, extunc tales dicti electi connumeratores in [eo mox] admonere debeant, ut pro defectu huiusmodi non perfectionis dispositionis et ordinationis predictorum pro quolibet equite sedecim florenos auri et pro quolibet pedite decem florenos usque quintumdecimum diem diei amonitionis eorundem computandum capitaneo nostro generali dare et solvere debeant et teneantur. Qui si non solverint, extunc ductor exercitus talis comitatus una cum electis hominibus et iudicibus nobilium ipsius comitatus, ubi talismodi dispositiones infringerentur seu non perficerentur, illas portiones possessionarias, de quibus ipse dispositiones perfecte non fuerint, occupare occupatasque tamdiu, donec per hos, quorum redemptioni eadem magis competunt, pro dictorum sumpsa et quantitate florenorum redimantur, conservare valeant atque possint.

XII. Quodque premissa dispositio exercituali ad aliquam pecuniariam solutionem nullatenus et per nullum modum per quempiam convertatur. Quod si per aliquem factum fuerit, penam sententie capitalis incurrat ipso facto.

XIII. Item exercituantes illi, qui scilicet de exercitu furtive recedunt, si nobiles fuerint, possessiones eorum amittant, si vero ignobiles, pene capitali subiaceant. Et similiter illi, qui a dominis ipsorum dispositionem habuerint vel pecuniam eorum levaverint, cum eisdemque proficisci noluerint, eandem sustineant penam capitalem.

XIV. Preterea quia premissam dispositionem exercitualement contra antiquam consuetudinem et libertatem tam ecclesiasticarum personarum, quam etiam aliorum regnicolarum nostrorum, maiorum scilicet et minorum propter presentis validissimi belli apparatus dicti imperatoris Turcorum in huius regni invasionem, quod deus avertat, faciendam pro eiusdem regni, natalis scilicet solii nostri regii et patrie paterne defensione et conservatione inpresentiarum levare opportuit et promulgari, ideo nos et ipsi prelati, barones, ceteri nobiles et proceres dicti regni nostri spondemus et fide nostra christiana prestita etiam cum nostri et ipsorum prelatorum ac banonum sigillorum inpressionis roboratione promittimus et pollicemur, quod a modo et deinceps nullo unquam tempore talem inconsuetam exercituationem promulgabimus et faciemus, neque ipsi facient et promulgabunt, sed tam nos, quam ipsi prelati, barones et proceres regni nostri penes dictam antiquam consuetudinem exercituationis semper permanebimus et ipsi permanebunt.

XV. Item pro compescendis quarumcunque nociturnitatum generibus disposuimus, ut pretacti electi homines in singulis comitatibus unacum iudicibus nobilium omnibus querulantibus super quibuscunque factis potentiariis et etiam possessionum occupationibus ex parte in causam attractorum, habita prius superinde diligenti inquisitione compertaque sufficienti rei veritate, absque dilatione et terminorum protractione iudicium et iustitiam querulantibus teneantur exhibere, comesque parochialis iuxta huiusmodi iudicium modo premissis faciendum teneatur mox satisfactionem indilatam et plenariam ex parte huiusmodi in causam attractorum lesi ministrare, Quod si ipse comes parochialis ex quacunque causa facere nollet, extunc talis comes parochialis honore suo privetur, causaque huiusmodi modo pretacto adiudicata in curiam nostram regiam per eosdem iudices transmittatur, ubi in primis octavis celebrandis fine conclusivo absque ulla prorogatione ulteriori terminetur. Ubi si ipsi comites vel vicecomites parochiales nobilibus et quibusvis possessionatis aut ignobilibus hominibus quevis facta potentiaria, iniurias, nocumenta et dampna quoquomodo fecerint ad se pertinentibus facere permiserint, tunc iidem electi homines et iudices nobilium talis comitatus ipsos comites et vicecomites premissa patrans in eo, ut ipsi in prima die sedis iudicarie super talismodi actibus potentiariis, dampnis atque iniuriis lesi et dampnificatis omnimodam impendere debeant satisfactionem, amoneant. Qui si id facere recusaverint, tunc ipsi electi et iudices nobilium seriem huiusmodi non satisfactionis in litteris eorum conscribi facere et ad primas octavas tunc celebrandas transmittere, iudexque ordinarius octavis in eisdem contra tales comites et vicecomites litteras sententiales lesi et dampnificatis dare et eisdem executioni demandare debeant et teneantur.

Quocirca fidelitati vestre precipimus et mandamus, quatenus mox postquam pretacti homines electi dicti comitatus Zabolcz hic Bude inpresentiarum constituti hinc vestri in medium cum presentibus revertentur et prevenerint, ad locum vestre sedis iudicarie universaliter congregati iuxta contenta dispositionum nostrarum unacum dictis prelati, baronibus et electis hominibus per vos deputatis ceterisque nobilibus et proceribus dicti regni nostri in superioribus articulatim conscriptarum vos cum celeritate more exercituantium tam expedite disponatis et apromptuetis, ut dum et quamprimum annotatus comes Johannes generalis capitaneus exercitus nostri prenotati vobis scripserit, in continenti cum apparatu exercituali fulciti, previo ductore belli ipsius comitatus vestri modo pretacto vestri de medio eligendo ad loca, que idem capitaneus noster generalis duxerit notificanda, ad resistendum predictorum inimicorum nostrorum insultibus proficisci valeatis. Aliud sub penis predictis et nostre indignationis facere non ausuri in premissis.

Datum Bude, in festo Conversionis beati Pauli apostoli, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo quarto.

Ad relationem dominorum prelatorum et baronum consiliariorum]

JANUARY 25, 1454

Ladislas, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, &c., duke of Austria and Styria, and margrave of Moravia, grace and greetings to all our faithful prelates, barons, nobles, and landowning men of any other station and condition assembled and living in the county of Szabolcs.¹ We understand from news that has proved to be true, passed on to us by trustworthy noble men who fear for this our Hungarian kingdom, that the most perfidious emperor of the Turks is scheming to attack this our Hungarian kingdom with a very powerful force of pagans, far greater than expected, in order finally to extirpate it.² Hence we, searching in our mind for a way to guard against this, lest—as before, when this our realm of Hungary was brought to pitiful ruin by the unexpected invasion of the Tartars—the inappropriate response of the gentlemen of the realm and our unpreparedness to open battle against the said emperor of the Turks, may, God forbid, lead us into such danger that the edifice of this whole realm, deeply imbued with the holy Christian faith, may be destroyed, just as we are well aware that most recently has been done, as a warning example to us, to the city of Constantinople by the same emperor of the Turks,³ called our said faithful prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of our said realm of Hungary along with certain elected nobles from every county of our kingdom, to whom we had recently given mandates by our letters, to gather in this our city of Buda during these days and hold common discussion and deliberation concerning that matter,⁴ as to how such a threatened invasion by the emperor of the Turks could be more safely avoided. We, along with them, have decreed the launching of a major campaign to defend the land of our birth, with the help from up high, against the attacks of the pagans about which we notify you by our present charter, including certain articles in it, namely:

1. That first we appoint the notable and distinguished János Hunyadi, perpetual count of Beszterce,⁵ as captain-general for one full year from now to raise our army.⁶

¹ As noted above, the surviving text is the copy sent to the noble community of Co. Szabolcs in northeastern Hungary.

² Actually, during the following summer Sultan Mehmed II besieged unsuccessfully Smederevo, the residence of George Branković, despot (ruler) of Serbia. Hunyadi led a campaign into Serbia and defeated the rear-guard of the Ottomans at Kruševac on 2 October 1454.

³ Constantinople fell to the Ottomans on 29 May 1453.

⁴ The exact dates of the diet are not known.

⁵ Hunyadi was given the title of comes perpetuus by the young king. Although this title had been borne by other prelates and barons who were perpetual ispáns of a county, this time the title was to be similar to German-imperial title of Graf. That is why we chose to translate it not by the otherwise-used Hungarian term, but rather by the European-style “count.” Actually, it was Hunyadi’s son, King Matthias I, who legalized the existence of such formal titles, when he created several perpetual comital families and in 1487 (Peace of St. Pölten) wrote about barones naturales, in contrast to barones ex officio; see Erik Fügedi, “The Aristocracy in Medieval Hungary,” in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary, ed. J. M. Bak. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986), ch. 4, p. 14.

⁶ This meant that he was charged with both hiring a mercenary force and commanding the banderia—troops supplied by the barons and prelates-- and the comital contingents. Hunyadi’s right to dispose of the royal

2. Then, we have decided that from the said prelates, barons, nobles, and lords of our realm certain men should be elected who should see how many of our royal banderia can be raised from our royal revenues and who should further attend to the manner in which our royal revenues are to be administered in our royal Chamber, how the same revenues should be dispensed from the Chamber, and that stipends should be paid to those holding baronial honors,⁷ that is, those who by approved custom usually raise their own banderia for campaign, and that they should be prompt in coming to campaign with their banderia.⁸

3. Then, the lord archbishops, bishops, provosts, chapters, abbots, and others holding the greater ecclesiastical dignities and honors are required to come on campaign with their banderia or a number of lances, just as they used to in the time of the late lord king and emperor Sigismund, our grandfather,⁹ however, in such a manner that the contingents of churches and ecclesiastics whose revenues were diminished by the enemy shall be suitably reduced according to the estimation of the said elected men.¹⁰ Also other clergy holding the smaller ecclesiastical dignities and honors, whose names are not recorded in our military register,¹¹ are required to participate in the campaign in accordance with the careful estimation by the said elected men according to the size of the revenues of these same clergy.

4. Then, in every county as many proven and trustworthy powerful men as there are magistrates should be elected by the community of nobles of that county, who, with the magistrates of the county in which a census must be taken, having sworn oaths after enumerating the tenant plots in the way as is done for the chamber's profit,¹² should send, for every one hundred tenant plot belonging to both clergy and laymen, four mounted archers and two foot-soldiers¹³ similarly armed revenues was challenged by the king's propositions in (March) 1455, but the diet confirmed the captain-general's powers against the young king's opposition (see DRH, p. 432, n. III.1).

⁷ This decision is an attempt of the estates to gain control over the royal finances, a recurring program of the diet, but rarely successful until the early sixteenth century; see Elemér Mályusz, "Les débuts du vote de la taxe par les ordres dans la Hongrie féodale," Nouvelles études historiques 1:55–82, and Gyorgy Bónis, "Ständisches Finanzwesen in Ungarn im frühen 16. Jahrhundert," ibid. 83–103, esp. 83f.

⁸ "Approved custom" refers to the tradition as contained e.g., in Propositions 1432/3.

⁹ See 8 March 1435:1 and 1439: 19 and the Propositions 1432/3.

¹⁰ By this time the southern regions of the country had suffered so much from some sixty years of Ottoman incursions that, for example, the bishop of Bosnia, once one of the richest prelates of the kingdom, was now one of the poorest. Another indicator of the devastation of the region is that by the 1450s virtually all fourteen Franciscan convents of southern Hungary and Croatia had disappeared.

¹¹ The "register" is clearly what we know as Propositions 1432/3.

¹² As prescribed e.g., in 8 March 1435:4. Magistrates (judices nobilium) were noblemen elected by their fellows to assist the ispán and represent the noble community; there were usually four in every county. The chamber's profit was a direct tax that replaced, ever since the thirteenth century, the royal income from annual re-issue (and devaluation) of the currency.

¹³ This quota is higher than the earlier ones for the militia portalis: 1397:6 had stipulated 5, but 12 March 1435:2 only 3 mounted archers for every 100 tenants. In general, see András Borosy, "The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526," in eds. János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, From Hunyadi to Rákóczi. War and

with bows, shields, and spears for a campaign at this time only and only as far as the borders and confines of our kingdom of Hungary.¹⁴ In every county the community of nobles must elect from among themselves one suitable war-leader for that county who must go to the captain-general of the army with the enumerated fighting men at the required time.¹⁵ All the nobles of our realm who do not have tenants are required to campaign singly or with their masters at the direction of the elected men. And the same elected men should decide and direct who should set out on horseback or on foot, or who cannot campaign because of poverty, age, or infirmity. Soldiers should be sent in place of the small children of the magnates, and similarly for other children and orphans, according to their capacity.¹⁶

5. Each and every magnate, baron, knight, noble, and lord of our said realm, both the greater and the lesser who hold separate properties,¹⁷ must this time campaign in person. It should be sufficient for one of the castellans to remain in every castle with so many men as the aforesaid elected men will have judged sufficient to guard such a castle; the others must campaign in person.¹⁸

6. Then, in the houses of the greater nobles one nobleman may remain as the steward of the court with this proviso, that whoever remains for this reason is still required to send his enumerated men to camp.¹⁹ It is sufficient, for one to set out on campaign from among the nobles or other greater men who live together with adult sons or brothers,²⁰ in observance of ancient custom.

7. Then, armed tenants²¹ of nobles holding estates in several counties should be sent by the men elected as enumerators of such counties to their lords in that county where such lords make their personal residence. Those nobles and lords may, if they wish, come and set out with these men society in late medieval and early modern Hungary. East European Monographs, 104, (Brooklyn: Brooklyn College, 1982), pp. 63–80.

¹⁴ The restriction to serve only within the territory of the realm, earlier valid only for the noble general levy, is new and is in contrast to Propositions 1432/33:5

¹⁵ By the law of 8 March 1435:4 the ispán was entrusted with the command of the county's levy, which seems to have been established custom (see also the "historical" argument in Propositions 1432/3:2). The reason for the change proposed here is not known.

¹⁶ Cf. Propositions 1432/3:2, 6, and 8 March 1435/I: 3

¹⁷ Note the assumption of still undivided kindred-properties. As all sons were entitled to an equal portion of an inherited estate, with the paternal house usually going to the youngest, division was often postponed for another generation or more. From a legal point of view, brothers or cousins who lived on still undivided estates were considered to form one family.

¹⁸ Cf. 1397:6 and 8 March 1435/I:5.

¹⁹ Cf. 8 March 1435/I: 4–5.

²⁰ See above, n. 18.

²¹ The wording here (jobagiones exercitantes) is one of the few explicit references to peasant tenants actually going to war in the so-called portal militia. Whether this was always the case, or landlords hired soldiers according to their holdings is debated; see Borosy, "The militia portalis."

under the banner of their masters, who then will be required to give account of the number and person of such men and answer for them to the captain-general.²²

8. Then, every soldier, whether rich or poor, is required to travel at his own expense in going, in camp, and in returning, and none should dare to take any goods or victuals without adequate payment. If anyone should take violently any goods or victuals anywhere, the leader of the troops of that county must assure that compensation is given without delay to the plaintiff on behalf of the trespasser. And if the trespasser does not have the means to pay compensation, his head should be placed in the hands of the plaintiff²³ by the war-leader of that county. If that war-leader is unable to do so, because of the high status of the trespasser, he then should inform the captain-general, who must compensate the plaintiff. Otherwise the plaintiff may recoup his losses at law awarding to the contents of the decree of the lord prelates and barons.²⁴

9. Then, all free cities belonging to the king and the queen, to the lord despot and to the count of Cilje²⁵ or other magnates as well as the people of the entire realm of Slavonia, who do not customarily pay our chamber's profit,²⁶ must be enumerated in the aforesaid manner, and similarly Philistines, Cumans, Vlachs, and Tartars²⁷ must be also enumerated and join the campaign.

²² On the noble retainers (familiares), lesser noblemen who joined (or were forced to join) more powerful nobles serving in their lords' armies, or acting in administrative and legal positions; see Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred (Budapest-New York: CEU Press, 1998) and János M. Bak, "Feudalism in Hungary?" in: Feudalism: New Landscapes of Debate. Sverre Bagge, Michael H. Gelting, Thomas Lindkvist, eds. (Turnhout: Brepols, 2011) pp. 203-17.

²³ This archaic formulation means capital punishment, (sententia capitalis), which meant loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates..

²⁴ This procedure has been regulated many times, see, e.g., 1427B:2; 8 March 1435/I:8-9; 1445:7, 20; 1447:40.

²⁵ George / Đurađ Branković (1377-146) was despot (ruler) of Srebia and Ulrich II (1406-56), his son-in-law, the last princely count of Cilje/Cilly were among the greatest landowners of the kingdom in their times.

²⁶ The inhabitants of Slavonia usually paid the mardurina, a tax originally rendered in marter pelts, monetarized at least since 1231 instead of the direct tax called lucrum camerae that replaced royal income from devaluating the money in the thirteenth century, but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages.

²⁷ Cumans and Jász/As (probably Alans, called by this Biblical name) settled in Hungary in the thirteenth century and kept certain liberties for centuries in return for military service. See Nora Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and 'Pagans' in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000-c.1300 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) esp. pp. 68-75. It is not quite clear, which people are meant under "Wallachs," most probably those who lived in the border districts between Severin (Szörény) and Timișoara. They were subject to royal border fortresses and registered for military service. (In a list from around 1430 there were 643 kenezi, i.e., local leaders, 2066 peasants and 108 other servants in the three districts of Mehadia, Halmas and Ilidia.) Tartars are mentioned occasionally in the early fifteenth century along with Cumans and Jász; they probably lived in the same region, but nothing is known about their origin and date of settlement in the Hungarian Plain.

10. Then, all sessions of octavial and other courts, both ecclesiastical and secular, must be suspended until the disbanding of the army of this imminent campaign. After the disbanding of the present army—or if such an army need not be levied at all—all octavial sessions should be held until their business is completed, particularly the one at the feast of St. George now following.²⁸ No peasant tenant of anyone should be moved to a new home until the next feast of St. Martin.²⁹

11. We have further decided that anyone, whether prelate, clergy, baron, magnate, noble, or landed resident, who is unwilling or hesitant to observe and fulfill in whole or in part the said arrangement and order, then the said elected enumerators must quickly warn such men, that for the damage caused by failure to perform the said arrangement and order they must and are required to give and to pay to our said captain-general sixteen florins of gold for every horseman and ten florins for every foot-soldier by the fifteenth day of the warning. If they will not pay, the leader of the army of that county with the elected men and the magistrates of that county where such arrangements are infringed upon or not performed, can and should occupy appropriate parts of his possessions for which the arrangements were not met and keep them occupied until such time as they are redeemed by those who are more prepared to redeem them for the said amount and quantity of florins.

12. And that the said military service may not be commuted to any monetary payment at any time and by any means by anyone. If that is done by anyone, he should immediately incur the penalty of capital sentence.³⁰

13. Then, those soldiers who leave the army secretly, if they are nobles, should lose their estates; if they are non-nobles they should be subject to a capital penalty. And similarly those who make an arrangement for their lords or raise their money, if they are unwilling to set out with them, should sustain the same capital penalty.³¹

14. Furthermore, because the preparation of the very powerful machinery of war by the said emperor of the Turks for the invasion of this kingdom, God forbid, demanded that for this one time the aforesaid military arrangements be made and promulgated for defense and preservation of the kingdom, namely, of our royal throne and ancestral land, against ancient custom and the liberty of both ecclesiastics and our other gentlemen of the realm, the greater and the lesser alike, therefore, we and the prelates, barons, other nobles, and lords of our said realm vow, promise, and pledge with the offering of our Christian faith and also with the strength of the impression of our seals and those of the prelates and barons that never in any way or at any time will we or they promulgate

²⁸ 1 May 1454.

²⁹ 11 November 1454. This clause may have had something to do with the mobilization of tenant militiamen, see above, notes 13, 21.

³⁰ On capital sentence, see n. 23, above.

³¹ Cf. Prop. 1432/3:12, but here more specified penalty.

and arrange such an unprecedented campaign, but both we and the prelates, barons, and lords of our realm will always persist in the said ancient custom of campaigning.³²

15. Then, to repress any kind of harmful deeds we have ordered that the said elected men in every county with the magistrates must render justice and sentence to all plaintiffs regarding any acts of act of might and occupations of estates on behalf of the damaged party, after having held proper enquiry and sufficiently established the truth in the case without delay and protraction of terms. The ispán of the county is required to exact at once full and immediate compensation for losses, according to such a judgment made in the said manner on behalf of the damaged party.³³ If the ispán of the county is unwilling to do so for any reason, then such an ispán should be deprived of his office and the case decided in the said manner should be sent to our royal court by the magistrates, where it will be brought to a conclusive end in the first octave held without any further prorogation. If ispáns or alispáns of counties commit or allow the commission of acts of act of might, injuries, harm, and damage of any kind by nobles, gentlemen of the realm, or non-nobles, then the same elected men and the magistrates of such a county should warn the ispáns and the alispáns committing the aforesaid that they must pay compensation for such acts of act of might, losses, injuries, and damages caused in any way on the first day of the county court's session. If they refuse to do this, then the elected men and the magistrates must and are required to have the facts of such non-compensation written down in their letter and to send it to the first octave held, and the justice ordinary ought and will in that octavial court grant a letter of sentence for the damages and losses against such ispáns and alispáns and will order its execution.³⁴

Therefore, we have ordered and mandated your fidelities that after your said elected men of the said county of Szabolcs at present here at Buda return and arrive home with the present charter, you should assemble at the seat of the county court, and, according to the contents of our arrangements written in the above articles issued together with the said prelates, barons, and elected men chosen by you along with the other nobles and lords of our said realm, you must arrange and make ready quickly in the customary way of campaigning, so that when and as soon as the said Count János, the captain-general of our said army, writes to you, you will be able to set out equipped for war, with the war-leader of your county previously elected in the said manner from your midst, to the place which our captain-general will designate, to resist the attacks of our said enemies. Do not dare to act otherwise under the said penalties and the risk of our indignation.

Given at Buda, on the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul the Apostle, in the year of the Lord one thousand, four hundred and fifty-four. On the instruction of the lord prelates and barons of the council.

³² It may be worth noting that Sigismund promised a similar return to “ancient custom” half a century earlier (1397:6).

³³ A charter of King Ladislás of 15 May 1454 (Imre Nagy III et al., eds., Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkeö (Budapest: Magyar Történelmi Társulat, 1895) 9:437), addressed to the elected men of Co. Bodrog in a matter of compensation, suggests the implementation of this ordinance.

³⁴ Several charters of the subsequent years refer to this decree ordering the procedure set out in the last article, e.g., Nagy, Cod. dipl. Zichy, 9:459; MNL OL Dl. 61662, 88302, 90015, 15108, 93265

LAW OF REGENT MICHAEL SZILÁGYI OF HUNGARY

([24 January] 1458)
(1458Sz)

After the election of Matthias Hunyadi on 24 January 1458, when the young king was still in Prague, where Ladislas V had taken him as a kind of hostage in the fall of 1457, his uncle, Michael Szilágyi of Horogszeg, issued a decree as regent for the minor ruler.

MSS.: One damaged paper original with seal en placard, MNL OL DL. 15209, two sixteenth century copies in the Codd. Festetics and Nádasdy (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458–1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], p. 83).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Supplementum ad vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. 3 vols. (Pest: Regia Universitas, 1789-1801), pp. 134–5 (excerpt); Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1: 327–35; DRH Matth., pp. 83–7.

LIT.: Vilmos Fraknói, Szilágyi Mihály, Mátyás király nagybátyja [M. Sz., uncle of King Matthias], Budapest: Franklin, 1913, pp. 63, 66-8; Gyula Gábor, A kormányzói méltóság a magyar alkotmányjogban [The office of regent in Hungarian constitutional law]. Budapest: Athenaeum, n.d. [1932], pp. 86-9; György Bónis, A jogtudó értelemiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Men learned in the law in Hungary before Mohács] (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1971), pp. 245-46.

[24 IANUARI] 1458

DECRETUM GUBERNATORIS MICHAELIS SZILÁGYI

Nos Michael Zylagy de Horogzeg nomine et in persona illustris principis domini Mathie Dei gratia Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. electi regis, gubernator in eisdem regnis constitutus etc. memorie commendamus per presentes, quod nobis una cum dominis prelatis, baronibus, nobilibus et proceribus regni Hungarie universis circa festum Circumcisionis Domini proxime preteritum in hanc civitatem Pestiensem convenientibus et pro faciendis ordinationibus, que pro conservanda pace et statu utilitateque et comodo pretactorum regnorum et partium eis subiectarum opportune et perutiles videbantur, tractantibus relictis sopitisque et sedatis omnibus et singulis guerris et dissensionibus in alterutrum previis rationibus exortis et suscitatis inter alia, que hinc inde concorditer expedita sunt, prefati domini prelati, barones, nobiles et proceres universi exhibuerunt nobis concorditer et presentarunt articulos infrascriptos petentes et desiderantes, ut eos et in eisdem contenta rata habere, admittere et per nos ac prefatum dominum nostrum Mathiam electum regem observaturos promittere dignaremur.

Quorum quidem articulorum tenor sequitur in hec verba:

I. Item primo quod omnes ecclesie occupate ac possessiones et bona earundem ac prelatorum et barronum ac nobilium possessiones seu portiones possessionarie similiter occupate, tempore scilicet, quo non fuerunt octave iudicialiter celebrate, hoc est a tribus annis citra, remittantur usque quindecim dies; ita quod occupatio talis probetur per attestaciones vicinorum et commetaneorum ac nobilium comprovincialium, prout consuetum est in proclamata congregatione; et si occupatas remittere noluerint, extunc sine ulteriori processu convincantur in facto potentie et dominus gubernator possit occupari facere possessiones et bona talis convicti et propriam personam eiusdem captivari.

II. Item quod dominus rex contra omnes et quoslibet inimicos et devastatores huius regni hoc regnum Hungarie de suis proventibus regalibus protegere et defensare teneatur, ita videlicet quod si idem dominus rex ab insultibus ipsorum inimicorum huius regni cum ipsis proventibus protegere non posset vel non valeret, extunc prelati et barrones ceterique viri ecclesiastici huius regni, banderia seu gentes ipsorum iuxta limitationes divorum regum huius regni in hac parte factas levare et insurgere debeant et teneantur. Si autem cum eisdem etiam ipsis inimicis resistere non possent, extunc universi nobiles et alterius cuiusvis status possessionati homines exercituantium more, prout aliorum regum Hungarie temporibus fuit, procedere et permanere teneantur.

III. Item quod de omnibus illationibus damnorum et iniuriarum et aliorum malorum generibus a festo beate Katharine virginis in anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo sexto preterito usque hec tempora per quoscumque patratorum et commissorum iuxta ordinationem et conclusionem prelatorum et barronum ac regnicolarum huius regni Hungarie pridem in generali congregatione hic Bude facti in comitatu quolibet iudicium et iustitia celebrari teneantur. Hoc est contra libertatem regiam et palatinale officium, igitur id ipsum permaneat in antiqua consuetudine.

IV. Item quod ipse quatuor octave singulis annis celebrari teneantur et nunquam pro aliqua ardua causa pretermittantur excepto, quando erit generalis exercitus et nulla alia causa prorogentur.

V. Item quod nunquam dominus noster rex et neque dominus Michael Zilagy gubernator huius regni pro quacunque causa seu negotiis quibusve arduissimis aliquam taxam seu solutionem pecuniariam per iobagiones regnicolarum seu alios nobiles petere valeat atque possit.

VI. Item quod universa fortalitia seu castella per quoscumque in quibusvis comitatibus erecta et constructa, ex quibus spolia et depredationes committuntur, diruantur exceptis, que ad utilitatem ipsius comitatus sunt. Ita quod si aliqui moniti per nobiles illius comitatus in sede iudiciaria infra quindecim dies non diruerent, extunc tales notam infidelitatis incurrant eo facto et dominus rex vel gubernator tales ut infideles punire valeat et quodcunque fortalitium in aliquo comitatu remanere debebit, extunc tale fortalitium vigore et testimonio litterarum capituli vel conventus et iudicis nobilium illius comitatus, in quo tale fortalitium esset erectum, remanere valeat.

VII. Item quod ipse dominus rex neque dignitates ecclesiasticas neque aliquos honores, officiolatus vel perpetuitates, hominibus extraneis dare et conferre valeat.

VIII. Item de castris et aliis bonis extraneis hominibus donatis rex faciat recuperandi diligentiam.

IX. Item quod iudices ecclesiastici neque archiepiscopi et episcopi vel eorum vicarii iudicare valeant, nisi dotes et res paraffernales, iura quartalitia, factum decimarum, efusiones sanguinum et verberationes ecclesiasticorum et mulierum necnon testamenta, causas matrimoniales et de periurio, prout in canonibus expressum est.

X. Item quod nullus omnino hominum de sacerdotibus ac nobilibus neque telonia, et neque decimas prout vetus regni consuetudo requirit, exigere debeat.

XI. Item quod dominus noster rex et ipse dominus Michael gubernator ex parte omnium et quorumlibet fratrum ac familiarium ipsorum omnibus querulantibus absque omni favore debitam iustitiam ac omnimodam satisfactionem impendere teneantur et nec per aliquos fratres vel familiares ipsorum aliqui regnicole huius regni quovismodo opprimantur.

XII. Item quod pecunie nove cudantur, quarum ducenti pro floreno et obuli earundem quadringenti habeantur et nunquam mutantur.

XIII. Item quod universi regnicole et homines possessionati singulis annis ad festum Pentecostes ad opidum Pestiense per singula capita congregari teneantur et si qui se rationabiliter excusare non poterint, talium possessiones per dominum gubernatorem vel dominum regem occupentur

XIV. Item quod universe civitates murate ac castra regalia ad manus prefati domini Michaelis gubernatoris statim resignentur.

XV. Item quod universi possessionati homines de eorum possessionibus ad possessiones aliorum obtenta licentia iustoque terragio deposito et aliis solitis debitis persolvatis iuxta antiquam consuetudinem huius regni absque omni litigionario processu pacifice et tute secureque permittere debeant. Si autem aliqui permittere nollent, extunc comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium illius comitatus huiusmodi iobagionem cum sex marcis eliberare teneantur, prout antiqua consuetudo requirit. Si autem aliqui hominum comitibus obedire noluerint, tunc regia maiestas vel eius gubernator possessiones talium occupare et tamdiu tenere valeat, donec huiusmodi iobagio cum duodecim marcis eliberabitur

XVI. Item ad hoc, quod littere preceptorie proclamationis generalis vires integras habeant, iuramentum ad caput deponendum conclusum est, ut adminus sex commetanei, totidem vicini ac duodecim nobiles comprovinciales attestati habeantur. Ubi autem defectus pluralitatis commetaneorum fuerit, suppleatur talis defectus per vicinos tantumdem numeri.ⁱ

Nos itaque petitionibus dictorum dominorum prelatorum, barronum, nobilium et procerum regni universorum iuri consonis inclinati articulos prescriptos et singulum eorum inviolabiliter observare, complere et exequi per nos et per prefatum dominum Mathiam regem electum promittimus et volumus cum effectu.

In quorum omnium premissorum testimonium presentes litteras nostras eidem universitati dominorum prelatorum, barronum ac nobilium regni Hungarie predicti duximus concedendas.

Datum in Pest vigesima quarta die congregationis supradicte anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo octavo.

1458 [24 JANUARY]

REGENT MICHAEL SZILÁGYI'S DECREE

We, Michael Szilágyi of Horogszeg,¹ in the name and person of the renowned prince, lord Matthias, by the grace of God elected king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., designated governor in these same kingdoms, etc. wish to be remembered by these presents that at the recent feast of the Circumcision of the Lord² we met together in this city of Pest with all the prelates, barons, nobles and lords of Hungary and discussed the measures that would seem appropriate and most useful for keeping the peace, the good state, welfare and benefit of the aforementioned kingdoms and the provinces subjected to them putting aside, calming, and ceasing from, each and every instance of war and strife that had arisen and been undertaken against each other for reasons in the past, among the affairs which were, with full agreement, settled at this time and place,³ the said lord prelates and barons, nobles and lords, presented and gave us in common accord the following articles, asking us and wishing that we accept and confirm them and their content and to deign to promise their observance on our part, as well as on the part of the aforementioned lord Matthias, king-elect.

¹ Michael Szilágyi of Horogszeg was the king's uncle as the brother of Matthias' mother, Elisabeth. His family goes back to a fourteenth century lesser noble clan that received major donation under Sigismund. Michael served in the army of János Hunyadi who married his sister. During Hunyadi's regency, he became commander of Belgrade, and after his death the senior member of the Hunyadi clan. He and his sister engineered the election of Matthias by mobilizing the military force of the HunyadiSzilágyi estates and making a pact with the influential Gara clan. As a guarantor of this agreement, Michael was made regent for the minor king, but held that position only for about six months. In October 1458, Matthias arrested him, for he conspired with rebels against the king, and released him only in June 1459. In November 1460, Szilágyi, at that time commander of the southern frontier, fell into Ottoman captivity and was executed by Sultan Mehmed II in 1461.

² 1 January 1458.

³ This reference is to the settlement of the civil war following the death of King Ladislas V. On 12 January 1458 Michael and Elisabeth Szilágyi agreed in Szeged with the palatine, Ladislas of Gara, and his wife, Alexandra, Duchess of Teschen, to offer the crown to Matthias, guaranteeing properties and influence of both parties. However, the contract was to be valid only after an oath in front of cardinals Carvajal and Szécsi. That was never done, probably because the prelates, on the pope's prodding, did not wish to assist in binding Matthias's hand; see András Kubinyi, "Szécsi Dénes bíboros prímás" [Primate Dyonisius Cardinal Szécsi], in Entz Géza nyolcvanadik születésnapára: Tanulmányok, (Budapest: OMVH, 1993), pp. 101-02; repr. in Idem, Főpapok, egyházi intézmények és valóság a középkori Magyarországon (Budapest: METEM, 1999), pp. 139-455. The agreement was also to be strengthened by Matthias's marrying the palatine's daughter, Anna of Gara, which, however, did not come to pass, for the young king arrived home engaged (for political reasons) to Catherine of Podebrady; József Teleki, A Hunyadiak kora Magyarországon [The Era of the Hunyadi in Hungary]. 12 volumes (Pest: Emich, 1852-57) 10:565-9.

The text of these articles is as follows:

1. First, that all seized churches and their estates and property belonging to them, as well as the estates or portions of the estates of prelates, barons and noblemen that were similarly seized in the period when no octave courts were held, that is, during the past three years,⁴ shall be returned within fifteen days, provided, that these occupations be proven with the testimony of neighbors and abutters and fellow noblemen of the county, as it is usual in extraordinary county assemblies;⁵ and if they should refuse to return these seized properties, they shall be condemned in the act of might without any further process, and the lord governor should be able to confiscate the properties and goods of such a condemned person and arrest him in his person.⁶

2. Then, that the lord king must protect and defend, in accord with his royal revenues, this kingdom of Hungary from all enemies and plunderers of this kingdom, thus that, if the lord king could not or would not be able to protect it with those resources from the attack of those enemies of the kingdom, then the prelates and barons and other ecclesiastics of the realm are required to arm and mobilize their banderia, that is, their men, according to the directions made in this respect by the holy kings of this kingdom. However should they be unable to repel the enemy even with these forces, then all noblemen and men of property of whatever station are required to go to camp and stay there in a soldierly manner, as it was the custom in the times of other kings of Hungary.

3. Then, that sentence and justice shall be delivered in every county in every case of damage, injury, and any other kind of crime, committed and done by anyone since the last feast of Saint Catherine the Virgin⁷ in the year of one thousand four hundred and fifty-six, in accordance with the orders and decisions passed at the recent diet held here, in Buda⁸ with the prelates, barons and other gentlemen of the realm of this kingdom of Hungary. This is against the privilege of the king and the count palatine; hence, this matter shall remain as ancient custom prescribes.⁹

⁴Octave court (octava) was the term of the session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times. Apparently, the attempts of 1454:15 to restore regular administration of justice were frustrated in the upheaval after 1456 and court sessions were for years not resumed.

⁵Extraordinary county assembly (proclamata congregatio): in major criminal cases county nobles were gathered in a single place and examined under oath. Abolished in the judicial reforms of 1486.

⁶Cf. 1447:7.

⁷25 November.

⁸See 1454:15.

⁹The last sentence contradicts the content of the preceding ones. Apparently, the nobility requested an expansion of the counties' jurisdiction, but in the final formulation of the decree, the governor (probably in

4. Then, that the four octave courts shall be held every year and never be missed for any other important reason, except when the general levy is called, neither shall they be postponed for any other reason.¹⁰

5. Then, that neither our lord king, nor lord Michael Szilágyi, governor of this realm, may demand any kind of tax or monetary payment from the tenant peasants of the gentlemen of the realm or of other nobles for any reason or action however urgent.¹¹

6. Then, that every fortification and castle erected and built by anyone in any county, from which looting and devastation was committed shall be razed, except those that are useful for that county. Thus those who, warned by the nobles of the county at the county court, do not demolish them within fifteen days, shall therefore by that action fall into the charge of infidelity and the lord king or the governor should have the right to punish such persons as faithless persons. And if a fortification in a county is to remain intact, it should remain intact with the force and testimony of letters of that chapter or convent and the noble magistrate of that county where the fortification was built.¹² concert with Palatine Gara and the barons) cancelled this decision. It is an interesting example of internal contradictions, shedding some light on the procedure of legislation, cf. also June 1458:43.

¹⁰ This promise was often given, e.g. in 1447:36 and 1453:10, but rarely held.

¹¹ Cf. 1446:6; 1453:6. The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate.

¹² Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia," in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66–73; now also T. Kőfalvi, "Places of Authentication (loca credibilia)," Chronica 2 (2002), 27–38. Noble magistrates were nobles elected by the county nobility to assist the ispán or alispán and at the same time represent their fellows.

7. Then, that the lord king may not give or grant either ecclesiastical honors nor other offices and positions or perpetual rights to foreigners.¹³

8. Then, that the king should diligently attempt to recover the castles and other properties granted to foreigners.

9. Then, that no ecclesiastical judge – archbishop, bishop or their vicars – may pronounce a sentence in cases other than dowries and paraphernalia, filial quarters, tithes, beating and blood shedding of clergy and women, wills, matrimonial matters, and perjury, as has been stated in the canons.¹⁴

10. Then that absolutely no one ought to exact either tolls or tithes from priests and noblemen (as is required by ancient custom of the realm).¹⁵

11. Then, that our lord king and lord governor Michael are required to administer justice and give satisfaction on behalf of any of their kinsmen or noble retainers¹⁶ to every complainant without ¹³ Almost verbatim repetition of 1453:3.

¹⁴ Cf. 1447:38 and its precedents, expanded by listing the cases where courts spiritual should have jurisdiction. Cases pertaining to the filial quarter were sometimes regarded as causae mixtae, for they implied property issues as well, which were, as a rule, not within the jurisdiction of courts spiritual. The filial quarter (quarta filialis) was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impositus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Antal Murarik (Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the Basic Institutions of Aviticitas] [Budapest: Sárkány, 1938], pp. 163–192) saw it as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished this provision (Inst. Bk. III, tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, “Vita a leánynegyedről” [Debates on the filial quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, “La ‘quarta puellaris’ dans l’ancien droit hongrois,” Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, “Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére.” [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Erik Fügedi The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998) pp. 45–6, Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 103–7.

¹⁵ On the exemption of nobles from tolls, see Comp. ante 1440:17, repeated regularly; on the exemption from the tithes, see 1439:19. The exemption of clergy has not been decreed in any surviving Hungarian law, but was generally accepted in medieval Europe.

¹⁶ The formulation is somewhat puzzling. Neither King-elect Matthias nor Governor Szilágyi had brothers alive (Ladislás Hunyadi was executed by King Ladislás in 1457; of Szilágyi's brothers Oswald died before 1452 and Ladislás is assumed to have been killed by the Brankovići some time before 1455). The expression fratres may have, however, meant the male members of the extended kindred of the Hunyadi. The most any favor; and their kinsmen or noble retainers may not oppress anyone among the inhabitants of this realm¹⁷ in any way.

12. Then, that new coins should be minted, whose value should never change: two hundred should equal one florin; four hundred obols should equal one florin.¹⁸

13. Then, that all gentlemen of the realm and men of property are required to gather together each year on the feast day of Pentecost, in person, in the city of Pest,¹⁹ and the lord governor or the king may confiscate the properties of those who cannot excuse themselves with good reason.²⁰

14. Then, that all walled cities and royal castles should be immediately returned to the hands of the aforementioned lord governor Michael.²¹

15. Then, that every man of property is bound to allow his tenant peasants, once they have received permission, rendered the lawful ground rent, and paid their other customary debts, to move from his estate to the estates of others in peace, safety and impunity, and without any litigation in accordance with the ancient custom of this realm. If someone should be unwilling to allow this, important persons among these were John Geréb of Vingard, Szilágyi's brother-in-law (thus the king's uncle) who was a military commander in the civil war preceding Matthias' accession, and Sebastian Rozgonyi, brother-in-law of the Pográc of Dengeleg brothers. Noble retainers (familiares) were lesser nobleman who chose (or, occasionally, were forced) to accept military or administrative positions in the service of a prelate, baron (q.v.) or major landowner. They kept their noble privilege and were subject to his senior (dominus) only for service, for which they received monetary compensation and occasionally land. The laws refer to them rarely, as in principle all noblemen were equally privileged and free (see 1351:11), but it can be inferred. The institution resembled West European vassalage, but was less formalized (often signaled by only a handshake in the castle gateway), less mutual, and rarely passed onto descendants. See: Fügedi, The Elefánthy. pp. 137–40; 199; Rady. Nobility, Land and Service, pp. 110–31,

¹⁷ Regnicola seems to mean here not only the “gentlemen of the realm” (the legally enfranchised nobility), as usual, but all subjects of the kingdom, just as e.g., in 1405/II:2, where they are paralleled to plebicolares.

¹⁸ Cf. 1447:37, with the added claim never to change this exchange rate.

¹⁹ The plan to hold the diet regularly at Pentecost did never materialize. The earliest known diets met at the feast of St. Stephen the King (August 20), see 1222:1, but from the fourteenth century onwards no regular date seems to have been observed. Although regular diets were held in the following years, they met at various dates (see also 1458:37).

²⁰ That nobles were to attend under penalty sheds light on the reverse side of their right to appear at the diet viritim (on which they often insisted): the long stay in Buda (or wherever else) placed considerable burden on less well-off nobles, who, therefore, chose not to attend the diet, or leave early. The regent in fact referred to the punishment decreed here in an invitation to Matthias's first diet in May 1458, see Iván Nagy et al., eds. Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkő. (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1907–31), 10:9.

²¹ This measure was already decreed in a decree (now lost) of 1455; see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Vera Bácskai, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1301–1457, (Budapest.: Akadémiai Kiadó, 1978), pp. 384–5. There must have been many castles usurped during the civil strife of 1456–57, of which we know that Buda was held by the Gara, Székesfehérvár probably by the Újlaki family, and many castles of Upper Hungary were in Jiskra z Brandísa's hands the ispán or alispáns and the noble magistrates of the pertinent county shall free such a tenant peasant with six marks, as is required by ancient custom. And if some people should disobey the ispáns, his royal majesty or his governor shall have the right to occupy the estate of such a person and keep it, until such a tenant peasant is freed with twelve marks.²²

16. Then, it was decided, in order to give full power to those letters of command²³ issued at the extraordinary county assembly which order a capital oath,²⁴ that at least six abutters, the same number of neighbors and twelve noblemen from the county must attest to them. And where the number of abutters is insufficient, the deficiency should be filled by the same number of neighbors.²⁵

Thus, we, yielding to the just request of the said lord prelates and barons and all the noblemen and lords, promise and fully intend on our part and on the part of the said lord king-elect Matthias, to keep, fulfill, and execute each and every one of the articles written above.

In witness of all these aforesaid matters, we decided to grant our present letter to the community of the lord prelates, barons, and noblemen of our said kingdom of Hungary.

²²This prohibition became referred to as the “statute of King Sigismund” (cf. DRH Matth. p. 87, n. XV/2); namely his Decretum maius, 1435/I:7. However, the fines were raised: from three to six and twelve Marks, respectively. Tenant peasant (jobagiones, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid. The prohibition of hindering them to do so was mainly in the interest of the lesser nobility, whose peasants were sometimes moved (or lured) to the estates of greater landlords who were able to offer better conditions. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005)

²³Letters of command (littere preceptorie) were mandates issued in a great variety of matters of administration or law.

²⁴Oath (iuramentum) was a mode of proof that survived in Hungary until the nineteenth century and was sworn by one or both litigants supported by a number of oath-helpers, as defined by the judge depending on the value of the case and the status of the oath-helpers. There were also special oaths, such as the oath sworn on the soil (iuramentum super terram, 1435/I:10) or the capital oath (iuramentum ad caput, see e.g. 1386:Preamb., 1435/I:4,6, 3 1458/I: 16; 5 II 32) that the defendant was not allowed to counter by his own oath. Such a decisive oath was also allowed when the plaintiff presented three favorable letters of inquest (based on an inquiry testified by a witness of a convent as place of authentication and a royal bailiff sent out for that purpose) and the defendant refused to submit to a fourth one.

²⁵On the role of the abutters and the comprovinciales at common inquests, see Erik Fügedi, “Verba volant... Oral Culture and Literacy among the Medieval Hungarian Nobility,” in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986), ch. VI, pp. 6-8.

Given in Pest, on the twenty-fourth day of the aforesaid diet, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and fifty-eight.

King Matthias I Corvinus from Corvina manuscript c. 1470

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY OF 1458

(1458 [June 8])

In spite of the ordinance of the regent Michael Szilágyi in January 1458, Matthias wanted to issue his own inaugural decree and, therefore, after his return to Hungary, he invited the estates to a diet in Pest. The invitations were issued for 28 May, but we have no evidence that the assembly began on that day; hence, the exact date of this decree—in the text dated “on the twelfth day” of the diet—remains conjectural.

In return for the king's oath about not collecting additional taxes (Art. 44), the deputies at the diet swore an oath, also in the name of those absent to observe the decree; see Iván Nagy et al., ed. Codex diplomaticus domus senioris comitum Zichy de Zich et Vásonkő. (Budapest: Magyar Tudományos Akadémia, 1907-31), 12: 256 (of 31 July, 1458).

MSS.: Four surviving originals; two on parchment, one with seal pendant (MNL OL DI 15252/2), one with seal en placard (MNL OL DI 15252/1), two on paper, one with extant (MNL OL DI 15252/3) and one with lost seal en placard (City Archives, Bardejov, Slovakia, No. 1058).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Gorgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 298-330; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818), pp. 135-61; Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], pp. 88-106.

LIT.: Vilmos Fraknói, Matthias Corvinus, König von Ungarn (1458-1490) (Freiburg i. Brsg: Herder, 1891), pp. 57-88; Lajos. B. Kumorowitz, “Mátyás király pecsétjei” [Seals of King Matthias], Turul 46 (1932): 5-19, György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary]. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), pp. 246-47, see also “Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary.” East Central Europe/L’Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 181–191.

Nos Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc., memorie commendamus per presentes, quod cum nobis quoque, ut ceteris regibus Hungarie divinitus regnandi tempus obvenisset et totius regni nostri corpore unum sentiente ad huius maiestatis fastigium fuisset sublimati, tandem habita generali conventionem in hac civitate nostra Pesthiensi prelati, barones, nobiles et proceres regni nostri universi inter alia, que pro bono statu et pace ipsius regni nostri hinc inde concorditer expedita et agitata sunt, exhibuerunt nobis concordi animo et presentarunt articulos infrascriptos, desiderantes et supplicantes, ut eos et in eis contenta rata habere, admittere et nos observaturos promittere dignaremur.

Quorum quidem articulorum tenor sequitur in hec verba:

I. Conclusum est, ut decretum condam serenissimi domini Alberti regis quoad omnes articulos preter articulum dumtaxat prosecutionis causarum plurimarum evocationum et trine forensis proclamationis exprimentem in suo vigore debeat remanere. Et quod regia maiestas antiquas leges et consuetudines huius regni sui et libertates regnicolarum eiusdem ecclesiasticorum scilicet et secularium et alterius status hominum ad statum et modum priorem, quantum de iure et cum honore suo ac prelatorum et baronum ac regni nobilium consilio et auxilio poterit, reducere, reintegrare et reformare, et tandem de cetero regnicolas in eisdem conservare teneatur et manutenere.

II. Atque maiestas regia pro tuitione regni et confiniorum eiusdem conservatione hominibus suis exercituantibus de stipendio regali dispositiones faciat sic, ut regnicole ab illis exercituantibus non afficiantur preda. Si autem afficerentur aliquo tempore, tales exercituantes veluti patratores actuum potentiariarum reputentur et super spoliis, rapinis et victualium exactionibus et verberationibus hominum per eos exercituantes in progressu exercituali commissis, fieri debeat evocatio cum insinuatione contra eosdem, qui veritate comperta in primis octavis in facto potentie convincantur instar aliorum patratorum actuum potentiariarum contra actores in causa; neque tales exercituantes in domibus nobilium condescendant. Exercitus vero generaliter regnicolis interim, donec huiusmodi stipendiarii exercituantes inimicis resistere poterunt, non indicetur, nisi tunc, cum tante et tam magne inimicorum multitudini supervenire contingeret, cui dominus rex de proventibus regalibus ac ex concurrentia banderiorum prelatorum et baronum et stipendiariis a viris ecclesiasticis more alias consueto debentibus resistere non posset, promulgetur. Alias autem dominus rex de proventibus regalibus et de banderiis prelatorum et baronum et ceteris dispositionibus ecclesiasticarum personarum exercituare teneatur. Nobiles regni in exercitu generali non ulterius, quam usque ad confinia et metas regni exercitualmente proficiscantur, ubi si inimici defuerint, solummodo per quindecim dierum spatium et non amplius in exercitu tali moram facere teneantur antiqua consuetudine regni requirente.

III.=1439:IV.

IV.=1439:V.

V.=1439:VI.

VI.=1439:VII.

VII.=1439:VIII.

VIII.=1439:IX.

IX.=1439:X.

X.=1439:XI.

XI.=1439:XIII.

XII.=1439:XIV.

XIII.=1439:XV.

XIV.=1439:XVI.

XV.=1439:XVI.

XVI.=1439:XVII.

XVII.=1439:XVIII.

XVIII.=1439:XIX.

XIX.=1439:XXI.

XX.=1439:XXIII.

XXI.=1439:XXIV.

XXII.=1439:XXVI.

XXIII.=1439:XXVII.

XXIV.=1439:XXVIII.

XXV.=1439:XXIX.

XXVI.=1439:XXX.

XXVII. Preterea, ut multimodis actibus potentiariis et novis attemptationibus via precludatur, statutum est et ordinatum, ut etiam preter et extra octavas evocationes breves super omnibus actibus potentiariis ab anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo quarto patratis possint fieri sub sigillo iudicatus specialis presentie regie proxime sculpendo, pro eodemque certum prothonotarium impresentiarum constituendum. Ita videlicet, quod idem prothonotarius domino rege ubicunque in regno suo procedente hic Bude semper perseveret et insuper sex prudentes et nobiles viri ex proceribus regni deputentur, qui et in rebus regiis agendis consilio pro arbitrio regio adhereant, quorum etiam opere et ingenio dicta iudicia pretextu dictarum brevium evocationum fienda continue exequantur. Huiusmodi autem evocationes breves fiant ad tricesimum secundum diem a die evocationis per hominem regium et testimonium fiende computandum, ad quem diem evocatus coram iudice debeat comparere; quodque littere regales super huiusmodi evocationibus emanande, si infra sexagesimum secundum diem execute non fuerint, deinceps viribus careant et cum illis evocatio fieri de cetero non valeat, prout antiquitus est observatum. Et dominus rex teneatur dictis sex nobilibus viris oportuno salarii disponere, ut ratione premissorum residentiam facere valeant. Insuper huiusmodi iudicia per nullas litteras regias prorogatorias pro quorumcunque parte emanandas dempta solummodo illorum parte, qui superius notificati sunt, possint prorogari. Atque ordinatum est, ut partes litigantes, quandocunque voluerint, absque requisitione iudicis et onere solutionis birsagiorum liberam inter se concordandi habeant facultatem.

XXVIII.=1447:XXV.

XXX.=1439:XXXIV.

XXXI. Item quod omnia fortalitia post decessum domini regis Alberti in quibuscunque comitatibus in detrimentum eorundem comitatum per quoscunque erecta usque ad festum beati Michaelis archangeli proxime venturum sub pena perpetue infidelitatis diruantur, demptis illis, que regia maiestas erecta esse voluerit pro necessitate regni cum consilio prelatorum et baronum.

XXXII. Item quod omnia castra, civitates, opida, vine, terre et quelibet portiones possessionarie et iura possessionaria similiter post decessum domini Alberti regis intra ambitum regni Hungarie per quoscunque occupata usque dictum festum beati Michaelis archangeli nunc venturum similiter sub pena perpetue infidelitatis illis, quorum sunt, remittantur, alioquin evocentur tales detentores cum evocatione brevi.

XXXIII. Item quod omnia castra, civitates, opida et quecunque iura, videlicet tricesime, tributa, quinquagesime, lucrum camere, proventus mardurinales et alie quecunque proprietates ad sacram coronam regiam ab antiquo pertinentia post obitum dicti domini Alberti regis a corona sacra indebite et sine iure alienata et erga quorumcunque manus sub quocunque titulo habita et existentia usque prefixum festum beati Michaelis archangeli nunc venturum manibus regiis remittantur, resignentur et reintegrentur sub eadem pena perpetue infidelitatis.

XXXIV. Item quod decime tam frugum et bladorum, quam vinorum sub qualibet dioecesi in quibuscunque comitatibus cum frugibus et bladis ac vinis in specie solvantur, hiis scilicet, quibus huiusmodi decime de iure debentur, frugesque et blada in campo in capetiis et manipulis congregata, sine fraude usque festum Assumptionis virginis Marie in quolibet anno sub custodia decimasolvere debentis relinquantur. Et si decime usque ipsum festum non levarentur per decimatores, et in campo ex eis decimis deperire contigerit, nullam propterea litis questionem is, cuius est decima, movere possit, neque ecclesiasticum interdictum imponere valeat. Statutum etiam est, quod huiusmodi decime integraliter in frugibus, bladis et vinis extradantur, nulleque occupationes horreorum et cellariorum per aliquos fieri debeant, sicut in aliquibus terris abusive facere consueverunt.

XXXV. Item iudices ecclesiastici de foro seculari et facto poessionario se non intromittant et si quispiam episcoporum factumulare adiudicaverit, convincatur in facto potentie, videlicet emenda capitis. Ubi autem aliquis vicariorum se intromiserit de facto seculari, ex parte talis archiepiscopus vel suus episcopus iustitiam facere teneatur. Tamen causas super dote et rebus paraffernalibus, iuribus quartalitiis, facto decimarum, dispositione testamentaria, vulneratione, verberatione clericorum et feminarum, et item super matrimonio ac periurio motas iudicandi habeant facultatem.

XXXVI. Item quod calumpniantes pauperes clerici convicti solvere non potentes captiventur et in carcere servantur.

XXXVII. Item conclusum est, ut in singulis festivitibus Penthecostes omni anno congregatio generalis omnium regnicolarum per singula capita fienda per regiam maiestatem publicetur et celebretur et celebrari mandetur.

XXXVIII. Item si aliquis regnicolarum maior vel minor aliqua presumptionis audacia ductus partialitatem practicaret et contraheret aut coniurationem aliquam in periculum et scandalum persone regie et regnicolarum facere attemptaret contra maiestatem regiam, nota perpetue infidelitatis ipso facto sit aggravatus, cui dominus rex preter voluntatem communitatis regnicolarum nequaquam gratiam facere valeat atque possit; universitasque fidelium regnicolarum in auxilium regium et suppressionem ac extremam perditionem talis persone temerarie partialitatem facientis per singula capita ad terminum ilium, quem regia maiestas deputaverit, mox insurgere et procedere teneatur sub vinculo corporalis iuramenti generalis superinde prestiti.

XXXIX. Item quod dicationes lucri camere temporibus statutis iuxta modum et consuetudinem ab antiquo observatam fiant, atque de capitibus dicarum non plus, quam duo denarii exigere possint.

XL. Item comites vel vicecomites sive iudices nobilium nunquam aliquid vadium nisi per universitatem nobilium comitatus transmissi exigere possint; alioquin lesionem, interemptionem et dampnificationem, si quam ibidem passi fuerint sufferant equo animo, nec unquam lesorem superinde valeant in causam convenire.

XLI. Item comites vel vicecomites et iudices nobilium birsagia non exigant nisi in congregatione generali iuxta antiquam consuetudinem.

XLII.=1447:XIV.

XLIII.=1447:VII.

XLIV. Item quod, prout dominus rex prestitit iuramentum, quod nullo unquam tempore super regnicolas et iobagiones regnicolarum taxa unius floreni vel medii floreni aut alie exactiones indebite ex quacunque ratione per dominum regem vel ad eum pertinentes petantur vel imponantur preter lucrum camere et alios proventus ex antiqua consuetudine regni exigere solitos.

XLV. Item quod castra, tenutas et possessiones regnicolarum per Bohemos et forenses occupatas et violenter ablatas, dummodo ex culpa notabili amissa non fuerint, dominus rex, si eadem vel easdem reobtinere poterit a manibus alienis, hiis, quorum existunt, restituat; hoc excepto, quod si ex traditione propria et inductione extraneorum hominum vel propter malam custodiam aliquis castra amiserit, ea dominus rex pro se valeat reservare.

XLVI. Item, quia ecclesie regularium personarum, videlicet abbacie prepositure diversorum ordinum ex inprovidentia et incuria patronorum ad extremam desolationem et ruinam sunt redacte, igitur ordinatum est, ut regia maiestas provideat de comodo ecclesiarum talium desertarum cooperantibus reverendissimis dominis archiepiscopis et episcopis, quatenus fiat visitatio et reformatio ordinum regularium et ecclesiarum earundem, ne diruantur.

XLVII. Ordinatum etiam est, quod dominus noster rex omnes abbatias et preposituras quorumcunque ordinum regularium idoneis viris regularibus cappatis et in regula ordinis peritis conferat, tamquam verus patronus et nemo alter. Donationes autem super iure patronatus quoad ecclesias regularium personarum predictarum per quoscunque reges quibuscunque facte nullius sint vigoris et viribus omnino cariture pronuntientur, preter illas ecclesias, quas fundaverunt certi fundatores, quorum corpora in ipsis ecclesiis existunt tumulata.

XLVIII. Item quod quicunque vel partem dominorum regis Mathie vel premortui Ladislai regi fovendo regnicolis aliqua dampna intulerint, relaxentur illis et hoc usque ad electionem ipsius domini Mathie regis et gubernatoris Michaelis fratris eiusdem. Excipiantur dumtaxat illi, qui non pro aliqua partium istarum guerras inchoaverint et regno regnicolisque dampna et nocumenta intulerint.

Nos igitur acceptis articulis prenotatis maturaque super eis deliberatione prehabita eosdem et omnia in eis contenta rata habuimus et admisimus, omnesque eos et singulos eorum inviolabiliter observare, complere et exequi promittimus et volumus cum effectu.

In quorum omnium testimonium presentes litteras nostras eidem universitati prelatorum, baronum et nobilium regni nostri duximus concedendas.

Datum in Pesth duodecimo die diei congregationis supradicte anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo octavo.

[8 JUNE] 1458

We, Matthias, by grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc. commend to memory by these presents that, when the time had come for us, as it had for the other kings of Hungary, to reign with divine favor and when, with the unanimous agreement of our entire realm, we had been raised to the summit of this majesty, a diet was held here in our city of Pest.¹ All our kingdom's prelates, barons, nobles, and lords, in addition to discussing and deliberating harmoniously at that diet matters concerning the good state and peace of our kingdom, with common accord offered and presented to us the following articles, and beseeched and requested that we deign to accept, confirm, and promise to observe these articles and their provisions.

The content of these articles is as follows:

1. It was decided that every article in the decree of the late, most serene lord, king Albert,² should remain in force, except for the article concerning the method of summons for prosecution of multiple cases and the provision for proclamation at three fairs.³ And that the royal majesty must restore, put aright, and reform the ancient laws and customs of this realm of his and the liberties of the gentlemen of the realm, that is of the ecclesiastics, the laymen, and men of other estates, to their prior state and condition as far as it can be done justly and fairly, with the counsel and aid of the kingdom's prelates, barons, and noblemen; and henceforth he must defend and keep the gentlemen of the realm in that state.

2. And that the royal majesty should make provision from the royal income for his men who fight to protect the realm and to defend its borders thus that the gentlemen of the realm do not suffer from the looting of these soldiers. And moreover, if they do so suffer at any time, such soldiers should be regarded as perpetrators of acts of might⁴ and should be cited with terminal summons

¹ Matthias was elected on 24 January 1458 and arrived in Buda on 14 February; where he was enthroned in the church of Our Lady (for the crown of Hungary was in the hands of Frederick III of Habsburg). He counted his regnal years from that date; see Radu Lupescu, "The Election and Coronation of King Matthias," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458- 1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008), pp. 191-5.

² See 1439:32. The articles repeated from that decree, even if in slightly changed formulation, will not be reprinted below. Significant minor additions are included in the notes.

³ It is not clear, why the detailed procedure described in 1439: 32 seems to have been abolished. Summons were first delivered to the respondent at his noble residence, giving notice of a lawsuit. If the respondent failed to attend court, then he would be summoned again. If he still failed to attend, the citatio trineforensis (announced on three fairs) was issued. There is no evidence that this practice would have been abandoned.

⁴ "Act of might" (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. By the late thirteenth century, "criminal cases" falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. A distinction was made between "major" and "minor" acts of might. It seems that the term also covered varieties of feuding as well as ritualized acts of violence that were aimed at forcing for the looting, robbing, confiscation of food, and physical violence committed by them while on campaign; and, once the truth has been established, they should be condemned at the first octave for the crime of act of might against the plaintiff, as in cases of other perpetrators of acts of might. Nor shall such soldiers billet in the houses of nobles. No general levy shall be called for the gentlemen of the realm as long as these paid soldiers are able to withstand the enemy, unless the enemy attacks in such size and number that the lord king is unable to resist them by relying on his revenues and the aid of the banderia of the prelates, barons, and the customary and obligatory paid soldiers of the clergy. Otherwise the lord king must wage war out of the royal revenues and with the banderia of the prelates, and barons, and the other stipendiaries of the clergy. The noblemen of the realm in a general levy shall not go further than the borders and boundaries of the kingdom. If the enemy is not at hand, they are obligated, as the ancient custom of the realm requires, to remain under arms for fifteen days but not longer.⁵

3=1439:4

4=1439:5⁶

5=1439:6

6=1439:7⁷

7=1439:8⁸

8=1439:9

9=1439:10

10=1439:11⁹

11=1439:13¹⁰

12=1439:14

the courts to quick action in otherwise protracted suits. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one.

⁵ This article repeats 1439:3, augmented by arrangements in 1447:8 and 40 and the limitation contained in Prop. 1432/33: 5.

⁶Cf. also 1444: 2, 10, 32 and 1445:19.

⁷ The king interpreted this article in a wider sense, when he cancelled exemptions from the chamber's profit (a direct tax that originated from the old practice of exchanging better moneys for worse ones) granted after the death of King Louis; see MNL OL DI 201357 of 24 April 1459, DRH Matth., p. 93, n. VI/3.

⁸ The 1439 text is augmented by a prohibition of clergy to hold secular offices.

⁹ The text does not repeat the monetary details of Albert's decree, but refers solely to the laws of Sigismund. In Regent Szilágyi's decree of January 1458Sz:12 the exchange rate was set at 200d for the florin, as in 1447:37.

¹⁰ The measures about the king's right to captives taken in war is here, in contrast to 1439:13, limited to campaigns in which no stipends were paid.

13=1439:15

14-15=1439:16

16=1439:17¹¹

17=1439:18

18=1439:19

19=1439:21

20=1439:23¹²

21=1439:24

22=1439:26

23=1439:27¹³

24=1439:28¹⁴

25=1439:29¹⁵

26=1439:30

27 Furthermore, in order to block the way of various acts of might and new delicts¹⁶ it was decided and ordered that besides and beyond the octaves, short summons should be available for all those acts of might committed since the year of our Lord one thousand four hundred and fifty-four, issued under the seal (to be cut forthwith) of the royal court of special presence, for which court a protonotary ought to be appointed straightaway.¹⁷ Thus, when the king is travelling somewhere in

¹¹ The article omits, logically, Albert's promise about the preservation of the borders to Austria, which Matthias could, of course, not guarantee.

¹² Here and in several subsequent articles the text of 1439 was altered by referring to the practice “in the times of the late King Sigismund,” even if no specific law of Sigismund is known to regulate the issue.

¹³ Augmented by a passage from 1435/I: 6.

¹⁴ Augmented by the words: nisi nobiles vineam vel agrum in alieno territorio tenentes, qui solvere debent (“excepting those nobles who hold vineyards and arable land on someone else's property, for they have to pay”). This suggests rental arrangements by noble landowners, which was widespread among nobles with no tenants, who were thus exempted from taxes for their own land, but not for that rented elsewhere (cf. also Reg 1467:1).

¹⁵ The article allows prorogation in cases of nobles on diplomatic missions or in the border fortresses; cf. 1435/I: 3, 6.

¹⁶ Whether there was some precise legal meaning attached to the frequently used expressions “new delicts,” or “new acts” or they merely intended to refer to crimes committed in the recent past, is not clear.

¹⁷ This new court with its power to cite accused parties on short notice, thus avoiding the delay of several months from one octave court—held four times a year—to another, was to be a successor of the “special royal presence,” a central court of justice which existed from ca. 1376 to c. 1430. Now it came to be professionalized insofar as the presiding secret chancellor was assisted by protonotaries (in Hungarian: itélőmester, “master of sentencing”, practical lawyer who became ever more important in the courts, see his country, the same protonotary should always stay here in Buda, and from among the lords of the realm, six nobles, men with legal expertise, should be commissioned who, when matters of the crown are at issue, would deliberate together in place of royal judgment, and by whose work and wisdom, trials arising from the said short summons may be regularly conducted.¹⁸ These short summons should be issued to the thirty-second day counted from the citation by the royal bailiff and the witness,¹⁹ at which time the cited party must appear publicly before the judge; and if the royal letters issued in such summons will not have been executed within sixty-two days, they shall lose their force and no one may be summoned with them, as has been ancient custom. And the lord king must grant a decent salary to the said six noblemen so they can establish residence for the abovementioned reasons. Moreover these trials may not be postponed by any royal letter of prorogation issued for anyone, except those who have been indicated above.²⁰ And it was also ordered that the litigant parties may reach an agreement freely any time they wish, without summoning a judge and, without the burden of paying fines.²¹

28=1447:35²²

Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség, passim). In fact, Matthias entrusted this court to the humanist poet, nephew of Bishop John Vitéz of Sredna, Janus Pannonius.

¹⁸*Proceres* are usually listed besides barons and nobles and may refer to those great men of the realm, who did not have court offices, but belonged to the group of magnates. We translate it as “lords.” The first jurors (as we may call them) of this court were indeed duly elected by the diet, though we know the name of only one, Magister Andrew of Torda; see Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség p. 247.

¹⁹The royal bailiff (homo regius) was the executive officer of a royal judge, who delivered summonses and assisted in the process of trial and punishment; also, an officer of the king, count or other lords, who performed similar tasks. It seems that in lawsuits bailiffs were selected by the litigants from among the nobles of their counties. Royal clerks were also commissioned as specially delegated royal bailiffs with powers more extensive than regular royal bailiffs.. The other person, referred to here as testimonium, was the witness sent by as place of authentication. Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, “Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter.” Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, “Administering the Law: Hungary’s Loca Credibilia.” in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35, and Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 66-73; now also T. Köfalvi, “Places of Authentication (loca credibilia),” Chronica 2 (2002), 27–38.. Citations for the thirty-second day, based on this law, were in fact issued, however, not only to the court of special presence but also to that of personal presence (a court presided over by a magnate). For examples see I Iván Nagy et al., ed. Cod. Dipl. Zichy 10: 5, 31, 41, and 152 as well as in MNL OL DI 33040.

²⁰ See Art. 25 (with n. 15), above.

²¹ The right to settle out of court was ancient custom, and often confirmed; e.g., 1435/I:4, 1439:30.

²² The fees to be paid for records are repeated from Sigismund's and Albert's decrees, specifying that they have to be counted in the money of that time. At the end, a sentence is added about poor clerics trespassing

29=1439:33

30=1439:36

31 Then, that every fortification built after King Albert's death²³ by anyone in any county for the detriment of that county should be demolished by the coming feast of Saint Michael the Archangel²⁴ under penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity,²⁵ except for those that the royal majesty, with the advice of the prelates and barons, may wish to have constructed for the needs of the realm.

32 Then, all castles, cities, market towns, villages, lands, any portions of property, and proprietary rights, similarly seized by anyone within the kingdom of Hungary after the death of the late King Albert, must be returned to their owners by the aforementioned feast of Saint Michael the Archangel under penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity, otherwise these usurpers will be cited with short summons.

33 Then, that all castles, cities, market towns or rights of whatever kind, that is, the thirtieth, tolls, the fiftieth, the chamber's profit, the *mardurina*²⁶ and any other proprietary rights that were unjustly and unlawfully alienated from the holy royal crown after the death of the said King Albert, be they in anyone's hands by any title, should be remitted, surrendered, and restored to the king's hands under the same penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity by the above set date of the coming feast of Saint Michael the Archangel.²⁷

34 Then, that the tithes of produce, grain, as well as of wine shall be paid in every diocese and every county,²⁸ in kind with produce, grain, and wine to those whom the tithes belong bylaw; each these regulations who are to be handed over to the archbishop and incarcerated for life (see also Art. 36, below).

²³ 27 October 1439.

²⁴ 29 September 1458.

²⁵ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes against the person of the king or the interests of the realm, and certain other major offenses (heresy, forgery and counterfeiting, violence against private persons and property) usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate..

²⁶ The thirtieth (tricesima) was a 5 % custom duty for imports and exports; the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) a direct tax that replaced in the twelfth century the royal income from annual change and devaluation of the money; the fiftieth was a special tax paid by the Vlach (Romanian) settlers in Transylvania, as far as known, in sheep, and the mardurina a direct tax mainly of the inhabitants of Slavonia, originally rendered in marten pelts, but at least since 1231 (see 1231: 20) in money.

²⁷ Cf. 1444:2 and 4. The return of royal properties and revenues was also included in 1458Sz:1 and 14.

²⁸ The rendering of the tithes in kind was first mentioned in the decree of 1351: 6, repeated in 1397:65-66, and many times after. It seems to have remained a point of contention between bishops (and tithe-farmers) year the produce and grain, collected into shocks and sheaves, shall be kept under the guard of the tithe-payer without fraud until the feast of the Ascension of the Virgin Mary.²⁹ And should the tithe-collectors not collect the tithe by that feast and should some of the tithe perish in the field, the owner of the tithe may not initiate any litigation and may not impose ecclesiastical ban. It was also ordered that such tithes shall be given wholly in produce, grain, and wine, and no one may seize granaries and barns, as was accustomed to happen, illicitly, in certain locations.

35 Then, that ecclesiastic judges should not interfere with cases pertaining to a secular court or concerning property issues;³⁰ should any bishop pass judgment in a secular case, he shall be condemned in the act of might, namely in his composition.³¹ Moreover, should any vicar interfere with a secular case, his archbishop or bishop shall deliver justice on his part. They shall, nevertheless have the right to pass judgment in cases of dower and paraphernalia,³² filial quarter,³³ tithe, last wills, injury and beating of priests and women, as well as in cases concerning matrimony and perjury.

and peasants paying the tithe as well as their overlords. See: Andor Csizmadia, "Die rechtliche Entwicklung des Zehnten (Decima) in Ungarn." Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, Kanonistische Abteilung, 61 (1975), 228–257. A more detailed monograph on the issue is still missing.

²⁹ 15 August.

³⁰ The delimitation of the jurisdiction of courts spiritual was a general feature in all medieval Europe. The conflict arose usually concerning cases based on a sacrament (such as marriage) or connected to the protection of orphans and widows, but implying property rights, which were regarded as strictly secular matters.

³¹ The bishop's composition was set at 100 marks silver, equal to that of the barons of the realm, cf.

Tripartitum I:9.

³² Dower (dos, dotalitium) was originally the "price of the bride" paid by the bridegroom's family to that of the bride, then a grant of the husband to his wife on the occasion of their marriage. The dower was usually given both in land and chattels, but the woman did not have free disposal of the land so given, which was managed together with her husband's goods. After her husband's death, the widow could keep the dower unless she remarried. In this case, the kinsmen of the deceased husband redeemed the dower from her. The term often also included those valuables that were brought by the bride in the marriage (res parafernales), which remained with the wife. See Erik Fügedi The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. Budapest: CEU Press, 1998, 24–6.

³³ The filial quarter (quarta [filialis]) was the hereditary portion of noblewomen due from the inherited estates of their fathers. The filial quarter was, in theory, paid in cash. In practice, however, it was often given out in land. In law, the grant of the quarter in land was only valid when the woman was married to a non-noble man (ignobilis or homo impossessionatus), or as a temporary substitute for cash payment, but in fact it was more widespread. Antal Murarik (Az ősiség alapintézményeinek eredete [Origin of the Basic Institutions of Aviticitas] [Budapest: Sárkány, 1938], pp. 163–192) saw it as having derived from Roman Law, in particular from the Lex Falcidia (cf. Inst., Bk. II, tit. 22). According to the Corpus Iuris Civilis of Justinian the rights of female children were the same as those of male children when a man died intestate. But the descendants of females had been entitled to a smaller portion of the estate than those descended from the males in the earlier Teodosian Code (5.1.4.), where the legacy granted to grandchildren in the female line was reduced by a fourth part (pars quarta) in favor of the agnates. Justinian specifically abolished

36 Then, that poor priests who are convicted of calumny and are unable to pay (the fine), should be arrested and detained in jail.³⁴

37 Then, it was decided that the royal majesty must call and hold, and order to be held, a diet of all the gentlemen of the realm in person every year on the feast of Pentecost.³⁵

38 Then, if anyone among the gentlemen of the realm, be he of major or minor status, moved by reckless daring, should devise and organize a revolt or attempt some plot, with danger and scandal to the person of the king and the gentlemen of the realm, he should by that action incur the penalty of perpetual taint of infidelity, and the lord king may not and can not pardon such a person without the consent of the community of the gentlemen of the realm; all loyal gentlemen of the realm are required, by force of their personal sworn oath, to take arms at once and march forth in person on the date set by the royal majesty, for the purpose of aiding the king in the suppression and final destruction of the person who rashly causes a revolt.³⁶

39 Then, that levying the chamber's profit shall be done on the usual date, in the ancient manner and custom, and no more than two pennies may be collected for the tallies.³⁷

this provision (Inst. Bk. III. tit. 1, c. 16). The discussions concerning this institution in medieval Hungary were summed up by Ferenc Eckhart, "Vita a leánynegyedről" [Debates on the filial quarter], Századok, 66 (1932), 408–415; see also József Holub, "La 'quarta puellaris' dans l'ancien droit hongrois," Studi in memoria di Aldo Albertoni (Padua: Milani, 1935), III, 275–297. See now, Péter Banyó, "Birtoköröklés és leánynegyed. Kísérlet egy középkori jogintézmény értelmezésére." [Inheritance of land and the filial quarter: An attempt on the interpretation of a medieval legal concept] Aetas 18:3 (2000): 76–92 and Fügedi The Elefánthy, pp. 45–6; Martyn Rady, Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000), pp. 103–7..

³⁴ Calumnia refers here, as usual in medieval Hungary, not to the Roman legal term for calumny but the offense which we translated as frivolous prosecution (Hung.: patvarkodás), i. e., unfounded and vexatious litigation. Such offenses as prosecuting the same case in two different courts, thus seeking satisfaction twice (via duplex), or claiming an obligation already settled (dupplici sub colore) were classified as calumnia. Anyone so convicted had to pay his man price. The term might include astatio falsi termini whereby a litigant appeared in court instead of another person, without a letter of attorney or summoned an adversary to a false term so as to mislead him and the court, thus obstructing the administration of justice. -- The reference to a jail (carcer) here, just as in Art. 28, above, implies the existence of ecclesiastical jails, but no information is known on these.

³⁵ For the demand to hold regular diets at Pentecost, see Jan. 1458:13, but the date did not become general practice

³⁶ For the charge of infidelity. See abover, n. 25/ 1447:10, refers explicitly to rebellion or conspiracy; in 1458 the measure may have aimed at possible opponents of the king, who then in the Summer of 1458 in fact conspired to depose him and offered the throne to Frederick III, who claimed the kingdom also by "hereditary right," see Karl Nehring, Matthias Corvinus, Kaiser Friedrich III. und das Reich. Zum hunyadisch-habsburgischen Gegensatz im Donauraum, 2d ed. (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1989), p. 14.

³⁷ Earlier regulations for the levy of the chamber's profit (from 1351:4-5 onwards) did not contain "usual dates." The capita dicarum (in Hung.: rovásnyél, "rod of assessment") were some kind of tallies. Lajos Thallóczy described one that survived, (by the courtesy of Károly Tagányi) in "Adatok a magyar pénzügyi kezelés történetéhez" [Data on Hungarian administration of finances], Magyar Gazdaságtörténeti Szemle

40 Then, the ispáns or alispáns or the noble magistrates may not accept any pledge, unless sent on a mission by the community of nobles of the county; and should they suffer insult, death or damage on this instance, they should endure it with patience, and may not sue the offending party on this account.³⁸

41 Then, the ispáns or alispáns and the noble magistrates should collect fines only at the county assemblies, in accordance with ancient custom.³⁹

42=1447:14

43=1447:7⁴⁰

44 Then, that, as the lord king has sworn under oath, neither the lord king nor his men may at any time levy or demand the tax of one or of half a florin or other unlawful exaction from the gentlemen of the realm for any reason, or from the tenant peasants of the gentlemen of the realm, except the chamber's profit and other revenues that used to be collected according to the ancient custom of the realm.⁴¹

45 Then, that the lord king shall return the castles, tenancies and estates of the gentlemen of the realm, occupied and taken with force by the Czechs and other foreigners – unless they were lost by carelessness – to those to whom they belong, if he can recover them from alien hands; with this exception: if someone handed over the castle voluntarily or under the influence of foreigners or lost it due to improper custody, those castles the lord king may keep for himself.⁴²

(1895): 119-20. The object, found by coincidence in a sixteenth century file, was a 5 cm long piece of thin wood. — On the fee of 2d for the assessment, see also 1478:4, 1481:6.

³⁸37. Cf. 1447:19. The measure seems to aim at limiting the right of the county's officials in imposing burdens (in the form of sureties), unless acting with the authorization of the community of the county. 1447:29 mentioned also fines, which are here omitted

³⁹Cf. 1435/I: 7 and 1447:20.

⁴⁰The text here adds a vague clause that seems to have altogether cancelled the strong wording of the measure, by stating: Nihilominus in hiis antiqua consuetudo regni firmiter observetur ("None the less, the old customs of the realm should be strictly observed in these matters"). In all likelihood, this clause was added by the barons or the royal chancellery to the text of 1447:7 that gave the county nobility considerable powers in fighting acts of might. Even though the present paragraph was less radical inasmuch as it transferred the powers to the king's appointee, the barons may have found it still too strong and managed to have the contradictory clause inserted. This is another case, where the surviving text reflects the politicking during which the dietal submission, though globally approved by the king, was altered before the decree's final issue (cf. also 1458Sz: 3)

⁴¹ Apparently, the king swore an oath at the diet, but not, as was usual at coronation diets, on the liberties of the realm in general, only on not levying taxes, in particular. As became usual, he did not keep his word. The one-florin subsidy "against the Turks" was levied in the fall of 1458, some time before 9 October

⁴² The reference to Czechs is mainly to the ex-Hussite brethren under Jan Jiskra z Brandísa, who, ever since the death of King Albert, held considerable territories in northern Hungary in the name of and loyal to the Habsburg party. Matthias succeeded in "buying out" Jiskra and hiring some of his troops only in 1462 (actually, they became the core of the king's later, famous mercenary army). Other foreigners holding Hungarian territory were the Austrians: Frederick III held at that time the cities of Sopron (Ödenburg),

46 Then, because monastic churches, that is, abbeys and chapters of canons of orders of whatever sort are on the verge of final destruction and decay due to the inadvertence and carelessness of their patrons, it was, therefore ordered that the lord king, with the cooperation of the most reverend lords archbishops and bishops should provide for the good state of these desolated churches, and that visitation and reform of the monastic orders and their churches should take place, so that they do not deteriorate.⁴³

47 It was also ordered that the lord king alone, as a true patron, should grant all abbeys and chapters of canons of each and every order to suitable religious men wearing the monastic habit and knowledgeable in the rules of the order. Moreover the donation of right of patronage over the churches of the said monastic men, given by any king to anyone shall be declared invalid and entirely null and void,⁴⁴ except for those churches founded by specific founders, whose bodies are buried in those same churches.⁴⁵

48 Then, amnesty is given to anyone, belonging to the party of lord king Matthias or that of the late lord king Ladislas,⁴⁶ who caused any damage to the gentlemen of the realm, provided that such damages were inflicted before the election of the lord king Matthias and his uncle, governor Michael.⁴⁷ But those who undertook feuds for neither of these parties and caused damage and losses to the realm and to its gentlemen, are exempt from this amnesty.⁴⁸

Kismarton (Eisenstadt), Kőszeg and Rohonc (Rechnitz), of which he released only Sopron in the 1463 peace treaty.

⁴³ On the condition of monasteries in late fifteenth-century Hungary, see E. Mályusz, Egyházi társadalom a középkori Magyarországon [Clerical society in medieval Hungary] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), pp. 211-54

⁴⁴ Several prelatures were occupied by secular lords; so, for example, the counts of Celje/Cilli held the bishopric of Zagreb by a grant from Queen Elisabeth (of Luxemburg) from 1440. Nicholas of Újlak held the abbey of Szekszárd occupied, and placed his own retainer at the head of the abbey of Petrovardin. On Nicholas, see Tamás Pálosfalvi, "Mikós Újlaki," in: Matthias Corvinus, the King. Tradition and Renewal in the Hungarian Royal Court 1458-1490. Exhibition Catalogue (Budapest: Budapest History Museum, 2008, pp. 267-8

⁴⁵ This is a reference not only to the so-called clan monasteries (some of which were founded as early as in the eleventh century as cultic centers of a noble lineage), but also to royal abbeys entrusted to secular commendatores; see Egyed Hermann, A katolikus egyház története Magyarországon 1914-ig [History of the Catholic church in Hungary until 1914], (Munich: Aurora, 1973), p. 199. Sometimes the royal right of high patronage was also given away to private lords; so, for example, the baronial family of Szécs (Szécsi) obtained the royal foundation of Szentgotthárd (a Cistercian abbey) from Sigismund, and its members were regularly buried there, see Elemér Mályusz, Das Konstanzer Konzil und das königliche Patronatsrecht in Ungarn (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1959), pp. 104-7

⁴⁶ Ladislas V (Posthumus) of Habsburg.

⁴⁷ That is, the period between the death of Ladislas V on 23 November 1457, and the election of Matthias Hunyadi on 23 January 1458.

⁴⁸ In fact, the king did not observe the restriction expressed in this article, and granted immunity for all violent deeds during the disturbances of 1457-58 to the Saxons of Transylvania; see DRH Matth., p. 105, n. XLVII/1.

We, therefore, having received the aforementioned articles, and after mature deliberation on them, have confirmed and accepted them and all their contents and promise and intend to keep, carry out, and execute each and every one of them without any infringement.

In witness of all these, we decided to issue these presents to the entire community of our kingdom's prelates, barons, and nobles.⁴⁹

Given in Pest, on the twelfth day of the aforementioned diet, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and fifty-eight.

CONCORDANCE

Kovachich Vestigia , Kovachich Sylloge	DRH Matth, dDRMH
I—II	I
III-IV	II
VIII
VIIV
VII V—VI
VIII VII
IX VIII
XXI

⁴⁹ There is no sealing clause and the surviving originals are sealed in different ways (see above) but all as letters patent, which was not rare with Matthias's decrees. In 1458, however, the king simply did not yet have a great seal of majesty Lajos Bernát Kumorowitz, "Mátyás király pecsétjei" [Seals of King Matthias], Turul 46 (1932): 5-19 here p. 7

XI	X
XII	XI
XIV	XII
XV	XIII
XVI	XIV—XV
XVII	XVI
XVIII	XVII
XIX	XVIII
XX	XIX
XXI	XX
XXII	XXI
XXIII	XXII
XXIV	XIII
XXV	XXIV
XVI—XXVII	XXV
XXVIII	XXVI
XXIX—XXXIV	XXVII
XXXIV—XXXVIII	XXVIII
XXXIX	XXXIX
XL	XXX
XLI	XXXI
XLII	XXXII
XLIII	XXXIII
XLIV—XLV	XXXIV
XLVI—XLVII	XXXV
XLVII	XXXVI
XLVIII	XXXVII

XLIX

L

LI

LII

LIII

LIV

LV

LVI

LVII

LVIII—LIX

LV

XXXVIII

XXXIX

XL

XLI

XLII

XLIII

XLIV

XLV

XLVI

XLVII

XLVIII

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY OF 5 JANUARY 1459

King Matthias had called the diet in order to discuss the defense of the realm, the recovery of the Holy Crown, and negotiations with King Stephen Thomas of Bosnia. The urgency of defense was due to the fact that in August 1458, the important fortress of Golubac on the lower Danube fell into Ottoman hands, and the king's campaign in the fall did not relieve it. Turkish incursions increased, and the king intended to levy an extraordinary subsidy, but seems to have found it necessary to obtain the approval of the estates. The urgency may also explain why only four deputies were invited from every county. It was a special feature that at this occasion the towns were requested to send their seals with their deputies, probably because the king wanted them to confirm an agreement on subsidies. Several invitations to cities and counties have survived, see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], p. 107, n. 1.

The decree's main thrust is to strengthen the levy and the portal militia. There is, however, no evidence that an army organized according to these arrangements would have been called up within the subsequent year, for which the decree was to have validity.

MSS.: Two originals on paper, one (MNL OL DI 15205) with fragments of a seal en placard, the other (Košice City Archives, Additamentum Schramianum 19184) damaged, unsealed; one simple copy (MNL OL DI 31701).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Martinus Georgius Kovachich, Vestigia comitiorum apud Hungaros ab exordio regni eorum in Pannonia, usque ad hodiernum diem celebratorum. (Buda: Regia Universitas, 1790), pp. 335-47; Johannes Nicolaus Kovachich, Sylloge decretorum comitialium inclyti regni Hungariae, quae in vulgato corpore juris hungarici, hactenus, aut penitus desiderabantur, aut aliqua sui parte, manca referebantur et oblivion postliminio, recenter erepta sunt. (Pest: Trattner, 1818), pp. 161-78; DRH Matth., pp. 107-18.

LIT.: András Borosy, "The militia portalis in Hungary before 1526" in: János M. Bak and Béla K. Király, ed. From Hunyadi to Rákóczi: War and Society in Medieval and Early Modern Hungary (Brooklyn: Social Science Monographs, 1982), pp. 19-22; Magyarország hadtörténete [Military history of Hungary], ed. Ervin Liptai, 2d ed., (Budapest: Zrínyi, 1990) 1:111-6; Lajos Bernát Kumorowitz, "Mátyás király pecsétjei" [Seals of King Matthias], Turul 46 (1932): 5-19.

Nos Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, Dalmatie Croatie etc. significamus tenore presentium quibus expedit universis, quod cum hiis diebus post labores nostros regios bellicos pro disponendis rebus nostris et regni negotiis, per nos consumptos de partibus inferioribus regni nostri in hanc civitatem nostram Zegendiensem feliciter venissemus, tandem habita generali congregatione prelati, barones, nobiles ac de unoquoque comitatu quatuor electi cum plena facultate missi totum regnum representantes inter alia, que pro bono statu et pace ac defensione ipsius regni nostri hincinde concorditer expedita sunt, exhibuerunt nobis concordi animo et presentaverunt articulos infrascriptos, desiderantes, ut eos et in eis contenta rata habere, admittere et nos observaturos promittere dignemur.

Quorum quidem articulorum tenor sequitur in hec verba.

I. Dispositum est, quod serenissimus princeps dominus Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, dominus noster gratiosissimus banderia sua pro custodia persone sue et tutela regni sui iuxta facultatem suam levare teneatur; et quod universa oppida, possessiones et provincie regales ubilibet intra ambitum regni adiacentia, demptis dumtaxat civitatibus et oppidis illis regalibus, que cum eorum ingeniis bellicis labores belli sufferunt, connumerentur ad numerum singulorum viginti iobagionum modo infrascripto, et regia maiestas facultatem habeat constituendi eos sub banderio, quo voluerit bellaturos. Prelatorum vero iobagiones sub propriis eorum banderiis secundum connumerationem exercituare tenebuntur, nobiles vero ecclesiarum exercituare teneantur more antiquitus consueto, et non secundum connumerationem.

II. Item nobiles regni Slavonie secundum connumerationem reliquorum regnicolarum exercituare teneantur.

III. Item quod omnes prelati, videlicet archiepiscopi, episcopi ac maiores abbates et prepositi, sicuti tempore condami Sigismundi regis cum eorum banderiis et numero lancearum exercituarunt, ita et in presentiarum exercituare teneantur. Minores vero abbates et prepositi, capitula et conventus ceterique viri ecclesiastici possessionati secundum connumerationem iobagionum suorum modo infrascripto exercituare debeant. Si qui autem ex ipsis in eorum proventibus defecissent, illi secundum quantitatem proventuum eorum banderia sua levare teneantur, quos dominus rex videre debeat.

IV. Tandem barones seculares, quibus dominus rex ad levanda eorum banderia de proventibus regalibus sallaria dare tenetur, huiusmodi banderia eorum cum exercituantibus ex iobagionum suorum connumerandorum resultantibus integrare non debeant, sed ipsos exercituantes iobagionum connumeratorem preter banderia sua faciant exercituare et huiusmodi exercituantes in singulis comitatibus sub ductoribus belli dare teneantur.

V. Exinde universi barones et nobiles ac possessionati homines ubilibet intra ambitum regni constituti, tam scilicet maiores, quam minores iuxta premissam connumerationem, utpote de singulis viginti iobagionibus census domino suo solventibus cum uno armigero equite bene armato, gladio, clipeo, pharetra et arcu vel lancea fulcito exercituare teneantur. Excipiantur tamen inquilini vulgo seller de huiusmodi connumeratione.

VI. Atque lucrum camere iuxta antiquam consuetudinem et non secundum connumerationem premissam temporibus solitis ad numerum portarum dicetur. Per hocque Rutheni, Wolachi et Sclavi, qui alias lucrum camere solvere non consueverunt, ad solutionem eiusdem lucri camere non compellantur.

VII. Demum dominus rex eligat connumeratores nobiles ex eodem comitatu, qui connumerationem facere teneantur, recusantem autem pena quinquaginta marcarum puniat et ab eo irremissibiliter exigi faciat. Preterea dominus rex capitaneum eligat comitem proprii comitatus vel alium fidelem, quem maluerit, cui dicti connumeratores ipsorum registra assignent atque etiam paria registri huiusmodi connumerationis modo simili regie maiestati dare teneantur.

VIII. Subinde dum dominus rex contra potentiam inimicorum banderium suum levare voluerit et cum prelatis et baronibus suis levare fecerit, tunc universi regnicole secundum connumerationem predictam exercituare teneantur, et id arbitrio regis subiiciatur, quando erit necessarium. Et quodsi dominus rex universos comitatus ad tres menses in toto vel in parte exercituare iusserit, id fiat pro voluntate et arbitrio suo, in presenti uno anno ad tres menses tantum.

IX. Expost quando dominus rex cum prelatis et baronibus suis personaliter ad exercitum qualemcunque modo prenotato sua banderia et dictorum suorum prelatorum et baronum levando proficiscitur, extunc etiam universi nobiles regni, maiores scilicet et minores cum eorum gentibus exercitualibus connumeratis personaliter cum eodem domino rege iuxta consuetudinem antiquam usque metas regni tantum, unusquisque secundum suum posse ire teneatur; et dum ipse dominus rex de huiusmodi exercitu redire voluerit, regnicole ipsi cum eodem redire valeant. Si vero ultra et extra metas huius regni personaliter exercituare voluerit, universitas nobilium iuxta consuetudinem regni ultra ipsas metas cum eo exercituare non teneantur, sed gentes ipsorum connumerate sub conductu capitaneorum illac, quo regia maiestas voluerit, infra dictos tres menses integros et non amplius exercituare teneantur.

X. Denique si castrum Nandoralbense et alia castra finitima cis flumina Danubii et Zawe et in eorum littoribus adiacentia multitudo inimicorum circumvallaverit et dominus rex banderia sua levare voluerit, ac prelatorum et baronum suorum banderia levare fecerit, tunc omnes regnicole personaliter secundum connumerationem ad defensionem eorundem castrorum ire teneantur.

XI. Item nobiles iobagiones non habentes iuxta facultatem et fidelem revisionem electorum connumeratores levantur. Simples vero et pauperes facultatem exercituandi in personis et rebus non habentes numero decem unum pharetrarium idoneum modo pretacto bene dispositum mittere teneantur cum expensis ad tres menses. Nobiles vero inferiores, qui pauciores quam decem habent iobagiones, connumerentur cum nobilibus, qui nullum habent iobagionem. Iobagiones siquidem eorum connumerentur cum iobagionibus aliorum nobilium usque ad numerum viginti. Et si aliquis nobilium decem habuerit iobagiones, personaliter ad exercitum ire teneatur.

XII. Insuper si aliqui regnicolarum in diversis comitatibus iobagiones habuerint, tales iobagiones legitima revisione dictorum connumeratores electorum connumerentur, et certificati venire debeant ad comitatum, in quo dominus talium iobagionum commoratur, et sub comite illius comitatus exercituare teneantur.

XIII. Exhinc si quispiam nobilium iobagiones habentium ab aliquo prelato vel barone ad numerum lancearum aut aliter pecunias levaverit, extunc exercituantes suos de connumeratione iobagionum suorum resultantes preter et ultra numerum exercituantium ad pecuniam acceptam levantium teneatur facere exercituare sub conductu capitanei illius comitatus.

XIV. Deinde si homines connumeratores et ductores belli singulorum comitatum in eorum prescriptis expeditionibus fraudem vel favorem sive pactationem aliquam gratia relinquendi aliquos ab exercituatione commisisse reperti fuerint, et in eo legitima certitudo experietur, tales in homagio eorum convincantur eo facto.

XV. Item si dominus rex ac prelati et barones huiusmodi levationem exercitus, dum necessitas evenierit, modo et ordine prenarratis facere non vellent, extunc neque regnicole preter formam antique libertatis et decreti exercituare teneantur compellanturque.

XVI. Demum quia connumeratores in propriis eorum expensis huiusmodi connumerationem facere debent, ob hoc ab exercituatione personali eximantur, de connumeratis tamen eorum iobagionibus exercituari facere tenebuntur.

XVII. Ceterum nullus regnicolarum tam maiorum, quam minorum aliquam pecuniam cuiuscunque numeri aliquibus capitaneis vel ductoribus belli gratia remissionis alicuius de exercitu vel relaxationis alicuius ab exercituatione dare presumat, alioquin tam dans, quam etiam recipiens in facto potentie et sententia capitali convincatur.

XVIII. Item iobagiones tam regales, quam aliorum quorumcunque a die, quo presens constitutio in sede iudiciaria cuiuslibet comitatus promulgata fuerit, usque integram dicti exercitus anni revolutionem causa commorandi hincinde non deducantur; quodsi factum fuerit extunc ductor belli sive comes talis comitatus cum pena decreti sex marcarum talem iobagionem pristino domino suo reddat sine omni protelatione et favore.

XIX. Insuper quod occupationes possessionum secundum formam decreti Pesthiensis remitti et acquiri debeant.

XX. Item quia quamplurimi Wolachi, Rutheni et Sclavi fidem Wolachorum tenentes rustici, qui alias ad lucrum camere regie numerari asueti non fuissent, tales tam regales, quam aliorum ad presentem exercitum connumerari debeant, et insuper, prout et quemadmodum alias exercituare consueti sunt, exercituare teneantur. Excipiantur tamen Comani, Philistei et Tartari, qui iuxta antiquam consuetudinem exercituabunt, secundum quod Saxones.

XXI. Item quia Comani et Philistei per officiales regios de possessionibus prelatorum, baronum et nobilium potentialiter abducuntur, itaque in talibus agatur, secundum quod fuit consuetudo temporibus antiquorum regum.

XXII. Subsequenter dominus rex omnes octavas et breves evocationes continue iuxta decretum celebrare et iudicare per prothonotarium et iudices deputatos faciat, et non prorogentur, nisi tempore levationis exercitus supradicti secundum formam decreti Pesthiensis, et sigillum specialis presentie sue dandi ad conservandum, cui maluerit, cum idem sue maiestatis est, habeat facultatem.

XXIII. Item servientes nobilium, videlicet aratores, fabri, prediales et sartores, victum et amictum de curiis nobilium habentes ad connumerationem predictam non computentur, etiamsi nobilis esset. Provisor curie, quorumcunque nobilium una persona nobilis ab ingressu exercitus supportetur. Sed et senescali, dapiferi, pincerne supportentur in propriis personis. Et quia castra regnicolarum sine provisione relinqui non possunt, igitur castris in eisdem secundum necessitatem eorundem iuxta estimationem connumerorum electorum castellanus vel castellani relinquuntur; ex duobus enim castellanis unus remittatur, alter exercituare compellatur. Preterea sunt plures nobiles, qui quodammodo statum baronie, seu alium honestum statum ultra ceteros nobiles habent, tales pro honestiori statu suarum uxorum nobiles in numero iuxta estimationem dictorum connumerorum in domibus suis relinquere poterunt. Omnium tamen talium castellanorum et nobilium, senescali, dapiferi, pincerne, provisionis curie per connumeratores ante connumerationem in huiusmodi eorum officio repertorum ex quacunque causa domi remanentium iobagiones connumerentur per connumeratores prenotatos.

XXIV. Insuper magistri prothonotarii et sex assessores iurati iudicantes et procuratores regii exercituare non teneantur, sed quilibet eorum pro se mittat unum pharetrarium; et quod eorum iobagiones connumerentur, atque iudices nobilium ab ingressu exercitus non remittantur, sed exercituare teneantur.

XXV. Item ex pluribus fratribus in uno victu existentibus unus eorum pro aliis exercituare possit; et qui stipendium receperit, per hoc fratres sui non sint exempti a presenti exercituatione, sed unus eorum exercituare teneatur modo premissis.

XXVI. Ceterum nullus exercituantium in domibus quorumcunque nobilium descendere ausus sit, nisi affuerit voluntas illius nobilis. Et quod omnes exercituantes universa victualia in descensibus ipsorum secundum priorem cursum victualium, in quo vendebantur, priusquam exercitus illac veniret, usque ad locum deputatum, ubi constitui debebunt, emere et comparare teneantur; constituti tandem in loco deputato emant et comparent victualia pretio, quo poterunt. Ubi autem, prout hactenus sunt asueti, ipsa victualia sine solutione quipiam receperint, extunc tam descendentes in domibus nobilium preter voluntates eorum, quam victualia diripientes iuxta formam decreti Pesthiensis puniantur.

XXVII. Item quicumque regnicolarum exercituantium cuiuscunque status et preeminentie existat, nobilis scilicet et ignobilis, de exercitu supradicto clandestine vel aliter qualitercunque recesserit, talis omnia bona et caput amittat eo facto, absque tamen pena domini talis recedentis, si fuerit idem sine dolo et fraude, super quo idem dominus ipsius recedentis prestare debeat iuramentum, quod recessit sine voluntate sua.

XXVIII. Deinde vidue, orphani, debiles ac membris orbat, senes, pueri et alii quilibet, quod tali defectu tenentur, quod personaliter exercituare non possent, tales non teneantur exercituare, pro personis tamen eorum propriis singuli eorum mittere teneantur, quorum etiam iobagiones, sicuti ceterorum, connumerentur. XXIX. Tandem regnicole teneantur post agnitionem litterarum regiarum infra viginti quinque dierum spatia secundum connumerationem insurgere, et illac, quo rex iusserit, procedere ita, ut ipso vigesimo quinto die in loco deputato constituentur et a die illa, in qua illinc constituentur, prefati tres menses debeant computari.

XXXI. Item quod a festo Circumcisionis Domini proxime preterito usque ad aliud festum Circumcisiones Domini in alia revolution annuali venturum et non ulterius regnicolas dominus rex ad levandum exercitum connumeratura compellat.

XXXI. Preterea si tam magna potentia inimicorum contra hoc regnum veniret, quod dominus rex cum potentia sua ac prelatis et baronibus suis et exercituatione premisse dispositionis dictorum inimicorum potentie resistere non possit, extunc universitas regnicolarum per singula capita cum equitibus et peditibus eorum insurgere et penes dominum regem exercitualmente venire debeant tamdiu, donec necessitas exposcerit.

XXXII. Postremo si aliquis baronum spiritualium vel secularium, necnon regnicolarum major, vel minor premissa facere non vellet, notam perpetue infidelitatis incurrat, sed heredes eiusdem propter huiusmodi notam infidelitatis ius proprium non amittant, nec propter hec iidem heredes infideles habeantur.

Nos igitur acceptis articulis prenotatis maturaque super eis deliberatione prehabita eos et omnia in eis contenta, cum ad utilitatem rei publice commodumque regni nostri ac precipuam defensionem eiusdem ab universis hostibus utiliter et integerrime complecti videbantur, rata habuimus et admisimus, omnesque eos et singulos eorum inviolabiliter observare, complere et exequi promittimus et volumus cum effectu.

In quorum omnium testimonium presentes litteras nostras universitati prelatorum, baronum et nobilium regni duximus concedendas.

Datum Zegedini predicta in congregatione generali, in vigilia festi Epiphaniarum Domini, anno eiusdem millesimo quadringentesimo quinquagesimo nono

5 JANUARY, 1459

We, Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc., make known to all whom it may concern by these presents that, in these days, when, after completing royal military efforts to put in order our affairs and those of the realm, we felicitously arrived in this, our city of Szeged from the southern parts of our realm,¹ a diet was then held. The prelates, barons, and four nobles elected from every county with full authority and representing the entire realm, in addition to discussing harmoniously matters concerning the good state, peace, and defense of our kingdom, with common accord offered and presented to us the following articles, and beseeched us that we deign to accept, confirm, and promise to observe these articles and their provisions.

The content of these articles is as follows:

1 It was ordered that the most serene prince, lord King Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, our most gracious lord, shall levy his *banderia*² for the protection of his own person and for the defense of his realm to the best of his abilities; and all the royal market towns, estates and provinces, located anywhere within the realm – with the exception only of those royal cities and towns that take part in the burdens of warfare with their military skills³ – shall be enumerated in the manner described below, for every twenty tenant peasants⁴, and the royal majesty shall have the right to assign them to banderia as soldiers wherever he wishes.⁵ The tenant peasants of the ¹Matthias returned to Szeged from a minor campaign on the southern border, which brought no results.

²*Banderia*, (from the Italian bandiera, ‘banner’) were troops supplied by the king, the queen, the barons and prelates (later also by other major landowners) in return for their landholdings. Probably introduced in the late thirteenth century, they were regulated systematically in the fifteenth and sixteenth. The size of a banderium varied from 400 to 1000 horsemen, mainly heavy cavalry (occasionally light cavalry, hussars). Here, apparently, the so-called militia portalis (soldiers mobilized according to the number of tenant holdings) is also included into the banderia. They usually were sent to war under the command of the county ispán; (see below, Art. 4). In general, see Borosy, “The militia portalis.”

³The role of towns in military technology is documented in several charters, in which the towns supply cannon and other siege weapons partly of their own, partly the king's, entrusted to their care, see József Teleki, A Hunyadiak kora Magyarországon [The Era of the Hunyadi in Hungary]. 12 volumes (Pest: Emich, 1852-57), 11: 226, 348-9, 570; also: Zoltán I. Tóth, Mátyás hadügyi politikája [Military policies of King Matthias I] (Budapest: Élet, 1912), p. 21; more recently: András. Kubinyi, “Városaink háborús terhei Mátyás alatt” (German resume “Kriegslasten unserer Städte unter König Matthias Corvinus”), in Házi Jenő Emlékkönyv, pp. 155-67 (Sopron: Soproni Levéltár 1993).

⁴Tenant peasant (jobagio, from Hung. jobbágy) was the status of the majority of the agrarian population in medieval and early modern Hungary (down to 1848). They were personally free, obliged to render dues in kind, money and labor to the lord of the land on which they lived. Their plots were de facto heritable, though not their property. Tenant peasants had the right to move (or to be moved) to another lord, once their dues were paid.. The prohibition of their doing so was mainly in the interest of the lesser nobility, whose peasants were sometimes moved (or lured) to the estates of greater landlords who were able to offer better conditions. For a summary of their fate, see János M. Bak, “Servitude in the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: A Sketchy Outline” in Forms of Servitude in Northern and Central Europe: Decline, Resistance, and Expansion, ed. Paul Friedmann and Monique Boruin, pp. 387–400 (Turnhout: Brepols, 2005).

⁵ Cf. 1435/II: 4; 1454:9.

prelates will be obliged to go to war with their own banderia, according to the enumeration while the nobles of the churches must go to war in accord with ancient custom and not according to the enumeration.⁶

2 Then, noblemen of the kingdom of Slavonia must go to war according to the enumeration of the rest of the gentlemen of the realm.⁷

3 Then, that all prelates, that is, the archbishops, bishops, major abbots, and provosts must go to war just as they did in the time of the late king Sigismund, so must they now do: with their banderia and contingents of their lances. Minor abbots and provosts, chapters and convents, and other propertied ecclesiastics, however, must go to war according to the enumeration of their tenant peasants as described below. However, should the income of anyone decline, that person must raise his banderium in proportion to his income, which the lord king must examine.⁸

4 Furthermore, the lay barons, to whom the lord king is obliged to pay a salary from the royal revenues for raising their banderia, must not use these banderia to complete the number of soldiers coming from among their enumerated tenant peasants, but they should send the enumerated soldier-tenant peasants to war separately from their banderia, and these soldiers must serve under the command of the commander in each county.⁹

5 Moreover, all the barons, noblemen, and men of property, both of minor and major status, wherever they live in the realm, must go to war in accordance with the aforementioned enumeration, that is, with one well-armed mounted soldier, equipped with sword, shield, quiver, and bow or lance, for every twenty tenant peasants who pay rent to their lord. The landless peasants, called zsellér, however, are exempted from the enumeration.¹⁰

⁶ Lesser noblemen, who held their land (predium) from the church, were called nobiles prediales. Prediales, who were not all dependent on churches, enjoyed many of the rights of “true nobles,” such as freedom of taxation, immunity from local justice, and inheritable possession, but they were not immediately under royal jurisdiction and their properties escheated not to the crown, but the ecclesiastical body from which they held it. They could not take part in the life of the county, were not represented at the diet, and had no right to acquire additional noble (unencumbered) property or to keep tenant peasants. This “mediated” position placed them between commoners and true nobles on the social scale, see Martyn Rady Nobility, Land and Service in Medieval Hungary. (Houndmill, Basingstoke: Palgrave, 2000) pp. 79-84.

⁷ Cf. 1454:9 and above, n. 2.

⁸ The reference is to the Register of King Sigismund (Prop. 1432/3: 21), codified in 1435/II: 1 and 1439: 19. However, the king granted exemption to some of the people of the nuns of Óbuda in the same year (MNL OL DI 15381 and 19220).

⁹ Cf. 1397:6; 1435/II: 2; 1454:4.

¹⁰ Cf. 1397:6; the ratio of soldiering peasants was changed in the subsequent laws (e.g., 1435/II:2 , 1454:4), and the 20:1 became the standard for the rest of the Middle Ages. In the older literature one finds references to this law as the origin of the well-known Hungarian word for light cavalryman, huszár (hús=twenty). This is an error, for the word comes from a much older Southern Slav word meaning “robber, highwayman,” and is used in this meaning in a Hungarian charter of 1378 as well as several times in the earlier fifteenth century; see, A magyar nyelv történeti etimológiai szótára [Historical-etymological dictionary of the

6 The chamber's profit shall be exacted according to the ancient custom on the usual dates, by the number of portae and not according to the aforementioned enumeration.¹¹ Accordingly, the Ruthenians, Vlachs, and Slavs, who hitherto did not customarily pay the chamber's profit, are not bound to pay the same chamber's profit.¹²

7 The lord king in addition, shall choose noblemen from the same county as enumerators, who must accomplish the enumeration, and he shall punish the reluctant ones with a fine of fifty marks and shall without exception collect it from them. Moreover, the lord king shall choose the county's own ispán or some other loyal man of his choice as commander,¹³ to whom the said enumerators shall hand over their register and they must similarly hand over to the royal majesty another copy of this register.¹⁴

8 Further, when the lord king wishes to call to arms his banderia against the forces of the enemy and makes his prelates and barons call to arm theirs, all the gentlemen of the realm must go to war according to the aforesaid enumeration, and it should be up to the king's decision when this is

Hungarian language] (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1970), 2: 174.— Due to the partible inheritance and other factors, the number of landless peasants (inquilini) increased in the later Middle Ages; many of them lived on tenant peasants' plots and supplied the wage labor in times of seasonal employment. See István Szabó, "Hanyatló jobbágyság a középkor végén" [Decline of tenant peasants at the end of the Middle Ages], in Idem, Jobbágyok, parasztok: Értekezések a Magyar parasztság történetéből, István Für, ed. (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1976) pp. 167-200.

¹¹The chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) was originally the king's income from minting and especially from the repeated exchange of better money for less valuable coins; in this form first mentioned in 1231, but certainly earlier than that date. By the late thirteenth century, by which time the original way of gaining this income has been abandoned, the chamber's profit had become a direct tax but retained its name until the end of the Middle Ages; see Lajos Thalóczy, A kamara haszna (Lucrum camerae) története... [History of the chamber's profit (lucrum camerae) in the context of taxation in Hungary] (Budapest: Weizsmann, 1879). In around 1459 the royal income from this tax was ca. 40 thousand gold florins, to be increased by the reforms of Matthias to almost 400 thousand; see János M. Bak, "Monarchie im Wellental: Materielle Grundlagen des ungarischen Königtums im späteren Mittelalter", in R. Schneider, ed., Das spätmittelalterliche Königtum im europäischen Vergleich. (Sigmaringen: Thorbecke, 1987), pp. 347-87, here 360.

¹² Cf. 1454:9., however, Slavs and Ruthenians are not mentioned there, nor in the Register of Sigismund (Prop. 1432/33), where only the Vlachs are listed among the soldiering people. Medieval Hungarian usage referred to those Slavic hospites of proto-Slovak and Ruthenian origin who were settled in the Carpathian region ever since the thirteenth century as Sclavi et Rutheni. After the ebbing of the Western settlers in the fourteenth century, Slavs from the neighboring regions were granted the same rights of jus theutonicum as the earlier German migrants; see Z. Ács, Nemzetiségek a történelmi Magyarországon [Nationalities in historic Hungary], (Budapest: Kossuth K., 1984); Leslie S. Domonkos, "The Multiethnic Character of the Late Medieval Hungarian State," in Transylvania: The Roots of Ethnic Conflict, J. F. Cadzow, A. Ludanyi, L. J. Éltető, eds. pp. 53-5 (Kent, OH: Kent State Univ. Press, 1983).

¹³The royal commission of enumeration and command was an innovation; earlier (e.g., 1435/II :2, 4.; 1454:4) these tasks were left in the hands of the counties. However, this new custom did not last, and soon the old system was resumed, see 1463:8 (DRH Matth., p. 135) and Suppl. 1464: 2 (Ibid., p. 153).

¹⁴One of these royal commissions for nobles in Co. Veszprém survived in the National Archives (MNL OL DI 102541), and expressly refers to the diet at Szeged; see DRH Matth., p. 112, n. 2.

necessary. And if the lord king orders all the counties to go to war for three months, partly or wholly, this may take place in accord with to his will and decision, but only for three months in this present year.¹⁵

9 Moreover, when the lord king, calling to arms his own banderia and those of the prelates and barons, goes personally to any campaign together with his prelates and barons, then all the nobles of the realm, that is, the major ones as well as the minor ones, must go with the lord king personally, together with their enumerated troops, according to the ancient custom of the realm only to the borders of the realm, each one to best of his ability; and when the lord king wishes to return from such a campaign, the gentlemen of the realm may return with him. And if he personally wishes to campaign across and beyond the borders of this realm, the community of nobles, in accordance with the custom of the realm, are not obligated to campaign with him; the enumerated troops, however, must go to war under the command of their commanders wherever the lord king wishes, within the said three months, but not longer.¹⁶

10 Next, should a great number of enemy forces besiege the fortress of Belgrade and the other, nearby fortresses located near to and on the banks of the rivers Danube and Sava¹⁷ and should the lord king wish to call to arms his own banderia and those of the prelates and barons, all of the gentlemen of the realm must go personally to defend those fortresses according to the enumeration.

11 Then, nobles having no tenant peasants should be called to arms in accordance with their wealth and the loyal inspection of the elected enumerators. Nobles who are poor and of humble station and who are unable to wage war in person and with their resources, are obliged to send, for every ten tenant peasants, a suitable archer, equipped in the aforesaid manner, with expenses for three months. Minor nobles, who have less than ten tenant peasants, shall be enumerated with those nobles who have no tenant peasants at all. Their tenant peasants shall be enumerated with the tenant peasants of others up to twenty. And if a nobleman has ten tenant peasants he must go to war in person.¹⁸

¹⁵ The limitation of service to three months seems to have been an innovation, for the Register of Sigismund (Prop 1432/3: 5;) spoke of only 15 days which the noble levy is obligated to spend at the border and this was also repeated only a year earlier, see 1458:2. It is worth noting as a comparison that in Western Europe the typical obligation was merely six weeks or 40 days, cf. e.g. Heinrich Mitteis, Lehnrecht and Staatsgewalt, pp. 602-6 (Weimar: Böhlau Nachf., 1958).

¹⁶ Cf. 1454:4, where, however, the restriction of campaigning beyond the borders applies to all troops, not only the noble banderia. The clause about the right of the nobles to return from "campaign when the king does, goes back, in essence, to the Golden Bull, where the law seems to imply military service only under the king's command" (1222:7).

¹⁷ On the significance of these border fortifications, see Ferenc Szakály, "The Hungarian-Croatian Border Defense System and its Collapse," in Bak-Király, From Hunyadi, pp. 141-58; and specifically on Belgrade, Géza Perjés, The Fall of the Medieval Kingdom of Hungary: Mohács 1526-Buda 1541, pp. 48-9 (Boulder, Colo.-Highland Lakes: Social Science Monographs-Atlantic Research, 1989).

¹⁸ Due to the great number of freemen with noble privilege (probably more than 5 percent of the population) many of them were poor, some without any subject tenant peasants (so-called "one plot nobles,"

12 Furthermore, if some of the gentlemen of the realm have tenant peasants in different counties, such peasants shall be counted with lawful inspection by the said elected enumerators, and must go, so certified, to that county where the lord of the tenant peasants dwells, and go to war under the command of the ispán of that particular county.¹⁹

13 Moreover, if any nobleman who has tenant peasants should receive money from some prelate or baron for a number of lances or otherwise, he must send the soldiers coming from the enumeration of his tenant peasants to war under the command of the captain of that county, in addition to the soldiers he arms from the money he receives.²⁰

14 Next, should it be discovered that the enumerators and captains of certain counties have committed a fraud or favor or made an agreement in order to leave someone out of the army, and should this act be confirmed by lawful evidence, these people shall immediately be condemned to their composition.²¹

15 Then, if the lord king, the prelates, and the barons should not wish to call to arms their soldiers in the aforesaid manner in cases of emergency, then the gentlemen of the realm, in accordance with their ancient liberty and what has been decreed, shall not be obligated and forced to go to war either.²²

16. Furthermore, because the enumerators must conduct this enumeration at their own expense, therefore, they are exempted from going to war in person; however, they are obligated to perform military service through their enumerated tenant peasants.

17 In addition, let no one of the gentlemen of the realm, be he of major or minor status dare offer money of whatever amount to the commanders or to the military leaders for the purpose of sending someone back from the army or exempting him from campaigning; both – he who gives and he who accepts the money – shall be condemned in an act of might to capital sentence.²³ or “nobles with one plumbtree”). The laws took only gradually cognizance of this fact during the fifteenth century, see e.g. 1435/II:2; 1454:4.

¹⁹ Cf. 1454:7. Here the portalis militia is to serve under the county’s flag, in contrast to what was written above in Art. 2.

²⁰ See above, art. 4 and 1454:7.

²¹ No such penal clause was decreed in earlier laws about the enumeration.

²² The reference is, once again, to the tradition codified in the Golden Bull, 1222:7.

²³ “Act of might” (potentia, factum/actum potentiae) was a term used for delicts, committed by noblemen, against persons and property in a violent manner. “Criminal cases” falling into this category were fairly well circumscribed and handled in a special manner, including judicial combat as the method of trial. Major acts of might included the violent attack on noble houses, the seizure of estates, the unlawful detention of a nobleman, the killing or assaulting of one (sc. rape). Capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim’s heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate

18 Then, from the day this decree is announced at a county's seat²⁴ until the final end of the year of the military campaign no tenant peasant, neither of the king nor of anyone else, is to be taken from one place to another in order to settle there; if this is done, the military leader or ispán of that county shall return such a tenant peasant to his former lord with the decreed fine of six marks without any delay or favor.²⁵

19 Furthermore, that occupied estates must be returned and received according to the terms of the decree of Pest.²⁶

20 Then, because there are a great number of Vlach, Ruthene, and Slav peasants belonging to the faith of the Vlachs who have not in the past customarily been registered for the royal chamber's profit, they must be enumerated for the present levy, whether they are the king's or anyone else's peasants, and they are bound to go to war as they have customarily done. The Cumans, Jász, and Tartars, however, will do military service according to the ancient custom followed by the Saxons.²⁷ was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary -- Cf. 1454: 12, where, however, the reference is not to bribes to the commissioners, but rather the redemption of military service by payment is prohibited.

²⁴This is a rare reference to the way decrees were promulgated, clearly assuming that a certain time may pass between the issue of the law and its promulgation in the counties.

²⁵The main reason behind the one-year moratorium of peasant tenants' transfer was obviously their military obligation, as decreed above. On the fines for forcible removal of peasants, see 1435/I:7 and 1454: 10. Tenant peasants were often removed or lured from estates of lesser nobles to those of great landowners, who would offer better conditions; see Bak, "Servitude."

²⁶This is a reference to 1458:27.

²⁷Cf. 1454:9; Cumans and Jász/As (probably Alans, called by this Biblical name)) settled in Hungary in the thirteenth century and kept certain liberties for centuries in return for military service. See Nora Berend, At the Gate of Christendom: Jews, Muslims and 'Pagans' in Medieval Hungary, c. 1000-c.1300, (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001) esp. pp. 68-73 and 87-92. It is not quite clear, which people are meant under "Wallachs," most probably those Orthodox Romanians who lived in the border districts between Severin (Szörény) and Timișoara. They were subject to royal border fortresses and registered for military service. (In a list from around 1430 there were 643 kenezi, i.e., local leaders, 2066 peasants and 108 other servants in the three districts of Mehadia, Halmas and Ilidia.) Tartars are mentioned occasionally in the early fifteenth century along with Cumans and Jász; they probably lived in the same region, but nothing is known about their origin and date of settlement in the Hungarian Plain. and above, n.

9. Slavs and "Ruthenes" refer to settler from the near-by Slavic lands, who came to Hungary mainly after the ebb of Western immigrants and enjoyed the same hospes-privileges. As to the Saxons (Germans in Transylvania), their military service was regulated as early as 1224 in the Privilegium Andreanum where it is stated that five hundred knights (milites) shall serve the king within the kingdom, while one hundred shall serve if the king personally leads an external campaign, or in his absence only fifty on an expedition outside the kingdom (see Franz Zimmermann-Carl Werner, eds. Urkundenbuch zur Geschichte der Deutschen in Siebenbürgen Band 1, (Hermannstadt: Michaelis, 1882), p. 34.

21 Then, because royal officials take Cumans and Jász from the estates of the prelates, barons, and nobles by force, the legal process in these matters should be the same as was customary in the times of the ancient kings.²⁸

22. Furthermore, the lord king shall see to it that all the octaves and assizes of short summons be held and concluded regularly according to the law by the protonotaries and their deputy judges, and shall not to be prorogued, except at the time of a levy of the aforementioned army, in accordance with the measures of the decree of Pest;²⁹ and the royal majesty shall have the right to give the seal of his special presence for keeping to whomever he chooses, because it belongs to his majesty.³⁰

23 Then, the servants of noblemen, that is, the plowmen, carpenters, house-servants and tailors, who receive their food and clothing from the mansions of the nobles, shall be exempted from the said enumeration, even if they might be nobles.³¹ One noble shall be exempted from going to war as the mayor-domo of every noblemen. Also, the seneschals, masters of the table and the cupbearers shall be personally exempted. And because the fortifications of the gentlemen of the realm cannot be left unguarded, one or more castellans, as necessary, shall be left behind in these fortifications, upon the estimation of the elected enumerator; out of two castellans, one shall be left behind and the other shall be made to go to war.³² Moreover, there are many noblemen, who, in some way, are in a baronial or otherwise distinguished state, exceeding that of other nobles; these men, because of the higher estate of their wives, can leave behind a number of nobles in their

²⁸ The military duties and taxes of the Cumans and the jász were not to be alienated from the crown (see 1444:4). However, they seem to have been forced or lured to move to the estates of nobles; the diet protested against their recovery, which may have been pursued with greater vigor after Matthias had organized the office of provisor curiae castri regiae in Buda (in Hungarian: udvarbíró) and entrusted him with administering the crown properties, including the Cuman lands, cf. András Kubinyi, "A budai vár udvarbírói hivatala" [Office of the proctor of the court in castle Buda] Leveltári Közlemények 35 (1964): 67-98. The palatine remained the judge of the Cumans, an office he had held from the mid- thirteenth century.

²⁹ This is a reference to 1458:27.

³⁰ See Kumorovitz, p. 7. Instead of a distinct seal for the court of special presence (cf. 1458:27), only a general judicial seal was cut in 1459 and not two, as in the times of Ladislas V, when the two "presences" used different seals. Since the court of special presence was presided over by the secret chancellor, its records were usually sealed with the secret seal (very rarely with the judicial one, used for the personal presence, which, however, never used the sigillum secretum). The king made good use of the right decreed here, to select his judge for the new court: he did not name protonotaries, but first the poet Janus Pannonius as locumtenens, then (in 1459) Peter of Sár, as chancellor, later locumtenens. Peter kept this position until 1464 (when the courts were reorganized, see below, 1464:4-6) and established its writing office, which then became the "lesser chancellery," see, Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] pp. 246-50. (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), see also "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary." East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 181-191 houses, according to the estimation of the said enumerators.³³ The tenant peasants, however, of all these castellans, nobles, seneschals, masters of the table, cupbearers, and mayor-domos, who were found in these offices by the enumerators prior to the enumeration and remaining at home for whatever reason, shall be enumerated by the said enumerators.

³¹ This is an interesting rare insight into the living conditions of poor nobles, who apparently took service with their better-off fellows, even as household employees and artisans.

³² Cf. 1435/II:3; 1454:5-6.

24 In addition, the master protonotaries, the six sworn assessors, and the royal solicitors do not have to go to war, but each one of them shall send an archer instead; and their tenant peasants shall be enumerated as well; and the noble magistrates shall not be excused from campaign, but must go to war.³⁴

25 Then, where several brothers dwell in one household, one may go to war in place of the rest; but if one brother draws pay, his brothers are not therefore exempted from the present campaign, but one of them must go to war in the aforesaid manner.³⁵

26 In addition, no one among the soldiers should dare to lodge in the house of any sort of nobleman, unless it is the wish of the said nobleman. And that all the soldiers, before arriving at the place where they are to be deployed, must buy and obtain all provisions in their quarters at the old price for which it was sold before the army arrived there. After arrival at the appointed place they may buy food at the price they can get.³⁶ And as for those who seize food without payment – although this has been customary practice in the past – as well as those who lodge in the houses of nobles against their will, and those who rob food, they should be punished in accord with the provisions of the decree of Pest.³⁷

27 Then, if any man serving in the army, regardless of his rank and position, that is, noble or non-noble, deserts the aforementioned army secretly or in any other way, such a man should, because of his action, lose all his chattels and his head, but without punishing the lord of that man who

³³ This is, in fact, the first time that a decree expressly defines the social status of barons, regardless of office-holding; on this, see Erik Fügedi, “The Aristocracy in Medieval Hungary: Theses”, in Idem, Kings, Bishops, Nobles and Burghers in Medieval Hungary. ed. J. M. Bak. (London: Variorum Reprints, 1986), ch. IV, pp. 13-14.

³⁴ Protonotaries (prothonotarius, Hung. ítélőmester, “master in sentencing”) were lawyers who acquired legal training in the secular Hungarian courts. From the mid-fifteenth century they presided over court sessions in an increasing number of cases together with noble assessors, see György Bónis, Jogtudó értelmiség and “Men Learned in the Law” (as n. 30, above). The royal solicitor represented the interests of the crown mainly in matters of property in the courts. Magistrates (iudices nobilium) were members of the county nobility assisting the county ispán and representing their fellows, usually 4 in every county.

³⁵ Cf. 1435/II: 2, and 1454:6. Note the assumption of still undivided kindred-properties. As all sons were entitled to an equal portion of an inherited estate, with the paternal house usually going to the youngest, division was often postponed for another generation or more. From a legal point of view, brothers or cousins who lived on still undivided estates were considered to form one family.

³⁶ This clause betrays a remarkable realism by the legislator, aware of the fact that at the assembly point of the army food-prices will inevitably rise. Cf. 1435/II:6

³⁷ Reference is to 1458: 2, where the punishment for such deeds is that for acts of might (see n. 23, above).

deserts, if it happened without fraud and cheating, in which case the lord of the deserting man must take an oath that he left without his permission.³⁸

28 Furthermore, the widows, orphans, sick, and disabled, the old, the children, and any other people who have such handicaps that they cannot go to war in person, such persons shall not campaign, but they are obligated to send someone else instead of their own person; and their tenant peasants, like those of others, shall be enumerated.³⁹

29 Moreover, the gentlemen of the realm must rise and go where the king orders, in accordance with the enumeration, within twenty-five days of taking notice of the royal letter, so that they arrive at the appointed place on the twenty-fifth day; and the said three months must be counted from the day of their arrival.⁴⁰

30. Then, that the lord king may summon the gentlemen of the realm for the levy, according to the enumeration, in the period of time within the year between the last feast of the Circumcision of the Lord to the next feast of the Circumcision of the Lord, but not later.⁴¹

31 Furthermore, if an enemy of such enormous force should come against the realm that the lord king could not resist the power of the said enemy with his own forces and with those of his prelates and barons together with the army set up in accordance with the said decree, then each and every one of the community of the gentlemen of the realm must rise, with their cavalrymen and foot-soldiers, and go to war at the side of the lord king for as long as is necessary.⁴²

32 Finally, if any of the ecclesiastic or lay lords or the gentlemen of the realm, be he of major or minor estate, should be unwilling to fulfill the aforesaid duties, he would be punished with perpetual charge of infidelity, but his heirs would not lose their rights and they would not be regarded as faithless.⁴³

We, therefore, having received the aforementioned articles, and after mature deliberation on them, because they seem to pertain thoroughly to the utility of the commonwealth and the advantage of our realm and the strong defense of it from all enemies, have confirmed and accepted them and all their contents, and promise and intend to keep, carry out, and execute each and every one of them without any infringement.

In witness of all these, we grant these our presents to the community of the prelates, barons, and the noblemen of the realm. Given in Szeged, at the aforementioned diet, on the eve of the feast of the Epiphany of the Lord, in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and fifty-nine.

³⁸ Cf. 1435/II:5 and 1454:13

³⁹ Cf. 1435/I:5; 1454:13.

⁴⁰ Cf. 1435/II:2; 1454:4.

⁴¹ That is, from 1 January 1459 to 1 January 1460.

⁴² This measure of a “general mobilization” seems to aim at the suspension of the thirty-day limit in dire emergency.

⁴³ Cf. 1351:10, 19.

CONCORDANCE

Kovachich Vestigia	Kovachich Sylloge	DRMH Matth/dDRMH
I	I—IV	I
II	V	II
III	VI—VIII	III
IV	IX	IV
V—VI	X—XI	V
VI-VII	XI-XII	VI
VIII—IX	XIII-XIV	VII
X	XV—XVI	VIII
XI	XVI—XVII	IX
XII	XIX	X
XIII-XVI	XX-XXIII	XI
XVII	XXIV	XII
XVIII	XXV	XIII
XIX	XXVI	XIV
XX	XXVII	XV
XXI	XXVIII	XVI
XXII	XXIX	XVII
XXIII	XXX	XVIII
XXIV	XXXI	XIX
XXV—XXVI	XXXII-XXXIII	XX
XXVII	XXXIV	XXI
XXVIII	XXXV	XXII
XXIX—XXXII	XXXIV—XXXIX	XXIII

XXXIII	XL	XXIV
XXXIV	XLI	XXV
XXXV—XXXVII	XLII—XLIV	XXIV
XXXVIII	XLV	XXVII
XXXIX	XLVI	XXVIII
XL	XLVII	XXIX
XLI	XLVIII	XXX
XLII	XLIX	XXI
XLIII	L	XXXII

LAW OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS) OF HUNGARY (1458-90)

OF 28 MAY, 1462

After long negotiations with Emperor Frederick III, Bishop John Vitéz of Sredna was able to sign on 3 April 1462 a preliminary treaty about the release of the Holy Crown in return for Matthias's agreeing to Habsburg's right of inheritance and the emperor adopting him "as his son." (This agreement was the basis for the Treaty of Wiener Neustadt of 1463/64.) Apparently, Bishop John insisted that in such an important matter all regnicolae should be consulted; he therefore convinced the king to call a diet. The invitation went out for 9 May 1462 and the preamble of the decree suggests that it opened on that day. However, the Venetian ambassador Pietro Tomasi reports that the king arrived from Vác only on 18 May to Pest, and indeed, there exists a charter of Matthias dated 14 May 1462 from Vác. Hence, it is more likely that the diet started around 20 May, codified the peace treaty (on 28 May), granted the extraordinary levy necessary for both the ransom of the crown and the agreement with Jan Jiskra, and issued a short decree not connected to the political situation. It defines the oft-quoted cases of infidelity, and the competence of courts spiritual.

MSS.: No original survived, only seven sixteenth-century copies, one signed by Christopher Kubinyi jr. (MNL OL DL 13382), the others in the manuscript codices of Hungarian laws (see Ferenc Döry, György Bónis, Géza Érszegi, Zsuzsanna Teke, eds., Decreta regni Hungariae: Gesetze und Verordnungen Ungarns 1458-1490, (Budapest: Akadémiai K. 1989) [=DRH Matth.], p. 123).

Most medieval charters of the kingdom of Hungary are kept in the National Archives, Diplomatic Archives (Collectio antemohacsiana), referred to as MNL OL DL. Accessible when searched by number, or date, or name of issuer @ <http://archives.hungaricana.hu/en/charters/search>

EDD.: Magyar Törvénytár: Corpus Juris Hungarici, Dezső Márkus et al. eds., (Budapest: Franklin, 1896), 1:338-43; DRH Matth., pp. 123-27.

LIT.: Karl Nehring, Matthias Corvinus, Kaiser Friedrich III. und das Reich. Zum hunyadisch-habsburgischen Gegensatz im Donauraum, 2d ed. (Munich: Oldenbourg, 1989), pp. 18-20; György Bónis, A jogtudó értelmiség a Mohács előtti Magyarországon [Professionals learned in the law in pre-Mohács Hungary] p. 252 (Budapest: Akadémiai K., 1971), see also "Men Learned in the Law in Medieval Hungary." East Central Europe/L'Europe du centre-est, 4, pt. 1 (1977), 181-191; Elemér Mályusz, "A magyar társadalom a Hunyadiak korában" [Hungarian society in the age of the Hunyadi], in Mátyás király emlékkönyv születésének ötszázéves fordulójára, Imre Lukinich, ed. pp. 309-434, here 366-8 (Budapest: Franklin, s.d. [1940],).

Nos Mathias Dei gratia rex Hungarie, Dalmatie, Croatie etc. significamus per presentes, quod cum his diebus, in presenti scilicet generali congregatione universorum prelatorum, baronum, procerum et nobilium regni nostri in hac civitate nostra Budensi quinto decimo die festi beati Marci evangeliste celebrata una cum eisdem multa et magna disposeremus ad meliorandum statum regni nostri predicti opportuna inter alia iidem prelati, barones, proceres et nobiles unanimi omnium voto obtulerunt et presentaverunt nobis quosdam articulos antiquam legem et consuetudinem ipsius regni nostri innovantes et declarantes ordine infrascripto in hec verba:

I. Articuli, in quibus iuxta antiquam consuetudinem regni evocatio sine procrastinatione extra octavas fieri potest in presentiam personalem regie maiestatis, ubicunque fuerit intra ambitum regni.

Primus articulus. Invasores castrorum et domorum seu inhabitationum nobilium, in quibus personaliter resident, si verberationes sive vulnerationes aut cedes sive spolia rerum in talibus domibus conservari solitarum fecerint.

Item violenti abductores litterarum aut litteralium instrumentorum.

Item incendiarii et inductores exterorum hominum spoliatorum et erigentes se contra reverentiam regie maiestatis et litteras iuridicas aut fidei publice, quas salvum conductum vulgariter Gleyt appellamus.

Item interfectores nobilium et qui nobiles capiunt et captos detinent, vulneratoresque ipsorum nobilium, presertim euntium ad congregationem regnicolarum vel octavas aut sedem iudiciariam vel inde exeuntium.

Item depredatores totalis possessionis alicuius cum effractione ecclesie.

Item violenti stupratores virginum aut corruptores honestarum mulierum.

Hi omnes evocari possunt in personalem presentiam regis ad terminum longiorem vel breviorum secundum distantiam locorum e quibus huiusmodi evocatio fieri debet. Ita tamen, quod longior terminus triginta duos dies non excedat, brevior vero terminus infra quindecim dies non descendat, et talismodi evocatio fiat solummodo per testimonium capituli vel conventus illius comitatus vel vicini, unde predicta evocatio fieri debet. Et quia firmitus est iudicium, quod plurimorum sententiis roboratur, interesse debeant iudicio huius evocationis prelati et barones, qui tunc in curia domini regis erunt constituti, et dilationem habeant sive prorogatione solummodo illi, qui occupati erunt in castris finitimis, item, qui erunt in exercitu generali aut particulari pro regni utilitate instaurando, item qui erunt occupati in ambasiata regis vel regni pro communi bono. Verumtamen qui sub confidentia talismodi prorogationis aliquem ex pretactis actibus fecerit, et se absentaverit a iudicio, huiusmodi prorogatione se defendere non valeat, et talismodi evocatio fiat solum deinceps pro actibus premissis a primo die presentis congregationis generalis in posterum patrandis. De occupationibus vero a tempore electionis domini nostri Mathie regis factis fiat restitutio, cui si occupator non obediverit aut impediverit, quominus fieri valeat et perficiatur, evocetur ut supra declaratur. Item proclamata congregatio detur secundum formam decreti quondam domini Sigismundi imperatoris et regis.

Item quatuor octave annuatim sine intermissione celebrentur.

II. Articuli, qui concernunt notam infidelitatis et in quibus et non aliis possint per dominum regem possessiones et bona delinquentium alicui donari seu conferri.

Primus. Evidenter se erigens contra statum publicum regis et corone. Item qui conficit falsas litteras vel eis evidenter utitur in iudicio.

Item qui sculpit falsum sigillum vel eo utitur.

Item cutores falsarum monetarum vel eis scienter et publice in magna quantitate negotiationes exercentes.

Item occisor consanguinei sui usque ad quartum gradum consanguineitatis inclusive.

Item incendiarii publici villarum et possessionum.

Item introductores exterorum hominum spoliatorum aut stipendiariorum ad disturbandum statum internum regni.

Item erigentes se et opposcentes sua potentia contra litteras iuridicas et sententias iudicum ordinariorum post secundam evocationem et probationem.

Item violatores litterarum fidei publice vel salvi conductus, dum evidenter fuerint convicti.

Item traditores castrorum vel propriorum dominorum, dum evidenter fuerint convicti.

Item occisores vel vulneratores iudicum ordinariorum regni, presertim dum sunt in officio publico.

Item occisores adversariorum in loco iudiciorum publicorum vel palatinalium.

Item publici heretici adherentes damnate heresi.

Item incestuosi et corruptores consanguinearum suarum usque ad quartum gradum consanguinitatis dum fuerint evidenter convicti et proscripti.

III. Articuli forum spirituale concernentes:

Primus. Omnes cause circa mysteria et defectus sacramentorum.

Item cause in facto fidei et cause heresium sive suspectorum de heresi. Item cause testamentorum et earundem accessoria.

Item cause matrimoniales et accessoria earundem, specialiter vero dotis, rerum paraphernalium, donationum propter nuptias et iuris quartalitii, si non intentetur pro hereditate possessionaria adipiscenda.

Item cause decimarum realium et personalium et accessoria earundem. Item cause usurarum.

Item cause viduarum et miserabilium personarum, si non agitur pro possessionibus et prediis adipiscendis.

Item cause fidei violate et omnium periuriorum et cause, quarum finis tendit ad correctionem pro peccato.

Item omnes cause, in quibus quis incidit in sententiam excommunications hominis vel canonis.

Quibus quidem articulis premissis modo premissis nobis presentatis supplicaverunt nobis dicti prelati, barones, proceres et nobiles regni nostri, ut eosdem articulos regio consensu approbantes dignaremur deinceps facere observari. Nos itaque supplicationibus eorundem prelatorum, baronum, procerum et nobilium predicti regni nostri inclinati predictos articulos et quemlibet eorum acceptantes et approbantes decrevimus deinceps inviolabiliter observandos observabimusque et observari faciemus cum effectum.

In quorum omnium premissorum testimonium presentes litteras nostras secreti sigilli nostri, quo ut rex Hungarie utimur, munimine roboratas universitati dictorum prelatorum, baronum, procerum et nobilium predicti regni nostri duximus concedendas.

Datum Bude, vigesimo die congregationis generalis supradicte, anno Domini millesimo quadringentesimo sexagesimo secundo.

28 MAY, 1462

We Matthias, by the grace of God king of Hungary, Dalmatia, Croatia, etc. announce by these presents that in these days, namely, during the general assembly held with all the prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom, in our town of Buda, on the fifteenth day of the feast of St. Mark the Evangelist,¹ we have taken action in concert with those aforementioned on many important matters appropriate for the betterment of the state of our said kingdom; among others, these same prelates, barons, lords, and nobles presented and handed to us with their unanimous consent certain articles renewing and clarifying the ancient laws and customs of this our kingdom, which are listed here in order with the following content:

1 Instances in which according to the ancient custom of the realm summons without delay² may be issued outside the octave terms to the personal presence of the royal majesty, wherever he may be within the confines of the kingdom.³

The first article: If the invaders of castles, houses or dwellings of nobles in which they actually reside, commit beatings, cause wounds, inflict death, or steal property customarily kept in such residences;

Likewise, for those who forcefully take away charters or written documents; Likewise, for arsonists and those who introduce plundering foreigners, and act against the king's authority, and against legal documents of public trust commonly referred to as safe conduct, in the vernacular called Geleith;⁴

Likewise, for killers of noblemen and those who capture and detain nobles, as well as those who injure nobles, particularly those going to or returning from a general assembly, an octave or a county court;

¹ May 9; on the contradictory evidence about the date, see above.

² Here evocatio sine procrastinatione, is identical with the evocatio brevis of earlier decrees, that is a summons requiring the respondent to attend court within 32 days (or at the next octave term.), usually issued in respect of violent crimes. The short summons was often combined with a terminal summons issued with the clause that judgment would be passed even in the absence of the summoned party, used particularly against perpetrators of acts of might.

³ The personalis presentia regia, court of royal personal presence emerged as early as the thirteenth century. In the first third of the fourteenth century it was augmented with the court of the special personal presence. The court of the personal presence functioned on a regular basis from 1435 and it was led by the chancellor. After 1464, when it was united with the court of the special personal presence, it became the main royal court of justice, issuing sentences under the king's judicial seal. Its head was a chancellery protonotary, the locumtenens personalis presentie (later simply: personalis) who presided over an ever more professionalized judicial staff. See: Imre Hajnik, A királyi bíróság személyes jelenléte és ennek helytartója a vegyesházi királyok korában [The personal presence of the royal court and its locumtenens in the age of the diverse dynasties] (Budapest: MTA 1892), esp. pp. 18-9. As its judges were prelates and barons, it strengthened the influence of the aristocracy in the administration of justice.

⁴ The vernacular word for the salvus conductus is supposed to be the German Geleit.

Likewise, for those who ravage someone's entire village and break into the church in that place;

Likewise,, for those who violently rape virgins or seduce honorable women.

All these persons may be summoned to the court of the king's personal presence within a longer or shorter time limit, depending on the distance of the locality whence they are summoned, thus that the longest time limit may not exceed thirty-two days and the shortest time limit may not be under fifteen days; such summons must be served only with the authentication of a convent or chapter from the very same or an adjoining county where the said summons has to be made.⁵ And since that judgment is stronger which is confirmed by the sentence of more persons, all those prelates and barons who happen to be present at the king's court at the time must participate in the judgment given in such cases; delay or deferral is allowed only for those serving at fortified border sites or who are engaged in either a general levy or particular campaign for the welfare of the realm; deferral is also granted for those who in the interest of the general good are on a diplomatic mission for the king or the kingdom. However, those who, counting on such a delay, commit one of the said deeds and stay away from trial, shall not be protected by such a prorogation, and such summons may apply only to those aforementioned deeds which will be committed in the future, beginning with the first day of this general assembly. Regarding the seizures of property which took place since the election of our King Matthias, said property must be returned to its previous occupant and if the seizer refuses to comply or hinders that the restoration be done or performed, he shall be summoned in the above stated manner. Then, extraordinary county assemblies shall be called according to the decree of King Sigismund.⁶

Furthermore, each year (without interruption) the four octave courts must be held.⁷

⁵ Members of chapters or convents served as witnesses to legal actions at places of authentication (loca credibilia): cathedral or collegiate chapters (capitula) and – mostly Benedictine, Premonstratensian, and Hospitaller – convents. They substituted for the notaries public of other countries. They issued under their authentic seal documents recording private legal transactions (e.g. recognizances), and sent out witnesses (called: testimonia) to certify the actions of royal bailiffs. Thereafter they issued the appropriate letters and kept these as well as other records of noble families in their archives. See: Ferenc Eckhart, "Die Glaubwürdigen Orte Ungarns im Mittelalter." Mitteilungen des Instituts für Österreichische Geschichtsforschung Erg.-Bd. 9 (1913/15): 395–555; Zsolt Hunyadi, "Administering the Law: Hungary's Loca Credibilia." in Martyn Rady, ed. Custom and law in Central Europe, (Cambridge: Centre for European Legal Studies, 2003) pp. 25–35.

⁶ See 1435/I:3, 6. Extraordinary county assembly (proclamata congregatio): in major criminal cases county nobles were gathered in a single place and examined under oath. Abolished in the judicial reforms of 1486. See István Tringli, "Megyék a középkori Magyarországon." [Counties in medieval Hungary] in Honoris causa. Tanulmányok Engel Pál tiszteletére, ed. Tibor Neumann and György Rácz, (Budapest– Piliscsaba: MTA TTI-PPKE BTK, 2009), pp. 487–518.

⁷ Octave court (octava) refers to the session of royal courts of justice; there were usually four annually, beginning on or around the eighth day after a major feast (such as Epiphany (6 January), St. George's (23 April), St. James's (25 July), and Michaelmas (29 September)) and lasting 30–40 or more days. St. George's and Michaelmas were often called the major octaves. Octave courts in Transylvania and Slavonia were usually held at different times

2. Instances which concern conviction for the charge of infidelity and in which cases alone the estates and goods of culprits can be granted or transferred by royal right to another person:⁸

First those who patently rise against the public state of the king and the crown; Then, those who forge false documents and use them as evidence in a court of law;⁹ Then, those who cut and use a forged seal;¹⁰

Then, those who mint counterfeit money, and knowingly and publicly use them in large quantity for business;¹¹

Then, those who murder a blood relative within four degrees of kinship;¹²

Then, those who are known arsonists of villages or estates;

Then, those who introduce pillaging foreigners and mercenaries to cause unrest in the kingdom;¹³

Then, those who rebel and oppose on their own authority letters of judgment or sentence passed by justices ordinary after being twice summoned and reprimanded;

⁸ The charge of infidelity, (nota infidelitatis) referred to specified serious crimes—defined here in greatest detail among the decretal—against the person of the king or the interests of the realm. It was usually punished by capital sentence. (sententia capitalis): That meant the loss of life and property but in fact usually only one of the two, since this punishment included the obligation to give satisfaction: if physically executed (which happened very rarely in practice), the victim's heirs retained his estates. If the condemned was pardoned by the king or spared by his adversary, then the estate was confiscated, with a portion of it going to the adversary. This encouraged noble litigants to arrive at a compromise solution which fell short of outright capital punishment (cf. agreement, peace). The king retained the right both to pardon a nobleman for a capital offence and, simultaneously, to return his estate. However, in the later Middle Ages, the king had not too many estates to give away, besides those of condemned "unfaithful" and those whose line got extinct.

⁹ Cf. 1351:9

¹⁰ Cf. 1446:10.

¹¹ Cf. 1405/I: 18; 1444:7. However, this is the most explicit inclusion of counterfeiting into the major felonies, see Márton Gyöngyössi, "Coinage and Financial Administration in Late Medieval Hungary (1387–1526)" in József Laszlovszky et al. eds., The Economy of Medieval Hungary (Leiden–Boston: Brill, 2018) pp. 295–308.

¹² The reckoning of kinship in Hungarian law followed the canon legal system, see Erik Fügedi, The Elefánthy. The Hungarian Nobleman and His Kindred. (Budapest: CEU Press, 1998) pp. 6–18.

¹³ This article aims above all at those who collaborated with the Czech (formerly Hussite) bands that devastated northern Hungary during the preceding decades. Matthias managed to pacify the region just before this decree was issued by negotiating a peace with Jan Jiskra z Brandýsa. As an example of implementing this article, the charter of 30 September 1462 survived, in which Matthias granted properties confiscated from such men to his commander in northern Hungary, with reference to this decree; see MNL OL DI 15772.

Then, those who, once publicly condemned, disrespect letters of public trust or safe conduct;¹⁴

Then, those who betray a castle of their own lords, once publicly condemned;

Then, those who kill or wound judges ordinary of the king, especially when they act in an official capacity;

Then, those who kill their opponents in a public court of law or a palatinal court;

Then, those public heretics who adhere to a condemned heresy;¹⁵

Then, those who commit incest and seduce their female relatives within the fourth degree of kinship,¹⁶ once they have been publicly condemned and proscribed.

3 Instances pertaining to courts spiritual:¹⁷

First. All cases concerning offenses against the divine mysteries or the sacraments;

Then, cases of faith, of heresy, and suspicion of heresy;

Then, cases concerning last wills and related matters;

¹⁴See, above, n. 3.

¹⁵ The secular prosecution of heresy had been conceived as a duty by some European rulers from the twelfth century, even though it did not feature in known Hungarian statute law: in general, see Gordon Leff, Heresy in the later Middle Ages, the relation of heterodoxy to dissent (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1967); for illustrative documents: Jeffrey B Russell, Religious Dissent in the Middle Ages (New York: John Wiley, 1971) Part VI: 125-38, No. 24-28. The Byzantine tradition of secular attention to heretical groups and thought was long-standing: Jacques Jarry, Heresies et factions dans l'empire byzantin (Cairo: L'Institut français d'archéologie orientale du Caire, 1968) esp. 3: 225ff.

¹⁶Roman law had been concerned primarily with prohibiting marriage between persons closely related by blood (Joseph A.C. Thomas, Textbook of Roman Law [Amsterdam: North-Holland, 1976] 423-25; Susan Treggiari, Roman Marriage: Iusti Coniuges from the time of Cicero to the time of Ulpian [Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1991] 37-39): the incest prohibition varied (as to degree of prohibited relationship) as a function of contemporary custom (so, explicitly, Digest 23.2.29; see F. de Martino, "L'ignorantia iuris nel diritto penale romano," Studia Doc. Hist. Iuris 3 [1937] 387ff. at 405). With the institutionalization of Christian authority in the fourth century, however, incest was defined more frequently and more rigorously (Codex Iustinianus 5.5), partly on the basis of Mosaic Law (Leviticus 20:11-21). The present definition (the fourth degree of relationship; marriage to, for example, a paternal uncle or aunt's great-grandchildren) was relatively liberal; elsewhere in Europe, the seventh degree of relationship was prohibited (Georges Duby, Medieval Marriage: Two Models from Twelfth-Century France Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1978, pp. 17-18; 25ff.). For these degrees of kinship relationship, see Isidore of Seville Origines 9.6.28.

¹⁷ On the cases pertaining to courts spiritual, see 1458Sz:9. However, this article contains a slightly wider range of matters.

Then, matrimonial cases and related matters, especially dowers and paraphernalia, nuptial gifts, and the filial quarters, unless the lawsuit concerns acquisition of inheritable property;¹⁸

Then, cases involving the tithing of goods and persons, and related matters;

Then, cases of usury;

Then, cases relating to widows and the wretched poor, if not connected to a lawsuit concerning the acquisition of estates and properties;

Then, cases of breaking an oath and all perjurers, also cases which aim at the correction of sinners;

Then, all cases in which someone falls under excommunication, whether by secular ruling or by canon law.

The said prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of our kingdom presenting to us the above articles in the above explained manner beseeched us to deign to assure the observance henceforth of these decrees by giving our royal approval to them. We therefore, acceding to the request of the same prelates, barons, lords, and nobles of our said kingdom, accepted and approved the above-named articles, each and every one of them, and we ordered that they be observed without infringement and we also shall adhere to them and make them observed effectively.

In witness to all of the above, we have decided to grant these our presents, confirmed by the affixing of our secret seal which we use as king of Hungary,¹⁹ to the community of the aforementioned prelates, barons, lords and nobles of our said kingdom.

Given at Buda on the twentieth day of the said general assembly in the year of the Lord one thousand four hundred and sixty-two.

¹⁸ Issues of property were always reserved to the secular courts.

¹⁹ Matthias seems to have used the secret seal (though as seal pendant) even on privileged charters, such as the 1486 decree. As there is no surviving original, it is unknown whether this time the seal was pendant.

CORONATION DECREE OF KING MATTHIAS I (CORVINUS)
OF HUNGARY (1458- 90)
OF 6 APRIL, 1464)

