The Golden Feast: a Version of the Land of Cockaigne

An escape from the absurd paradise known to the English as Cockaigne, the Germans as Schlaraffenland, and to the Dutch as Luilekkerland. Also something about desire, fulfillment, whatever. Also a fantasy.

Trigger warning for vomit, body horror, binging and purging, nightmare sex.

"SLEEPING BEAUTY," "THE GOOSE GIRL," "SNOW WHITE": PYTHON AS A FAIRY TALE GENERATOR

Once upon a time there was a princess who was plain but wise. There was a great uproar in the land because there was no heir. An ensorcelled frog hopped up from the well. It made a proclamation: "You are cursed. But this spell will be broken if you build a house made of candy." And thus it was so. And they lived happily ever after.

Once a long time ago there was a king who was plain but wise. There was great excitement in the realm because the queen was very ill. A magic mirror hung on the castle wall. "You are cursed," it proclaimed. "But this spell will be broken if you prick your finger on the spindle." And thus it was so. And order was restored to the realm.

Once there was a princess who was plain but wise. There was sadness in the land because there was to be a wedding. An ensorcelled frog hopped up from the well. "You are cursed," it proclaimed. "But this spell will be broken if you prick your finger on the spindle." And so it was. And happiness reigned from that time on.

Would you like another story? Y or N? Y

Sorry--I only got three stories. THE END.

COLORING UTOPIA WITH PYTHON

```python
anynameyoulike = open("testfile.txt", "r").read().lower()

the above opens the txt file, a string
the "r" stands for read
.lower() makes everything lower case
note that name of this variable, here "anynameyoulike", could be any name you like!
note that the file you open, here "testfile.txt" needs to be in your working directory
text_title = "testfile.txt"

words = anynameyoulike.split(' ')
this separates the string anynameyoulike into individual words, separated by spaces

azure_count = words.count("azure")
