Increased Stress
Among College Students
Trevor Magleby
I think that universities only portray positive photos of happy college students on their websites and promotional materials in order to portray that college is easier than it really is.
UA GRADS HAPPY, HEALTHY, SUCCESSFUL

A Gallup poll shows that Wildcats remain more emotionally connected to their alma mater than alumni of peer institutions.

READ MORE »
Hi I’m Trevor

On Average:
- I work 50 to 60 hours a week
- Full time
- Running business
- I study 10 to 15 hours a week
- I attend class 12 hours a week
- I commute 7 hours a week
- I sleep 5 hours a night
- Remainder goes to family time
AVERAGE HOURS STUDENTS SPEND PER WEEK, BY ACTIVITY

Based on student surveys and FIU Counseling and Psychological Services reports.
Problem 1

The UCLA Higher Education Research Institute found that nationwide first-year-college students’ sense of emotional well-being is at its lowest since 1985, when they first began the research.
Problem 2
Students are also reporting the overwhelming pressure to succeed. In a study by the American College Health Association, students said stress, anxiety, work and sleep difficulties were the top factors affecting their academic performance.
 Cause

Students see these promotional materials of happy students, and when college isn’t as easy as it looks, they become overwhelmed, anxious, and lose self-esteem.
Solution

Stop comparing yourself to others. Maybe some people are really as happy as those on the front page of university landing pages.

Take responsibility for your life. Realize that you are where you are because of choices you made
- I chose to go to school
- I chose to get married
- I chose to have a baby
- I chose to work
What did I learn?

It’s actually a good thing that universities show happy students on their front page.

in order to carry a positive action we must develop here a positive vision

- Dalai Lama
Sources:

https://news.fiu.edu/2015/04/surveys-show-increase-in-stress-among-college-students/86911