How well do we know ourselves? The image we project to those around us may or may not correspond to the perception we have of ourselves. Like businesses, people have a brand, whether they are aware of it or not. In my MFA thesis exhibition, I will explore others’ perceptions of my own personal brand.

Introspection has played a major part of my graduate school experience. Thinking about the significant changes I’ve experienced over the last two years got me wondering what friends and family thought. My hypothesis is that what we think of ourselves is just one part of who we really are and that there can be stark contrasts between self-perception and how others perceive us. To represent people’s perceptions in an effective, visual way, I will use myself as the subject.

In order to get a better idea of what makes up my personal brand, I constructed a survey of various questions selected to gain a better understanding of the identity I project to others. I researched several personality tests, including the Myers-Briggs, and collected a large pool of possible questions. The criteria used when selecting questions was that each would potentially reveal a distinct personality trait based on the collective responses. The purpose being to have several unique characteristics from which to produce designs. Similar to the traditional process of problem solving in graphic design, I will be creating art based on collected data. What makes it unique is that I am both the subject and collector of the data, as well as the creator of the work.

The resulting survey includes questions initially chosen by me, then reviewed and selected by my thesis committee. I have administered the online survey of thirty questions to seventy-five friends and family members. From the fifty-nine responses, I will create a series of twelve posters based on twelve questions selected from the survey that exhibit a significant and compelling conclusion among the respondents. I will also create additional material with detailed information on each question represented and the respective responses that will be available in the exhibition space.

I would like the viewer of this work to make interpretations based on their own perceptions. I want to visually communicate in my thesis exhibition an appreciation of the differences between how we see ourselves and how others see us. The contrast between individual realities: theirs and our own. The intent is to strive for objectivity in visually representing elements of my outward personal brand, whether I like them or not.
These are the survey questions and responses selected to be visually represented. The intent was to choose questions which yielded results closest to a consensus. Survey respondents were asked to make choices along a continuum and the statistical results are illustrated below.

1. I think of this person as someone who
   - plans far ahead: 27%
   - plans at the last minute: 39%
