Summary and Conclusions.
PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

THE PURPOSE OF THE STUDY

This study has a primary and a secondary purpose. The primary purpose is to call attention to the question of whether or not Utah verse should be introduced for study into the elementary and secondary schools of Utah. The author does not want to imply that he will give a satisfactory answer to this question. He hopes, however, that this effort will emphasize the question and stimulate thought concerning the same. It seems reasonable to suppose that most of the Utah school officials who are concerned in any way with literary material for school curricula will agree that, if there is any Utah verse that has literary merit, it should be utilized in the Utah schools.

The secondary purpose of this study is to search out the poetry of literary quality and recommend it for use in the elementary and secondary schools of Utah. Again the author does not want to imply that he will determine, once and for all, what is literary and what is not. He will merely attempt, through his best judgment, to measure the poetry by literary standards and bring into light what he considers best for further judgment and analysis by the literary critics. The critics and the test of time must complete the work.
"A classic is a poem whose position is above dispute. It has stood the test of time, is of the class. It has endured because it has had the power to appeal to the hearts and judgment, not of one crowd or coterie of men, nor of one country or period, but of all who have known it in all climes, through successive changes of literary fashion. And it has had this power of appeal because of its intrinsic truth, worth and beauty."¹

Utah may have few poems that can measure up to the universal acceptance of a classic as set forth in the above quotation. If there are any only usage through time and space can ultimately decide.

TYPE OF STUDY AND METHODS

This study is historical-analytical in type and employs the method of gathering data through library research and questionnaires.

DELIMITATION

The survey of Utah poetry and opinions concerning its introduction into Utah schools is limited with respect to period of time, extent of the amount of verse to be analytically read, personnel to be reached by questionnaires and scope of purpose or objectives. The period of time to be covered extends from 1840 to 1934 and is divided into three rather distinct periods which will be later discussed, with reasons for choosing 1840 as a starting point. With respect to amount of verse to be analytically read or studied no attempt will be made to cover every poem that has been written. This would seem quite unnecessary and probably be impossible. It is the object to make as general and as generous a sampling of the verse as time, access to sources of reading material and capacity for reading will permit. The magazines and principal newspapers of Utah will constitute the chief sources from which the poetry will be read and they will be mentioned later in detail. Furthermore, the object is to sample as many writers of verse as possible, whose identity as Utah poets or writers can be established. The people to be reached through the questionnaires are the school superintendents of Utah and about five hundred college students of the three major institutions of Utah. Out of this group of five hundred students, it is the aim to contact, through the questionnaire, about two hundred prospective English teachers. The objectives of the study are limited to three, which will be briefly discussed under the next heading.

SCOPE OF STUDY

This study has three major phases. The first is an attempt to evaluate the literary quality of Utah verse and to make a tentative classification of it. This is intended to aid in determining what poetry of Utah might be recommended for use in the Utah schools. The second is to learn the attitude of school officials of Utah relative to the question of introducing Utah verse into Utah elementary and secondary schools for either supplementary or basic study, and the third is to test prospective English teachers' (at present college students) elementary knowledge of Utah verse and their attitude toward it. The ideal thing (a thing quite impossible) would be to test the active English teachers of the state.

OTHER STUDIES

As far as the author is able to learn there have been no studies made that are similar or related to the subject suggested by the title of this thesis. All superintendents, who have responded to the questionnaire in appendix A, indicate that they know of none and, in most cases, have given the subject little or no thought. However, there seems to be an awakening interest in Utah poetry.

INTEREST IN STATE LITERATURE AWAKENED

An interest in Utah verse is being aroused in both its production and appreciation. Attention is here called to two of the agencies responsible for this. The Eliza R. Snow Memorial Contest conducted annually by the Relief Society Magazine, Salt Lake City, is designed to stimulate the best poetic efforts of the women of Utah and surrounding states. The Utah Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters is largely responsible for the present anthology of Utah verse, "Utah Sings", published in 1934, the Deseret News Press, Salt Lake City, Utah. The Utah Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters promises other anthologies in the future.

An interest in state literature seems to be growing in other states. Idaho has published an anthology of Idaho verse entitled "Sunlit Peaks". There is also a project in Idaho headed by Vardis Fisher, a prominent writer of Idaho.

2 "To collect and collate the literary material of the state, a similar work to that which has been inaugurated in Utah."

The same thing is being done in the state of Oregon. Furthermore, the school children of the state of New Jersey are being directed in an investigation and study of the fiction and fiction writers of their own state. This project is discussed in an article entitled "A Study of Fiction Writers of Our State" by Mary Shafto on page 160 of the May issue of the National Educational Association Journal for 1936.

CHAPTER 1

SPECIFIC METHODS OF INVESTIGATION

It is the purpose of this chapter to present in detail the methods or techniques employed in this investigation. As has been previously stated, the study is of such a type as to require, first, library research and, second, survey by means of questionnaires for opinions and knowledge. This chapter has three major topics. First it deals with the methods of investigating the literary quality of Utah verse.

METHODS OF INVESTIGATING THE LITERARY QUALITY OF UTAH VERSE.

IDENTIFICATION OF POETS WITH RESPECT TO UTAH RESIDENCE.

One of the first problems was that of identifying writers with respect to Utah residence. If one is to be classed as a Utah author he must at least claim Utah as his home state. This may be done by virtue of birth in Utah, residence within the state, or ties of kinship and associations that ever draw his heart to Utah in the event that he has moved away. He must have had at least five poems published while a resident of the state. These standards are not established by authority but merely set up by the author as a guide for this particular study. It is evident to be a citizen of a country or state one must live there and proclaim it his home land. The classification of the authors as Utah writers has been based on this fundamental idea. Only those that could be, with certainty, classified have been included in this study.

In search for Utah poets it seems necessary to go back as early as 1840, more than half a century before Utah came into statehood. It was at this date at Nauvoo, Illinois, that the periodical, "The Times and Seasons", a Latter Day Saint publication, first appeared. It is safe to assume that 90% of all the poetry printed in this early publication was written by Latter Day Saint converts and at least 75% of them eventually reached Utah where they made their home. Among those early prominent writers who later became citizens of Utah were such people as Eliza R. Snow, Parley P. Pratt, W. W. Phelps, John Lyon and Charles W. Penrose. Furthermore, most of those who wrote poetry as early as 1840 were prominently connected with the Mormon Church and consequently moved with the exodus to Salt Lake Valley. Eliza R. Snow's poetry was published in the "Times and Seasons" as early as 1841 and the same year her poem "The Transformation" appeared in the "Millennial Star" first edited by the L. D. S. Church in England in 1840. A few years later poems from Charles W. Penrose, author of the song "O Ye Mountains High" appeared in the Millennial Star. He was then a resident of England, later moving to Salt Lake City.

The practice of frequently publishing the author's address along with his poem has been the surest and best means of discovering a writer's residence. It is fortunate that this practice began in the L. D. S. magazines and periodicals even as early as 1840 and continued quite regularly down to about 1930. For example the poem "The Funeral of Brig. General Smith" by Eliza R. Snow, published in the Millennial Star, volume 2, 1841, pages 111 and 112, bears the address Nauvoo, Illinois. The address "Great Salt Lake City, Sept. 1851 appears with the poem "To Elder Samuel W. Richards, on His Departure for Europe" by Miss Eliza R. Snow, published in the Millennial Star, volume 14, 1852-3, page 48.

About the year 1900, authors from neighboring states began to contribute verse to Utah publications. A very high percentage was published with the author's address. The outside contributions gradually increased until by 1930 verse was coming in from all parts of the United States, Canada, Mexico and even England. Some of it was evidently sent in by Utah missionaries and some by converts in the various missions. Then, in 1934, came the anthology, "Utah Sings" with a brief biographical sketch of each of the 120 contemporary Utah poets represented. This greatly aided in further solution and verification of the identity of poets as to residence. Therefore, the authors who have been read for this study have had their identity as Utah writers established with a high degree of certainty.

THE PLAN OF SAMPLING UTAH VERSE

It would seem unnecessary and quite impossible to attempt a reading of all the verse accredited to Utah writers. Therefore a plan of sampling was devised whereby a representative portion of the verse might be read. The whole general body of Utah verse might then be judged on the basis of a representative sampling which would be as extensive in number of poems, authors and periods of time as would seem adequate.

Only approximations in numbers with respect to proportion of poems, authors etc. are possible. It would be impossible to determine the exact number of Utah versifiers and poems that have appeared in print. Some authors appear but once or twice and have no address. Some poems are signed with a non-de-plume, some with two initials, some with one initial and some with no identifying symbol at all. Therefore, no definite proportion of the whole group of Utah poems could be specified for this study. However, it was aimed to include in this study about half of the Utah poems published in the Utah magazines, including "The Times and Seasons" and "The Millennial Star". This meant that half the combined number of volumes of the various magazines would have to be read. Not only that but every other one should be read so that the sampling might be evenly distributed throughout the entire period of the magazine. This latter was necessary for the number of poems in any one of the late volumes far exceeded the number of poems in any one of the early volumes, and the style of poetic treatment, length of poems, themes etc. changed materially as the magazine progressed through time.
In three of the principal magazines the author exceeded his goal. Of "The Contributor" seventeen out of seventeen volumes were read. Of "The Improvement Era" thirty-five out of thirty-eight volumes were read. And of "The Relief Society Magazine" eithteen out of twenty-one were read. It would seem safe to assume that these three magazines have published approximately 75% of Utah's verse. If this were true about 60% of Utah's verse has been covered by this study. Turn to table 1 for the number of poems and authors read.

It was further planned to sample the verse in the Deseret News and the Salt Lake Tribune. All poems in the recent anthology of contemporary Utah verse entitled "Utah Sings" have been read. It represents 120 Utah poets with an average of about four poems per author.

The plan also included the books of verse that are listed in the bibliography of Utah verse sources. There are several bound volumes of verse by Utah authors which were not read because a portion of their contents was reached indirectly through the magazines persued. For example out of the volume "The Toilers" by Ezra J. Poulsen, which contains twenty poems, seven were discovered in the magazines. It is evident that a reading of many of the bound volumes of Utah verse would result in needless repetition of work.

SPECIFIC INFORMATION DESIRED CONCERNING THE VERSE COVERED BY THIS STUDY

The author was desirous of investigating the seventeen following items concerning the Utah verse covered by this study.

1. The degree of its poetic quality.
2. The quality of its rhythm.
3. The triteness of the diction.
4. The proportionate number of trite poems.
5. The proportionate number of moralistic poems.
6. The proportionate number of prosaic poems.
7. The proportionate number of sentimental poems.
8. The proportionate number of 'preachy' poems.
9. The various kinds of themes and the proportionate number of each.
10. The proportionate number of didactic poems.
11. The proportionate number of lyrical poems, narrative poems and dramatic poems.
12. The proportionate number of sonnets, odes and poems written in the Spenserian stanza form.
13. The proportionate number of light verse poems, and the number of free verse poems.
14. The proportionate number of poems in blank verse.
15. The proportionate number of poems with local color.
16. The length of each poem in terms of lines.
17. The poems suitable for reading in the schools of Utah.

The author here defines terms as applied in this study; explains the basis of classification of poetry of this study and presents the methods of obtaining desired information.

The time from 1840 to 1934 was divided into three rather arbitrary periods for the purpose of comparison and discovery of certain trends in the poetry of Utah. These periods are as follows; 1840 to 1900, 1900 to 1920 and 1920 to 1934. The choice of 1900 was based on the assumption that the turn of the century marked a rather sudden increase in the variety of themes in Utah poetry and the decline of the religious theme. The year 1920 was chosen on the assumption that it marked a change in the philosophy of immortality in Utah poetry from a certainty of life hereafter to a faint shadow of doubt. It was also assumed that the length of the poem decreased, the quantity of poetry increased and the quality improved.

Each poem read was listed in the period in which it was published. The data taken on the poem were also listed in the period of its publication. The poem was analytically studied in the light of the author's most sincere and best judgment. His judgment was prompted by the personal emotion and interest awakened by the poem and his knowledge and understanding of the criteria of literature set up by famous poets and literary critics. The criteria are presented in chapter two of this study.
Notes were taken on every poem read. They were written on a sheet of paper six by four inches. A typical example is here presented with explanations.

Degree of Poetic Quality. Next for consideration is the exact method of analyzing and noting the degree of quality of Utah verse read. This pertains to item one. The criteria set up in chapter two were applied in the analysis.
The quality was divided into six degrees of excellence, specified as very ordinary, ordinary, rather ordinary, above ordinary, rather poetic and poetic. The term 'ordinary' as used in this connection symbolizes many characteristics of the criticism applied to the poetry which would have required undue amount of time to note. 'Ordinary' is to be considered generic in this study. Any one of the characteristics this term embodies may index the poem as commonplace and unpoetic. A poem then, which is termed in this study as 'ordinary', is, first of all, of the common class of poems. It has the characteristic of sameness; it is on the level with the great majority; it is mediocre. It lacks a sincerity and deep emotional quality; it fails to convince and stir the soul of the reader; it fails to give joy. Its diction is commonplace; its figures, if it has any, are faulty or trite. Its rhythm may be crude. In fact, as measured by poetic standards, it cannot be termed poetic. It is a member of the largest of the six classified groups, as mentioned above, and for that reason it is classed by this study as 'ordinary'.

The very ordinary poem is a shade lower in quality. It is elementary in treatment, crude in style, likely faulty in rhetoric and may be extremely sentimental, simple or prosaic.

3 "... poetry is enjoyed and loved; and learned because it is a joy to learn it." Gayley and Young, op. cit., page vii.
A normally intelligent child of fourteen might easily write its equal.

The 'rather ordinary' poem is a degree higher in quality than the ordinary poem. It must possess at least one striking characteristic such as vivid imagery or uniqueness. The poem classed as 'above ordinary' must possess at least two distinguishing characteristics. For example it may have vivid imagery and express a unique idea. The 'rather poetic' poem must possess at least three distinctive features such as artistic language free from traditional diction, vivid imagery and sincerity. The poetic poem must possess four of the major qualities as set down in the literary criteria in chapter two of this study. Of the four two must be emotion and sincerity. These are indispensable qualities of real poetry.

4 "In a notable article on poetry in the Encyclopedia Britannica, Theodore Watts-Dunton gives one of the most comprehensive of all definitions. 'Absolute poetry is the concrete and artistic expression of the human mind in emotional and rhythmical language.' Hubbell and Beaty, Introduction to Poetry, page 11.

5 "There are a number of things which distinguish genuine poetry from mere versifying, but the one quality which needs most to be emphasized is sincerity. No poem can be great unless its author is sincere in telling us what he sees and feels and thinks. Above all the poet must not try to make us feel what he himself does not completely feel. The untrained reader often fails to see that the language of an inferior poem is conventional and consequently insincere. Such poems, with these outworn phrases, to quote Pope,

'Ring round the same unvaried chimes,
A lack of them results in artificiality.

Quality of Rhythm. Data concerning the quality of the rhythm in Utah verse was secured by keeping record of the quality of rhythm of a representative number of the total poems read, approximately one third. In criticizing a poem for rhythm one cannot say it has no rhythm for, "Rhythm is a principle guiding not only the motion of substance and action, feeling and thought but the measure of form as well."

All speech has rhythm. "There is a rhythm of emotional diction in all speech; but since experience has taught men that certain rhythmical sequences are more suitable than others to the representation of particular moods, these sequences have been favored by the poets; have been, so to speak, singled out and conventionalized. Verse depends upon the rhythm of sounds, their quality and pitch, and their harmony or consonance." Thus a poem may lack uniformity in rhythm; it may suddenly depart from a chosen form or pattern of rhythm without any apparent reason and consequently a hitch or discord in harmony results. "Rhythm is a fundamental mode of art."

With sure return of still expected rhymes;
Where'er you find 'the cooling western breeze,'
In the next line, it 'whispers through the trees.'
If crystal, streams 'with pleasing murmurs creep,'
The reader's threatened (not in vain) with 'sleep.'

Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 11.
Gayley and Young, op. cit., page xxix.
Gayley and Young, op. cit., page 1.
Gayley and Young, op. cit., page xxx.
A careless joining of two different kinds of poetic feet diametrically opposed in nature such as iamb and trochee is considered by some critics to be bad taste. 9 This fault sometimes occurs in the verse that was read for this study. A poem then, which seemed to show a striking lack of adherence to the chosen scheme or pattern of rhythm and a harmonious smoothness and grace of movement, was labelled 'faulty in rhythm'. About one third of the poems were scanned for rhythm and the number of poems in iambic rhythm and the number of poems in all other kinds of rhythm respectively recorded.

The following stanzas are considered by this study as 'very ordinary' and 'faulty in rhythm'. They come from the Contributor, volume ten, 1889, pages 112-3.

Cripple Jim

"His mother would sometimes find on the street
Some picture the wind blew away,
And bring it to him. Ah! that was a treat
That would last poor Jim a whole day.

"On the same flat lived a maiden named Nell,
Just under eleven years of age.
Both of her parents were known very well,
As two good actors on the stage.

"Nell's father would always quarrel and fight,
And spend all the money he had;
He drank in the day what he earned in the night,
And that made little Nellie so sad."

9 "I do not think that the metrical ear tolerates the yoking of rhythms diametrically opposed in nature."
Gayley and Young, op. cit., page ixi.
The following lines from the poem, "Repose" found in the Improvement Era, volume 29, page 942, show 'faulty rhythm'.

"The willows droop at high noon,
The horseflies hum a sleepy croon."

Triteness of Diction. The third phase of analysis is that concerning a general survey of trite diction. No attempt was made to catalogue every archaic or traditional word and phrase found in the verse read. However, those most commonly occurring were listed on a sheet. As will be presently stated in the discussion of item four, every poem considered trite either in subject or treatment, or both, was counted, and this number, in as much as traditional language is considered a major characteristic of triteness in poetry, should be a fair index to the extent of trite diction. A list of the trite words and expressions that most commonly occurred in Utah verse read for this study is here given. Vale of tears, golden thread of time, battle of life, Life's stony pathway, wend, shroud, balmy summer breeze, sylvan, me thought, dell, rills, verdant turf, babbling brook, vigil keep, and the archaic forms of the pronoun you. Many of these can be found listed in various text books on composition and rhetoric such as Tanner's Composition and Rhetoric, Century Hand Book of Writing by Jones and Greever, and Hand Book of Composition by Wooley.

Proportionate Number of Trite Poems. Furthermore, it was the purpose to learn the proportionate number of poems considered trite by this study. The word trite is to be here considered specific in meaning. It is one characteristic that will label a poem 'ordinary'. Every 'ordinary' poem, however, may not necessarily be trite. The literal meaning of triteness as given in a standard dictionary, where it is defined as "worn out, used until so common as to have lost its novelty and interest", is to be here taken.

A trite poem (see not 5, page 17) is one employing trite rimes, trite figures and worn out ideas dressed up in excessive traditional language. The idea that triteness mars poetic quality, is supported by the following quotation.

10 Walt Whitman used to go through his poems ruthlessly cutting out all these trite phrases, which today are usually called clichés. Learning to detect the trite, the insincere, depends upon practice. Taste in poetry, as in everything else, grows by feeding upon the right things. But, one may ask, what are the right things and how do you know that they are the right things? This is a question difficult to answer. It is not enough to appeal to the great names of the past; for, contrary to popular notion, the great poets do not enjoy an unchanging fame. We cannot accept even Homer as a great poet merely because Matthew Arnold assures us that he is one: Homer must prove himself a great poet to us. With more recent poets, like Tennyson and Longfellow, the problem is still more difficult. The poets of the mid-nineteenth century are being severely tested to-day. There are many who deny that either Tennyson or Longfellow was a poet at all. Our fathers thought Longfellow's "Village Blacksmith" and Tennyson's "May Queen" great poems, but to us the former seems too didactic and the latter too sentimental to be great. In the last analysis, no one can tell exactly what makes a poem a classic; it is best for us to frankly admit that fact.

PROPORTIONATE NUMBER OF MORALISTIC POEMS. It was also the purpose to learn the proportionate number of moralistic poems covered by this study. The term 'moralistic' is here considered specific. With respect to a moralistic poem it must be said that a poem may be moralistic and yet have a high degree of poetic quality. The degree of quality will largely depend upon the artistic manner of treatment. William Cullen Bryant's poem "To a Waterfowl" is high in poetic quality though it is moralistic.

A poem considered moralistic by this study is one that teaches plainly and directly a moral. The moral is not suggested to the reader's imagination but prosaically explained. In the following quotation the poet Lowell expresses his attitude towards the practice of using verse as a medium for teaching morals.

12 "The poet should follow the advice of Lowell who wrote in "The Origin of Didactic Poetry," 'Put all your beauty in your rhymes, your morals in your living.'"

And the critic Spingarn expresses his attitude in the following quotation.

13 'The poet's only moral duty, as a poet' says Spingarn, is to be true to his art, and express his vision of reality as well as he can.'"

Each poem considered moralistic by this study was so 11 "While it is probably true that the greatest poet, as Arnold said of all literature, gives us 'a criticism of life' it does not follow that a poem should ever directly teach a moral." Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 6.

indicated in the notes.

Proportionate Number of Prosaic Poems. Moreover, the purpose was to learn the proportionate number of prosaic poems. The term 'prosaic' has a specific meaning. A poem having this characteristic is classed by this study as 'ordinary'. A prosaic poem, according to this study, is one that is void of imagery or imaginative suggestion. It lacks figures of speech, or at least striking figures, and its language is very commonplace. Such poems covered by this study were indicated in the notes.

Proportionate Number of Sentimental Poems. The proportionate number of sentimental poems was noted by this study. A poem labelled by this study as sentimental is one which expresses false or exaggerated emotion, sensational appeal\(^{14}\) or insincere feeling. For instance the lavish praise characterizing some of the 'Mother Day' poems published at large from year to year seems exaggerated and insincere with the purpose of effect and show. The term sentimental as here used is specific. A poem with this characteristic was considered 'ordinary'. Each sentimental poem was recorded as such in the notes.

Proportionate Number of 'Preachy Poems. Another purpose

\(^{14}\)"One of the characteristics of poetry as of all art is to awaken unselfish, that is to say, ideal emotion. The art which appeals to the senses alone, to taste and touch and the various carnal affections, can hardly be called art. It should awaken desires and ideals which men may enjoy in common." Gayley and Young, op. cit., page cix.
was to learn the proportionate number of poems considered 'preachy'. The term 'preachy' is specific in connection with this study. A 'preachy' poem is 'ordinary'. It is a low grade of didactic verse with respect to poetic quality. It literally preaches in a very commonplace, prosaic manner and its major themes are religion, the philosophy of work and unselfish service, and moral rectitude. A record of such poems was kept in the notes.

Following is a poem that is labelled by this study as 'ordinary', trite, prosaic, moralistic and 'preachy'. It comes from volume twenty-four of the "Improvement Era", 1921, pages 821-2.

What Have You Sown?

"What have you sown, my dear brother?
Just stop a moment to think;
Kindness you've done for another?
Just stop a moment to think.

"What have you sown in your pathway,
In this world of toil and strife?
What have you done day after day
To lighten a darker life?

"What have you done for troubled souls?
Have you given a kindly smile
To urge them on nearer the goal,
Pressing forward all the while?

"Have you done for others a kindly deed,
Lightening their loads tomorrow?
Have you helped someone sadly in need
Comforting them in their sorrow?

"And given laughter for sadness,
So smoothing the roughest road?
Noticed the weary one's gladness,
When helping him with his load.

"Have you sown in earthly career,
All the things which God above
Has ordered to comfort and cheer
Unfortunate ones we love?

"If not let us begin anew,
Avoiding vice, temptation,
Heeding the glorious teachings true
That bring lasting salvation."

Kinds of Themes and Proportionate Number of Each. A still further purpose was to learn the various kinds of themes and the proportionate number of each. Twenty different themes were included in this study and in the notes on each poem the theme of the poem was recorded. Some poems had a primary and a secondary theme. As considered by this study, there are three kinds of primary and secondary theme combinations. They are: philosophy colored with religion, termed 'philosophy with religious tone', philosophy supported or illustrated by nature, termed 'philosophy and nature', and Latter-Day Saint religious philosophy or doctrine termed 'L.D.S. philosophy'.

The theme of immortality was classified as 'immortality certain' and 'immortality doubtful' for the purpose of noting the trend in philosophy on life hereafter. A poem which expresses 'immortality certain' expresses a sure faith in a future life. It is characterized by the notion of a literal resurrection. 'Immortality doubtful' expresses anything from a faint doubt in a literal resurrection to a complete doubt or a different conception of life eternal. The idea of doubt is always implied, not literally expressed. An example of 'immortality certain' is here given followed by an example of 'immortality doubtful'.

"We'll look upon death as a sleep,
And recline in his arms as a babe.
Our angel sweet vigils will keep,
Till trimphant we rise from the grave."

The above is the last stanza of "Song of the Weary" printed in the "Woman's Exponent" vol. 7, 1878.

The following poem from "Utah Sings" page 57, expresses 'immortality doubtful'.

To My Father

"You who so loved the spring, are gone, and I Await this first May with no uttered cry.
I shall be brave, for you loved courage, too.
I shall not weep at green shoots pushing through
The earth that holds you, or at melting snow,
New bursting buds, or robins. I shall go
Mutely enough among these living things,
Stilling within me tears and wonderings.

"But I shall have to close my eyes to these --
Moonbeams upon white blossoming apple trees,
Where once we lived in beauty one brief hour.
How can I bear to see these trees in flower?
What lies between us, what dark sort of wall,
The Spring should come and you not hear it call?"

The other themes are philosophy, religion, nature, love, death, pioneers, patriotism, humor, mother, father, Christmas,
New Year, Easter, Thanksgiving, war and Utah. These data were acquired for two purposes. First, the author wished to learn the trend of the themes and their relative importance which might be determined by the relative frequency and, secondly, to prove or disprove certain popular notions with respect to the kind of theme thought to be most common in Utah poetry.

Proportionate Number of Didactic Poems. Each poem in this study considered didactic was catalogued in the notes. A poem which is considered, by this study, to be didactic is one that instructs, advises and explains.

Didactic poetry might have a wide range of varying degrees of quality. The following quotation infers the attitude of many critics and poets toward didacticism in poetry.

16"For generations the best foreign and native critics have told us that we Anglo-Saxons are most likely to overestimate the intrinsic poetic worth of didactic poetry. While it is probably true that the greatest poetry, as Arnold said of all literature, gives us 'a criticism of life' it does not follow that a poem should ever directly teach a moral. Poe never tired of condemning the didacticism of the New England poets, and contemporary American poets, and critics agree that he was right. The older New England poets inherited too much of the Puritan attitude toward life to be able always to distinguish between the ethical and the beautiful. Occasionally as in Kipling's "If" and Wordsworth's "Character of the Happy Warrior", didactic verse is so excellent of its kind that only a very rash critic will deny that it is genuinely poetic. Longfellow's "Psalm of Life" is the classic example of the didactic poem which is popular with the average reader but has no standing with critics and scholars. As a sermon, it is magnificent; as poetry it is poor."

15Didactic poetry includes verse compositions that are reflective and expository in nature. Criticism, satires, and other poems that are addressed primarily to the intellect and have for their purpose the imparting of instruction belong to this class. Such poems as Pope's "Essay on Criticism", Cowper's "Task" and Wordsworth's "Excursion" are examples of didactic poetry." Tanner, W. M. Composition and Rhetoric. Appendix C. page xxiv.

16Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 7.
Proportionate Number of Lyrical, Narrative, and Dramatic Poems. It was, furthermore, the purpose to learn the proportionate number respectively of lyrical poems, narrative and dramatic poems in the Utah poetry read. All poetry may be classified into these three kinds. The respective numbers were recorded in the notes.

Proportionate Number of Sonnets, Odes and Spenserian Stanza Form Poems. This study also made a notation respectively of the number of sonnets, odes, and poems written in the Spenserian stanza form. The French forms such as the rondeau and the rondel were not noted.

Only odes with the title "Ode" were counted as such. The author observed the three sonnet forms, the Spenserian, the Shakespearean and the Italian. However, they were not classified in the notes as such.

Proportionate Number of Light Verse and Free Verse Poems. The thirteenth item that claimed attention was the number respectively of poems of vers-de-société, or light verse, and 17"But since we can express ourselves only by one or more of three ways, - singing, saying and acting, - it follows that no matter how many kinds of subjects there may be, the main divisions of literary expression are, and must always be, Song (the early or the modern lyric, especially of feeling), Recital (the poem of events in time, narrative, or of objects in space, descriptive; or of thoughts, reflective), and dramatic. The ballad, the pastoral, and the idyll combine qualities of two or more of these kinds. As for satorial, didactic, and philosophical verse, they are on the border line between poetry and practical literature." Gayley and Young, op. cit., page xci.

poems of free verse. The number of each was recorded respectively. The term light verse has been used in this study with a rather specific meaning. Here, though style is one of its chief criteria, it has more to do with subject matter than with style or treatment of form. In this study subject matter, social in nature, (treated in lighter moods) characterizes what has been termed light verse, so regarded herein. Subjects such as children, homelife, friends, animals, socials and books are the themes.

Proportionate Number of Poems in Blank Verse. Another purpose was simply to tabulate the number of blank verse poems of Utah poetry covered by this study.

Proportionate Number of Poems with Local Color. It was also the purpose to indicate in the notes the number of local color poems read in the Utah poetry for this study. The poems herein considered local in color were those about pioneers, Utah scenery, philosophy peculiar to the majority of the people of Utah, Utah history and Utah social customs.

Length of Poem in Terms of Lines. Furthermore, it was 18 "There is little agreement among authorities as to the limitations in form and subject matter of vers-de-societe. The poem may be cast in the form of a letter, a song, a toast, an epitaph, a ballade, an autograph. The subject matter is generally social in nature. The poet writes most often perhaps of love in its lighter moods; but the theatre, books, friends, children, animals and many other subjects are also open to him." Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 322.

the purpose to indicate in the notes the length, in terms of lines, of each Utah poem read for this study in order that a scientific record might be kept of the exact amount of poetry covered. (See table 1 page 12). This would also, should it be desired, make it possible to compare the length of poems of the three different periods.

Number of Readable Poems. It was also the purpose to indicate in the notes (see page 15) the number of poems within this study considered suitable for reading in the schools of Utah.

METHODS OF DISCOVERING CERTAIN TRENDS IN UTAH VERSE

In this study an attempt was made to gain some notion of certain trends in Utah verse. The entire period covered was divided into three periods as explained on page fourteen of this thesis. (Turn to that page for details). By thus dividing the period comparison might be made and trends indicated. It was believed that an interpretation of the data acquired by the analysis of the verse hereby considered might give a fair idea of certain tendencies. The trends observed are as follows:

1. The trend in themes.
2. The trend of the philosophy on theme of immortality.
3. The trend in literary quality of verse.
4. The trend in quantity of verse.
5. The trend in kinds of poetry.
6. Some apparent factors influencing these.

METHODS OF DETERMINING WHAT UTAH POETRY
MIGHT BE RECOMMENDED FOR UTAH SCHOOLS

Two means were employed by this study in determining what Utah poetry might be recommended for Utah schools. The first was the evaluation of the literary quality of Utah poetry covered herein, and the second was the application of the objectives of literature courses as set up in chapter five of this work.

METHOD OF GRADE PLACEMENT OF READABLE POETRY.

This study attempted to grade the poems found suitable for use in the schools into two categories, one for the elementary schools and one for the secondary schools. The grading was based on the objectives for literature courses as set up in chapter five and on the author's judgment as to theme or subject material and treatment that would be suitable and interesting to the grades respectively. This grade placement is more or less tentative and is to be considered rather as an incidental phase of this study. It might need much modifying by qualified curriculum makers.

METHODS OF LEARNING THE ATTITUDE OF SCHOOL OFFICIALS ON THE QUESTION OF TEACHING UTAH POETRY IN UTAH SCHOOLS

A questionnaire (See appendix A for copy of questionnaire to superintendents) was sent to each of the forty superintendents of Utah schools. It was hoped through the questionnaire to learn the following:

1. The general attitude of Utah school officials towards the question of teaching Utah verse in the Utah schools.
2. The place in the school curriculum that they would assign Utah verse.
3. The objections they might have or the objections they think generally exist against the introduction of Utah verse into Utah schools.
4. The ranking importance they would accord Utah verse with other local subject material.
5. The extent of consideration they have given the question of introducing Utah poetry into the Utah schools.
6. Their opinion on the question of whether or not a college course in Utah poetry should be taught for teachers.
7. What they have done to stimulate students' interest in Utah poetry.
8. The movements or agencies promoting the idea of teaching Utah poetry in the schools.

The author realizes that the reliability of the data obtained through this questionnaire to the superintendents may be severely criticised and discounted but it can be relied upon as a fairly accurate index to the attitude of school officials toward the above mentioned items. Such was the chief purpose. It is probable that certain factors such as personal prejudice, patriotism, or degree of personal interest in poetry might enter in to color the opinions. On the other hand the response was voluntary, free from obligation, with no advantage in answering any particular way or even answering at all. The various comments freely offered by over 50% of those responding and the nature of the comments would indicate a sincerity of opinion and a marked interest in the question worthy of serious consideration in this study.

Courses of study for the schools of Utah are made by a committee appointed by the State Superintendent and State Board of Education. Five of the members of this committee are chosen from among the school superintendents of the state. This is one reason for sending the above mentioned questionnaire to school superintendents of Utah.

METHODS OF LEARNING PROSPECTIVE TEACHERS' ATTITUDE AND ELEMENTARY KNOWLEDGE RELATIVE TO UTAH POETRY

Five hundred and forty copies of a questionnaire and objective test (See appendix B for questionnaire and test) were given out to students of the Utah State Agricultural College, the University of Utah and Brigham Young University. Two hundred and ninety were sent to the first school and 125 to each of the other schools. They were answered in the classroom during ten or fifteen minutes of the class period and then collected and returned to the author by the professor.
or instructor of the class. The object in including the three major institutions of Utah was to make the sampling of the students' attitude and knowledge relative to Utah poetry as extensive as possible to enhance the significance of the data. The students were not classified though it was intended to include as many prospective teachers and English majors as possible.

It was hoped through the questionnaire, to learn the following:

1. The students' general attitude towards Utah poetry.
2. The students' reaction to the question of teaching Utah poetry in Utah schools.
3. The students' opinion relative to the importance and literary quality of Utah verse.
4. The students' desire for a college course in Utah verse.
5. The extent of the students' elementary knowledge of Utah verse and Utah poets.

Again the author realizes, as in the case of the questionnaire to the superintendents, that the reliability of the data acquired by this questionnaire is subject to severe criticism. The factors of personal interests, prejudice, or patriotism might enter to color the response but in spite of this the data have sufficient reliability to demand serious consideration as an index to the students' attitude and elementary knowledge relative to Utah poetry.
CHAPTER II

THE CRITERIA FOR EVALUATING THE LITERARY QUALITY OF UTAH VERSE

A BRIEF REVIEW OF SOME METHODS OF APPRAISING POETRY

In the first place the measurement of the literary values of poetry is subjective. This is due to the fact that, in the application of the literary criteria, opinion will unavoidably enter to color the evaluation. The judgment of two critics on a given poem or poet will seldom, if ever, concur in every detail. (See note 20). The appeal of poetry is subjective; the appeal of science objective; poetry and science are direct opposites. The following quotation supports this statement.

19 "The true antithesis of poetry as Coleridge pointed out is not prose but science. Poetry is emotional; science is the opposite. Science deals with facts, poetry with suggestions. The scientist calls water H2O; the poet calls it murmuring, rippling, still, or blue."

This suggests that there can be no single, definite term in the language of poetry that symbolizes water, nor can one say that, of all the terms, a certain one is best.

Whether or not there can be a science of literary criticism is debatable. 20 Though the fundamental principles of 19 Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 10.

20 "Literary Criticism has been defined in the preceding paragraphs as a science (though an imperfect one), because it seeks to discover certain qualities, common to all good literary criticism are definitely established and accepted, -- and especially is that true with the laws of rhetoric - critics differ in their application of these standards to a given poem or poet. 21

The term criticism has attached to it various meanings. 22 It is commonly thought of as 'fault-finding'. Though this is fundamentally right, such a notion has been, of late years, modified. 23 One idea is that criticism "is a process, or the process, of passing judgment upon anything." 24 Another idea literature, which may serve as tests and standards - in a word, a body of principles. But it is often objected that just this is impossible, and consequently that there is, and can be, no such thing as a science of criticism." Winchester, C. T., Some Principles of Literary Criticism, page 17.

21 "The difference in the verdicts which competent critics pronounce on a given work of art is largely accounted for by the different relative weight which they give to particular excellences." Winchester, C. T., op. cit. page 23.

22 "Criticism may be broadly and provisionally defined as the intelligent appreciation of any work of art, and by consequence the just estimate of its value and rank." Winchester, C. T. op. cit., page 1.

23 "Of late years writers like Matthew Arnold have attempted to give criticism a more general function than it had formerly. Such writers maintain that the business of criticism is less to cen­ture than to praise. Some go so far as to say that the critic ought never to cen­ture. (See Moulton and Taine)." Gayley and Scott, Methods and Materials of Literary Criticism, page 2.

is that criticism is a process of comparison.

Closely related to the definition of criticism is its function. In his "Essays Literary and Critical" Matthew Arnold said, "Of the literature of France and Germany, as of the intellect of Europe in general, the main effort, for now many years, has been a critical effort; the endeavour, in all branches of knowledge, theology, philosophy, history, art, science, to see the object as in itself it really is."

In the same book he gives a definition in the light of its function as follows: "In general, its course is determined for it by the idea which is the law of its being; the idea of a disinterested endeavour to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world, and thus to establish a current of fresh and true ideas."

There are many recognized purposes of literary criticism. For instance it disciplines literary taste, aids in appreciation, indicates what is good and poor in quality, emphasizes and preserves the best in literature, and saves the reader time in his search for what is worth reading.

The judicial method and the inductive method of literary criticism are the two widely contrasted methods with various intermediate types. The Judicial Method passes judgment on the work of literature, that is, evaluates it or appraises it. 2. The Inductive Criticism, when employed in its simplicity, busies itself solely with the collection and arrangement of facts. It refuses to evaluate or appraise."

25 "'Criticism', says Mr. Robertson (Essays, p. 1) 'is a process that goes on over all the field of human knowledge, being simply comparison or clash of opinion', and Mr. Godkin, in Forum, 17: 45, says: 'All genuine criticism consists in comparison between two ways of doing something.'" Gayley and Scott, op. cit., page 2.

27 Arnold, Matthew, op. cit., page 23.

28 Gayley and Scott, op. cit., page 5.

It must be said, incidentally, that taste and appreciation are terms very common in critical discussions. Taste means the power to appreciate literature both intellectually and emotionally. Appreciation means "the exercise of all powers which combine to receive the full effect of a work of art." 29

If the critic uses the judicial method he must establish some tests and standards of judgment. (See note 20 page 35). Among all the tests of literature there are four fundamental ones. They may be here expressed in the words of C. T. Winchester. 30 "... we find that in all critical examination of literature we must notice the following elements.

1. Emotion, which, if our analysis be correct, is the characteristic and distinguishing element of literature.
2. Imagination, without which it is impossible in most instances to awaken emotion.
3. Thought, which must be the basis of all forms of art, except music.
4. Form, which is not an end in itself but the means by which all thought and feeling find expression,..."

The following set of criteria for the judgment of poetry is found in "English Poetry its Principles and Progress" by Gayley and Young, pages civ to cx1 in the introduction.

"The Degree of Acceptance: Classic. -- The Manner: Classical, Romantic, -- The View of Life: Idealistic, Realistic, etc. -- The Test Passage. -- The Effect on the Senses -- The Effect on the Emotions: Real and Aesthetic. -- Gradation of Aesthetic Emotions. -- "

Naturally the critic, in judging the poetry may have in mind, either vaguely or definitely, classic poems for a basis of comparison. Matthew Arnold used the test passage in appraising poetry. He called it the 'touch stone'. His "test passages" were based on the principle of balance in component sounds and of thoughts opposed, yet reconciled. The following line from Keats is a fine example of one of his 'touch stones'.

"Thou wast not born for death, immortal Bird;"

The "test passage" has worth but it would seem to test the poem only fractionally. The nature of the poem as a whole is, after all, the significant thing.

The practice, then, of appraising poetry is based on definite methods and standards. Fundamentally, literature is tested by its appeal to the emotions, its power of imagination to awaken emotion, its quality of thought, and its form.

SOME DIFFICULTIES IN APPRAISING CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

There are certain difficulties in attempting to evaluate the literary qualities of contemporary verse. It is hard to judge because it is so immediate in time. It cannot be la-

31"As a test, the quality of poetic moments, the 'touch stone' is of decided worth. It mustnot, however, be applied to the exclusion of other tests which have in view the possession of the larger emotional effects, and the cumulative nature of the poem as a whole." Gayley and Young, op. cit., page cix.
belled as a classic with certainty or finality. (See note 10 page 21). Many examples may be quoted in which great poets and critics have mis-judged contemporary poetry. This, however, does not imply that all contemporary criticism is wrong and therefore useless. (See note 27, page 37). It simply is not final, but a guide pointing to finality. Time alone will place the poem in its proper relation with the classic.

For "... one must remember two things; first that many of our living poets still have their best years ahead of them and, second, that the great output of contemporary verse is as yet unwinnowed by the hand of time. For Frost, Robinson, and Masefield, the sifting is yet to be done." 34

The feeling extant with respect to contemporary poetry is significant. It is common to either over-estimate or under-estimate the value and importance of things near at hand in time and space. Max Eastman tersely expresses the rather common feeling towards contemporary poets in the fol-

32 Lord Byron attempted to forestall posterity's estimate of his fellow poets. At the head of his list he placed Crabbe and Rogers, both almost forgotten; in the middle, Moore and Cambell; at the end Wordsworth and Coleridge. Byron could hardly have made a poorer guess, for though posterity has accepted his list, it reads it backwards." Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 481.

33 Critics disagree even concerning poets who have long been dead. Matthew Arnold thought Gray a better poet than either Chaucer or Burns. Wordsworth and Tennyson both considered Burns a great poet; but Wordsworth thought Burns' songs unworthy of him, whereas Tennyson greatly preferred them to his other poems. Still another poet, Aubrey de Vere, did not care at all for Burns. Literary history is full of once hallowed names which are now forgotten. What verdict posterity will ultimately pass upon living poets, no man knows." Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 14.

34 Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 480.
lowing: "'It appears', says Max Eastman, 'that a poet in history is divine; a poet in the next room a joke'. "35 But who can say what one of these jokes will become divine?

And further, "One should beware of assuming either of two pernicious attitudes; first that only contemporary poetry is of any importance and, second, that only the older poetry is worthy of serious attention."36 And still further, "Professor Bliss Perry has said, 'I have little confidence in the taste of professed admirers of poetry who can find no pleasure in contemporary verse, and still less confidence in the taste of contemporaries whose delight in the 'new era' has made them deaf to the great voices of the past'."37

Critics and poets are showing a favorable attitude toward contemporary verse and are prophesying an era of great poetry near at hand. "John Masefield said: 'America is making ready for the coming of a great poet. In England, in the days before Chaucer, many people were reading and writing verse. Then he came. The same intense interest in poetry was shown again just before the coming of Shakespeare and now, in this country, you are all writing poems or enjoying them. You are making ready for a master, a great poetic revival is in progress'."38

Ludwig Lewisohn says, "The change which has come over the attitude of intelligent people to literature is of great, of ultimate importance. Yet much criticism and all of literary history is written as though we still lived in the tight and thoroughly explored little cosmos of our ancestors and as though the psychology of the writer were still that of the minstrel, the purveyor of information or the adorer of pious legend."39

37 Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 16.
38 Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 481.
39 Lewisohn, Ludwig, Expression in America, page xi.
Further says Mr. Lewishohn, "...in any creative rebirth of the future, whether near or far, America will have her appropriate and splendid share." 40

In Matthew Arnold's "Introduction to Ward's English Poets" he says, "The future of poetry is immense, because in poetry, where it is worthy of its high destinies, our race, as time goes on, will find an even surer and surer stay." 41

POETRY IS DIFFICULT TO DEFINE

"To define poetry is not easy. Part of the difficulty, doubtless, arises from the fact that the word, like many familiar terms, is used with vague and varying significance. It means one thing to one man, and quite a different thing to the next man." 42

"Definitions are for the most part alike unsatisfactory and treacherous; but definitions of poetry are proverbially so. Yet some definition must be attempted; and, using the phrase "absolute poetry" as the musical critics use the phrase "absolute music", we may, perhaps, without too great presumption submit the following. Absolute poetry is the concrete and artistic expression of the human mind in emotional and rhythmical language." 43

THE CRITERIA SET UP IN THIS STUDY FOR EVALUATING UTAH POETRY

In view of the above discussion, the evaluation of Utah poetry by this study can be at best, but tentative. It is 40 Lewishohn, Ludwig, op. cit., page 589.

41 Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 1.
42 Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 226.
hoped that this work will be a guide calling attention to Utah poetry which seems to be the best. The author feels almost certain that the poetry he has labelled by this study as 'ordinary' or 'very ordinary' has little or no significance. The poetry labelled 'above ordinary' 'rather poetic' and 'poetic' seems promising. Anything more that this is not attempted in the evaluation.

The following literary criteria are here set up.

1. Emotional appeal.
2. Sincerity.
3. Universality.
4. Verisimilitude.
5. Imagination.
   A. Imagery.
   B. Figures of speech.
7. Ideality.
8. Excellence of thought.
   A. Rhythm.
   C. Quality of style of treatment.
      a. Energy.

   a. Trite diction.
   b. Prosaic language.
   c. Flowery language.
   d. Wordy language.
   e. Artistic treatment of language.

Emotion. It would be difficult to find an authoritative definition of poetry that does not specify emotion as the chief characteristic. (See note 5, page 17; note 19, page 35; note 30, page 38; note 31, page 39; note 43, page 42).

"This, at least, will be granted, that no literary expression can, properly speaking, be called poetry that is not in a certain deep sense emotional,..."44

Sincerity. Many poets and critics consider sincerity next in importance to emotional appeal. (See note 5, page 17).

Universality. A poem must have universal appeal. (See note 1, page 3). It must strike the chord of universal sympathy. For example, "Literature cannot appeal to the self-regarding emotions."45 It must appeal to emotions that are universal to all people. "... all phases of experience, however painful or mournful, that are universal and form a part of the common human lot, evoke in thought a not unpleasing sympathy."46

45 Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 63.
Verisimilitude. Poetry must have verisimilitude. This refers to the possible likeness of the situations, feelings and experiences expressed in the poem to the actual in real life. "... all emotional literature must have a basis in fact and truth." 47

Verisimilitude is expressed in "Literature is vicarious experience," so commonly used by modern critics. It is implied in the following: "From the whole body of experience the writer absorbs, forms and transmits as art to the reader what he has seen and felt and known." 48

"All our reading is vicarious experience - something we live through in another personality." 49

Imagination. Imagination has the function of enabling the poet to enhance the emotional appeal of his poem. The tools of imagination are imagery and figures of speech.

"Thus wonderfully can the poet heighten the emotional expression of an object by calling into association with it other images that tend to produce the same or allied emotions. This, then, is another and very important function of the imagination." 50

"Imagination, on the other hand, treats of ideal values, penetrates the surface of things, appeals to the highest, activity of the energy of the reader, sets him to creating for himself." 51

47 Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 54.
48 Lewisohn, Ludwig, op. cit., page xiv.
49 Steeves, H. R., Literary Aims and Art, page 2.
50 Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 125.
51 Gayley and Young, op. cit., page xivii.
Spontaneity. Poetry must be spontaneous. If not it lacks sincere emotion.

Ideality. Poetry must express ideals. It must lift us up to something finer; it must give us the highest kind of enjoyment. "Art must, therefore, make its appeal not to the senses alone, lower or higher, nor alone to the personal emotions, but to emotions which have no practical bearing on our everyday lives, no connection with selfish interests, but a significance that is universal, an aim that is ideal."53

"To put it in other words, a book of lasting importance will be found to view life with a convincing reality or a pleasurable or strengthening ideality."54

Thought. "Poetry, the most purely emotional form of literature, is to be measured always very largely by the amount and quality of thought which underlies its emotion."55

The thought must be sound and consistent with life's experiences and knowledge as they are known and interpreted by the best minds of the ages.

Form. The excellence of the form56 will enhance the effectiveness of poetic expression. The various principles listed under the general term form in the set of criteria are all related to form of expression.

52 "Wordsworth also emphasizes the emotional side of poetry when he defines it as 'the spontaneous overflow of powerful feelings recollected in tranquility.'" Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 11.

53 Gayley and Young, op. cit., page cix.

55 Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 149.

56 "Form we have defined as the sum of all the means by which thought and emotion are conveyed from one mind to another." Winchester, C. T., op. cit., page 190.
Rhythm, of course, is so essential to poetry that without it poetry actually could not exist. (See notes 6, 7 and 8 page 18, and note 4, page 17). The quality of a poem is enhanced by the melody and harmony resulting from the artistic mastery of rhythm. Crude rhythm indicates inartistic workmanship, poor taste, all of which result in poor quality of verse.

A poem that violates rhetorical principles (except by poetic license) such as unity, coherence, emphasis, syntax and proper choice of diction may have its quality seriously impaired.

Under the heading "Quality of style or treatment" certain special phases of treatment of form, manner and spirit were considered by this study such as energy, delicacy, vividness and uniqueness.

Energy in a poem is that spirit of force, power or boldness which impressively engages the reader's attention. It might be termed vividness. Delicacy has to do with precision, fine distinctions in shades of meaning, emotion and interpretation. A poem, to be worthwhile, must measure up well in energy and precision.

A poem which has uniqueness, that is a new twist in thought or treatment, will at least command interest through its novelty though this will not necessarily stamp it poetic. However, it is a step above the ordinary.
The quality and style of language treatment are important phases of form. Trite diction mars the quality of a poem. It is very easy to detect and, being a rather concrete measuring stick, can be quite accurately applied.

Prosaic language is everyday, matter-of-fact language. It has no power of suggestion or imagination. The words are arranged in a matter-of-fact way and there are no figures of speech or at least no striking ones. A poem with such language treatment cannot rise above the 'ordinary'.

Flowery language or 'fine writing' indicates affectation. Wordy language may give the impression of deception, poverty of thought or an over-dressed composition.

Artistic language shows mastery of language, especially in the choice and arrangement of words, and in the creation of effective, consistent figures of speech. Such language is essential in good poetry.

The Utah verse covered by this study was appraised by the application of the above criteria according to the specific methods presented in chapter one. Attention is here called to the following poems by Utah authors, examples of the various degrees of verse quality.

"The Stolen Sunbeams", a poem by Sarah E. Carmichael, a Mormon pioneer, is stamped poetic by this study. It appeared in reprint in the Magazine Section of the Salt Lake Tribune, March 8, 1936, page 6. It has striking imagery, emotional appeal, sincerity, spontaneity and imaginative quality.

The Stolen Sunbeam

"He stood on the height when the sun went down--
He tore one plume from the day's bright crown.
The proud orb stooped till he touched the brow,
And the marks of that touch are on
it now;
And the flash of its anger forever more
Burns red when it passes the western door!
The broken feather above him
whirled,
In flames of torture around him
curled
In broken masses of quivering light.
Oh! More terrible was the shock
When the burning splinters struck wave and rock.
The green earth shuddered, and shrank, and paled;
The waves sprang up and the mountains
quailed!
Look on the hills - let the scars they bear
Measure the pain of that hour's despair.
That severed light in the earth grew cold,
And the diction of mortals hath called it Gold."

The poem "To My Father" on page 26 of this thesis is considered poetic because of its sincere, emotional appeal.
It has the quality of verisimilitude, and a theme of universal interest. It seems to consistently express an intense, emotional experience, awakening within the reader either a similar experience or a sympathetic reaction. One should gain through this poem a deeper sympathy with life.
Another poem from "Utah Sings", page 308, entitled "Earth Bound" has a sincerity that would rank it 'rather poetic'. A few trite expressions mar the effectiveness of the language. The poem follows:

"Earth Bound"

"Beloved earth, the day will come when Life and I must part,
And I shall find a resting place against your throbbing heart;
Will my lone spirit walk again along a dear, loved lane
When maple trees are dripping in a mist of summer rain?

"Oh, winds of earth, I've loved you when you've lashed me in the face,
Shall I feel again your stinging kiss, or thrill to your embrace?
When a pale moon shines on garden walls, can I come once more
To tend the roses I have loved, beside my cottage door?

"When heavy south winds blow, bringing scent of sage that's wet,
Pregnant with sweet memories that I cannot forget,
When wild geese fly forlornly across a sky of gray,
Oh, earth, I must return to you, though death should bar the way."

The following poem, "Conversation", from "Utah Sings", page 34, is considered by this study 'above ordinary'. It is imaginative, and unique with an impressive, philosophical thought. It is what might be termed 'light verse' with a theme of a social or friendly experience as the basis for reflective thought on the misunderstandings and misconceptions that might arise in life.

"Conversation"

"His mind with its ideas was a cupboard
Full of pewter dishes set in deep-cut grooves,
And one by one he took the empty plates
From off the shelves
And passing them to his friends,
Replacing them with satisfying nods,
Believing that his guests had banqueted.

"Her mind was a delightful cabinet
Of colored boxes filled with spicy cakes,
And in the evening when they both were there,
She put her tiny cakes bewitchingly
Upon the hard dull metal
Of her husband's pewter plates;
And by the miracle of friendship's firelight
Their guests were feasted, and reluctantly
Smiled their way home
With wonder in their hearts
At this congenial and well-mated pair."

The poem "What Have You Sown" on page 24 of this study is an example of the 'ordinary poem'. A criticism accompanies the poem.

The poem "Cripple Jim" on page 19 is an example of a 'very ordinary' poem.
CHAPTER III

RESULTS OF EVALUATION AND ANALYSIS OF UTAH POETRY

The results of evaluating and analyzing the Utah poetry covered by this study are recorded in this chapter. There were 3,528 poems read, which included a sampling from a total of 924 authors. (See table 1, page 12). In many cases but one poem from an author was read while from others the number reached more than forty. This can be accounted for by the frequency with which the various authors' poems appeared throughout the magazines read.

Table 2 shows the proportionate number of poems relative to the degree of poetic quality. It will be noted that 2.3 per cent of the total poems evaluated was considered high in poetic quality and that 35.3 per cent were considered ordinary. The percentage of high quality poetry of most any age is low and observation shows that the great bulk of literature written and published is read to-day and forgotten to-morrow.

It will be further noted from table 2 that about 70 per cent of the poetry is poor in quality and in the author's judgment, is not worthwhile reading, at least for the schools. It fails to measure up to the standards of good poetry.

Some incidental facts concerning the general analysis of the poetry are recorded in the various tables to be found in this chapter.

The rhythm of 1561 poems was given special attention. Six and six-tenths per cent of the poems showed marked crudeness in rhythm.

Table 4 shows the extent of blank verse and free verse. Only .9 per cent of the verse read is blank verse. The author observed no free verse before 1900 and, in fact, very little until after 1920.

Table 5 shows triteness to be a fault of 12 per cent of the poetry. This represents excessive use of trite expressions, treatment and worn out ideas in each poem so noted.

Poems, that were strikingly moralistic, that is, that had for the sole purpose the teaching of morals or ethical principles, amounted to 7.5 per cent.

Table 6 represents facts concerning the themes of the poetry studied. It might be incidentally observed by the reader that each column of percentages will not total 100 per cent or nearly so, nor will the sum of the numbers in the column necessarily check with the number of poems read. This can be accounted for by the fact that there is a lapping over of themes in many of the poems. A Christmas poem, for instance may also be religious and, if so, it was counted with the religious as well as with the Christmas poems. By studying table 6 the reader can discover the relative frequency of each of the twenty themes observed by this study.

It will be seen from table 7 that the percentage of lyrical poems is very high and the percentage of narrative and dramatic poems very low.

The fact that magazines cater to the short poem; which is usually lyrical, might partly account for this wide difference.

From table 8 it will be noted that didactic poetry is rather prominent.

Local color poetry has a rather lower percentage than might be expected.

Table 9 indicates 5.2 per cent of the poetry readable for the Utah schools. This percentage corresponds to that in table 2 relative to the poetry of high degree of poetic quality. This 5.2 per cent make up the reading list given in chapter VI. Another list comprising 11.8 per cent of the poetry seemed promising for reading material. It is indicated in the table as 'questionable'.

Some further results of this study relative to certain trends of Utah poetry are noted in this chapter. Special observance was made of the tendencies of the theme of general philosophy of life, the theme of general religious character, the theme of Latter-Day Saint religious philosophy, the theme of nature, and the philosophy on immortality. The trends in literary quality of the verse, the quality of the verse, and the kinds of poetry were also noted.

The trends are represented graphically on the basis of comparative percentages of each item considered and are traced through the three periods, namely, 1840-1900, 1900-1920, and 1920-1934. The periods are indicated horizontally across the page (see graph 1), and percentage vertically with labelled lines crossing horizontally through the periods to show upward or downward trend.

In table 6, in the 1840-1900 period, the theme of philosophy of life is shown to have a relative percentage of 35.7 and in the periods 1900-1920 and 1920-1934 a relative percentage of 54.3 and 38.2 respectively. It will be noted by table 6 that this theme has the greatest frequency of all themes. In graph 1 its relation to three other themes is shown both in frequency and tendency throughout the three periods.

TREND IN CERTAIN THEMES OF UTAH VERSE EXPRESSED IN PERCENTAGE.
The theme of general philosophy of life has the highest frequency of all themes and shows throughout the three periods a slight ascendancy. The sum of the frequencies of the theme 'philosophy with religious tone' and the theme 'religious' is next highest with a rather sharp decline in tendency. The religious theme ranks next in frequency with a rather sharp decline that drops below the nature theme in the 1920-1934 period. The nature theme gradually rises through the second period with a sharp climb in the third. On the whole the religious nature or tone of the poetry, which was comparatively high to begin with, is declining rather rapidly and the theme of nature rising in frequency.

The tendencies of the various other themes can be seen by noting the percentage of relative frequencies in table 6.

Graph 2 shows the tendency of the philosophy on immortality. 'Immortality certain' (see page 25) shows a sudden decline through the second and third periods while 'immortality doubtful' shows an equally sudden rise. The author did not discover any poems inferring 'immortality doubtful' in the 1840-1900 period.

From graph 3 it can be noted that there is a general upward tendency in quality of verse. The 'ordinary' shows a slight increase in the second period over the first and a sudden decline in the third period. The 'poetic' remains quite constant through the three periods. The frequency of the very ordinary, which is not plotted here is almost identical with that of the 'poetic'. (See table 2).

Graph 4 indicates the tendency in quantity of verse. (See table 2). There is a marked increase. The author observed, incidentally, that the poems have tended to grow shorter in length, and more numerous in each successive issue of most any given magazine read for this study. For example, but two poems appear in the December issue for 1903. It is not uncommon to find 20 or more poems in a single issue of the Improvement Era of recent date.

Graph 5 shows a very high frequency of lyrical poems, a comparatively low one of narrative poems and an almost negligible one of dramatic poems. The lyrical poems are increasing and the narrative decreasing.

Some of these tendencies are so sudden and extreme that there must be unusual factors of influence at work. It can be assumed that among them the most significant are religion, science, leisure time and outside poetry.

Religion and ethical teaching have used poetry as a medium for their messages. Ludwig Lewisohn, in his "Expression in America" constantly reminds the reader of the Puritan influence on American poetry, which influence, he 57"If we have produced no masterpieces of a very high order, if both wholeness and high severity are lacking even to our best works, that is a fate which we share with all but one of the contemporary peoples. And the cause lies, I must be permitted to repeat, in that universal situation of mankind which is in the last analysis a religious and metaphysical one." Lewisohn, Ludwig, op. cit., page 589.

claims, is responsible for the didactic tone and mediocre quality of American verse. The comparatively high frequency of the religious theme in the 1840-1900 period might be thus partly accounted for. And secondly, the theme nearest the hearts of the pioneers of Utah was religion. That the religious theme tone could have impaired the quality of the main bulk of the poetry is probably true but did it impair or enhance the quality of the small margin of the best poetry? Graph 3 shows a high constancy in the latter but the main bulk of poetry seems to improve as the religious theme and influence decline. (See also graph 1).

Another influence that seems apparent is that of science. It has seriously questioned either directly, or indirectly, many religious doctrines. It has stimulated man's mind to think in terms of the concrete things perceptible to the purely physical senses. Things by faith alone are not certain, definite or concrete in the light of science. Then again all depends on man's interpretation of the relationship of science to religion. In 1910 Orson F. Whitney began to write his poem "Love and the Light". "This poem" he says, "has a definite purpose. To combat the influence of the so-called 'Higher Criticism', which is indoctrinating with hurtful effect the minds and hearts of many of the youth -- that is its paramount aim."58 "Love and the Light" is a poem with a religious purpose and message. Mr. Whitney no doubt means by the expression "Higher Criticism" the criticism of religion by science by those who are apt to misinterpret the true purpose of science or misapply it to religion.

It seems possible that science has influenced the philosophy of immortality. At least it must be one of the factors that is responsible for the abrupt change indicated by graph 2.

Among many other things, education and more leisure time are responsible for the increase in amount of poetry. There must be time to read as well as write poetry. There is little time for such activity and art in a pioneering stage.

According to graph 5 the frequency of lyrical poetry is very high.\textsuperscript{59} It seems to be the natural tendency of the age to read and write lyrical verse.

Quite often poems from the New England poets, American poets in general or even the British poets of the nineteenth century appeared in the magazines read for this study. In comparing many of these with those of local writers, there seems to be little difference in quality, purpose or treatment. A portion of a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox is here presented as rather typical of the general run of poetry of the latter half of the nineteenth century. It is ordinary, didactic and moralistic. The reader might compare it to the poem by a local author which is to be found on page 22 of this thesis. The following comes from the Contributor, vol. 16, page 746, 1895.

\textsuperscript{59}"Literature, in other words, has become more and more lyrical and subjective in both origin and appeal." Lewisohn, Ludwig, \textit{op. cit.}, page xiv.

WHAT HAVE YOU DONE

I saw a farmer when the day was done,
   The setting sun had sought its crimson bed,
And mild stars came forward one by one.
   I saw the sturdy farmer and I said:
      "What have you done today,
      Oh, farmer say?"

"Oh, I've sown the wheat in yonder field,
   And pruned my orchard to increase the yield,
And turned the furrow for a patch of corn --
   This have I done since early morn."

I saw another when the night drew nigh
   And turned each daily toiler from his task,
When gold and crimson cloudlets decked the sky.
   "What have you done today,
   Drink seller, say?"

But the drink seller turned with drooping head.
   And not a single word in answer said.
What had he done? His work he knew full well
   Was plunging souls in deepest hell!

"When death shall call, your race is run,
   How can you answer? What can you say, ...
When God shall question you, 'What have you done'?
   How can you meet the eye
   Of the most High?"

"When night approaches and the day grows late
   Think you to find your way to heaven's gate?
Think you to dwell with souls of honest men?
   Think you to enter in? If not, what then?"
This chapter attempts to answer two questions. First, what are some of the significant objectives of literature courses and, second, do any of the poems evaluated by this study seem to meet these objectives.

In this study the objectives of literature courses were kept in mind when the poems were read and analyzed, with the object of noting all the readable ones. Two lists resulted. One contained the poems that seemed recommendable without question, and the other contained those that were questionable. On further consideration by curriculum makers and literary critics, some poems of the secondary list might be found recommendable for reading in the schools of Utah. In chapter six the primary list appears, graded for elementary and secondary schools.

Among others there are two chief influences that underlie modern curriculum making relative to poetry. One of these is the knowledge revealed by the modern study of child psychology, and the other is the theory that the classroom is the 60 "We have noted two influences in particular that underlie the modern curriculum. These are the science of child psychology and the new interpretation of the classroom as a place in which to live and learn to live." Hooper, John, Poetry in the New Curriculum, page 31.

place in which to 'live and learn to live'.

If the school room is the place to 'live and learn to live',\(^{61}\) poetry of high quality will be one of the factors in the realization of this objective. (See note 49, page 45, and note 54, page 46).

"One of the practical methods of improving human life is to develop the child's appreciation of the beautiful. Poetry is one of the groups of subjects that aim at this ideal, this development of the aesthetic sense, this joy in beauty. All teaching of poetry, to be practical, must foster this love of the beautiful."\(^{62}\)

In the past there were three main objectives in teaching poetry. "These were: first, to teach a moral lesson; second, to afford training in elocution; third, to develop an appreciation of poetry."\(^{63}\)

The first and second objectives are, in the light of modern theory, much modified. The main purpose of a poem is not to teach a moral, (see notes 11, 12 and 13, page 22) and any poem written solely for that purpose is not of the highest quality. Genuine poetry cannot be propaganda; it is an art to be enjoyed for its own sake. (See note 3, page 16).

\(^61\) "... make our students desire the vicarious experiences provided by good books, and the delights of beautiful expression." The author further says that students should be, "...stirred to significant activity by what they read." Cox, Sidney, The Teaching of English, page 101.

\(^62\) Hooper, John, op. cit., page 32.

\(^63\) Hooper, John, op. cit., page 34.
Neither should poetry be used solely as a tool for training in elocution. "In order to read poetry well, it is indeed necessary that the voice be sensitive to rhythm of that poetry. The traditional objectives, however, used poetry as a means rather than an end. Its end was to bring out the voice."\(^{64}\)

The old objective to develop an appreciation of poetry is in accord with the idea that poetry should be taught for its own sake but, "'Appreciation of poetry' was a term not clearly defined in the minds of those who used it. ... Therefore, in most cases, appreciating became synonymous with analyzing."\(^{65}\)

The fundamental elements underlying poetry parallel those characteristics in the psychological make up of the child. If this were not the case, poetry, of course, could not interest human beings. Rhythm and emotion are the primary elements in primitive man that laid the basis of poetry and therefore these appeal to the child; in fact appeal universally to both child and adult.

The elements, then, in the child's psychological make-up parallel the basic elements in all poetry. "This parallel may be followed so closely through the grades as to provide us with a real basis for preparation of an elementary course in poetry.

1. The primary appeal of poetry is to the emotions, \(\cdots\).
   Since emotional language is essentially rhythmical, it is to this element of poetry that he reacts most strongly.

2. His world is an objective one. The concrete objects that make up this world are a source of constant curiosity. If poetry is to please him, therefore, it must cater to this curiosity.\(\cdots\)

\(^{64}\) Hooper, John, op. cit., page 37.
\(^{65}\) Hooper, John, op. cit., page 37.
3. The primary child's adjustment to his world is an active one. He is continually doing something and is interested in what other people are doing. These interests, aided by his innate ability to participate in further activity of a make-believe world, give the poem of action a special appeal to him.

4. Moreover, the primary child, like the primitive man, speaks more naturally in poetry than he does in prose.

5. His vocabulary is a limited one; so he has to make it go farther.

6. The child plays with words as he plays with other things. Their sound, the pictures they draw, the surprise of new names, and the identification of his experiences in the action of words, are a kind of pleasure he shares with his primitive ancestors.

7. Once out of this world, when he has acquired a background of experiences and the maturity to discriminate among them, his attitude becomes more reflective. He is beginning to be interested in ideas. Then poetry holds more for him than the purely emotional appeal. This period has its beginning somewhere in the middle grades, but it is only a beginning.

From the above quotation it is indicated that poetry for the child must appeal to the fundamental elements of his psychological make-up; namely, the emotions, curiosity, imagination, poetic language instinct, play, and, as he progresses physically and mentally, interest in ideas. The author of this study finds few poems that seem to serve these objec-

66 Hooper, John, op. cit., pages 39-41.

67 "The imagination of the child is very vivid. Creative imagination is the source of invention, discovery and all progress. It is basic in all the fine and lasting in art, music, literature, and religion." Gast and Skinner, Fundamentals of Educational Psychology, page 252.

68 "Reading is a form of play. It is play for the imagination with materials conveniently supplied by the author and it serves to gratify desires and longings." Woodworth, Robert S., Psychology-Revised Edition, page 401.
tives. More poems were found that would serve the objectives for students advanced to a stage of an interest in ideas.

This suggests two other important things to consider in choosing reading material in the schools. First, the child's familiarity with the theme and content of the poem and, second, the fact that poetry, which might be of interest to one age or group, will not necessarily be to another.

Relative to the first it must be said that the child proceeds from the known to the unknown. The simpler poetic forms and ideas naturally come first. These pave the way for the more advanced. The child's literature should parallel his 69 "The imagination of youth partially supplies the place of experience; but much of what is greatest in poetry is comparatively meaningless to those who have never known love, sorrow, married life, children. It is unfortunate that most of us read the masterpieces of English poetry only in our immature years in school and college, for the great poets write mainly for the mature and the experienced." Hubbell and Beaty, op. cit., page 20.

70 "What is literature for mature people may or may not be literature for youths of high school age; and what is literature for a boy of fourteen may or may not be literature for him at eighteen. To be literature for a given age or group a production must deal with life situations common to that age and group; and it must deal with them so as to give an interpretation which is in harmony with the moral and artistic taste of that age and group. All the masterpieces of English Literature of the past remain literature today in America in so far as they realize and present in appreciable artistic form typical life situations which are common now in our country, i.e., have the element of universality. One trouble in our high schools is that we have assumed that what was once literature is necessarily always literature and that literature for educated adults is literature for boys and girls." Crow, Charles Summer, Evolution of English in the High School. Doctor's Thesis, 1924. Teacher's College, Columbia University - N. Y. City. Contribution to Education, No. 141.
life's experiences and season them with something just a little beyond his ordinary life in ideality. Contemporary poetry related closely to the time and place of the child will awaken his interest and, (granting that it should be what is considered the best contemporary poetry), pave the way to the classic.

In the second place the poetry must fit the child's age and experience. He cannot be expected to understand and enjoy a poem that deals with experiences common to only the adult or to some remote place and time.

It is indicated by many educational writers that, in general, literature courses should do the following:

1. Stimulate students' interest in good books. (See note 71 page 74.
2. Present high ideals of character.
3. Establish desirable reading habits for high type of literature.
4. Promote appreciation of masterpieces or accepted classics.
5. Enlarge experience.

71"There is a strong feeling that adequate standards of literary taste and appreciation can be developed best in the child through a wide acquaintance of contemporary literature interpreting the life of his own time, and then with other more traditional material." Stroth, Mary Margaret, Literature for Grades VII, VIII and IX, page 92. Master's Thesis. Teachers College, Columbia University, 1926.
7. Provide wholesome pleasure.

Nearly all of these objectives are suggested in the two following quotations.

"The objective for the study of literature in secondary education is conceived to be the development of right attitudes through an abundance of reading which reveals wholesome, ethical and aesthetic values and also an ultimate preference for reading which uses adequate literary forms."\(^7^2\)

"Modern literature is regarded as a means of enjoyment of experience, the formation of ideals, and the unselfish enjoyment of leisure."\(^7^3\)

In the main, then, the choice of poetry for reading material in the schools, from what has thus far been reviewed in this chapter, can be based on knowledge of child psychology, the theory that the school room is a place in which to live and learn to live, the fact that the poetry which is interesting to one age or group will not necessarily be to another, the child's familiarity with the theme and content and the seven general objectives as listed above.

To meet the above objectives literature will need to be of high quality. It will need to awaken the emotions, stimulate the imagination, present high ideals of character, enlarge and enrich experiences and provide wholesome pleasure.

Any Utah poem that seems to meet one or more of these objectives was listed for reading material in the schools of \(^7^2\) Morrison, Henry C., The Practice of Teaching in the Secondary Schools, page 335.

Utah. It is evident that it would have to be 'above ordinary', 'rather poetic' or 'poetic' in quality. But all poetry of these three degrees of quality was not recommended. The nature of the theme may prohibit the availability of a poem for reading, though it have many worthy qualities. Some poems were recommended on the basis of local color or historical significance, (see note 71 page 78) though they might have been labelled 'above ordinary'. Several poems of this nature were placed in the secondary list.

If the poetry of Utah is to be read in the schools it should not be for state patriotism's sake but to fulfill the purpose of poetry in the school curriculum as herein pointed out. It may have some historical value and worthwhile local color, but it must at least have poetic quality of a high degree and meet one or more objectives of literature courses.

The Utah poems, which, in the author's judgment, guided by literary criteria, measure up well in literary quality and meet one or more of the above objectives of literature courses, are to be found in the two lists in chapter six.
CHAPTER VI

GRADE PLACEMENT OF READABLE POEMS

The poems found recommendable by this study for reading in the elementary and secondary schools of Utah are listed in this chapter. They have been chosen on the basis of their worthy literary quality as revealed by their evaluation through the application of the literary criteria set up in chapter two, and the objectives of literature courses as presented in chapter five. Two lists have been made, one for the elementary grades and one for the secondary grades. This classification is tentative, as was explained on page thirty-one, and is based on the objectives for literature courses, and the theme, content and treatment that, in the author's judgment would be suitable and interesting to the grades respectively. The poems have been listed in the following tables which give the author, title, and source of the poem. The reader is referred to tables 10 and 11.

The author prepared a secondary list, many poems of which list, might, on further deliberation be found recommendable for the schools of Utah. That list is not given in this thesis but is accessible through the notes on the poems covered by this study.

CHAPTER VII

ATTITUDES AND KNOWLEDGE RELATIVE TO UTAH POETRY

AS REVEALED BY QUESTIONNAIRES

RESULTS OF THE QUESTIONNAIRE TO SUPERINTENDENTS

First the results of the questionnaire to superintendents (see appendix A and table 12 page 93) will be reviewed. The objectives of the questionnaire may be found on page 31.

A questionnaire was sent to each of the forty school superintendents of Utah. Twenty-seven were answered and returned, a 67.5% response. As may be noted from the results in table 12 the general attitude towards the introduction of Utah poetry into the schools is, on the whole, very favorable.

The officials almost unanimously suggest that the poetry be introduced as incidental or supplementary reading.

There were three main objections to the introduction of Utah poetry into Utah schools upon which the response was about equally divided. One was based on poor literary quality, one on sectarianism and one on the insignificance of its educational value. Eight out of the twenty-seven did not answer question three. However, some of those who wrote comments relative to objections.

Eighty-five and two tenths per cent ranked Utah poetry as less important than other local subject matter. Fourteen-and eight tenths per cent ranked it equal in importance.

Forty-four and four tenths per cent favored a college course in Utah poetry, for teachers.

The questionnaire indicates that school officials have given some thought to the question under discussion and have done a little to awaken an interest in the same, especially by way of encouraging creative writing. Fifteen superintendents sent in comments most of which indicate active interest. These comments may be found in appendix C.

RESULTS OF QUESTIONNAIRES TO COLLEGE STUDENTS

The purpose of the questionnaire to college students may be found on page 33 and a copy of it is in appendix B.

Five hundred and twenty-five questionnaires were given out to college students and 480 were answered and returned. Two hundred and eighty-two were answered by the students of the Utah State Agricultural College, 118 by the students of the University of Utah and 80 by the students of the Brigham Young University.

Out of the 480 responding 133 were prospective teachers, with English majors. The results of the 480 as a whole and also the results of the prospective teachers were respectively tabulated in table 13, page 96. Some students failed to answer certain questions. The percentages found in the table are based on the actual number answering the respective questions.
The results show in general, a favorable attitude towards Utah poetry. The prospective teacher group seems slightly more favorable in some respects and less favorable in others. Sixty-nine and five tenths per cent of the total group thought Utah poetry should be taught in the schools as compared to 67.7 per cent of the prospective teacher group. Sixty-four and nine tenths per cent of the total group expressed interest in a college course in Utah poetry, and 73.9 per cent of the prospective teacher group indicated interest in the same.

A high percentage (see table 13, page 96) of the students thought the poetry of sufficient literary quality to merit serious consideration. One hundred and twenty-seven or 34.2 per cent of the students who answered question 21 thought the theme of religion the theme most frequently used in Utah poetry. Twenty-four and five tenths per cent thought the theme, pioneers, most frequently used. See table 13 for ranking of themes by students relative to frequency.

Table 14, page 97, shows the results of the part of the questionnaire which tested the students' elementary knowledge of Utah poetry and Utah poets. The test shows this knowledge to be rather meager. The highest possible score is 30 with an average score of 8 or 26.8 per cent for the group as a whole and 6.2 average score or 27.3 per cent for the prospective group. Twenty-three students failed to answer this part of the questionnaire. Many of these stated that they know nothing about the poetry and therefore either guessed or did not answer at all.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

About five per cent of the Utah verse has high literary quality. About seventy-five per cent is too ordinary and poor in quality to merit consideration for reading material especially in the schools of Utah. About five per cent is too highly colored with theological doctrine, though its literary quality is above ordinary. About ten per cent shows promise. The relative quantity of the poetry most literary in quality remains fairly constant at about three per cent. The theme of general philosophy of life has the highest frequency in Utah poetry. In the nineteenth century the frequency of themes highly colored with religion was almost as high but from 1900 declined rapidly. The frequency of the theme of nature has increased rapidly since 1920. The frequency of poems colored with sectarianism has gone from 15.9 per cent in 1900 to 1.6 per cent in 1933. From 1900 to the present the philosophy of immortality has undergone a great change from an expression of certainty in life hereafter to an expression of doubt. The results of the questionnaire indicate that the common notion relative to themes in Utah poetry is that themes of religious character occur with higher frequency than any other. This is true of the nineteenth century but throughout the entire period from 1840 to 1934 the theme of religious character, including the strictly religious in purpose, the sectarian and the partially religious, has a frequency of 27.9 per cent while general philosophy of life has a frequency of 42.3 per cent.

The attitude of Utah school superintendents toward the question of whether or not Utah poetry should be taught in Utah schools indicates that the question is worthy of serious consideration.

The attitude of the prospective teachers also indicates this. Furthermore, the questionnaire to college students shows a meager knowledge of Utah poetry. Seventy-three and nine tenths per cent of the prospective teachers and sixty-four and nine tenths per cent of the students as a whole indicate an interest in a course in Utah poetry.

The Conclusions Are:

1. That there is a small percentage of worthwhile Utah poetry sufficient to justify its consideration.
2. That this poetry should be introduced into the elementary and secondary schools of Utah.
3. That Utah school officials and prospective teachers show, on the whole, a favorable interest in the question herein discussed.
4. That, through further critical study of Utah verse, this interest in the question might be stimulated into some definite action.

APPENDIX C

SUPERINTENDENTS' COMMENTS

The following are the comments written by the superintendents who answered the questionnaire.

"It should be studied if it has real literary value."

"Can someone verify its quality and worth?"

"Don't think we should study Utah poetry just because it is local. If it has real literary merit, that part of it should be included in our literature courses."

"I am not competent to give an intelligent opinion."

College courses to be given for "those who choose."

"Has Utah any recognized poets? I think that Utah poems may well receive some attention in our schools; but until some are really recognized as a leading poet, his work should not be made the basis of a course."

Basis of a definite course "in larger schools."

On number 6. "Utah poetry could become a part of the material considered."

"Utah has many latent poets who need encouragement and direction. Such talents should not be falled."

"I did not answer No. 3. I think poetry should be taught, but we should teach the poetry that fits the age and maturity of our children, whether it is Utah poetry or Iowa poetry should not enter."

On number 3. "Builders of curricula probably haven't thought of it."

"The subject for your Master's thesis sounds interesting."

"For No. 3 I would say teachers not qualified to teach successfully Utah or any other poetry."

On No. 6. "There are too many courses in college now. It could be a part of a course."

"I believe a little stimulation of creative writing by students in all grades would be about as useful language training as can be given."
